When the envoy returned, he related the whole story of Bahrām's doings to the king. The king was full of wonder at Bahrām's strength and boldness, gave him rich presents and questioned him about himself and his background. Bahrām told him that he was one of the great men of the Persians, but had incurred the wrath of the king of Persia for a certain reason, hence had fled from him to the king of India's protection. Now that latter monarch had an enemy who had tried to deprive him of his kingdom and had marched against him with a large army. The king, Bahrām's patron, had become fearful of the enemy because of what he knew of this enemy's might and the fact that the latter demanded of him submission and payment of tribute. Bahrām's patron was on the point of acceding to the enemy's demands, but [868]
Bahrām dissuaded him from that, and guaranteed to him that the affair would be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. The king's mind became tranquil and confident in Bahram's words, and Bahrām set out, prepared for war.

When the two armies encountered each other, Bahrām said to the Indian cavalrymen (asāwirah),[258] "Protect my rear," and then

258. This is the Arabic broken pl. formed from the sing. aswār/uswār, from MP aswār, "cavalryman," used specifically in Sāsānid times for the heavy, mailed cavalrymen who formed the backbone of the army. It seems originally to have denoted a high military rank, the chief of a military unit, but in Sāsānid times came to be applied to the cavalrymen in general. These aswārān were certainly ranked among what might be called the aristocracy and landed gentry of Persia, and in the fiscal reforms of Khusraw Anūsharwān they were one of the classes exempted from paying the poll tax on account of their great services to the state (thus enumerated by al-Ṭabarī, I, 962, p. 259 below, where al-muqātilah = aswārān; in his equivalent passge, al-Dīnawarī specifically has asāwirah, see n. 625 below). In the accounts of the battles of the Muslim Arabs with the armies of the last Sāsānids, e.g., in al-Balādhurī's Futūḥ al-buldān, the asāwirah emerge as an élite of mounted archers. See Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, 171, and the detailed discussion in Widengren, "Recherches sur le feudalisme iranien," 170–76; and for later usage of the term aswārī, extending up to Mughal and British Indian times as suwār, Anglicised as sowar, see EIr, s.v. Asāwera (C. E. Bosworth).

he led an assault on the enemy. He began to strike their heads with blows that split the head down to the mouth; to strike another in midbody so that he cut him in half; to go up to an elephant and sever its trunk with his sword; and to sweep a rider off his saddle. The Indians are a people who are not very skillful in archery, and most of them fought on foot, not having horses; when, on the other hand, Bahrām shot an arrow at one of the enemy, the shaft penetrated right through him. When the enemy saw what was happening, they wheeled round and fled, without turning aside to do anything. Bahrām's patron seized as plunder everything in the enemy's camp, and returned home rejoicing and glad, in company with Bahrām. As a reward for Bahrām's efforts, the king bestowed on him his daughter in marriage and granted to him al-Daybul, Makrān, and the adjacent parts of Sind.[259] He wrote out for him an investiture patent for all this, had the grant to him confirmed before witnesses, and gave orders for those territories to

259. Daybul, the Arabized form of a possible original something like Dēwal, was the great port of Sind in pre-Islamic and early Islamic times, and the first city of the province to be captured by the Arab commander Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim al-Thaqafī in 92/711–12. Moses Khorenac'i (later sixth century to early eighth century ?) mentions the district of *Dēpuhl, linking it, as here, with Makrān and Sind in general (see Marquart, Ērānšahr, 45). It lay in the Indus delta region to the west of the river's then main channel, but its location is still a matter for conjecture since an identification with the archaeological site Bhanbore is by no means certain. See S. Qudratullah Fatimi, "The Twin Ports of Daybul. A Study in the Early Maritime History of Sind," 97–105; *EI*², s.v. Daybul (A. S. Bazmee Ansari).

Makrān is the coastal region of what is now Pakistani and Persian Baluchistan. Whether it embraced the region known from Sumerian and old Akkadian texts as Magan, in the OP inscriptions Maka (where it is described as a satrapy of Darius the Great), and also from Akkadian texts as Melukhkha, has called forth varying opinions. Recently, de Blois, on the evidence of the texts of two Elamite tablets from the so-called Persepolis fortification tablets, has argued that Maka denotes the region called in Middle Iranian, Syriac, Armenian, and Arabic sources, from the third century A.D. onward, Mazūn = 'Umān; see his "Maka and Mazūn." 160–67. Whatever the truth, Greek historians of the time of Alexander call Makrān Gedrosia; and the region appears in the Naqsh-i Rustam inscription of Kerdēr as Mkwl'n. Despite the reported pretensions of early Persian monarchs to control it, as here with Bahrām Gūr, Makrān probably remained always within the Indian rather than the Persian political and cultural sphere, in Bahrām's time under the influence of the Brahman kings of Sind. See Ḥudūd al-'ālam, trans. 123, comm. 373; Marquart, op. cit., 33–34; Le Strange, Lands, 329–30; *EI*², s.v. Makrān (C. E. Bosworth).

be added to the Persian lands, with their land tax to be paid to Bahrām. Bahrām then returned [to his homeland] rejoicing.[260]

After this, Bahrām sent Mihr Narsī, son of Burāzah, on an expedition against the Roman lands, at the head of a force of forty thousand warriors. He ordered him to make for their supreme ruler ('aẓīm) and discuss with him the question of the tribute and other things, tasks that only a man of Mihr Narsī's caliber could undertake. Mihr Narsī then marched off with this army and matériel, and entered Constantinople. He played a notable role there, and the supreme ruler of the Romans made a truce with him. He returned homeward having achieved all that Bahrām had desired, and the latter heaped honors unceasingly on Mihr Narsī.[261]

His name was sometimes rendered in a "lightened" (mukhaffaf) form as just Narsī, and sometimes people would say Mihr Narsih.

---

260. Naturally, there is no question of the historicity of these fabulous Indian adventures of Bahrām, which appear, however, in other Arabic sources such as Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 660–61 (detailed account, clearly based on the same source as al-Ṭabarī); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 191 = § 612 (describes Bahrām's secret mission to the court of King Shubrumah, probably to be identified with the Gupta monarch Chandragupta II, r. 376–415); Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 49 (very brief mention); and Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 122–25.

261. This is a cursory mention of the war with Byzantium that broke out in 421 shortly after Bahrām's accession. It ran counter to the general trend in Byzantine-Persian relations of the period, which had been one of peace since the treaty of 384 between Theodosius II and Shābūr III. It seems to have been provoked, on the one hand, by the violent persecution of Christians within the Persian lands that broke out at the beginning of the new reign (see n. 242 above), and, on the other hand, by Byzantine attempts to use Christian missionary activities in order to secure the allegiance of Arab tribes of the Syrian Desert fringes and by the Byzantines' sheltering of Christian converts from those fringes under Persian control.

The war was ended by a peace treaty in the following year. It promised religious freedom for Christians of Persia and for Zoroastrians in the Byzantine lands; each side was prohibited from accepting and sheltering Arab allies of the other side if these Arabs should rebel; and the Greeks were to pay an annual tribute, ostensibly for the defense of the pass at Darband against the barbarians beyond the Caucasus, but which contained no territorial changes to the boundary between the two powers. See J. B. Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene (395 A.D. to 800 A.D.), I, 304–305; idem, History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius to the Death of Justinian (A.D. 395 to A.D. 565), I, 4–5; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 118; Christensen, Sassanides, 281; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 145; Z. Rubin, "Diplomacy and War in the Relations between Byzantium and the Sassanids in the Fifth Century A.D.," 679–81; G. Greatrex, "The Two Fifth-Century Wars between Rome and Persia," 1–14.

[869] He was Mihr Narsī, son of Burāzah, son of Farrukhzādh, son of Khūrahbādh, son of Sīsfādh, son of Sīsanābrūh, son of Kay Ashak, son of Dāra, son of Dāra, son of Bahman, son of Isfandiyār, son of Bishtāsb.[262] Mihr Narsī was held in high honor by all the kings of Persia because of his fine education and manners, the excellence of his judgment, and the contentedness and tractability of the masses of the people with him. He had, moreover, several sons, who approached him in worth and who fulfilled various offices for the monarchs that almost reached his own office [in rank and importance]. There were three of them who had reached an outstanding position. One was Zurwāndādh,[263] whom Mihr Narsī had intended for religion and the religious law. In this sphere he attained such a leading position that Bahrām Jūr appointed him Chief Hērbadh (Hirbadhān Hirbadh), a rank near to that of Chief Mōbadh. The second was called Mājusnas, who remained in charge of the department of the land tax all through the reign of Bahrām Jūr, the name of his rank in Persian being Wastrā'i'ūshān Sālār.[264] The third was called Kārd[ār], supreme commander of the army, the name of his rank in Persian being Rathāshtārān Sālār;[265] this is a rank higher than that of al-Iṣbahbadh and is near to that of al-Arjabadh.[266]

---

262. Mihr Narseh's Arsacid descent, in fact linking the first Arsacids with a Darius of the Achaemenids and then with the legendary kings of early Persia (only detailed here and in the Sprenger ms.), shows that scions of the previous, fallen dynasty could nevertheless rise to high office under the Sāsānids; cf. n. 84 above.

263. Following here the version of this name preferred by Nöldeke from the Sprenger ms., set forth in his n. e, instead of the text's Zarāwandadh; the name Zurvandād is, in fact, attested, see Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 1091. The name would then mean "given by Zurvān," i.e., by the deification of time put forward by some heretical (?) Zoroastrian circles, erecting it into a guiding principle for the universe as the father of both Ahura Mazdā and Ahriman, hence above all gods and men. See R. C. Zaehner, The Dawn and Twilight of Zoroastrianism, 236–47 (his chapter here being more manageable than his exhaustive work, Zurvan, a Zoroastrian Dilemma, Oxford, 1955).

264. Following the form reconstructed by Nöldeke, in n. g for the text's Rās.t.r.āī w.shān.s.lān, i.e., Wāstaryōshān-sālār. The title would then be that of "head of [the class of] cultivators."

265. Following the form reconstructed by Nöldeke in n. i for the text's As.ṭ.rān s.lān, i.e., Artēshtārān-sālār. The title would then mean "head of [the class of] warrors." Cf. for this and the preceding note, Nöldeke, trans. 110 n. 4.

266. For the exalted title of argabadh, "commander of a fortress," see al-Ṭabarī, I, 815, p. 6 and n. 15 above.

Mihr Narsī's own title of rank was in Persian Buzurjfarmadhār, [870] which means in Arabic "supreme vizier" (wazīr al-wuzarā') or "supreme executive" (ra'īs al-ru'asā'). He is said to have come from a town (qaryah) called Abruwān[267] in the rural district of Dasht-i Bārīn[268] in the province of Ardashīr Khurrah. He had lofty buildings erected there and at Jirih, in the province of Sābūr, because of the contiguity of that and Dasht-i Bārīn, and he constructed there for himself a fire temple, which is said to be still in existence today,[269] with its fire still burning to this present moment. It is called Mihr Narsiyān. In the vicinity of Abruwān he founded four villages, with a fire temple in each one. He set up one of these for himself and called it Farāz-marā-āwar-khudāyā, meaning [in Arabic] "come to me, O my lord,"[270] with the aim of showing great veneration for the fire. The second one was meant for Zarāwandādh, and he called it Zarāwandādhān. The third was for Kārd[ār], and he called it Kārdādhān; and the last was for Mājushnas, and he called it Mājushnasfān.[271] He also laid out three gardens in this region: in one of them he planted twelve thousand date palms; in another, twelve thousand olive trees; and in [the third] garden, twelve thousand cypress trees. These villages, with [871] the gardens and the fire temples, have remained continuously in the hands of his descendants, who are well known till today, and it has been mentioned that all these remain in the best possible condition at the present time.

It has been mentioned that, after he had finished with Khāqān and the King of the Romans, Bahrām proceeded to the land of the

---

267. The text has 'b.r.wān, but the form of this name is uncertain. It may possibly be the Artuwān of al-Maqdisī, Aḥsan al-taqāsīm, 258, in the list of the towns and districts of Sāsānid Persia attributed to Qubādh (I), son of Fayrūz, or the Arduwāl/Arduwān of Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 149, as a small town of southwestern Persia.

268. The "plain of Bārīn" was a district of southwestern Fārs whose urban center was in Islamic times Ghundijān. See Nöldeke, trans. 111 n. 4; Le Strange, Lands, 260, 268, 294; Schwarz, Iran, 68–70.

269. When "today" and "at the present time" were, is unfortunately not known.

270. With feminine forms in the Arabic: iqbalī ilayya sayyidatī, nār, "fire" being a feminine noun. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 111 n. 7.

271. These names of estates or places in -ān demonstrate connections with their founders or developers (the -ān being originally a genitive pl. ending) and were especially notable in Iraq during early Islamic times for the names of estates, canals, etc.; e.g., Go Masrūqān, Not Artashīrakān, Nahr Sūrān.

blacks, in the region of Yemen,[272] and fell upon them, wreaking great slaughter among them and taking large numbers of captives before returning to his kingdom. Then followed his death in the manner we have described. There are differing views on the length of his reign. Some say that it was eighteen years, ten months, and twenty days, others that it was twenty-three years, ten months, and twenty days.[273]

[Yazdajird II]

Then there succeeded to the royal power after him Yazdajird, son of Bahrām Jūr. When the crown had been placed on his head, the great men of state and the nobles (ashrāf) came into his presense, invoked blessings on his head, and congratulated him on his accession to the royal power. He replied to them in pleasant terms and mentioned his father, his virtues, how he had behaved toward the subjects, and how lengthy his sessions for them (sc., for hearing complaints and receiving petitions) had been. He told them that if they did not experience from him just what they had been used to experience from his father, they should not condemn him, for his periods of withdrawal from public gaze at court were only for some aspect of public good for the kingdom and to trick enemies. [He went on to say] that he had appointed Mihr Narsī, the son of Burāzah, his father's aide, as his vizier, that he would

272. The bilād al-sūdān would be the regions of the Horn of Africa and East Africa adjacent to South Arabia, but the story that Bahrām penetrated to there is quite legendary, and may have been influenced by the Persian expeditions to Yemen in the later sixth century, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 948ff., pp. 239ff. below.

273. Bahrām V Gūr's reign was 420–38. His name appears on his coins as (R'MŠ-TRY) WRḤR'N, i.e., (Rāmshahr) Bahrām See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 62, 363–66, 447–48, Plates XIV–XV, Table XII; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 49, Table IX, Plate 9; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 116–18; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 235.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 661; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 183–84; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 56–58; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 190–93 = §§ 612–14; idem, Tanbīh, 101, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 49; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 401–406. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 118–26. Of modern studies of his reign in general, see Christensen, Sassanides, 274–82; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 144–46, 178; *EI*², s.vv. Bahrām (Huart-H. Massé) and Sāsānids (M. J. Morony); EIr, s.vv. Bahrām V Gōr (O. Klíma), Bahrām V Gōr in Persian Legend and Literature (W. L. Hanaway).

behave with them in the best possible manner and would lay down for them the best of ways of conduct, and that he would unceasingly humble his enemies but continuously behave with mildness and benevolence to his subjects and his troops.[274]

Yazdajird had two sons, one called Hurmuz, who was ruler over Sijistān, and the other called Fayrūz. It was Hurmuz (II) who seized the royal power after his father Yazdajird's death. Fayrūz [872] fled from him and reached the land of the Hephthalites (al-Hayāṭilah).[275] He told their king the story of what had happened between him and his brother and that he had a better right to the throne than Hurmuz. He asked the king to provide him with an army with which he could combat Hurmuz and gain control of his father's kingdom, but the king of the Hephthalites refused to respond to his request until he received information that Hurmuz really was a tyrannical and unjust king. He said, "God is not pleased with injustice, and He does not let the works of those

274. Christian sources nevertheless describe Yazdagird II as a savage persecutor of the Christians, both within his kingdom proper (with records of many martyrs in Mesopotamia) and also in Armenia, where his edict of 449 imposing Zoroastrianism on Armenia and Georgia provoking the revolt there, mentioned in n. 277 below. Jews also suffered when in 454–55 Yazdagird forbade the observance of their Sabbath, and later the Persian authorities are said to have closed all Jewish schools. See Nöldeke, trans. 114 n. 1; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 126–30; Christensen, Sassanides, 283–89; Lang, "Iran, Armenia and Georgia," 520–21; Neusner, "Jews in Iran," 915–16; Asmussen, "Christians in Iran," 942.

275. Hayāṭilah is the Arabic broken plural of Hayṭal, correctly *Habṭal. This last seems originally to have been a dynastic name, with forms of it appearing in, e.g., Byzantine sources (Hephthalitai) and Chinese ones (Ye-tai-i li-to), the Greek form corresponding to the Sogdian nominative pl. Heβtalīt*; see W. B. Henning, "Neue Materialen zur Geschichte des Manichäismus," 17 n. 2. At the time of Fayrūz/Pīrūz's flight to the land beyond the eastern frontiers of the Sāsānid realm (i.e., in 457), the Kidarites were still ruling in Bactria and Gandhara, but were about to be replaced there, in the second half of the fifth century, by the Hephthalites (J. Harmatta places the Hephthalite attack on the Kidarite territories in Transoxania in 466). The Hephthalites did not apparently arrive in a sudden wave from the Inner Asian steppes, but had doubtless been infiltrating into Transoxania, Bactria, and the northern fringes of Khurāsān for some time. It was to these that the fugitive Pīrūz was able to appeal for the help that enabled him to gain his father's old throne. See Nöldeke, trans. 115 n. 2; Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica. I. Die byzantinischen Quellen der Geschichte der Türkvölker, 69–70; Sinor, "The Establishment and Dissolution of the Türk Empire," 298–99; E. V. Zeimal, "The Kidarite Kingdom in Central Asia," 124–26; B. A. Litvinsky, "The Hephthalite Empire," 138–39.

committing it prosper; under the rule of an unjust king, a man cannot succeed properly in any enterprise or practice any trade successfully except by injustice and tyranny likewise." Then, after Fayrūz had made over al-Ṭālaqān to him, he provided Fayrūz with an army.[276] Fayrūz advanced with it and gave battle to his brother Hurmuz, killing him, scattering his forces, and seizing control of his kingdom.

The Romans had been dilatory in forwarding to Yazdajird, the son of Bahrām, the tribute they used to pay to his father. Hence Fayruz sent against them Mihr Narsī, the son of Burāzah, with an army and matériel such as Bahrām had originally sent against them for that purpose (sc., of exacting tribute), and Mihr Narsī secured the imposition of his master's will for him.[277]

---

276. There was more than one Ṭālaqān in the eastern Persian lands and their fringes. See Nöldeke, trans. 116 n. 1; *EI*², s.v. Ṭālaḳān (C. E. Bosworth and J. R. Lee). The Ṭālaqān intended here is most likely the one in what was the later mediaeval Islamic province of Gūzgān, at a site now unknown but somewhere in the vicinity of modern Maymanah in northwestern Afghanistan. At the time of the Arab invasions of Bactria/Ṭukhāristān, it had a local (Iranian?) ruler of its own. Less likely to be the Ṭālaqān mentioned here is the one beyond Balkh and toward Badakhshān. See Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 6–8; Le Strange, Lands, 423; *EI*², art. cit., sections 1 and 3. The mention here of the cession of Ṭālaqān to the Hephthalites implies that the Sāsānid territories never extended as far as the Oxus.

277. This was the war launched by Yazdagird II in 439 soon after he had achieved the throne. It caught the Roman empire at a critical moment when its North African provinces had just been invaded by the Germanic Vandals and when the Huns from Inner Asia were pressing on the Balkans and eastern parts of the empire. As al-Ṭabarī implies in his mention of the arrears of tribute, there were financial reasons behind the outbreak of war, the Byzantines' refusal to contribute to the cost of defenses in the Caucasus to keep out barbarians pressing down from the north, as well as continuing disputes over the allegiance of Arab tribes in the Mesopotamian frontier region, which had caused the war with Yazdagird I twenty years previously (see n. 261 above). The war was terminated by the commander of Theodosius II's eastern army, the Strategus Anatolicus, coming to an agreement with Yazdagird, essentially on a basis of retaining the status quo, and with the additional proviso that neither side should erect new fortresses in the frontier zone between the two empires. See Nöldeke, trans. 116 n. 2; Stein, Histoire du Bas Empire, I, 291; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 146; Rubin, "Diplomacy and War in the Relations between Byzantium and the Sassanids in the Fifth Century AD," 681ff.; Greatrex, "The Two Fifth-Century Wars between Rome and Persia," 2–14.

In addition to this war against the Byzantines, Nöldeke notes, trans. 113 n. 4, that Yazdagird II was involved in several other wars during his reign, unmentioned by the Arabic sources but known from Greek, Armenian, and Syriac authors. The emperor suppressed with difficulty a revolt of the Christian princes of Armenia

According to some authorities, Yazdajird's period of royal power was eighteen years and four months, but according to others, seventeen years.[278]

[Fayrūz I]

Then there succeeded to the royal power Fayrūz,[279] son of Yazdajird (II), son of Bahrām Jūr, after he had killed his brother and three [other] members of his family. There was related to me a report going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad [in which] he said: Fayrūz prepared for war with the resources of Khurāsān and called upon the men of Ṭukhāristān and regions neighboring on it for support,[280] and marched against his brother Hurmuz, son of Yazdajird (II), who was at al-Rayy. Both Fayrūz and Hurmuz had a common mother, called Dīnak, who was at al-Madā'in governing that part of the kingdom adjacent to it. Fayrūz captured and im-

---

(see n. 274 above), the battle of 451 between the Persians and Armenians leaving behind the memory of a host of slain Armenian martyrs whose deaths are commemorated by the Armenian Church to this day. Yazdagird also repelled an invasion of the Huns through the Caucasus that had penetrated to Darband and Shīrwān; and, most importantly, he engaged in strife with the Kidarites or their supplanters, defeating their king in a battle near Marw al-Rūdh. It was probably in the course of this last campaign on his eastern frontiers that Yazdagird subdued the local ruler of Ṣūl or Chōl in the vicinity of Gurgān (see on Ṣūl, al-Ṭabarī, I, 874, pp. 112–13 and n. 290 below) and founded there a town, Shahristān-i Yazdagird, whose exact location is unknown.

278. Yazdagird II's reign was 438–57. His name appears on his coins as (KDY) YZDKRTY, i.e., (Kay) Yazdagird. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 63, 366–67, 450–52, Plate XV, Table XIII: Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 49, Table IX, Plate 10; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 119–21; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 236.

The other Arabic sources on his reign are Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 661; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 184; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 58–59; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 193–94 = §§ 615–16; idem, Tanbīh, 101, tr. 144–45; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 49; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 407. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 127–28. Of modern studies of his reign in general, see Christensen, Sassanides, 282–89; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 146–47, 178; *EI*², s.v. Sāsānids (M. J. Morony).

279. In Pahlavi, Pērōz, NP Pērōz/Fīrūz, literally, "successful, victorious." See Nöldeke, trans. 117 n. 3; Justi, Namenbuch, 247–51; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 759.

280. That is, the Kidarites or Hephthalites of Bactria.

prisoned his brother.[281] He displayed just rule and praiseworthy [873] conduct, and showed piety.[282] During his time, there was a seven-year-long famine, but he arranged things very competently: he divided out the monies in the public treasury, refrained from levying taxation, and governed his people to such good effect that only one person died through want in all those years.

He then marched against a people called the Hephthalites, who had taken over Ṭukhāristān. At the outset of his reign, he had strengthened their power, because they had helped him against his brother (sc., Hurmuz).[283] They allegedly practiced sodomy, hence Fayrūz did not deem it permissible (or: it was not deemed permissible) to leave the land in their hands.[284] He attacked the Hephthalites, but they killed him in battle, together with four of his sons and four of his brothers, all of whom bore the title of king. The Hephthalites conquered the whole of Khurāsān, until there rose up against them a man of Fārs, from the people of Shīrāz,

---

281. The Arabic sources on the civil war include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 661; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 184; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 58–59 (the most detailed account); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 195 = § 617; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 408. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 127–28.

282. kāna yatadayyanu, reflecting the fact that, in the civil warfare between the two brothers, Fīrūz had the support of the Zoroastrian priesthood. Subsequently in his reign, he enforced harsh measures against the Christians and Jews of the empire. See Nöldeke, trans. 118 n. 4; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 130; Christensen, Sassanides, 290–92. Reflecting the state of affairs in the middle of the fifth century, i.e., at this time, al-Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 193, trans. 147–48, places the Chief Mōbadh at the head of the social hierarchy in the state, just below the king himself. See Christensen, op. cit., 265, 290.

283. At the time of his first war with the powers of the eastern lands, Fīrūz's enemies there were probably still the Kidarites, who controled Balkh, as they were likewise the Persian ruler's foes in his second war of 467, in the opinion of Zeimal, "The Kidarite Kingdom in Central Asia," 125–26, and see n. 275 above. It would thus have been natural for Fīrūz to have sought aid from the Kidarites' enemies, soon to replace them as the dominant power in Transoxania and Bactria, the Hephthalites, and equally natural that he should fall out with his erstwhile allies once the formidable power of the Hephthalites was firmly established just across his eastern frontiers.

284. This accusation laid against the Hephthalites is also in al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 403, cf. Nöldeke, trans. 120 n. 1. In the Shu'ūbiyyah controversies of the third/ninth century within the Islamic caliphate, the Arabs asserted that it was the Persians, and especially the Khurāsānians, who had brought the vice into the central lands of the caliphate.

among whom he was a chief, called Sūkhrā.[285] Sūkhrā went forth with a band of followers, like a volunteer fighter and one seeking a heavenly reward for his action, until he encountered the ruler of the Hephthalites and expelled him from the land of Khurāsān. The two sides now disengaged and made peace; all those members of Fayrūz's army who had not by then perished and had been made captive—men, women and children—were repatriated. Fayrūz had reigned for seven years.[286]

Another purveyor of historical traditions other than Hishām[287] has stated that Fayrūz was a man of limited capability, generally unsuccessful in his undertakings, who brought down evil and misfortune on his subjects, and the greater part of his sayings and the actions he undertook brought down injury and calamity upon both himself and the people of his realm. During his reign, a great famine came over the land for seven years continuously. Streams, qanāts, and springs dried up; trees and reed beds became dessicated; the major part of all tillage and thickets of vegetation were reduced to dust in the plains and the mountains of his land alike,

---

285. The form of the name is uncertain, but it appears to have been a family name rather than one of an individual; at all events, Sūkhrā clearly represented a powerful family of the Shīrāz region. In al-Ṭabarī, I, 877–78, 880, pp. 116–18, 120 below, and see n. 298, he is linked with the great family of Qārin and his genealogy given back to legendary Iranian times. See Nöldeke, trans. 120 n. 3.

286. There were actually three wars of Fīrūz with the powers of the East; in the first two he made no headway, while the third campaign ended in the supreme disaster of his death. In the first campaign, Fīrūz may have been taken prisoner and later released in exchange for a ransom, paid in part by the Byzantines, on the evidence of the history attributed to Joshua Stylites, The Chronicle of Joshua the Stylite, tr. W. Wright, 8. He was certainly captured at the end of the second campaign, and his son Qubādh/Kawādh, the future king, had to spend two years in the East as a hostage until sufficient ransom money could finally be raised. The third and last campaign was undoubtedly against the Hephthalites proper, who had by now overrun Transoxania and Bactria and were pressing southward over the Hindu Kush into northern India, where there were to appear in Indian chronicles as the "White Huns." See Litvinsky, "The Hephthalite Empire," 138–39. Al-Ṭabarī, or his source, was not able to distinguish these three campaigns, but conflated them into one calamitous war that destroyed the Persian king himself and left his country tributary to the Hephthalites for several years.

287. According to Nöldeke, trans 121 n. 1, this new authority for Fīrūz's reign is Ibn al-Muqaffa', who is indeed cited in Ibn Qutaybah's 'Uyūn al-akhbār as "the author of the Kitāb siyar al-'Ajam" for Fīrūz's débâcle with the Hephthalite king Akhshunwār, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 874ff., pp. 113ff. below.

bringing about the deaths there of birds and wild beasts; cattle and horses grew so hungry that they could hardly draw any loads; and the water in the Tigris became very sparse. Dearth, hunger, hardship, and various calamities became general for the people of his [874] land. He accordingly wrote to all his subjects, informing them that the land and capitation taxes were suspended, and extraordinary levies (nā'ibah)[288] and corvées (sukhrah) were abolished, and that he had given them complete control over their own affairs, commending them to take all possible measures in finding food and sustenance to keep them going. He wrote further to them that anyone who had a subterranean food store (maṭmūrah), a granary, foodstuffs, or anything that could provide nourishment for the people and enable them to assist each other, should release these supplies, and that no one should appropriate such things exclusively for himself. Furthermore, rich and poor, noble and mean, should share equally and aid each other. He also told them that if he received news that a single individual had died of hunger, he would retaliate upon the people of that town, village, or place where the death from starvation had occurred, and inflict exemplary punishment on them.

In this way, Fayrūz ordered the affairs of his subjects during that period of dearth and hunger so adroitly that no one perished of starvation except for one man from the rural district of Ardashīr Khurrah, called Dīh. The great men of Persia, all the inhabitants of Ardashīr Khurrah and Fayrūz himself considered that as something terrible. Fayrūz implored his Lord to bestow His mercy on him and his subjects and to send down His rain (or, assistance, ghayth) upon them. So God aided him by causing it to rain. Fayrūz's land once more had a profusion of water, just as it had had previously, and the trees were restored to a flourishing state.[289]

Fayrūz now gave orders for a town to be built near al-Rayy and called it Rām Fayrūz; another town between Jurjān and the Gate of 288. See for this meaning, Glossarium, p. DXXXIII.

---

289. Fīrūz employs here what would have been called, in an Arabian context, istisqā', "offering up pleas, prayers [to God] for rain," and this is in fact the very term used here by al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 59, in his account of Fīrūz's measures to relieve the famine and dearth and to restore fertility. See *EI*², s.v. Istiṣḳā' (T. Fahd and P. N. Boratav).

Ṣūl and called it Rūshan Fayrūz; and a third one in the region of Azerbaijan, which he named Shahrām Fayrūz.[290]

When Fayrūz's land had revived and his kingly rule there was firmly established, when he had inflicted condign violence on his enemies and subdued them, and when he had completed the building of these three towns, he set off with his army for Khurāsān, with the aim of making war on Akhshunwār, king of the Hephthalites.[291] When news of this reached Akhshunwār, he

290. Fīrūz's building activities are also recorded by al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 59–60, and Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 50 (in the latter source, as far as Hind!). Rām Fīrūz is mentioned by the Arabic geographers, but they are uncertain whether it was the predecessor of the mediaeval Islamic city of Rhagae/Rayy or a town near it, as al-Ṭabarī states here. See Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 283; Schwarz, Iran, 744–45. The "Gate of Ṣūl" guarded the ancient corridor for peoples from the steppe passing via Dihistān and Gurgān on to the Persian plateau. The Ṣūl in question is possibly the Ṣūl or Chūl known as a family or tribal name; Marquart, Ērānšahr, 51, 73, connected it with Turkish chöl, "steppe, desert," regarded skeptically by Barthold, Four Studies on the History of Central Asia. III. A History of the Turkmen People, 87–88. Von Gutschmid, however, in his "Bemerkungen zu Tabari's Sasanidengeschichte," 736, preferred to connect Ṣūl with the Qaghan of the Western Turks known in Chinese sources as Su-lu and the Arabic ones as Abū Muzāḥim, r. 717–38. De Blois adduces the MP name for "Sogdian," sūlīg (sughdī > sughlī > sūlī). Whatever the origin of this name, the local rulers of Ṣūl are certainly described as "Turks" at the time of the first Arab probes into Gurgān and Dihistān, i.e., in the mid-first/seventh century; see al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 335–36. But the family of these rulers must gradually have bcome Islamized and integrated into Perso-Islamic life and culture. A Ṣūl [Er-] Tigin was a leading commander under the caliphs al-Mu'taṣim and al-Wāthiq in the first half of the third/ninth century (al-Ṭabarī, III, 1194, 1313), and the family produced several scholars and *adīb*s in Arabic, most notably Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Ṣulī (d. 335/947) (see *EI*², s.v. al-Ṣūlī [S. Leder]).

The Sāsānids constructed walls across the coastal plain of Gurgān between the Caspian and the inland Elburz mountain chain to keep out the barbarians, including Fīrūz himself (al-Ṭabarī, I, 895, p. 152 below) and Khusraw Anūsharwān (Ibn Rustah, Kitāb al-a'laq al-nafīsah, 150, tr. 173). Rūshan Fīrūz seems, however, to be the wrong appellation for Fīrūz's foundation in Gurgān, since certain other sources place this in the district of Kaskar on the lower Tigris (see Nöldeke, trans., 123 n. 2). Later, at I, 894–95, pp. 150–52 below, al-Ṭabarī mentions Khusraw Anūsharwān's stone defenses in the regions of the Ṣūl and the Alan region of the Caucasus, his quelling of the Ṣūl people and his settling them at the (already existing?) Shahrām (= Shahr Rām) Fīrūz. This last is most likely the correct name for Fīrūz's foundation in Gurgān, especially as there seem to be no other mentions, apart from the one here of a Shahr Rām Fīrūz in Azerbaijan. See Nöldeke, trans. 123 nn. 1–3.

291. It is not immediately obvious whether this is a personal name or a title; the Khushnawāz of Firdawsī and other Persian sources looks like an attempt to mold this into an intelligible Persian name. Nöldeke, trans. 123 n. 4, connected the name Akhshunwār with the Kougchas, king of the Kidarites in ca. 485, mentioned

[875] was stricken with terror. It is mentioned that one of Akhshunwār's retainers offered up his life for him and told him, "Cut off my hands and feet and hurl me down in Fayrūz's way; but look after my children and family." He intended by this, so it has been mentioned, to trick Fayrūz. Akhshunwār did this to the man, and threw him down in Fayrūz's way. When Fayrūz passed by him, he was distressed at the man's state, and asked him what had happened to him. The man informed him that Akhshunwār had done that to him because he had told Akhshunwār that he would be unable to stand up against the Persian troops. Fayrūz accordingly felt pity and compassion for him, and ordered him to be carried with him. The man told Fayrūz, by way of advice, so it is alleged, that he would show him and his followers a short cut, which no one had ever previously used, to get to the king of the Hephthalites. Fayrūz was taken in by this trickery, and he and his troops set off along the route the mutilated man had told him about. They kept on floundering through one desert after another, and whenever they complained of thirst, the man would tell them that they were near to water and had almost crossed the desert. Finally, when the man had brought them to a place where, he knew, they could neither go forward nor back, he revealed to them what he had done. Fayrūz's retainers said to him, "We warned you about this man, O King, but you would not be warned. Now we can only go forward until we encounter the enemy, whatever the circumstances may be." So they pressed ever onward; thirst killed the greater part of them, and Fayrūz went on with the survivors against the enemy. When they contemplated the state to which they had been reduced, they appealed to Akhshunwār for a peace by the Byzantine historian Priscus (see on this Greek rendering, Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica, II, 165–66), and this was followed up by Ghirshman, who adduced a coin of Fīrūz's with the counterstamp of a ruler called Akūn, which he connected with Kougchas; see his Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 87–88. The name looks like a distinctly Iranian one, and certainly not a Turkish one, and Henning put forward the view that it was a title, which should be read as '.kh.sh.n.dār = Sogdian 'xš'wnd'r "power holder"; see his "Neue Materialen zur Geschichte des Manichäismus," 17 n. 2. Widengren, however, saw no need to amend the w of the ending of the name, and suggested that it represents Sogdian 'xš'wnw'r "power bearer"; see his "Xosrau Anōšurvān, les Hephtalites et les peuples turcs. Etude préliminaire des sources," 75 n. 1.

---

agreement, on the basis that he would allow them freely to return [876]
to their homeland, while Fayrūz would promise Akhshunwār, with an oath and an agreement sworn before God, that he would never in the future mount raids against him, covet his territories, or send against him an army to make war on them. Fayrūz further undertook to establish a boundary between the two kingdoms, which he would not cross. Akhshunwār was content with these promises. Fayrūz wrote for him a document, properly sealed and with his obligations guaranteed by professonal witnesses. Akhshunwār then allowed him to depart, and he returned home.

However, once Fayrūz arrived back in his kingdom, overweening pride and uncontrollable rashness led him to renew the war with Akhshunwār. He led an attack on Akhshunwār, despite the advice of his viziers and his close advisers against this, since it involved breaking the agreement; but he rejected their words and would only persist in following his own judgment.[292] Among those who counseled against this course of action was a man called Muzdbuwadh (?) who was especially close to Fayrūz and whose opinion Fayrūz used to seek out. When Muzdbuwadh perceived Fayrūz's firm determination, he set down what had passed between him and the king in a document, which he asked Fayrūz to seal.[293]

Fayrūz now set off on his expedition toward Akhshunwār's territory. Akhshunwār had dug a great trench (khandaq) between his own and Fayrūz's territory. When Fayrūz came to this, he threw bridges across it and set up on them banners which would be guiding markers for him and his troops on the way back home, and then crossed over to confront the enemy. When Akhshunwār came up to their encampment, he publicly adduced before Fayrūz the document with the agreement he had written for Akhshunwār, and warned him about his oath and his undertaking; but Fayrūz rejected this and only persisted in his contentiousness and

292. The narrative emphasizes Fīrūz's personal responsibility, as the breaker of his oath, for the ensuing catastrophe; but as Nöldeke skeptically observes, if Fīrūz had been victorious, all mention of his oath-breaking would have been tossed aside!

293. That is, so that the record should be clear, that he had opposed Fīrūz's planned attack and was thus in no way responsible for the consequences.

squaring up to his opponent. Each one of them addressed his opponent in lengthy speeches, but in the end, they became enmeshed in the toils of war. Fayrūz's followers were, however, in a weakened and defeatist state because of the agreement that had existed between them and the Hephthalites. Akhshunwār brought forth the document Fayrūz had written out for him and raised it up on the ṭip of a lance, calling out, "O God, act according to what is in [877] this document!"[294] Fayrūz was routed, mistook the place where the standards had been set up [as markers], fell into the trench, and perished. Akhshunwār seized Fayrūz's baggage, his womenfolk, his wealth, and his administrative bureaus (dawāwīnuhu). The Persian army suffered a defeat the like of which they had never before experienced.

There was in Sijistān a man of the Persians, from the people of the district of Ardashīr Khurrah, who had insight, strength in battle, and bravery, and who was called Sūkhrā.[295] He had with him a detachment of cavalrymen. When he received the news about Fayrūz, he rode off that same night, traveling as far as he could, till he came up with Akhshunwār. He sent a messenger, announcing to him his intention of making war and threatening him with destruction and ruin. Akhshunwār dispatched a mighty army against Sūkhrā. When the two sides met, Sūkhrā rode out against them, and found them eager for battle. It is said that he shot an arrow at a man who had ridden out to attack him; the arrow struck the latter's horse between the eyes and became almost totally sunk in its head. The horse fell down dead, and Sūkhrā was able to capture its rider. Sūkhrā spared his life, and instructed him to go back to his master and inform him about what he had seen. The (Hephthalite) troops went back to Akhshunwār bearing with them the horse's corpse. When Akhshunwār saw the effects of the arrow shot, he was amazed, and sent a message to Sūkhrā, saying, "Ask whatever you want!" Sūkhrā told him, "I want you to return to me the government exchequer (al-dīwān) and to release the captives: The king did that. When Sūkhrā had taken possession of the ex-

294. That is, bring down upon Fīrūz the stipulated curse for his breaking the agreement he had made with Akhshunwār.

295. Presumably the Sūkhrā mentioned by al-Ṭabarī, I, 873, pp. 110–11 above, as from Fārs, Ardashīr Khurrah being the district in which Shīrāz lay.

chequer and had secured the release of the captives, he extracted from the exchequer records a certified statement of the monies[296] that Fayrūz had had with him, and then wrote to Akhshunwār that he was not going to leave without this money. When Sūkhrā's determination became apparent to Akhshunwār, he purchased his freedom [i.e., from the threatenings of Sūkhrā, by handing over the missing money].

Sūkhrā was able thus to return to the Persian land after rescuing the captives and after getting hold of the exchequer, with the money and all the contents of the treasuries that had been with Fayrūz, now given back. When he arrived back to the Persians, they received him with great honor, extolled his feats, and raised him to a lofty status such as none but kings were able to attain after him. He was Sūkhrā, son of Wīsābūr,[297] son of Z.hān, son of [878] Narsī, son of Wīsābūr, son of Qārin, son of K.wān, son of 'b.y.d, son of 'w.b.y.d, son of Tīrūyah, son of K.r.d.n.k, son of Nāw.r, son of Ṭūs, son of Nawdhar,[298] son of M.n.shū, son of Nawdar, son of Manūshihr.

296. Reading, with the Sprenger ms., thabat (or thubūt), "certification, record," as in n. b, for the text's buyūt.

297. For Wihshāpūr, as in Nōldeke, trans. 127 n. 1.

298. Text, N.w.d.kā. The Addenda, p. DXCI, refer back to the name Ṭūs, son of Nawdharān, in al-Ṭabarī, I, 601, amended there by the editor from the form in the Bundahishn and the Shāh-nāmah, the name Nawdhar being in Persian legendary history the son and successor of king Manūchihr, killed by Afrāsiyāb. See Nōldeke, Das iranische Nationalepos, 8–9; Yarshater, "Iranian National History," 373, 404, 435. The Naōtara/Nawdhar were, in fact, one of the great princely houses of legendary history, figuring in the Avesta. From the time of Wištāspa onward—apparently through Wištāspa's marriage connection with Hutaosā, of the Naōtara—the Naōtara were reckoned as the royal house, now prominent in the national epic. See Christensen, Les Kayanides, 23–25; Yarshater, op. cit., 413, 460–61; and on the family name, appearing in the Avesta as the eponymous epithet naōtairya-, see Mayrhofer, Die altiranischen Namen, no. 228, regarding it as of uncertain origin.

This impressive genealogy for Sūkhrā, going back to mythological times, indicates the importance of the family and places it as one of the great Arsacid families, that of Qārēn or Qārin, which was to survive the Islamic conquest of Persia and play a role in Islamic history for some two centuries further. Qārin, son of Sūkhrā, received from the Sāsānid monarch lands in Ṭabaristān, the Wandā-Ummīd Kūh in the hinterland of Amul, and in early Islamic times the Qārinid principality may have been centered on Firrīm. The most famed representative of the line in the Islamic period was Māzyār b. Qārin, then only a recent convert to Islam, who rebelled against the Ṭāhirid governors of Khurāsān in the caliphate of al-Mu'taṣim and was executed in 225/840, with the line disappearing from history after this point. See al-Ṭabarī, III, 1268–98; Nōldeke, trans. 127 n. 2, 438 Excursus 3; EI[1], s.v.

Another authority knowledgeable about the historical narratives of the Persians has mentioned the story of Fayrūz and Akhshunwār in similar terms to what I have just recounted,[299] except that he has stated that when Fayrūz set out and headed toward Akhshunwār, he appointed as his deputy over the cities of Ctesiphon and Bahurasūr—the two royal residences—this person Sūkhrā.[300] He related: The latter was called, on account of his rank, Qārin,[301] and used to be governor of Sijistān as well as of the two cities. Fayrūz came to a tower (manārah) Bahrām Jūr had constructed in the zone between the border of the land of Khurāsān and the land of the Turks in order that the latter should not cross the frontier into Khurāsān—all this in accordance with the covenant between the Turks and the Persians providing that each side should renounce transgressing the other's frontiers. Fayrūz likewise had made an agreement with Akhshunwār not to pass beyond the tower into the land of the Hephthalites.

[After reaching the tower,] Fayrūz gave orders, and had fifty elephants plus three hundred men linked together,[302] and had it (sc., the tower) dragged forward, while he came along behind it. He intended by means of this to assert that he had ostensibly kept [879] faith with Akhshunwār regarding his agreement with him.[303] Akhshunwār got news of what Fayrūz was up to in connection with that tower. He sent an envoy to Fayrūz with the message, "Desist, O Fayrūz, from what your forefathers abandoned, and don't embark on what they didn't attempt to do!" Fayrūz took no notice of his words and Akhshunwār's message left him unmoved. He began to try and tempt Akhshunwār into a direct military

---

Māzyār (V. Minorsky); *EI*², sv. Ḳārinids (M. Rekaya).

299. In this version, Fīrūz's enemies in the East have become not Hephthalites but Turks, and Fīrūz's offense consists in advancing beyond the tower that Bahrām Gūr had set up as a boundary between the two powers. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 128 n. 3.

300. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 60, has Shūkhar for this name and also states that Fīrūz was accompanied on the expedition by, among others, the Chief Mōbadh.

301. Nöldeke, trans 128 n. 4, notes that Greek sources also tend to attach family or clan names, associated with great offices in the state, to the offices themselves.

302. The Cairo text, II, 96, has fa-ṣuffida "were linked together," with the same meaning as the Leiden text's fa-ḍumida.

303. That is, by not leading the attack on Akhshunwār directly from the front of his troops.

engagement and summoned him to this, but Akhshunwār kept on holding back and showing an aversion for this, because the Turks' method of warfare consists for the most part in trickery, deceitfulness, and stratagems. Furthermore, Akhshunwār ordered a trench to be dug behind the lines of his own army, ten cubits wide and twenty cubits deep. He had light branches of wood laid over it and then had it covered with earth. Then he retired with his troops to a spot not too far away. Fayrūz received news of Akhshunwār's departure from his encampment with his troops, and had no doubt that this meant Akhshunwār's withdrawal and flight. He ordered the drums to be beaten, and rode out at the head of his troops in pursuit of Akhshunwār and his followers. They rushed forward impetuously, heading directly toward that trench. But when they reached it, they rushed blindly on to the trench's covering.[304] Fayruz and the whole mass of his army fell into the pit and perished to the last man. Akhshunwār wheeled round to Fayrūz's encampment and took possession of everything there. He took captive the Chief Mōbadh, and among Fayrūz's womenfolk who fell into his hands was Fayrūzdukht,[305] his daughter. Akhshunwār gave orders for the corpses of Fayrūz and all those who had fallen into that trench with him to be retrieved, and they were laid out on funerary structures (al-nawāwīs).[306] Akhshunwār sent for Fayrūzdukht, wishing to join with her in sexual congress, but she refused.[307]

304. The Addenda, p. DXCI, suggest reading the text's 'alā ghimā'ihi (ghimā' = "roof made of reeds and earth" as 'alā 'amāyat^{in}, "erroneously." Cf. Glossarium, p. CCCSCII.

305. Literally, "daughter of Fīrūz"; cf. Justi, Namenbuch, 250, and Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 761. As Nöldeke, trans. 130 n. 2 notes, her true name would not be known outside the royal harem and its circle of attendants.

306. In conformity thereby with the Zoroastrian practice of exposing corpses to the air rather than inhumation. The nawāwīs would be hastily assembled, temporary structures for dealing with large numbers of the slain, corresponding to the more permanent dakhmas or "towers of silence."

307. Nöldeke, trans 130 n. 3, notes that this is a distortion of the apparent truth, meant here to emphasize Persian royal pride. According to Ps.-Joshua Stylites, Chronicle, trans. 15–16, the victorious Akhshunwār took Fīrūz's daughter into his harem, and she gave birth to a daughter who subsequently married her own paternal uncle Kawādh, son of Fīrūz; the king's daughter was obviously not given back with any other royal womenfolk.

When the news of Fayrūz's death reached the Persian lands, the people were thrown into perturbation and terror. However, when [880] Sūkhrā became convinced of the exact truth of Fayrūz's fate, he got ready and advanced with the greater part of the troops at his disposal against the Hephthalite lands. When Sūkhrā reached Jurjān, Akhshunwār received news of his expedition to attack him, so he prepared for war and moved toward engaging Sūkhrā in battle; and at the same time he sent to Sūkhrā asking him about his intentions and enquiring what his name and his official position were. Sūkhrā sent back the message that he was a man with the personal name of Sūkhrā and the official rank of Qārin, and that his intention in marching against Akhshunwār was to take vengeance on him for Fayrūz's death. Akhshunwār returned a message to him: "Your way of proceeding in this affair you have undertaken is exactly like Fayrūz's was, since despite the numerousness of his troops, the sole consequence of his attacking me was his own destruction and perdition." But Akhshunwār's words did not deter Sūkhrā, and he paid no heed to them. He gave orders to his troops, and they got ready for battle and girded on their weapons. He moved forward against Akhshunwār, advancing with firm determination and a keen mind (literally, "heart"). Akhshunwār sought a truce and a peace agreement with Sūkhrā, but the latter refused to contemplate any peace agreement with him unless he could recover everything Akhshunwār had appropriated from Fayrūz's encampment. So Akhshunwār returned to him everything he had seized from Fayrūz's camp, including his treasuries, the contents of his stables, and his womenfolk, including Fayrūzdukht, and he handed back to him the Chief Mōbadh and every single one of the great men of the Persians in his possession. Sūkhrā then went back to the land of the Persians with all that.[308]

308. The Arabic sources on Fīrūz's last campaign and Sūkhrā's putative campaign of vengeance include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 661–62; idem, 'Uyūn al-akhbār, I, 117–21 (from the Kitāb siyar al-'Ajam); al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 184–85; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 60; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 195 = § 617, placing the battle in which the Persian monarch was killed at Marw al-Rūdh, whereas Firdawsī places it in the vicinity of Marw; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 408–409. The Persian ones include Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 131–44. Nöldeke, trans. 131 n. 2, saw in the campaign of Sūkhrā a reminiscence of Bahrām Gūr's campaigns in the East, and in his Das iranische Nationalepos, 9, drew attention to the role of Sūkhrā

The authorities differ concerning [the length of] Fayrūz's reign. Some say it was twenty-six years, others twenty-one years.[309]

Mention of Events in the Reigns of Yazdajird (II), Son of Bahrām (V), and Fayrūz and the Relations of Their Respective Governors with the Arabs and the People of Yemen[310]

Information was transmitted to me from Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said: The sons of the nobles of Ḥimyar and others from the Arab tribes used to serve the kings of Ḥimyar during their as retriever of the military situation and restorer of Persian national honor after Fīrūz's ill-omen actions had abased it, and he mentioned the parallel role of the house of Qārin (to which al-Ṭabarī attaches Sūkhrā; see above) in Iranian legendary history, possibly an attempt to glorify the house of Qārin by giving it a splendid part in the nation's remote past. Christensen, Sassanides, 296, notes that the whole episode of Sūkhrā's campaign of revenge against the Hephthalite king is unmentioned in the contemporary sources (i.e., the Christian chroniclers), and may likewise have been a patriotic Persian invention by circles unwilling to accept the possibility of such a dismal defeat for Fīrūz, especially when the latter had been the darling of the Zoroastrian clergy. Of Byzantine sources on the wars with the Hepthalites, Procopius, The Persian War, I.iii.1–iv.35 is detailed but inclined very much to the anecdotal, with undue space devoted to, e.g., the story of a pearl earring of Fīrūz's; see Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, 154–55. Agathias, however, has a more lively account, influenced by Syrian and Armenian traditions very hostile to Fīrūz; see Cameron, "Agathias on the Sassanians," 152–54. Of modern studies on the wars, see Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephthalites, 87–90; K. Hannestad, "Les relations de Byzance avec la Transcaucasie et l'Asie Centrale aux 5e et 6e siècles," 438–40; Litvinsky, "The Hephthalite Empire," 138–40.

---

309. Fīrūz I's reign was 459–84; hence more like twenty-six (lunar) years. His name appears on his coins as (KDY) PYRWCY, i.e., (Kay) Pērōz. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 63, 367–70, 452–57, Plate XVI, Table XIV; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 49–50, Table IX, Plate 10; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 123–27; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 236.

The other Arabic sources for his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 661–62; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 184–85; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 58–60; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 195 = § 617; idem, Tanbīh, 101, trans. 145; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 50; Ibn al-Athīr, I, 407–11. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 128–44. For modern studies of his reign in general, see Christensen, Sassanides, 290–96; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 147–8, 178.

310. From this point, I, 880 l. 17 to 882, l. 4, Nöldeke did not bother to translate, considering the events narrated there as too "fabelhafte" (but see regarding such omissions, Translator's Foreword, p. xvi above).

period of royal power.[311] Among those who served Ḥassān b.
[881] Tubba' was 'Amr b. Ḥujr al-Kindī, the chief of Kindah during his time.[312] When Ḥassān b. Tubba' led an expedition against the Jadīs,[313] he appointed 'Amr as his deputy over certain affairs.[314] When 'Amr b. Tubba' killed his brother Ḥassān b. Tubba' and 311. The earliest firm mention of Ḥimyar (Sabaic ḥmyr) and the Ḥimyarites comes from Pliny the Elder in the late first century A.D., but it is unclear whether the term originally denoted an ethnic identity or a grouping of diverse ethnic elements. It then appears, in what is probably the next century, in the Periplus of the Erythraean Sea, where is mentioned Charibael "king of the two nations (ethnē), the Homeritae and the Sabaeans." In the first centuries A.D., the Ḥimyarites seem to have been led by minor princes, qayls, and chiefs, rather than kings. Only in the sixth century do we find epigraphic evidence for kings of Ḥimyar, when the Ḥiṣn al-Ghurāb inscription (CIH 621) speaks of their being killed by the Abyssinians. See Beeston, "The Himyarite Problem," 1–7.

312 Kindah (kdt = kndt in the South Arabian inscriptions, with assimilation of the intervocalic n) was the great Arabian tribe which, according to Arab tradition, migrated from Ḥaḍramawt to central Arabia, though this may be an inversion of what actually happened. It was accordingly accounted South Arabian in nasab by the overwhelming majority of genealogists (see for certain exceptions to these, Kister and Plessner, "Notes on Caskel's Ǧamharat an-nasab," 58–59). Certainly, in the third century A.D., Kindah was established in southwestern Najd with their center at Qaryat al-Fāw, an important settlement on the main caravan route from Yemen and Najrān northward to Najd (see A. R. al-Ansary, Qaryat al-Fau. A Portrait of Pre-Islamic Civilisation in Saudi Arabia); they appear in recorded history as nomad auxiliaries of the kings of Saba, and then, after ca. A.D. 275, of the Ḥimyarite kings. In the second half of the fifth century, Kindah are found further to the north in Najd, with what seems to have been a semipermanent camp/capital at Baṭn 'Āqil (localized by U. Thilo, Die Ortsnamen in der altarabischen Poesie, 29, in the wadi of that name, an affluent of the Wādī al-Rummah, to the west of modern 'Unayzah and Buraydah) under the celebrated Ḥujr b. 'Amr, called Ākil al-Murār (on this cognomen, n. 408 see below). It seems that, as part of the general policy of extending Ḥimyarite power into central Arabia at this time, this chief of Kindah was placed in power as a "king" (in fact, merely a tribal chief) over the local Arab tribes there of Ma'add. The Arab historical tradition makes the Ḥimyarite ruler involved here either the Tubba' As'ad Abū Karib or his son Ḥassān (in the South Arabian inscriptions, ḥs³n) Yuha'min, whose reigns should be placed, according to the inscriptions, in the second quarter of the fifth century. As well as appearing in the Arabian historical tradition, it now seems likely that Ākil al-Murār is the "Ḥujr b. 'Amr, king (mlk) of Kiddat" of a Sabaean rock inscription found near Kawkab, roughly half-way between Najrān and al-Fāw (see Iwona Gajda, "Ḥuǧr b. 'Amr roi de Kinda et l'établissement de la domination ḥimyarite en Arabie centrale," 65–73). The fortunes of Kindah were thus for long connected with the rulers of South Arabia, until the fall of the Ḥimyarites under Abyssinian pressure deflected many elements of the tribe in southwestern Najd into Ḥaḍramawt. See, in general, Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 176, 233, II, 47–53, 371–2; G. Olinder, The Kings of Kinda of the Family of Ākil al-Murār, 32–50; Chr. Robin, in idem (ed.), L'Arabie antique de Karib'îl à assumed the royal power in his stead, he took 'Amr b. Ḥujr al-Kindī into his personal service. 'Amr b. Ḥujr was a man of sound judgment and sagacity. 'Amr b. Tubba' intended to honor him and at the same time to diminish the status of his brother Ḥassān's sons, and as part of this policy he gave Ḥassān b. Tubba''s daughter in marriage to 'Amr b. Ḥujr. The Ḥimyarites grumbled at this, and among them were some young men who were concerned about her, because none of the Arabs had previously been bold enough to desire a marriage alliance with that house (sc., the Ḥimyarites).

Mahomet. Nouvelles données sur l'histoire des Arabes grâce aux inscriptions, 80–81; idem, "Le royaume ḥujride, dit «royaume de Kinda», entre Ḥimyar et Byzance," 666–68; idem, in Supplément au Dictionnaire de la Bible, s.v. Sheba. 2, col. 1141; EI², s.v. Kinda (Irfan Shahîd).

Ḥujr's son 'Amr, mentioned here, had the cognomen al-Maqṣūr, apparently because he was "limited, confined" to his father's sphere of power and unable to expand it (regarding his personal qualities, al-Ṭabarī, below, stresses his judgment and sagacity). He succeeded Ḥujr in the main center of Kindī authority, Najd, with another branch of the family under his brother Mu'āwiyah al-Jawn controling the eastern Najd regions of Yamāmah, Hajar and Baḥrayn. See Olinder, op. cit., 47–50, and nn. 314, 408 below.

313. This was one of the extinct tribes of the Arabs, al-'Arab al-bā'idah, according to Arabic lore and legend, which relates that Jadīs and his brother Thamūd were three generations after Sām b. Nūḥ, i.e., Noah's son Shem. The story goes that Jadīs, living in Yamāmah, rebelled against the tyranny of a sister tribe, Ṭasm, but that the sole survivors of the latter called in Ḥassān Tubba', whose army exterminated the Jadīs. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 215, 217, 219–21, 771–75; Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I. 40; EI², s.v. Ṭasm (W. P. Heinrichs).

314. Tubba', with the Arabic broken plural Tabābi'ah, is used by writers of Islamic times as a dynastic title (comparable to Fir'awn, pl. Farā'inah, for the Pharaohs of Egypt and Kisrā, pl. Akāsirah, for the Sāsānid kings (on this last title, see n. 374 below), etc.) for this line of Ḥimyarite rulers who controled the southwestern part of Arabia from the late third century A.D. to the early sixth century. It is probably true that Tubba' was a title rather than a personal name, but its meaning and/or etymology are unknown; the explanations of the Arabic lexicographers (see Lane, Lexicon, 295b–c) can be disregarded. At all events, ca. 275 the Ḥimyarite Shamir Yur'ish or Yuhar'ish overthrew the Sabaean rulers in Yemen, together with the independent rulers in Ḥaḍramawt, and constituted himself "king of Saba and Dhū Raydān and of Ḥaḍramawt and Ymnt" (see further on him, al-Ṭabarī, I, 890, p. 142 and n. 364 below). Almost all the Tubba' rulers mentioned by Islamic authors, most notably by al-Ḥasan b. Aḥmad al-Hamdānī (d. 334/945) in his Iklīl, can be validated from South Arabian inscriptions, but there remain lacunae, and a definitive dynastic list cannot be worked out. See Beeston, "Hamdānī and the Tabābi'ah," 5–15; EI², s.v. Tubba' (A. F. L. Beeston).

'Amr b. Tubba''s patronage of 'Amr b. Ḥujr al-Kindī further illustrates the closeness of the links between Kindah and the kings of Ḥimyar, as does his giving in marriage his own niece to 'Amr b. Ḥujr, mentioned a few lines below. Cf. Olinder, The Kings of Kinda, 48, who is unnecessarily skeptical about this marriage.

Ḥassān b. Tubba"s daughter bore al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr to 'Amr b. Ḥujr.

After 'Amr b. Tubba', 'Abd Kulāl b. Muthawwib succeeded to the royal power. This was because the sons of Ḥassān were only small, except for Tubba' b. Ḥassān, whom the jinn had rendered mentally unbalanced. Hence Abū Kulāl b. Muthawwib assumed the royal power [temporarily], fearing lest someone outside the royal house of the kingdom might covet it. He was qualified to exercise this power through his mature years, his experience, and his excellent powers of governing. According to what has been mentioned, he was an adherent of the original form of Christianity ('alā dīn al-Naṣrāniyyah al-ūlā), but used to conceal this from his people. He had been converted to that faith by a man of Ghassān who had come from Syria, but whom the Ḥimyarites had then attacked and killed.[315]

At that point, Tubba' b. Ḥassān recovered his sanity and was restored to health. He was highly knowledgeable about the stars, the most intelligent among those who had learned [the sciences] in his time, and the one with the most information and lore concerning both the past and what was to come after him in the future. Hence Tubba' b. Ḥassān b. Tubba' b. Malikay Karib b. Tubba' al-Aqran was raised to the kingship. Ḥimyar and the Arabs stood in intense awe of him. He then sent his sister's son al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr b. Ḥujr al-Kindī at the head of a powerful army against the [882] lands of Ma'add,[316] al-Ḥīrah , and the districts adjacent to them both. Al-Ḥārith marched against al-Nu'mān b. Imri' al-Qays b. al-Shaqīqah and fought with him; al-Nu'mān and a number of his family were killed, and his companions were routed. Only al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān al-Akbar,[317] whose mother was Mā' al-

315. That is, by al-Nu'mān I b. Imri' al-Qays II (r. ca. 400–18). See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 52, 65–68, 70.

316. Ma'add is a general designation for the North Arab tribes in Islamic times, as is also that of his father 'Adnān and his son Nizār. Ma'add was originally, in pre-Islamic times, a tribal group in central Arabia, presumably the Nizār of the Namārah inscription of A.D. 328, and then in the early sixth century the Ma'add are mentioned in South Arabian inscriptions as the North Arab subjects of Kindah. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 1, II, 1–2, 379; *EI*², s.v. Ma'add (W. M. Watt).

317. That is, al-Mundhir I b. al-Nu'mān I (r. ca. 418–76). See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 53, 68–70.

Samā', a woman of the Banū al-Namir,[318] managed to escape from al-Ḥārith. In this way the royal power of the house of al-Nu'mān passed away, and al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr al-Kindī succeeded to their former power and possessions.[319]

Hishām related: After al-Nu'mān, his son al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān succeeded to the royal power, al-Mundhir's mother being Hind bt. Zayd Manāt b. Zayd Allāh b. 'Amr al-Ghassānī,[320] for forty-four years, of which eight years and nine months fell within 318. The Namir b. Qāsiṭ were a minor tribe of Rabī'ah. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 141, II, 444; Ibn Durayd, Kitāb al-Ishtiqāq, 334–35.

---

319. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr al-Maqṣūr (fl. in the first thirty years or so of the sixth century) was a dominating personality on the political and military scene of Arabia and the adjacent fringes of the Byzantine and Persian lands. The Lakhmids and the chiefs of Kindah had had connections, despite being rivals for the control of northern and eastern Arabia; already in the later fifth century al-Aswad b. al-Mundhir I had married a daughter, Umm al-Malik, of the Kindī 'Amr b. Ḥujr Ākil al-Murār.

The campaign against the Lakhmids mentioned here was preceded by an attack on the Byzantine frontiers in Syria led by two of al-Ḥārith's sons, Ḥujr and Ma'dī Karib, in ca. 500, forcing the Greeks to agree to a peace treaty in 502. According to the South Arabian tradition of Ibn al-Kalbī and the Bakrī tribal one set forth in Abū Muḥammad al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad al-Anbārī's commentary on the Mufaḍḍaliyyāt poetical anthology, al-Ḥārith and the Rabī'ah attacked al-Nu'mān al-Akbar, al-Mundhir's father, and then al-Ḥārith became head of the Arabs of Iraq. This accords grosso modo wiith the South Arabian tradition of Ibn al-Kalbī also given here by al-Ṭabarī, that al-Nu'mān was killed but his son al-Mundhir III b. al-Nu'mān II b. Mā' al-Samā' managed to escape. All other Arabic traditions are concerned only with al-Mundhir, variously described as the son of Imru' al-Qays, of al-Nu'mān, and of Mā' al-Samā', and not with his father. Concerning the date of the event, the Ps.-Joshua the Stylite, Chronicle, trans. 45–46, states that the Arab (i.e., Kindī) invasion of the Lakhmid lands took place when al-Nu'mān was away with the Persian army combatting the Greeks, which would place an attack by al-Ḥārith on al-Ḥīrah in 503. It is probable that the Kindī ruler was then able to control the greater part of the Lakhmid dominions from 503 till 506, the years when the Byzantine-Persian war was at its most intense, and Kawād was unable to afford the Lakhmids any assistance. According to the Bakrī tradition again, al-Mundhir, bereft of Persian help, had to agree to marry al-Ḥārith's daughter Hind, who, as a Christian, was subsequently held in great honor at al-Ḥīrah and was the founder of a monastery in the region of al-Ḥīrah, the Dayr Hind (al-Ṣughrā); see al-Shābushtī, Kitāb al-diyārāt, 244–46, and n. 914 below. See for these events, Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 69–71, 87ff.; Olinder, The Kings of Kinda, 57–63; S. Smith, "Events in Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.," 445–46; *EI*², s.v. Kinda (Irfan Shahîd). For the general background of relations between Byzantium and Kindah, Shahîd, "Byzantium and Kinda," 57–63.

320. As Rothstein pointed out, Laḫmiden, 68, this nasab does not necessarily imply that Hind was a princess of the Jafnid/Ghassānid royal house in Syria; there were members of Ghassān living in al-Ḥīrah, e.g., the Āl Buqaylah.

the time of Bahrām (V) Jūr, son of Yazdajird (I), eighteen years fell within the time of Yazdajird (II), son of Bahrām, and seventeen years within the time of Fayrūz b. Yazdajird (II). After him there reigned his son al-Aswad b. al-Mundhir, whose mother was Hirr bt. al-Nu'mān from the descendants of al-Hayjumānah bt. 'Amr b. Abī Rabī'ah b. Dhuhl b. Shaybān.[321] It was he whom the Persians imprisoned. [He reigned for] twenty years, of which ten years fell within the time of Fayrūz, son of Yazdajird (II), four years in the time of Balāsh, son of Yazdajird (II), and six years in the time of Qubādh, son of Fayrūz.[322]

[Balāsh]

Then there succeeded to the royal power after Fayrūz, son of Yazdajird (II), his son Balāsh.[323]

(He was) the son of Fayrūz, son of Yazdajird (II), son of Bahrām (V) Jūr. His brother Qubādh had disputed the succession with him, but Balāsh had emerged victorious and Qubādh had fled to Khā-
[883] qān, king of the Turks, seeking his help and military aid.[324] When the crown was placed on Balāsh's head, the great men of state and the nobles gathered round him, hailed him with congratulations, and invoked divine blessings on him. They requested him to re-

321. Nöldeke, trans. 133 n. 1, thought that the unusual name al-Hayjumānah (found in ancient Arab onomastic in both masculine and femine forms) stemmed from Greek hegoumenē or hegemōn, and this seems very probable.

322. The reign of al-Aswad b. al-Mundhir I is poorly documented, but must have fallen substantially within the third quarter of the fifth century and just beyond it, apparently from 462 onward in Rothstein's computation.. The lists of the Lakhmid kings in the Arabic sources, where they mention al-Aswad (here from Ibn al-Kalbī, and also in al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, III, 200 = § 1060) accord in giving him a reign of twenty years, which would take his reign up to 482. See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 55, 70.

323. Correctly, the brother of Fayrūz and not his son. See Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 295. On the name Balāsh/Walāsh, see n. 31 above.

324. Some sources, both Christian and Muslim, mention two flights of Kawād from Walāsh to the rulers of the East, others only one. He had certainly been a hostage for two years with the Hephthalite king Akhshunwār, according to al-Ya'qūbī and other authorities. Further sources state, however, that Walāsh had to struggle for the succession of his father's death with another brother, Zarēr. See Nöldeke, trans. 133 n. 6.

ward Sūkhrā for what he had done, so Balāsh marked him out as one of his special favorites, honored him and gave him rich presents.[325] Balāsh invariably behaved in a praiseworthy manner and had an intense care for the prosperity of the land. His laudable concern for this reached the extent that, whenever he heard of the ruin of a house and the flight of its inhabitants, he would punish the owner of the village[326] because of his lack of lively concern for them and lack of relief for their need, so that they would not have been compelled to abandon their homes. He built in the Sawād a city he called Balāshāwādh, which is Sābāṭ near al-Madā'in.[327] His reign lasted four years.[328]

---

325. Sūkhrā was clearly a dominant influence during Walāsh's short reign. It may well be that Sūkhrā and his son Zārmihr, mentioned just below, are one and the same person. See Nöledke, trans. 134 n. 1.

326. ṣāḥib al-qaryah, i.e., the dihqān, a member of the lesser nobility of rural and small-town landowners.

327. This is a false equation of the two places mentioned, which extracts a fictitious name from the later port of Balāshābād; a genuine Sābāṭ, Sābāṭ al-Madā'in, in Persian, Walāshābād, existed as the port of Ctesiphon from Arsacid times, having been founded by Vologeses I (r. ca. A.D. 51–80), whose name really lies behind al-Ṭabarī's Balāshāwādh. See Nöldeke, trans. 134 n. 4; Fiey, "Topographie chrétienne de Mahozé," 398–99.

328. Walāsh's reign was 484–88. His name appears on his coins as (ḤWKDY) WLK'Š, i.e., Hu Kay Wālakhsh. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 63–64, 370–73, 457–59, Plates XVI–XVII, Table XVI; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 50–51, Table X, Plate 11; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 128–29; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 236.

Of the other Arabic sources on his reign, al-Ya'qūbī, al-Dīnawarī, and al-Mas'ūdī merely give his name and the length of his reign. Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 610, mentions him in connection with a popular proverb, ḥijām Sābāṭ, and 662–63 in regard to his brief reign and his deposition in favor of his brother Qubādh. Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 50, notes that he built Balāshābād and another town near Ḥulwān called Balāshfarr (read thus for the text's Balāsh.'.z). See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 411. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 144–46. For modern studies of his reign, see Christensen, Sassanides, 295–96; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 149, 178.

Despite Walāsh's good rule, he was overthrown and blinded by a conspiracy of the great men of state and the Zoroastrian clergy; Ps.-Joshua the Stylite, Chronicle, trans. 12–13, says that the clergy hated him and condemned him for introducing public baths into Persia, presumably because it was a foreign, Roman practice and such use of water profaned one of the sacred elements of creation. His measures had perhaps clashed with the interests of the aristocracy and the dihqāns, while his conciliatory policy toward the Christians had aroused the ire of the priesthood of the state church. See Nöldeke, trans. 134 n. 5; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 154.

[Qubādh I]

Then there succeeded to the royal power Qubādh, son of Fayrūz, son of Yazdajird (II), son of Bahrām (V) Jūr.[329] Before Qubādh attained the throne, he had fled to Khāqān, seeking help from him against his brother Balāsh. On his way there, he passed through the vicinity of Naysābūr, accompanied by a small band of companions fleeing with him in disguise. Among these was Zarmihr, son of Sūkhrā. Qubādh had an intense desire for sexual satisfaction, complained about this to Zarmihr, and asked the latter to seek out a wife of good family (dhāt ḥasab) for him.[330] Zarmihr did that, and went along to the wife of his major-domo (ṣāḥib manzilihi), who was one of his cavalrymen; she had a virgin daughter, of outstanding beauty. He asked her, as a sincere friend, for her daughter, and indicated to her that he would send her along to Qubādh. The wife told her husband about that, while Zarmihr kept on setting forth to the two of them how attractive a proposition it was and spelling out to them how alluring a prospect it was [884] for them, until finally they consented. The girl, who was called Nīwāndukht,[331] came to Qubādh; he lay with her that very night, and she became pregnant with Anūsharwān.[332] He ordered for her

329. Qubādh is the Arabized form of MP Kawād, Greek form Kabatēs, on his coins KW'T and KDY KW'T, i.e., (Kay) Kawād, which goes back to Kawi Kawāta, the legendary founder of the Kayānid dynasty. Following Nöldeke, Christensen, Les Kayanides, 40–41, and Sassanides, 350–51, noted the increasing popularity from the fifth century onward of personal names from Persian legendary history and that it was from this time that the legendary, epic history assumed the form as we know it in the Xwadāy-nāmag. See Nöldeke, trans. 135 n. 1, 147 n. 1; Justi, Namenbuch, 159–60; Mayrhofer, Die altiranischen Namen, no. 209; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 493; Yarshater, "Iranian National History," 374.

330. Necessary for her, since she was to be the mother of the great Anūsharwān. For the name Zarmihr ("golden Mithra"), see Justi, Namenbuch, 383; P. Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 1082. The historicity of this whole episode of Kawād's flight to the Khāqān of the Turks during his brother Balāsh's reign is, however, difficult to accept, and may be a confusion arising from the fact of Kawād's undoubted one, probably two, stays among the Hephthalites. The begetting of Anūsharwān at Nīshābūr must, at all events, be pure fable.

331. Following the reading of this name by Nöldeke in text, n. a; cf. his trans. 502. Justi, Namenbuch, 228–29, interpreted Nēwāndukht as "daughter of heroes."

332. Anūshrawān or Anūsharwān (the most common form of the name in later Islamic times), in its original form Anōshag-ruwān, literally "of immortal soul"; see Justi, Namenbuch, 17–18; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 102. According to Nöldeke, 136 n. 2, we do not possess any contemporary evidence for this a handsome present and gave her a noble reward. It has been said that the mother of that girl asked her about Qubādh's appearance and bodily form: The girl told her that she knew nothing about that except that she noticed that his trousers were embroidered with gold.[333] Her mother knew thereby that he was a royal prince, and this gave her happiness.

Qubādh traveled on to Khāqān, and when he reached him, he told him that he was the son of the king of Persia and that his brother had contested the throne with him and had gained the upper hand. Hence he was now coming to Khāqān seeking help. The latter gave him fine promises, but Qubādh remained at Khāqān's court for four years, during which Khāqān kept putting off his promise to Qubādh. Qubādh became tired of waiting and sent a message to Khāqān's wife requesting her to adopt him as her own child, and requesting her to speak with her husband regarding him and ask him to fulfill his promise. She did this, and kept on at length pressing Khāqān until he dispatched an army with Qubādh.[334] cognomen of the future Khusraw I, hence we cannot say whether this original form of the by-name was used for him or whether a shorter form was current. De Blois has, moreover, pointed out that this epithet is commonly used in Middle Persian with the simple meaning of "deceased" (hence the equivalent of Arabic al-marḥūm "the one on whom [God] has had mercy"), thus strengthening the probability that it was not applied to Khusraw till after his death; see Burzōy's Voyage to India and the Origin of the Book of Kalīlah wa Dimnah, 96.

---

333. Trousers were regarded by classical writers as a characteristic garment for the Persians (according to Herodotus, History, I.71, adopted by the Persians from the Scythians, steppe people of Inner Asia). A Byzantine author like Theophylactus Simocatta speaks of the "gold-embroidered trousers" of the Persian kings. Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 50, says that Kawād's trousers were red. The Arabic word for trousers, sirwāl is of doubtful etymology, though often assumed to be a loanword from Persian (cf. Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 18, 24; the parallel Persian form shalwār is often derived from a word shāl said to mean "thigh," but an origin in a putative OP word zārawāro, as asserted by W. Björkman in his EI² article "Sirwāl," is impossible (personal communication from Professor N. Sims-Williams).

334. According to some Western sources, when Kawād was in exile among the Hephthalites, he married the king's daughter, the offspring of the ruler and Fīrūzdukht (see n. 307 above). This would appear to be the basis for the story here in al-Ṭabarī's text, in which he becomes the adoptive son of the Khāqān's wife and, by extension, of the Khāqān himself. He would in any case now be in a strong position to secure military help from a father-in-law/adoptive father in gaining the Persian throne.

When Qubādh departed with the military force and reached the vicinity of Naysābūr, he asked the man who had brought the girl to him about what had happened to her. The man made enquiries of the girl's mother, who told him that she had given birth to a boy. Qubādh gave orders for the child to be brought to him. She came to him, bringing Anūsharwān by her hand. When she entered his presence, he asked her about the boy's history, and she informed him that he was his own son, that the boy resembled him in his bodily form and handsomeness. It is said that the news of Balāsh's death reached him on that very spot. He regarded the child's birth as a good augury, and ordered him and his mother to be conveyed in wagons of the type customary for royal womenfolk.[335]

When Qubādh reached al-Madā'in and had gathered together firmly in his hands all the reins of royal power, he sought out Sūkhrā for special honor, delegated to him all his executive [885] powers, and gave him thanks for the service rendered to him by his son (sc., by Zarmihr). He then sent out troops to the distant frontiers, which inflicted hurt on his enemies and brought back numerous captive women and children.[336] Between al-Ahwāz and Fārs he built the town of Arrajān, and likewise he built the town of Ḥulwān, and, in the administrative district (kūrah) of Ardashīr Khurrah, in the neighborhood of Kārazīn, a town called Qubādh Khurrah. All this was in addition to [other] towns and villages he founded and to [other] canals he had dug and bridges he had constructed.[337]

---

335. Carts and wagons, originally with two wheels and shafts for the animals drawing them, are known to have been used by the steppe peoples of Inner Asia from early Christian times onward, hence this form of transport would be familiar to Kawād from his residence among the Hephthalites; but they seem in any case to have been employed in Persia, on the testimony of classical authors, from Achaemenid times onward for conveying royal consorts. See also *EI*², s.v. 'Araba. II. (M. Rodinson).

336. According to al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 194, Kawād sent one of his commanders into the region of Arrān in Transcaucasia to secure the Caucasus passes against the Khazars (at this early period, this is probably an anachronism, and the steppe peoples to the north of the Caucasus were probably Huns, the Turkish Onughurs, and/or Avars, since it is only ca. 630 that a distinct Khazar state begins to emerge; see P. B. Golden, Khazar Studies, I, 28ff., 58–59). Kawād then ordered the building in Arran of various towns and defences between Shīrwān and the Alan Gates.

337. For Arrajān, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 818, p. 12 and n. 45 above. Ḥulwān, at the entrance from the Iraq plain to the pass through the Zagros mountains and thence

Now when the greater part of Qubādh's days had gone by, with Sūkhrā in charge of the government of the kingdom and the management of affairs, the people came to Sūkhrā and undertook all their dealings with him, treating Qubādh as a person of no importance and regarding his commands with contempt.[338] At last, Qubādh became desirous of resuming power and was no longer able to endure that state of affairs or remain content with it. He wrote to Sābūr of al-Rayy, [a man] from the house called Mihrān, who was Supreme Commander of the Land (iṣbahbadh al-bilād),[339] to come to him with the troops under his command.[340] Sābūr came to him with these, and Qubādh sketched out for him the position regarding Sūkhrā and gave him the necessary orders concerning this last. The next morning, Sābūr went into Qubādh's presence and found Sūkhrā seated there with the king. He walked toward Qubādh, passing before Sūkhrā and paying no attention to him. Sūkhrā [for his part] gave no heed to this part of Sābūr's to Khurāsān, is a much older town than this, being known in Assyrian times as Khalmanu; at most, Kawādh can only have refounded it. Kārzīn, to the southwest of Jahrum, within the bend of the Sakkān river in southern Fārs, was still in early Islamic times a town of significance, with the surrounding region still known as "the glory of Qubādh." See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 290–93, IV, 428–29; Nöldeke, trans. 138 n. 3; Le Strange, Lands, 191, 254; Schwarz, Iran, 70–71, 677–83; Barthold, Historical Geography, 198–99; *EI*², s.v. Ḥulwān (L. Lockhart).

---

338. Nöldeke, trans. 138 n. 4, thought that the opening words "when the greater part of Qubādh's days had gone by . . ." required emendation, since they would place the fall of Sūkhrā in the later part of his reign, well after his exile among the Hephthalites and his restoration. On this analysis, the obvious sense of the episode would be that the newly acceeded Kawād was at first under the tutelage of Sūkhrā but grew to resent this tutelage once he had acquired experience and the will to govern independently. This view is ostensibly confirmed by such Arabic sources as al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 185, and al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 64–65, which state that Kawād was fifteen years old on his accession and remained under Sūkhrā's dominance for the first five years of his reign, i.e., till 493, until he rebelled against this control. On the other hand, further sources make Kawād eventually die as an old man (Firdawsī, at the age of eighty; the Byzantine historian John Malalas, at the age of eighty-two), who must therefore have begun a reign spanning forty-three years in his late thirties; also, the account in al-Ṭabarī, I, 886, places the fall of Zarmihr-Sūkhrā after Kawād's restoration, see nn. 342–43, 345 below.

339. An attempt to render the title Ērān-spāhbed; see n. 237 above.

340. The Mihrāns were one of the greatest noble families at this time, in part at least descended from the Arsacid royal house, and Bahrām Chūbīn (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 992ff., pp. 301ff. below) was to be one of their most illustrious members. See the references gathered together in Nöldeke, trans. 139 n. 3, 438–39 Excursus 3, and also Lukonin, "Political, Social and Administrative Institutions: Taxes and Trade," 704.

cunning plan, until Sābūr threw round his neck a noose he had with him and then dragged him off. He was taken away, loaded with fetters, and consigned to gaol. People commented at that time, "Sūkhrā's wind has died away, and a wind belonging to Mihrān has now started to blow," and this became proverbial. After that, Qubādh ordered Sūkhrā to be executed, and this was done.[341]

When ten years had elapsed of Qubādh's reign, the Chief Mōbadh and the great men of state agreed together on deposing Qubādh from his throne, so they did this and imprisoned him. This was because he had become a follower of a man named Mazdak and his partisans, who proclaimed, "God has established [886] daily sustenance in the earth for His servants to divide out among themselves with equal shares, but men have oppressed each other regarding it." They further asserted that they were going to take from the rich for the poor and give to those possessing little out of the share of those possessing much; moreover, [they asserted that] those who had an excessive amount of wealth, womenfolk, and goods had no more right to them than anyone else. The lower ranks of society took advantage of this and seized the opportunity; they rallied to Mazdak and his partisans and banded together with them. The people (al-nās, i.e., the higher levels of society) suffered from the activities of the Mazdakites, and these last grew strong until they would burst in on a man in his own house and appropriate his dwelling, his womenfolk, and his possessions without the owner being able to stop them. They contrived to make all these doctrines attractive to Qubādh, but also threatened him with deposition (if he did not cooperate with them). Very soon it came to pass that a man among them (i.e., the Mazdakites?) no longer knew his own son, nor a child his father, nor did a man any longer possess anything with which he could enjoy ampleness of life.[342]

---

341. As Nöldeke observed, 140 n. 2, Kawād's seeming ingratitude here may have sprung from fear of Sūkhrā's ascendancy in the state and of his behavior as an overmighty subject; if so, it would accord with the information given in n. 338 above.

342. No episode in Sāsānid history has engendered so much discussion by modern scholars, from Nöldeke himself (in his trans., 455–67 Excursus 3 on Mazdak and the Mazdakites) through Christensen to recent scholars like F. Altheim and Ruth Stiehl, N. V. Pigulevskaya, O. Klíma, Mansour Shaki (viewing the Mazdakite revolt as an upsurge of oppressed peasantry had obvious attractions for scholars

They now consigned Qubādh to a place to which only they had access and set up in his place a brother of his called Jāmāsb.[343] They told Qubādh, "You have incurred sin by what you have done in the past, and the only thing that can purify you from it is handing over your womenfolk." They even wanted him to make writing behind the Iron Curtain), H. Gaube, and Patricia Crone, as the appearance of the Mazdakite movement and Kawād's involvement in it. Two recent summations of the problem are Ehsan Yarshater's chapter "Mazdakism" and, more controversially, Patricia Crone's article "Kavad's Heresy and Mazdak's Revolt." In brief, it seems unlikely that Mazdak espoused a thoroughgoing program of communism of property and wives, entailing a total upheaval in society, or that Kawād would adopt such a program in its entirety, thereby subverting the hierarchy of classes on which Persian monarchy and society had rested from time immemorial and laying a disordered land open to attacks from the Byzantines on one side and the Hepthalites on the other.

---

What Yarshater and Crone bring out, despite their different emphases, is that, when Mazdakism came to prominence in the first part of Kawād's reign (488–96), at a time when the emperor was still a youth or young man, it clearly appeared as a Zoroastrian heresy. As such it stemmed from the ideas of a third century A.D. heresiarch, Zarādusht of Fasā in Fārs (the Zarādhusht, son of Khurrakān, of al-Ṭabarī, I, 893, p. 148 below), not connected in any way with Manichaeism, and in Weltanschauung and ethos directly opposed to Mani's asceticism and suspicion of the present world. Kawād could never have become, by definition as a Sāsānid monarch, a fervid communist, but did see the utility of some of Mazdak's ideas in his endeavors to reduce the excessive power of the nobility, to modernize the Sāsānid state, to make its social structure more flexible, and to render it more able to withstand attacks from its powerful external enemies in both east and west. His proposed reform of marriage practices did not involve communism of wives, ibāḥat al-nisā', but rather a widening of such existing practices as wife lending, a redistribution of women immured within princely and noble harems, and the allowing of women to marry outside their own class. Regarding property, some redistribution, rather than confiscation, was probably envisaged. Such policies would have reduced social distinctions and destroyed the purity of noble lineages. They must have been anathema to the Persian nobility, and only Kawād's youth explains how he thought he could enforce such measures, given that the only coercive power at his disposal was that of an army staffed by the great nobility and *dihqān*s themselves, members of the classes most likely to be directly affected by the reforms. Hence the ending of what was apparently the first phase of the Mazdakite movement with Kawād's deposition in 496 by a conspiracy of the nobility, who replaced him by what was hoped would be a more pliant Jāmāsb/Zāmāsp, is wholly explicable.

343. Nöldeke, 142 n. 1, noted that all is straightforward in the narrative up to this point, but that it now becomes illogical and absurd, with Kawād dethroned by the Mazdakites but with them influential enough once more after his restoration to procure the killing of Sūkhrā/Zarmihr. Nöldeke attributed this section to Ibn al-Muqaffa'.

Jāmāspa- is in Persian legendary history a son of Kay Khusraw. Whether this is the name appearing here as Jāmāsb/Zāmāsp, Greek form Zamaspēs, on his coins over himself to them as a sacrifice, so that they could kill him and make him an offering to the fire. When Zarmihr, son of Sūkhrā, perceived this, he went forth with an accompanying group of the nobles, ready to expend his own life, and then killed a great number of the Mazdakites, restored Qubādh to his royal power and drove out his brother Jāmāsb. After this, however, the Mazdakites kept on inciting Qubādh against Zarmihr to the point that Qubādh killed him.[344] Qubādh was always one of the best of the Persian kings until Mazdak seduced him into reprehensible ways. As a result, the bonds linking the outlying parts of the realm became loosened and the defense of the frontiers fell into neglect.[345]

Z'M'SP, i.e., Zāmāsp, is unclear. See on Jāmāsb's coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 64, 375–76, 461–63, Plate XVII, Table XVIII; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 51, Table X, Plate 11; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 137–39; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 236–37. See on the name, Nöldeke, trans. 142 n. 2; Justi, Namenbuch, 109. His brief reign, separating the two parts of Kawādh's one, was 496–98. See on it, Christensen, Sassanides, 349–51; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 150.

344. It is strange, as pointed out by Nöldeke, trans. 140 n. 2, that after putting Sūkhrā to death, Kawād should take into his service the son Zarmihr and that Zarmihr should then take a leading part in the release and restoration of Kawād after the Mazdakite ascendancy, only to be killed in his turn by the emperor. He suggested that we do not need to assume that Kawād killed successively father and son, but that we have to deal instead with one minister only, Sūkhrā Zarmihr, who had been with Kawād in exile among the Hephthalites but who now, after the emperor's return, had arrogated too much power in the state to himself, leading to his elimination in the usual fashion. This event would have been split into two episodes corresponding to the two elements making up Sūkhrā Zarmihr's name. The actual occasion of the execution must, on this analysis, be accordingly pushed back to the second part of Kawād's reign; but see n. 338 above.

345. That Kawād was a weakling who allowed his empire to fall apart as alleged here (and in al-Ṭabarī, I, 888–89, pp. 139–41 below, in regard to Kawād's relations with the Kindī chief al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr) could well be a slanderous report going back to the Zoroastrian priestly and Persian aristocratic tradition exemplified in the Book of Kings which Ibn al-Muqaffa' made available for later Arabic authors, and reflecting Kawād's involvement early in his reign with Mazdakite doctrines and attempts to curb the Zoroastrian clergy and the nobility (see n. 342 above and n. 349 below). It is further reflected, for instance in the report of al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 292, that in Kawād's reign the irrigation channels in the district of Kaskar on the Tigris in Lower Iraq were allowed to fall into disrepair.

Nöldeke, trans. 142 n. 3, endeavored at length to refute this partisan verdict, pointing out that Kawād held the throne, with just a two or three years' break, for the lengthy period of forty-three years. During this time he undertook two protracted wars against the Greeks (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 887, p. 137 and n. 351 below).

A certain person knowledgeable about the history of the Persians has [on the other hand] mentioned that it was the great men of state of the Persians who imprisoned Qubādh when he became a partisan of Mazdak and one of the followers of his doctrines, and who raised to the royal power in his stead his brother Jāmāsb, son [887] of Fayrūz. Now a sister of Qubādh's went to the prison where he was incarcerated[346] and tried to gain entry, but the offical responsible for guarding the prison and its inmates prevented her from entering. This man became roused by the desire to ravish her at that opportunity, and told her how much he desired her; she informed him that she would not resist him in anything he might desire of her, so he let her in. She entered the prison, and spent a day with Qubādh. Then at her bidding, Qubādh was rolled up in one of the carpets in the gaol, and this was borne by one of his male attendants, a strong and hardy youth, and brought out of the prison. When the lad went past the prison commander, the latter asked him what he was carrying. He was unable to answer, but Qubādh's sister came up behind the lad and told the prison commander that it was a bed roll she had slept on during her menstrual periods and that she was only going forth to purify herself and would then return. The man believed her, and did not touch the carpet or go near it, fearing lest he become polluted by it, and he allowed the lad who was bearing Qubādh to pass freely out. So he went along with Qubādh, the sister following after him.

Procopius regarded Kawād as exceptionally clever and energetic. He also maintained a general peace with the Hephthalites in the east; see n. 348 below. Similarly, Crone, "Kawad's Heresy and Mazdak's Revolt," 25–26, stresses that, while Kawād ruled in a mild and pacific fashion, and abstained during his pro-Mazdakite phase from meat (al-Ṭabarī, I, 889, p. 142 below), after his restoration he behaved in a bellicose enough manner and in his warfare with the Byzantines was as savage as any of his predecessors.

346. According to Greek sources, Kawād's fortress-prison lay in Susiana. Procopius, who makes the ingenious woman here Kawād's wife and not his daughter (followed in this by Agathias, see Cameron, "Agathias on the Sassanians," 128–29, 157–58), simply calls it "the fortress of oblivion" and has a lengthy digression on its past history within his already extended account of Kawād's enforced interregnum, imprisonment, and escape. See The Persian War, I.v.1–vi.19; Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, 155. Theophrastes, however, calls the fortress Giligerda, which led the nineteenth-century traveler and historian Sir Henry Rawlinson to identify it with Gilgird in the mountains to the east of Shushtar. See Nöldeke, trans. 144 n. 1.

Qubādh now took to flight until he reached the land of the Hepthalites, in order to ask their king to help him and to provide him with an army, so that he might make war on those who had rebelled against him and deposed him. It has been further related that, on his outward journey to the Hepthalites, he halted at Abarshahr at the house of one of its leading citizens, who had a daughter of marriageable age, and it was on the occasion of this journey that he had sexual relations with the mother of Kisrā Anūsharwān.[347] It has been also related that Qubādh returned from that journey with his son Anūsharwān and the latter's mother.[348]

He defeated his brother Jāmāsb in the contest for royal power after the latter had reigned for six years.[349] Then after that, 347. Abarshahr was the district around Nīshābūr, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 819, p. 15 and n. 59 above. Al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 185–86, has Abatrshar here, but al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 65–66, in a more detailed account than that of al-Ṭabarī, has Kawād fleeing for refuge in the house of a dihqān, whose ancestry went back to Farīdūn, on the borders of Khūzistān and Iṣfahān, and Firdawsī follows al-Dīnawarī substantially. The emperor's flight to a refuge in southwestern-western Persia obviously accords better with his incarceration just before this in Susiana. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 145 nn. 2–4.

---

348. There is little information in the Arabic sources on Kawād's stay among the Hephthalites (with whom he already had links from his time as a hostage at the Hephthalite court during his father's reign), but useful information in Procopius and the Western sources. The fugitive Kawād was sheltered—after what must have been a lengthy journey right across Persia—by the king of the Hephthalites (whose personal name is unknown, unless Akhshunwār was still ruling). The king gave to Kawād in marriage his daughters, actually the child of the Persian princess who had been captured by the Hepthalites on the defeat of her father Fīrūz, hence Kawād's niece; such a union would not have been regarded in Zoroastrian custom as at all incestuous. Kawād regained his throne with Hephthalite assistance, but at the price of continued dependence on them. He had to finance the Hephthalite army that placed him back on the throne, to cede territory along the Oxus to them, and to pay a tribute, in Sāsānid coinage counterstamped with the Hephthalite name. This last was in fact paid for over thirty years till the opening of Khusraw Anūsharwān's reign. See Marquart, Ērānšahr, 63–64; Christensen, Sassanides, 349–50; Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 16–17 and Pl. II (coins) 92–93; Litvinsky, "The Hephthalite Empire," 140.

349. The reign of Jāmāsb/Zāmāsp seems in reality to have been shorter than this, with Kawād resuming power—apparently without striking a blow—in 498 or 499, which would make his period of deposition, imprisonment, and exile only two or three years. The fate of Zāmāsp, now in turn deposed, is uncertain. Elias of Nisibis alone states that Kawād had him killed. More probable is the leniency toward his brother attributed to Kawād by the well-informed Agathias, that Zāmāsp renounced the throne of his own accord, preferring a life of safe obscurity, and was pardoned (confirmed in the Arabic source of al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-

Qubādh led an expedition against the land of the Romans, conquered one of their towns in al-Jazīrah called Āmid[350] and carried off the women and children as captives.[351] He gave orders for a town to be built in the borderland between Fārs and the land of al-Ahwāz and named it Wām Qubādh;[352] this is the town named [888] ṭiwāl, 66). The Christian Arabic Chronicle of Se'ert does, however, record a purge of the Zoroastrian priesthood by Kawād, with executions and imprisonments. See Nöldeke, trans. 145 n. 5; Christensen, Sassanides, 350–51; Cameron, "Agathias on the Sassanians," 130–31; eadem, Procopius on the Sixth Century, 155 (Procopius in his The Persian War confuses Jāmāsb with Fīrūz's successor Balāsh/Blasēs); Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 150.

350. Āmid, classical Amida, was a key point in the fighting between the Byzantines and Sāsānids. It lay on the west bank of the upper Tigris, in what was in early Islamic times the district of Diyār Bakr in the province of Jazīrah, and is now the modern Turkish city of Diyarbakir. See PW, I/2, col. 1833, s.v. Amida (Baumgartner) Le Strange, Lands, 108–11; Canard, H'amdanides, 79–81; EIr, s.v. Amida (D. Sellwood). Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 66, adds that Kawād also captured another town of the region, Mayyāfāriqīn (the Greek Martyropoplis).

351. These are the sole details in the oriental sources on the great four years' war launched by Kawād against the Byzantines (summer 502–autumn 506) soon after his regaining the Persian throne. Kawād's pretext for opening hostilities was the emperor Anastasius's refusal to contribute to Kawād's expenses in financing the Hephthalite army, which had backed him, and in paying the ongoing tribute to the Hephthalites. The Byzantines must have had the hope that, if Kawād were unable to pay his former allies, a rupture between these two latter powers would occur. It seems that the Byzantine frontier fortresses and fortified towns had not been kept in good repair during the fifth century and, as a result, were at this time inadequate to withstand the Persians, especially as the Persians had acquired important stretches of territory in the later fourth century, above all the important bridgehead of Nisībīn (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 826, p. 28, and nn. 90–91 above). Hence early successes for Kawād's army, which included Hephthalite contingents, were the sack of Theodosiopolis (the later Erzerum) in western Armenia, this capture of Amida/Āmid (see n. 350 above), and that of Martyropolis or Mayyāfāriqīn (the bare information recorded in al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 66, and Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 143). However, the war is fully documented in Greek and Syriac sources, such as Procopius's The Persian War, I.vii.1–I.x.19; cf. Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, 155–56; Ps. Joshua the Stylite's Chronicle, trans. 37–62, 63–75. See Nöldeke, trans. 146 n. 1; Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, I, 307–309; idem, History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius I to the Death of Justinian, I, 10–15; Christensen, Sassanides, 352; Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 92–93; Hannestad, "Les relations de Byzance avec la Transcaucasie et l'Asie Centrale aux 5e et 6e siècles," 442; Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, II, 267–72; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 150–51; M. Whitby, "Procopius and the Development of Roman Defences in Upper Mesopotamia," 725–26; Greatrex, Rome and Persia at War, 502–532, 73–119.

The fame of the Persian victory at Amida resonated several decades later in a verse of the Ḥīran poet 'Adī b. Zayd:

We struck to the ground Qubādh, the lord of all the Persians, even though they Būqubādh,[353] also called Arrajān.[354] He laid out an administrative division (kūrah) and added to it rural districts (rasātīq) from the kūrah of Surraq and that of Rām Hurmuz.[355] He then nominated his son Kisrā as his successor in the royal power, and wrote this out in a document, which he sealed with his seal ring.[356] When

---

had stirred up with their hands the glistening swords of Āmid. (Dīwān, 124 no. 41)

352. Following Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCI, as being a crasis of *Weh-Āmid-Kawād for the text's Rām Qubādh.

353. Following Addenda et emendanda, loc. cit., for the text's Barqubādh.

354. These two alternative names for Arrajān are somewhat dubious; the second one should be read as *Abarqubādh, as the consonant ductus in al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 66, and Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 143, allows. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 146 n. 2.

355. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 66–67, mentions a number of changes in administrative geography carried out by Kawād in the provinces of *Abarqubādh (locating this, however, in central Iraq), Bihqubādh al-Awsaṭ and al-Asfal, and Iṣfahān. These may have been connected with the cadastral survey of the Sawād of Iraq instituted by Kawād, accompanied by a new tax system, to be continued by his successor Khusraw Anūsharwān, which is mentioned in the Arabic sources. See Crone, "Kawad's Heresy and Mazdak's Revolt," 33–34.

356. According to al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 67, Kawād had several sons, out of whom Khusraw was the most favored, despite the emperor's having certain grounds for suspicion (ẓinnah) regarding him. According to Procopius, Kawād's eldest son was Kaosēs, i.e., Kāwūs (called by Theophanes Pthasouarsan in an attempt to render Padashkhwār-shāh, this being Kāwūs's title as provincial ruler of Ṭabaristān), and there was another son Zamēs, i.e., Jam. But Kawād wished his third, younger son Khusraw to succeed him, since, according to Theophanes, Kāwūs had been brought up (in the first part of his father's reign?) as a Mazdakite.

Toward the end of his reign, Kawād was in a stronger position vis-à-vis the nobility, and was able to make these succession arrangements himself rather than leave the choice and the election of his successor to the nobles and clergy; but he cannot have wished to provoke a strong reaction by nominating Kāwūs if the latter was still indeed an adherent of the Mazdakites. Procopius, The Persian War, I.x.1–18, further relates that Kawād had sought from the Byzantine emperor Justin I (518–27) that the latter should adopt Khusraw (just as, at the end of the fourth century, the emperor Arcadius had made the Sāsānid Yazdagird I protector of his son and desired heir Theodosius (II) (see n. 191 above). No doubt Kawād had the intention of strengthening Khusraw's claim to the succession, which might then have been backed, if necessary, by Byzantine arms; but Justin had refused. The second son Jāmāsb (= Procopius's Zamēs/Jam) was disqualified from succeeding to the throne through the loss of an eye. Hence when Kawād fell mortally ill in 531, he wrote out this succession document (al-Ṭabarī's kitāb, al-Ya'qūbī's waṣiyyah) for Khusraw. According to the Byzantine chronicler John Malalas, he actually had him crowned. Again according to Procopius, ibid., I.xxi.20–22, Kāwūs laid claim to the throne on his father's death, and according to the later historian of Ṭabaristān Ibn Isfandiyār, raised a rebellion, which failed and caused him to lose his life. See Nöldeke, trans. 147 n. 1; Christensen, Sassanides, 353–55; Frye "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 151; Crone, "Kawad's Heresy and Mazdak's Revolt," 31–32.

Qubādh died after having reigned for forty-three years, including the years of his brother Jāmāsb, Kisrā put into execution the measures which Qubādh had commended to him.[357]

Mention of What Has Been Recorded Concerning the Events Taking Place among the Arabs in Qubādh's Reign in His Kingdom and Involving His Governors

There was related to me a narrative going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said: Al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr b. Ḥujr b. 'Adī al-Kindī met al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir b. Imri' al-Qays b. al-Shaqīqah in battle and killed him, with al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān al-Akbar escaping from al-Ḥārith. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr al-Kindī then assumed power over the lands al-Nu'mān had ruled. At this point, Qubādh, son of Fayrūz, the ruler of Persia, sent a message to al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr, informing him that there had been formerly an agreement between him and his predecessor as king [among the Arabs] and that he would welcome a meeting with al-Ḥārith.[358]

Qubādh was a Zindīq who did only good deeds, who abhorred shedding blood and who, in his dislike for shedding blood, treated

---

357. Kawād I's reign was 488–531, with the interlude of Jāmāsb/Zāmāsp's two or three years from 496 to 498 or 499. Concerning his possible age at death, see n. 338 above. Concerning his name on his coins, see n. 329 above. See on his coins, Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 64–65, 373–75, 376–80, 459–61, 464–70, Plates XVII–XVIII, Tables XVII, XIX; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 51–52, Table X, Plate 11; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 130–36; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 236.

The other Arabic sources for his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 663; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 185–86 (mainly on Kawād's flight to the Hephthalites and the circumstance of Khusraw's birth); al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 64–67 (considerable detail on Mazdak's movement); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 195–96 = §§ 617–18 (brief note of Mazdak); idem, Tanbīh, 101, trans. 145; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 50–51 (concentrates on his foundation of cities); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 412–14, 421. Of the Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 146–55.

Of modern studies on his reign in general, see Christensen, Le règne du roi Kawādh I et le communisme mazdakite; idem, Sassanides, 336–62; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 149–51, 178; EI[2], s.v. Sāsānids (M. J. Morony); also references on the Mazdakite movement in n. 338.

358. This is a repetition grosso modo of the events treated by al-Ṭabarī at I, 881–82, pp. 124–25 above, but bringing in Kawād at the end causes chronological difficulties, since Kawād only acceeded to power in 488, and the events involving al-Nu'mān I's death and the succession of his son al-Mundhir I are probably to be placed in the second decade of the century, hence some seventy years earlier; see nn. 315, 319 above.

his enemies with leniency.[359] In his time, heretical opinions (al-ahwā') became rife, and the people came to regard Qubādh as a weak ruler. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr al-Kindī, however, set out with a numerous and well-equipped army, until the two forces met at the bridge of al-Fayyūm.[360] Qubādh ordered a dish of dates and extracted their stones. Then he ordered another dish and placed in it dates in which the stones had been left. These two dishes were placed before them (sc., Qubādh and al-Ḥārith). The dish of dates [889] with stones by al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr, and the one with no date stones in it was placed by Qubādh. Al-Ḥārith began to eat the dates and to spit out the stones. Qubādh set about eating [everything in] the dish in front of him, and said to al-Ḥārith, "What's the matter with you? Why aren't you eating exactly what I'm eating?" Al-Ḥārith replied, "Among us, only camels and sheep eat date stones," and he realized that Qubādh was deriding him. After this, the two of them made peace on the basis that al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr and those he wished of his followers should bring their horses to drink from the Tigris up to their saddle girths but not pass any further beyond that point.[361]

But when al-Ḥārith saw Qubādh's weakness, he began to covet the Sawād, and ordered the men in his garrison posts (masāliḥihi) to cross the Euphrates and carry out raids into the Sawād.[362] The 359. See on the term Zindīq, n. 118 above.

360. According to Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 286, this was in central Iraq, near Hīt on the Euphrates; cf. Musil, The Middle Euphrates, 350. As a bridge, it would be regarded as neutral ground, hence suitable for a meeting between the two opposing sides. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 149 n. 1.

361. According to Nöldeke, trans. 149 n. 3, citing the Talmud, this occurs as a formulaic legal expression.

362. These garrison posts must in reality have been part of the Sāsānid defenses along the desert fringes against Arabs from the interior of the peninsula like those of Kindah. From this point onward, al-Ṭabarī's account slides into legend, as recognized by Nöldeke, trans. 150 nn. 1–2, and Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 88–89. What is, nevertheless, firmly historical is that between approximately 525 and 528 al-Ḥārith was indeed able to expel the Lakhmids from al-Ḥīrah, having taken over parts of the Iraqi borderlands some twenty years before (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 881–82, pp. 124–25 and n. 319 above). From 528 till his death in 531, Kawād was preoccupied with warfare with the Byzantines, with the emperor Justin I at the outset and then with the great Justinian I, this warfare being centered on Georgia and Transcaucasia on one front and on the Upper Mesopotamian frontier on another one (see Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, I, 372–80; idem, History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius I to the cries for help [of the local people] reached Qubādh when he was at al-Madā'in, and he exclaimed: "This has occurred under the protection of their king," and he then sent a message to al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr that some robbers of the Arabs had mounted raids and that he wanted a meeting with him. When al-Ḥārith came, Qubādh said to him, "You have done something which no one before you has ever done," but al-Ḥārith replied, "I haven't done anything, and don't know anything about it; it was some Arab robbers, and I myself cannot keep a firm hand over the Arabs except by financial subsidies and regular troops." Qubādh said to him, "What do you want, then?" and he replied, "I want you to make over to me a grant of part of the Sawād so that I can get weapons ready by means of it." So Qubādh made over to him the side of the lower Euphrates bordering on the Arabs, comprising six *ṭassūj*s. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr al-Kindī at that point sent a messenger to Tubba' in Yemen,

---

Death of Justinian, I, 79–89; Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, II, 267–71, 283–84, 287–94; Greatrex, Rome and Persia at War, 502–532, 139–212). It seems, however, to have been a withdrawal of support from al-Mundhir III by Kawād that allowed al-Ḥārith to take over al-Ḥīrah. Al-Mundhir had apparently been negotiating with the Persians' enemy, Byzantium. Hence credence should not be placed in the information retailed in some Arabic sources (e.g., Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[1], VIII, 63 = Aghānī[3], 78–79; Ibn al-Athir, Kāmil, I, 434) that Kawād tried first to impose Mazdakism on al-Mundhir but failed, whereupon al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr agreed to accept Mazdakism, and was rewarded by a grant of the former Lakhmid lands. See Christensen, Le règne du roi Kawādh I et le communisme mazdakite, and (regarding the tale with skepticism), Olinder, The Kings of Kinda, 63–64. In any case, Kawād had broken decisively with the Mazdakites on his restoration in 498 or 499, and it seems highly unlikely that he would make adherence to the heresy an instrument of diplomacy nearly thirty years later. Abū al-Baqā', al-Manāqib al-mazyadiyyah, 121, simply states that Kawād was unable to answer al-Mundhir's appeal for help because his kingdom was disturbed by the Mazdakites

Al-Mundhir regained control of al-Ḥīrah in 528. The sources all state that it was Khusraw Anūsharwān who restored him, but Khusraw did not come to the throne until 531; it thus seems that al-Mundhir had somehow regained possession of his capital and that Khusraw merely confirmed this. At all events, Lakhmid power was now firmly reestablished on the Iraq fringes, backed by the might of their traditional patrons and supporters, the Sāsānids. At some unspecified point, al-Mundhir managed to get hold of al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr, who had had to retreat into the interior of northern Arabia after clashing with the Byzantines and Ghassānids on the Syrian frontiers. Al-Mundhir seized the Kindī leader's camels, killed al-Ḥārith himself, and massacred forty-eight members of the ruling house of Kindah, an event alluded to in the Dīwān of al-Ḥārith's grandson Imru' al-Qays (Dīwān, ed. Muḥammad Abū al-Faḍl Ibrāhīm, 200, no. 37 vv. 1–2). Other traditions make al-Ḥārith's death at the hands of the Kalb. See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 89–90; Olinder, The Kings of Kinda, 63–68.

saying, "I covet strongly the kingdom of the Persians, and have already acquired six *ṭassūj*s of it. So gather your troops together and advance, for there is nothing between you and their kingdom, since the king does not eat meat and does not consider the shedding of blood lawful, for he is a Zindīq." So Tubba' assembled his troops and advanced until he encamped at al-Ḥīrah. He drew near [890] to the Euphrates, where the midges plagued him. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr ordered a canal to be dug for him as far as al-Najaf, and this was done: this is the Canal of al-Ḥīrah. He encamped against there and sent his nephew Shamir Dhū al-Janāḥ ("Shamir of the Wing") against Qubādh.[363] He fought with Qubādh and routed him, compelling him to flee as far as al-Rayy. He then caught up with Qubādh there and killed him.[364]

Tubba' now sent Shamir Dhū al-Janāḥ to Khurāsān and his son Ḥassān to Sogdia (al-Ṣughd), telling them, "Whichever of you

363. See on Shamir Yur'ish or Yuhar'ish, n. 314 above and n. 364 below, and al-Ṭabarī, I, 910, pp. 176–77 and n. 451 below.

364. All this is pure fantasy. As implied by al-Ṭabarī in I, 888, pp. 138–39 above, Kawād died a natural death, doubtless at an advanced age after such a long reign. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 411, criticizes al-Ṭabarī for his confusion here and lack of critical acumen, such defects of an absense of discrimination and discernment being common, he says, to all writers dealing with the ancient Arabs; Nöldeke in his translation omitted this passage on the legendary exploits of the Tubba' kings, that from I, 890 l. 4 to 892 l. 14. The only genuine feature in al-Ṭabarī's account is that the Tubba' prince Shamir Yur'ish mentioned in al-Ṭabarī, I, n. 910, pp. 176–77 below, the first recorded Tubba' king (on this dynasty, see n. 314 above), really did exist.

For the king's name, Sh.m.r, the vocalization is of course speculative, there being no indication of vowels in the South Arabian script with the probable exception of w and y used both consonantally and vocalically (see Beeston, Sabaic Grammar, 6–7). But Shamir or Shimr seem to have better claims that Shammar for the vocalization of the first component of the king's full name, despite the fact that the rather late author Nashwān b. Sa'īd al-Ḥimyarī (d. 573/1178) expressly gives Shammar in his Shams al-'ulūm (see 'Aẓīmuddīn Aḥmad, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns im Šams al-'ulūm, 56–57). The choice of this latter form by such later writers as Nashwān was probably influenced by the rise of the North Arabian tribe of Shammar and their home, the Jabal Shammar, since there is no orthographic sign in the South Arabian script to indicate gemination (Beeston, ibid., 7–8). G. Ryckmans, Les noms propres sud-sémitiques, I, 210, has Šimr, comparing this with Classical Arabic shimr, "energetic, capable"; G. Lankester Harding, An Index and Concordance of Pre-Islamic Names and Inscriptions, 357, has Šamir; and Robin, Supplément à la dictionnaire du Bible, s.v. Sheba. 2., writes Shammir. In the line of verse (apocryphal, naturally) placed in Shamir's mouth in al-Ṭabarī, I, n. 910, p. 177 below, the wāfir metre does require ShVmVr^{un} or ShVmr^{un}.

reaches China first shall become ruler over it." Each one headed a mighty army, said to be of 640,000 men. He further sent his nephew Ya'fur against the Romans; it was he who recited:

O my companion, you may well be full of wonder at Ḥimyar, when they encamped at al-Jābiyah![365]
Eighty thousand is the number of their chiefs,[366] and for each group of eight men there is a chief!

Ya'fur proceeded until he reached Constantinople (al-Qusṭanṭīniyyah), whose people then gave him their obedience and promised to pay tribute, and then went on to Rome (Rūmiyyah), a journey of four months, and besieged it. The troops accompanying him suffered great hunger, were afflicted by plague, and became weakened. The Romans perceived what had hit them, so fell upon them and killed them, with not a single man escaping. Shamir Dhū al-Janāḥ traveled on until he reached Samarqand.[367] He besieged it but was unable to capture any part of it. When he realized that, he went round to the city guard, captured one man of it, and interrogated him about the city and its ruler. The man told him that, regarding its ruler, he was the most stupid of mankind, with no interest except in drinking and eating, but that he had a daughter and it was she who decided the affairs of the populace. Hence Shamir sent the man back to her with a present, telling him, "Inform her that I have only come from the land of the Arabs because of what I have heard about her intelligence, and in order [891] that she might marry me and I might acquire through her a boy

365. This settlement in the Jawlān or Golan region south of Damascus was a main residence of the Byzantines' allies, the chiefs of the Jafnid family of Ghassān, probably their summer encampment, and it was further important in the periods of the Arab conquest of Syria and of the early Umayyads as a military encampment and concentration point for troops. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 91–92; Le Strange, Palestine under the Moslems, 460–61; Nöldeke, Die Ghassânischen Fürsten, 47–49; H. Lammens, "L'evènement des Marwānides et le califat de Marwān Ier," 77–79; Donner, The Early Islamic Conquests, 44.; *EI*², s.v. Djābiya (H. Lammens-J. Sourdel-Thomine).

366. Thus interpreting rawāyāhum, pl. of rāwiyah, "a camel used for drawing water," such a camel being likened to the chief who bears the burden of blood money, to be paid in camels by his tribe. See Lane, Lexicon, 1196c; Glossarium, p. CCLXXIII: rāwiyah = dux.

367. Presumably to Transoxania via Khurāsān, Ḥassān having, as it later appears, preceded him to Sogdia and then China.

who will rule over both the Persians and the Arabs. [Tell her also] that I have not come seeking wealth but that I have here with me four thousand chests of gold and silver and that I will hand it over to her and proceed onward to China. If I succeed in gaining the land, she will become my wife; but if I perish, all that wealth will be hers."

When his message was brought to her, she said, "I have fallen in with his wishes, so let him send what he has mentioned." Hence he sent to her four thousand chests, with two men inside each chest. Now Samarqand had four gates, with four thousand men by each gate. He fixed as a sign of recognition between himself and them the striking of camel bells, and gave orders regarding that to the envoys he sent with them. When they got inside the city, he had the camel bells struck; they sprang out [from the chests] and seized control of the gates. Shamir led a frontal attack with his troops and entered the city, killing its populace and seizing as plunder everything within it.[368] He then marched onward to China. He encountered the hosts of the Turks, put them to flight, and went on to China, but found that Ḥassān b. Tubbaʿ had preceeded him by three years. According to what certain people have mentioned, the two of them remained in China until they died, their stay there extending to twenty-one years.

He related: Those who have asserted that they both remained in China until they died have said that Tubbaʿ built [a chain of] lighthouses (al-manār) spanning the expanse between him and them, and when any affair of moment occurred, they lit fire beacons at night, and the news was thereby conveyed in a single night. He laid down as a sign between him and them that, "If I light two fires at my end, this signifies the death of Yaʿfur, and if I light three fires, that means the death of Tubbaʿ; whereas, if a single fire is kindled at their end, it means the death of Ḥassān, and if two fires, the death of both of them." They kept to this arrangement, until he lit two fires, and that signified the death of Yaʿfur, and then he lit three fires, and that signified the death of Tubbaʿ.

368. A Persian popular etymology derived the city's name (presumably after its supposed rebuilding) from this legendary episode, Shamir kand "Shamir destroyed, uprooted (it)," according to Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 108.

He related: According to the story generally agreed upon, [892]
Shamir and Ḥassān returned via the road they had previously taken when they had originally started out, until they came into Tubba"s presence with the wealth they had obtained in China plus various kinds of jewels, perfumes, and slave captives. Then they all went back together to their own land, Tubba' traveled onward till he reached Mecca, where he lodged in the ravine of the cook shops (al-maṭābikh).[369] Tubba' died in Yemen. None of the kings of Yemen after him ever sallied forth from Yemen on raids to any other land. His reign lasted for one hundred and twenty-one years.

He related: It is said that Tubba' had become a convert to Judaism because of the rabbis (al-aḥbār), a large group of whom had gone from Yathrib to Mecca with him.[370] He related: They say that Ka'b al-Aḥbār's lore came from the surviving material those rabbis had bequeathed; Ka'b al-Aḥbār came from the Ḥimyar.[371]

---

369. Tubba"s coming to Mecca and his designs against the Ka'bah are treated in more detail by al-Ṭabarī at I, 901ff., pp. 164ff. below. In giving this story, also from Ibn Isḥāq, the historian of Mecca al-Azraqī specifies that al-shi'b min al-maṭābikh got its name because Tubba' set up his own kitchens in the ravine of Mecca later called that of the early Umayyad governor of the city, 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Kurayz (Kitāb akhbār Makkah, I, 85).

370. We certainly know of the presence of Judaism in pre-Islamic Yathrib, the Islamic Medina, notably from the story of the Prophet Muḥammad's relations with the local Jewish tribes there after he had made the hijrah from Mecca to Medina. These Jews must have emigrated from Palestine to setlements along the Wādī al-Qurā in western Arabia, Yathrib being the farthest south of these colonies; the stimulus for this migration may well have been the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 or the aftermath of Bar Kokhba's revolt. i.e., after A.D. 135. The term used for "rabbi" in early Arabic, ḥabr/ḥibr, given the Arabic broken plural aḥbār, stems directly from Hebrew ḥabēr, and was already known in pre-Islamic Arabia. See C. C. Torrey, The Jewish Foundation of Islam, 34; A. Jeffery, The Foreign Vocabulary of the Qur'ān, 49–50. Al-Khwārazmī, Mafātīḥ al-'ulūm, 35, equates al-ḥabr with the Muslim al-'ālim.

How the town which became the Islamic Medina/al-Madīnah had acquired its earlier name of Yathrib (still appearing in Qur'ān, XXXIII, 13) is uncertain, but the name is undoubtedly ancient. A cuneiform inscription from Ḥarrān mentions ya-at-ri-bu as one of the towns in Arabia to which Nabū-nā'id or Nabonidus of Babylon (r. 556–539 B.C.) penetrated; in the Greek geographer Ptolemy we have Iathrippa; and in Minaean inscriptions we find Ytrb. See Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 201 n. 1; F. Rosenthal, introd. to Torrey, The Jewish Foundation of Islam, repr. p. xi; *EI*², s.v. al-Madīna. i. History to 1926 (W. M. Watt).

371. Abū Isḥāq Ka'b al-Aḥbār ("Ka'b of the rabbis") was a Yemeni convert from Judaism to Islam, probably in 17/638 (thus in al-Ṭabarī, I, 2514), dying in 32/652–

As for Ibn Isḥāq's account, he has mentioned that the member of the Tubba' dynasty who went to the Orient was Tubba' the Second (al-ākhar); namely, Tubba' Tubān As'ad Abū Karib b. Malkī Karib b. Zayd b. 'Amr Dhī al-Adh'ār, who was the father of Ḥassān.[372] Ibn Ḥumayd transmitted that information to us, saying that he had it from Salamah.[373]

[Kisrā I Anūsharwān]

Then there assumed the royal power Kisrā Anūsharwān, son of Qubādh, son of Fayrūz, son of Yazdajird (II), son of Bahrām (V) Jūr.[374] When he became king, he wrote letters to the four Fādhūsbāns, each of whom was governor over a region of the land of Persia, and to their subordinate officials.[375] The text of his letter to the Fādhūsbān of Azerbaijan is as follows:

---

53 or shortly afterward. He was considered the greatest authority of his time on Judaeo-Islamic traditions, the Isrā'īliyyāt, and also on South Arabian lore. See *EI*², s.vv. Isrā'īliyyāt (G. Vajda) and Ka'b al-Aḥbār (M. Schwitz).

372. This genealogy in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 12 = ed. al-Saqqā et alii, I, 20, tr. A. Guillaume, 6. As'ad Abū Karib is attested in the inscriptions as reigning ca. A.D. 425.

373. Abū 'Abdallāh Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd al-Rāzī (d. 248/862) was one of al-Ṭabarī's most important transmitters, in both his History and his Tafsīr, especially as a second-generation rāwī for Ibn Isḥāq, and it is very often Abū 'Abdallāh Salamah b. al-Faḍl al-Anṣārī (d. 191/806) who provides the link between the two scholars. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 242; Rosenthal, The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation, I, General Introduction and From the Creation to the Flood, 17–19, 172 n. 26, 174 n. 49.

374. . Kisrā, the Arabized form of MP Husraw (thus according to Gignoux) or Khusrōy, and NP Khusraw, Greek Chosroës, going back to Avestan haosrawah-, "of good reputation," a name stemming from the Persian legendary past; in Firdawsī, Kay Khusraw is the son of Siyāwush and Farangīs (for Wasfāfrīd), daughter of Afrāsiyāb, who is the victorious leader of the host of Iran against Turan, and the vanquisher and slayer of Afrāsiyāb. See Justi, Namenbuch, 134–39; Bartholomae, Altiranisches Wörterbuch, cols. 1737–38; Mayrhofer, Die altiranischen Namen, no. 167; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 465; Yarshater, "Iranian National History," 375–76. Because the two prolonged reigns of Khusraw I Anūsharwān (531–79) and Khusraw II Abarwēz (590 and 591–628) made them especially well known to the Arabs, and because those monarchs' actions impinged very much on the history of the pre-Islamic Arabs and the beginnings of Islam, the assumption arose among the Arabs that Kisrā was a generic term for all the Persian kings, and it actually acquired a broken plural, al-Akāsirah. See Nöldeke, trans. 151 n. 1. For the component Anūsharwān, see n. 332 above.

375. The exalted title Pādhūspān stems from a non-Persian form corresponding to MP pāygōs, "land, region," + the suffix -pān. The Pādhūspāns of the four quarters of the Sāsānid empire seem to have been the civil administration counterparts

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate,[376] from the King Kisrā, son of Qubādh, to Wārī, [893] son of the Nakhīrjān,[377] Fādhūsbān of Azerbaijan and Armenia and their territories, and Dunbāwand and Ṭabaristān and their adjacent territories,[378] and his subordinate officials, greetings! The thing that most strikes fear into the hearts of people is the feeling of deprivation felt by those who fear the ending of their state of comfortable living, the eruption of civil disorders, and the advent of unpleasant things to the best of individuals, one after the other of such individuals, in regard to their own persons, their retainers, their personal wealth, or what is dearest to them. We know of no cause for fear or absence of a thing that brings more crushing ill-fortune for the generality of people, nor one likely to bring about universal disaster, than the absence of a righteous king.[379] of the Ispahbadhs or provincial military commanders (on Khusraw Anūsharwān's division of the supreme military command into four commands corresponding to the quarters of the empire, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 894, p. 149 below), although the civil and military functions doubtless often overlapped in frontier regions. In some sources, notably al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 260, the Pādhūspān is placed under the control of the Ispabadh. See Nöldeke, trans. 151 n. 2, 445–46 Excursus 3; Christensen, Sassanides, 139, 265, 352, 519.

---

376. It is hardly conceivable that the Sāsānids should have used the exact form of the Islamic basmalah; whether they used a corresponding formula at the opening of their chancery documents, etc., is unknown, although Mr F. C. de Blois points out that extant Pahlavi texts (known, of course, in Islamic-period manuscripts) often begin with the formula pad nām ī yazadān "by the name of the gods," or words to the same effect. He cites Saul Shaked, "Some Iranian Themes in Islamic Literature," 152–54, who is skeptical, however, that there was any Persian influence on Islam in this regard.

377. This appears both as a family name and as a title, but was perhaps originally a patronymic. In al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 262, we have this same form, al-Nakhīrjān, as the name or title of the defender of al-Madā'in against the Arabs of 'Umar's army. See Nöldeke, trans. 152 n. 2. N. a of Nöldeke's text suggests the possible reading Zādhūyah for the son of the Nakhīrjān, which would make more sense than the unusual Wārī.

378. These would be the territories making up the "northern quarter" of the realm, the arrangements made by Khusraw Anūsharwān being variously defined in an Armenian source and in the later Islamic historians and geographers: see n. 385 below.

379. As Nöldeke remarks, trans. 153 n. 2, the sententious and moralizing tone of the document (this being merely its introduction) is not untypical of what we know of Sāsānid chancery documents.

When Kisrā had gained firm control of power, he took measures to extirpate the religious beliefs of a hypocritical person from the people of Fasā, called Zarādhusht, son of Khurrakān,[380] a new faith which he had brought into existence within the Mazdaean religion. A considerable number of people followed him in that heretical innovation, and his movement became prominent on account of this. Among those who carried out missionary work for him among the masses was a certain man from M.dh.riyyah (?) called Mazdaq, son of Bamdādh.[381] Among the things he ordained for people, made attractive to them, and urged them to adopt, was holding their possessions and their families in common. He proclaimed that all this was part of the piety that is pleasing to God, and that He will reward with the most handsome of recompenses, and that, if that religious faith he commanded them to observe and urged them to adopt were not to exist, the truly good way of behavior, the one which is pleasing to God, would lie in the common sharing or property. With those doctrines, he incited the lower classes against the upper classes. Through him, all sorts of vile persons became mixed up with the best elements of society, criminals seeking to despoil them of their possessions found easy ways to do this, tyrannical persons had their paths to tyranny facilitated, and fornicators were able to indulge their lusts and get their hands on high-born women to whom they would never have [894] been able to aspire. Universal calamity overwhelmed the people to an extent they had never before experienced.[382]

380. Fasā was an important town and district of southeastern Fārs. See Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 260–61; Le Strange, Lands, 290; Schwarz, 97–100; Barthold, Historical Geography, 152–53; *EI*², s.v. Fasā (L. Lockhart). That Zarādhusht came from Fasā is stated in the Dēnkard. See Nöldeke, trans. 456; Crowe, "Kavad's Heresy and Mazdak's Revolt," 24.

381. The sources variously attribute Mazdak to this mysterious M.dh.riyya (which Nöldeke, trans. 154 n. 3, compared with Manādhir in Susiana and which Christensen, Le règne du roi Kawādh I^er^, 100, sought to interpret as Mādharayyā in Lower Iraq), to Iṣṭakhr in Fārs (al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 65), and to Nasā in Khurāsān (al-Bīrūnī, al-Āthār al-bāqiyah, 209). See Nöldeke, trans. 457 and n. 3; Crone, "Kawad's Heresy and Mazdak's Revolt," 24.

382. The question of whether there were two Mazdakite revolts, one toward the end of Kawād's reign and another one at Khusraw's accession or shortly after it, and the exact timing of the revolt(s) anyway, has been much discussed. Most recently, Crone has suggested that it is simplest to assume that a single revolt broke out on Khusraw's acession in 531, at a time when he was combating the rival succession

Hence Kisrā forbade the people[383] to act in accordance with any of the heretical innovations of Zarādusht, son of Kharrakān, and Mazdaq, son of Bamdādh. He extirpated all their heresy, and he killed a great number of their fervid adherents and did not allow himself to be deflected from any of what he had forbidden the people. [He further killed] a group of the Manichaeans, and made firm for the Magians the religion they had always held.

Before Kisrā became king, the office of Iṣbahbadh—that is, the supreme commander of the armed forces—was held by one man, who was responsible for this supreme command over all the land.[384] Kisrā now divided this office and rank between four Iṣbahbadhs, namely, the Iṣbahbadh of the East, comprising Khurāsān and its adjoining regions; the Iṣbahbadh of the West; the Iṣbahbadh of Nīmrūz, that is, the land of Yemen; and the Iṣbahbadh of Azerbaijan and its adjoining regions, that is, the Khazar lands.[385] He claims of his elder brother Kāwūs and military control over the realm was obviously relaxed. Khusraw may have bought time by offering the Makdakites some degree of toleration, and he certainly brought the protracted, but by now rather desultory war with Justinian to an end. Once firmly in command of affairs, lammā istaḥkama lahu al-mulk, as al-Ṭabarī, I, 893, puts it, he turned on the Mazdakites, massacred them and gradually restored order in the land. A terminus ad quem for this would be 540, when Khusraw resumed the war with Byzantium. See Crone, 30–33.

---

383. The syntax here is somewhat unusual in that we have verb-object-subject instead of the normal verb-subject-object, but one only derives sense if Kisrā is taken as the subject and al-nās as the object, as here and as in Nöldeke's translation, "Da verbot nun Chosrau . . ."

384. This is the iṣbahbadh al-bilād/Ērān-spahbed of al-Ṭabarī, I, 885, p. 131 above.

385. The division of the realm into four quarters (probably in MP, kustag; Arabic, rub', nāḥiya), described by their geographical orientation, is attested to in the Armenian geography ascribed to Moses Khorenac'i, which considers the various places in the Persian lands according to a division of (1) K'usti Khorbaran, the West; (2) K'usti Nemroy, the midday region, the South; (3) K'usti Khorasan, the East; and K'usti Kapkoh, the direction of the Caucasus, the North. See Marquart, Ērānšahr, 16–17, and for the exact delimitation in this work of the Quarter of the South, see n. 969 below. The Islamic sources have similar information about these divisions. Thus Ibn Khurradadhbih, Kitāb al-masālik wa-al-mamālik, 118: Jibāl and its components, Rayy, Azerbaijan, Ṭabaristān, Dunbāwand, and Qūmis; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 201–202: Ṭabaristān, Rayy, Jibāl, and its components, and Azerbaijan; al-Dīnawārī, al-Akbār al-ṭiwāl, 67: Iṣfahān, Qum, Jibāl, Azerbaijan and Armenia. See Nöldeke, trans. 155 n. 2; and the discussion in Marquart, Ērānšahr, 94–95. The Khazar lands were never, of course, controled by the Sāsānids (or any other rulers of Persia), and the mention of this Turkish people in a context as early saw in this new arrangement a way of improving the good ordering of his kingdom. He strengthened the fighting quality of the soldiers with weapons and mounts.[386] He recovered lands belonging to the kingdom of Persia, some of which had slipped out of the hand of King Qubādh and into the control of other monarchs of the nations, through various causes and reasons, including Sind, Bust, al-Rukhkhaj, Zābulistān, Ṭukhāristān, Dardistān, and Kābulistān.[387] He inflicted extensive slaughter among a people called the Bāriz, transported the remaining ones of them from their land, and resettled them in various places of his kingdom. They submitted to him as his servants, and he utilized them in his military campaigns.[388] He gave orders for another people, called the Ṣūl, to be made captives, and they were brought before him.

---

as the first part of the sixth century is an anachronism anyway; see further n. 390 below.

386. For Khusraw's military reforms, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 963–65, pp. 262–63, and n. 633 below.

387. Bust, al-Rukhkhaj (classical Arachosia), Zābulistān, Kābulistān, and Dardistān (the pre-Islamic region of Gandhara, this name properly read in Nöldeke's text, whereas in his translation, 156, he had read it, with justifiable doubt, as "Dihistān") were all in the southeastern or eastern part of what is now Afghanistan, while Ṭukhāristān (older Bactria) was in its northern part. It is possible that the success in the mid-560s of the Western Turks against the Hephthalites north of the Oxus, with the resultant fragmentation of the northern Hephthalite kingdom, enabled the Persian king to extend Sāsānid control toward the Oxus and into Bactria (cf. al-Ṭabarī, I, 899, p. 160 below). But Marquart, in his Ērānšahr, 32–33, was dubious that Persian armies ever penetrated south of the Hindu Kush into eastern Afghanistan at this time, where the southern Hephthalite kingdom was to persist for a considerable time further, and hardly credible that they should have reached Sind. Later, however, in his "Das Reich Zābul und der Gott Žūn vom 6.-9. Jahrhundert," 257 n. 2, he apparently accepted that Khusraw did actually conquer the Hephthalite lands south of the Hindu Kush as far as the borders of India. See Nöldeke, trans. 156 n. 1; Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 94; Widengren, "Xosrau Anōšurvān, les Hephtalites et les peuples turcs," 69–74 (a penetrating critique of the information in the various sources and the traditions they represent); Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 156. For the regions mentioned above, see *EI*², s.vv. Bust (J. Sourdel-Thomine), Dardistān (A. S. Bazmee Ansari), Kābulistān (C. E. Bosworth), al-Rukhkhadj (idem), Zābulistān (idem, forthcoming).

388. The mountain people of the Jabal Bāriz in the southeastern part of Kirmān province seem to have supplied infantry for the Achaemenid armies, and were always regarded as a bellicose and predatory race. In early Islamic times, various of the ruling dynasties of Persia launched punitive expeditions against these Kūfichīs. See Bosworth, "The Kūfichīs or Qufṣ in Persian History," 9–17; *EI*² Suppl., s.v. Bāriz, Djabal (idem).

He commanded that they should be killed, except for eighty of their boldest warriors, whom he spared and had settled at Shahrām Fayrūz, where he could call upon them for his military [895] campaigns.[389] There was also a people called the Abkhaz, and other ones of the B.n.j.r, Balanjar, and al-Lān, who came together in a coalition to raid his lands.[390] They made an incursion into Armenia in order to raid and despoil its people. Their route thither was at that moment easy and unimpeded, and Kisrā closed his eyes to their activities until, when they had firmly established themselves in his territories, he dispatched against them contingents of troops, who fought with them, and exterminated them apart for ten thousand of them, whom they took prisoner and then settled in Azerbaijan and the neighboring regions.[391]

---

389. For the Ṣūl and Shahrām Fayrūz, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 874, pp. 112–13 and n. 290 above.

390. The Abkhāz were, and still are, a people living on the eastern shores of the Black Sea to the northwest of Georgia and on the southern slopes of the northwestern prolongation of the Caucasus range; under Soviet Russian rule there was an Abkhazian ASSR within the Georgian SSR, now part of the independent Georgian Republic. The lands of the Abkhāz were invaded by the Byzantine armies of Justinian and the people converted to Christianity; subsequently, their history was closely linked with the oher Christian peoples of the Georgians and Alans. See Marquart, Osteuropäische und ostasiatische Streifzüge, 175–78; EI², s.v. Abkhāz (W. Barthold-V. Minorsky). However, Marquart read al-Ṭabarī's Abkhaz as al-Khazar, without any discussion of the questions involved. If this were correct, it would be an early mention of the appearance of this Turkish people in the steppes north of the Caucasus; cf. D. M. Dunlop, The History of the Jewish Khazars, 23. But whether it is possible to speak of the Khazars, in what was at this time their prehistory, as a separate Turkish people or just part of the Inner Asian Türk empire, is impossible to decide. See Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica, II, 335–36; P. B. Golden, Khazar Studies, I, 49–50.

The Alans originally lived north of the Caucasus, but as a result of pressure from the Huns, were pushed into the central Caucasus. At the time of Khusraw Anūsharwān they must have been still pagan, and were not converted to Christianity till the early tenth century. Their modern descendants are the Ossetians. See Marquart, Ērānšahr, 65, 95, 105–06; idem, Streifzüge, 164–72; EI², s.v. Alān (Barthold-Minorsky), Marquart, op. cit., 16, also in Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCI, took B.n.j.r for Bulghār, adducing the Pahlavi form Burgar for this Turkish people of the middle Volga basin and South Russian steppe; see EI², s.v. Bulghār (I. Hrbek). The Balanjar are here a people, but subsequently they gave their name to what became a well-known city of the Turkish Khazars, in eastern Caucasia to the north of Darband or Bāb al-Abwāb. See Nöldeke, 157 n. 3; Marquart, op. cit., 16–18; EI², s.v. Balandjar (D. M. Dunlop).

391. On this Caucasian campaign of Khusraw, see Christensen, Sassanides, 369–70; Hannestad, "Les relations de Byzance avec la Transcaucasie et l'Asie

King Fayrūz had previously erected in the regions of the Ṣūl and al-Lān buildings of stone, with the intention of strengthening his lands against the encroachments there of those nations. Moreover, King Qubādh, son of Fayrūz, had begun the construction, after his father, of a great number of building works in those regions, until, when Kisrā achieved the royal power, he gave orders for the construction in the region of the Ṣūl, with stone hewn in the vicinity of Jurjān, of towns, castles, fortified mounds, and many other buildings, which would serve as a protection for the people of his lands, where they might seek refuge from the enemy in the event of a sudden attack.[392]

The Khāqān Sinjibū was the most implacable, the most courageous, the most powerful, and the most plentifully endowed with troops of all the Turks. It was he who attacked W.r.z (?) the king of the Hephthalites, showing no fear of the numerousness or the fierce fighting qualities of the Hepththalites, and then killed their king W.r.z and the greater part of his troops, seizing their possessions as plunder and occupying their lands, with the exception of the part of them that Kisrā had conquered.[393] Khāqān won

---

Centrale aux 5e et 6e siècles," 444–56; Dunlop, The History of the Jewish Khazars, 22–23; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 155–56.

392. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 874, pp. 112–13 and n. 290 above.

393. The episode briefly noted here reflects the fact that the Hepththalites were at this time squeezed between the growing might of the Sāsānids under Khusraw Anūsharwān and that of the Western Turks of Ishtemi or Istemi (see n. 394 below) and, subsequently, his son Tardu (Qaghan by 576). In the years from 560 to 563 the Qaghan of the Western Turks invaded Transoxania, seized Chāch (the later Tashkent) and defeated the Hephthalites near Bukhārā. The Hepththalite state in Transoxania thus came to an end, although minor Hephthalite principalities continued in Sogdia and the upper Oxus lands, with the main focus of the surviving Hepththalite power now in eastern and southeastern Afghanistan south of the Paropamisus mountains and the Hindu Kush, and in northwestern India. As a share of the spoils from operations contemporary with those of the Turks, Khusraw now received Bactria, but was to lose it to the Turks shortly afterward.

The name W.r.z (text, W.z.r) is probably to be connected with the Avestan name Varāza-, Middle Persian Warāz, Warāzān, frequent also in compound names in both Persian and Armenian, and meaning "boar, wild boar," especially as Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 22–23, records an undated Hephthalite coin mentioning VRZ; whether this coin was issued by the W.r.z mentioned here is impossible to tell. See on the name Nöldeke, trans. 240 n. 1; Justi, Namenbuch, 348–50; Mayrhofer, Die altiranischen Namen, no. 355; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, nos. 940–44; Widengren, "Xosrau Anōšurvān, les Hephtalites et les peuples turcs," 93 n. 4; and for the compound name Shahrbarāz/Shahrwarāz, n. 749 below. Among the titles of the petty princes of Khurāsān at the time of the Arab over the Abkhaz, the B.n.j.r and the Balanjar to his side, and they vouchsafed him their obedience. They informed him that the kings of Persia had always sought to ward them off by paying [896] tribute, thereby securing safety from their raids on their (sc., the Persians') lands. Khāqān now advanced with 110,000 warriors until he reached the fringes of the land of the Ṣūl. He sent a message to Kisrā, uttering threats and using peremptory language against him, to the effect that Kisrā must send to him treasure and to the Abkhaz, the B.n.j.r, and the Balanjar the tribute money the Persian kings had customarily paid before Kisrā came to power. [He further threatened] that, if Kisrā did not expedite the forwarding of all that he asked, he would enter his land and attack it. Kisrā paid no heed to his menaces and did not offer Khāqān a single item of what he had demanded, since he had strongly fortified the region of the gates of the Ṣūl and had blocked the ways and the tracks through defiles that the Khāqān Sinjibū would have to follow in order to reach him. He also knew the strength of his defensive forces in the frontier region of Armenia: five thousand warriors, cavalrymen, and infantry. The Khāqān Sinjibū got word of Kisrā's fortifying of the frontier regions of the Ṣūl, hence returned to his own land with all his troops and with his intentions frustrated. Those of the enemy who were massed against Jurjān were likewise, because of the fortifications Kisrā had built in its neighborhood, unable to mount any raids on it and to conquer it.[394] invasions are mentioned Barāz-bandah in Gharchistān, '.b.rāz in Nasā, and Barāzān in Herat, Būshanj, and Bādhghīs, according to Ibn Khurradādhbih, al-Masālik wa-al-mamālik, 39–40. The last king of the northern Hepthathalites, the one defeated and killed by the Western Turks, appears in the contemporary Greek sources as Katoulphos. See Christensen, Sassanides, 501; Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 23, 94–95; Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica, II, 156; Grousset, The Empire of the Steppes, 82–83; Litvinsky, "The Hephthalite Empire," 143–44.

---

394. Sinjibū is to be identified with the Turkish ruler mentioned by such Byzantine historians as Menander Protector (on whom see Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica, I, 422–26) in their accounts of the diplomatic and commercial exchanges between the Greeks and the Western Turks from 563 onward as Sizaboulos, Silziboulos, etc. The reigning Western Turkish Qaghan at this time was Ishtemi or Istemi, the Ištmi or Štmi of the Orkhon inscriptions and the Stembischagan of Greek sources. Marquart, Ērānšahr, 216–17, identified him with Silziboulos, but this is linguistically difficult, and it is more likely that Silziboulos/Sinjibū, and his son Turkhath, mentioned by Menander, were lesser Turkish rulers in the southern, Transoxanian part of the extensive Türk empire. It has not so far been possible to recover the (presumably) Turkish original form of Silziboulos/Sinjibū; it seems to be rendered in the Chinese annals as Shê-li čao-wu. Marquart's analysis of the first

The people had recognized Kisrā Anūsharwān's excellent judgment, knowledge, intelligence, bravery, and resolution, combined with his mildness and clemency toward them.[395] When he was crowned, the great men of state and the nobles came into his presence, and with all their might and eloquence called down element Silz- as connected with the Sir , the Seres of the Byzantine historian Jordanes, who located this people as living east of the Caspian Sea, and whose name seems to be enshrined in that of the Syr Darya river, is convincing, but his equation of the second element with Yabghu, the Turkish title of the leader holding the rank just below that of the Qaghan (Ērānšahr, loc. cit. and 247), is less so. This war between Khusraw and the Turks—who, after the defeat of the Hephthalites (see above), must have become uneasy neighbors in the Oxus region—is to be placed in the late 560s. See Nöldeke, trans. 158 n. 2, 159 n. 1; Grousset, The Empire of the Steppes, 82–83; Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica, II, 275–76, 291; H. W. Haussig, "Die Quellen über die zentralasiatische Herkunft der europäischen Awaren," 31–32; Sinor, "The Establishment and Dissolution of the Türk Empire," 302–305; Sinor, "The Türk Empire. 1. The First Türk Empire (553–682)," 332–33.

---

The Khāqān's advance to "the fringes of the land of Ṣūl" (here, then, Arabic al-Ṣūl would correspond to the Armenian name for Darband, C'or) is taken by Dunlop, The History of the Jewish Khazars, 24–25, as relating to Bāb al-Abwāb (the bābs "gates" being the mouths of the river valleys running down from the mountains to the sea) or Darband, which commanded a particularly constricted point on the narrow route between the western Caspian shore and the easternmost spurs of the Caucasus. This would imply that the Western Turks were already operating in the South Russian steppes and the Kuban steppes north of the Caucasus, in the latter region perhaps through the agency of the tribal chief of the Khazars (if, again, as in al-Ṭabarī, I, 895, p. 151 above, one reads al-Khazar for Abkhaz). To Khusraw Anūsharwān is traditionally ascribed the building of the famous Wall of Darband, said to have been seven farsakhs long, to keep out the northern barbarians as part of his general plan of fortifying the Caucasus region and thereby protecting Caucasian Albania or Arrān and also Azerbaijan (impressive remains of fortifications are in fact still visible at Darband). However, many romantic and legendary elements were subsequently added to the story, e.g., in al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 195–96; Qudāmah b. Ja'far, Kitāb al-kharāj, 259–61; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 304, s.v. Bāb al-Abwāb. See Minorsky, A History of Sharvān and Darband, 14, 86–88, 144; Dunlop, op. cit., 24–26; EI[1], s.v. Derbend (W. Barthold); EI[2], s.v. Bāb al-Abwāb (D. M. Dunlop).

395. Nöldeke, trans. 160 n. 2, notes that a new report on Khusraw's reign begins here, one which stems, on the basis of parallel reports in other sources, both Christian and Muslim, from Ibn al-Muqaffa'.

The image of Khusraw as a just, beneficent monarch, solicitous for the interests of rich and poor alike, while vigorous and powerful enough to defend the borders of his realm against the Greeks in the west and the Hephthalites and Turks in the east, and to extend Persian authority into lands as distant as Yemen, all contributed to the picture of an ideal ruler. Already, the Prophet Muḥammad is said to have praised him as a just king, although the prevalent Islamic image of the Kisrās, meaning the Sāsānid kings in general, came to be one of regarding them as examples of supreme royal pride and pomp. Nevertheless, for Khusraw Anūsharwān blessings on his head. When they had concluded their speeches, he stood up and delivered an oration. He began by mentioning God's favors on His people when He had created them, and his own dependency on God for regulating their affairs and the provision of foodstuffs and the means of life for them. He left nothing [which ought to have been said] out of his oration. Then he told the people what they had suffered [through the spreading of Mazdak's teachings]; namely, the loss of their possessions, the destruction of their religion and the damage to their position regarding their children and their means of life. He further informed them that he was looking into ways and means of putting all that right and rendering affairs strong again, and urged the people to aid him in this. [897]

Next, he ordered the heads of the leaders of the Mazdakites to be chopped off and their possessions to be shared out among the poor and needy.[396] He killed a large number of those people who had specifically, the image of him in the Islamic sources was in general positive, as can be discerned from anecdotes about him in adab works like the Kitāb al-tāj and the Kitāb al-maḥāsin wa 'l-aḍdād of Ps.-al-Jāḥiẓ, and the Marzubān-nāmah of Sa'd al-Dīn Warāmīnī, as also in the "Mirrors for Princes" such as Kay Kāwūs b. Iskandar's Qābūs-nāmah and Niẓām al-Mulk's Siyāsat-nāmah; often, he is linked with his supremely wise (semilegendary) vizier Buzurgmihr.

---

Even if there is truth in this picture—and certainly, the Sāsānid empire reached its apogee during his reign—it did not prevent Khusraw from being also a skillful exponent of Realpolitik, ready to use violence and terror to achieve his aims, and some of the later anecdotes about him stress his cunning and duplicity in dealing with opponents. The Christians of Persia had to endure some bouts of persecution during his time (although nothing as severe as that under Shābūr II), usually linked with resumption of Byzantine-Persian warfare. The Catholicos Mar Aba, a former Zoroastrian, survived imprisonment in Azerbaijan but died of the hardships he had suffered after Khusraw released him in 552. Clearly, the emperor must always have been careful to retain the support of the Zoroastrian priesthood. Yet, to be set against a natural feeling on the part of the Sāsānid authorities that Persian Christians must inevitably have a prime loyalty, through religion, to their co-religionists in the west, many of the Persian Christians seem, in fact, to have felt a strong attachment to their native land, Persia, and their own ethnos as Persians, and this counterbalanced any feelings of religious solidarity with the Greeks, especially as Byzantium stood for Chalcedonian orthodoxy as against the dominant Nestorianism and, to a lesser extent, Monophysitism, in the Persia empire. At least one high commander in the Persian army is known to have been a Christian. See for a detailed consideration of these attitudes, and the tensions between ethnos and faith which must often have been at work within the Persian Christian community, Asmussen, "Christians in Iran," 933–35, and Brock, "Christians in the Sasanian Empire," 10–17.

At all events, there was, on the whole, during Khusraw's reign, some amelioration of the Christians' lot. According to John of Ephesus, the king allowed the Monophysites to organize themselves within the realm and to choose a Catholicos confiscated other people's possessions, and restored these possessions to their original owners. He commanded that every child concerning whom there was dispute before him about his or her origin should be attributed to that person in whose family the child was, when the real father was not known, and that the child should be given a [legal] share in the estate of the man to whom the child was now attributed, provided that the latter acknowledged the child. In regard to every woman who had been forced to give herself unwillingly to a man, that man was to be held to account and compelled to pay the bride price to her so that her family was thereby satisfied. Then the woman was to be given the choice between remaining with him or marrying someone else, except that if she had an original husband, she was to be restored to him. He further commanded that every man who had caused harm to another person in regard to his possessions, or who had committed an act of oppression against another person, should make full restitution and then be punished in a manner appropriate to the enormity of his offense. He decreed that, where those responsible for the upbringing of the children of leading families had died, he himself would be responsible for them. He married the girls among them to their social equals and provided them with their bridal outfit and necessities out of the state treasury; and he gave the youths in marriage to wives from noble families, of their own. The peace treaty of 561 with Justinian promised freedom of worship for Christians in Persia, and for Zoroastrians in the Byzantine lands, provided that there was no proselytism between the two faiths (but the inference is that apostasy from Zoroastrianism had been tolerated till then). A certain amount of intellectual freedom and a spirit of enquiry seem to have characterized Khusraw's court, and this was an innovation among the Sāsānids. Some sources attribute to the emperor himself an interest in philosophical ideas and in the tenets of other faiths. There was indeed a movement for the translation of scientific, medical, and other works from languages like Greek and Sanskrit into Middle Persian. Translations from Sanskrit are especially attributed to the monarch's physician Burzōy. See Nöldeke, trans. 160 n. 3; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 177–90; Christensen, Sassanides, 372–73, 374–440; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 161–62; Asmussen, "Christians in Iran," 946; Wiesehöfer, Ancient Persia, 216–19; EI[2], s.v. Kisrā (M. J. Morony), and Tardjama. 2. Translations from Greek and Syriac (D. Gutas), 3. Translations from Middle Persian (Pahlawī) (F. C. de Blois).

---

396. According to Nöldeke, trans. 163 n. 1, other, later sources state that he merely banished the leaders of the Mazdakites from his land. And among these sources, Eutychius says that the confiscated goods and property were made into a charitable foundation for the common benefit.

presented them with money for dowries, awarded them sufficient riches, and ordained that they should be members of his court so that he might call upon them for filling various of his state offices. He gave the wives of his [dead] father the choice between staying with his own wives and sharing in their maintenance and provision, and enjoying the same income as these last, or alternatively, he would seek out for them husbands of the same social standing as themselves.[397]

He further ordained the digging of canals and the excavation of subterranean irrigation conduits (al-qunī), and provision of loans for the owners of agricultural lands and support for them. He likewise ordered the rebuilding of every wooden bridge or bridge of boats (jisr) that had been destroyed and of every masonry bridge (qanṭarah) that had been smashed, and further ordered that every village that had fallen into ruin should be restored to a better state of prosperity than previously. He made enquiries about the cavalrymen of the army (al-asāwirah), and those lacking in [898] resources he brought up to standard by allocating to them horses and equipment, and earmarked for them adequate financial allowances. He assigned overseers for the fire temples and provided good roads for the people. Along the highways he built castles and towers. He selected [good] administrators, tax officials, and governors, and gave the persons appointed to these functions stringent orders. He set himself to peruse the conduct, the writings, and the legal decisions of Ardashīr, and took them as a model to imitate, urging the people to do likewise.

Once he had a firm grip on the royal power and all the lands were under his control, and some years after he had been reigning, he marched against Antioch, where were stationed leading commanders of Qayṣar's army, and conquered it. He then gave orders that a plan should be made for him of the city of Antioch exactly to scale (literally, "according to its extent"), with the number of its houses, streets, and everything contained in it, and orders that a [new city] should be built for him exactly like Antioch but situated at the side of al-Madā'in. The city known as al-Rūmiyyah was built exactly on the plan of Antioch. He thereupon had the inhabitants of Antioch transported and settled in the new city; when they entered the city's gate, the denizens of each house went to the new house so exactly resembling their former one in Antioch that it was as if they had never left the city.[398] Kisrā now attacked the town of Heraclea and conquered it, followed by Alexandria and the lands extending up to it. He left behind a detachment of

397. That is, the state of widowhood was, according to Persian custom, to be avoided as far as possible.

398. The attack on Antioch was part of the resumed war of 540–43. Khusraw had made peace with the Byzantines in 532, just after his accession, thus ending the war that had begun toward the end of Kawād's reign (see n. 362 above): the Persians had evacuated several fortresses in Lazica and the Byzantines had agreed to pay a very substantial annual tribute in return for "eternal peace," since the empire was being hard pressed by external enemies in the West; see Greatrex, Rome and Persia at War, 502–532, 213–24. The resumption of war resulted from a general Byzantine resentment at the inferior position which the paying of tribute implied, and from the sheer inability to keep up these payments at a time when the empire was being threatened on so many fronts, with military defense expenditure causing a disastrous drain on the Byzantine treasury. A considerable effort had been made in the early years of Justinian's reign (527–32) to continue the earlier work of Anastasius. Thus he improved Daras/Dārā or Anastasiopolis, founded by Anastasius in 505 at a strategic point some 25 km/15 miles southeast of Mārdīn and facing the Persian bastion of Nisībīn, which lay further to its southeast (see on it Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 424; Le Strange, Lands, 96–97; EIr, s.v. Dārā (M. Weiskopf); Whitby, "Procopius' Description of Dara" (Buildings II, 1–3), 737–83, who describes and elucidates those of its buildings and defensive walls still visible), making it the single most important point in the Byzantine defensive system in Upper Mesopotamia. Justinian also strengthened the forward fortified points at such places as Circesium, Martyropolis, and Theodosiopolis. However, the "eternal peace" may have involved some restrictions on Byzantine frontier construction, and the emperor had in any case become involved in the defense of his western provinces. Hence when Khusraw marched against Antioch through the more weakly defended, more southerly middle Euphrates region, he found a city with deficiencies in its defenses, in part because of an earthquake some years previously. In June 540 he sacked it, a disastrous setback for the Greeks, in the course of which the overstretched Byzantine army was revealed as lacking the manpower really to protect this and other cities of northern Mesopotamia and northern Syria until troop reinforcements couild be brought up from further west and the military position in Mesopotamia stabilized. See Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, 163–65; Whitby, "Procopius and the Development of Roman Defenses in Upper Mesopotamia," 726–29.

Meanwhile, Justinian had to agree to a truce on the basis of the Greeks paying an indemnity and arrears of tribute. The new city for the dispossessed citizens of Antioch on the Orontes was called by the Persian emperor Weh Andiyōg Khosrōy, "Khusraw [has built this] better than Antioch," and was popularly known by the Persians as Rūmagān "town of the Greeks" = al-Rūmiyyah; it formed part of the urban complex of al-Madā'in. See Nöldeke, trans., 165 nn. 2–4; Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, I, 420–27; idem, History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius I to the Death of Justinian, I, 91–112; Christensen, Sassanides, 386–87; Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, II, 486–92; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 154–55; Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century, I/1, 209–36.

his troops in the land of the Romans after Qayṣar had submitted to him and had paid him ransom money.[399]

He returned home from Rūm and then took the field against the Khazars, and sought revenge on them for the damage they had wrought on him by afflicting his subjects.[400] Next, he turned his atention to Aden. He blocked up part of the sea there which lay between two mountains and is adjacent to the land of Abyssinia (al-Ḥabashah), with large ships, rocks, iron columns, and chains, and he killed the great men of state of that land.[401] He then returned to al-Madā'in, having brought under his control all those regions of the land of Rūm and Armenia that are situated on this side of Heraclea plus the whole area between his capital and the sea,[402] in the region of Aden. He appointed al-Mundhir b. al- [899]
Nu'mān as king over the Arabs and loaded him with honors.[403] Then he took up residence in his own kingdom at al-Madā'in, and

399. The truce was denounced by Justinian because of Persian operations in 541 in the Black Sea region of Lazica, which was adjacent to Byzantine defense points in eastern Pontus and which had been recently Christianized, and because of what were regarded as unjustified exactions of Khusraw from the people of the Byzantine fortified points and towns in Upper Mesopotamia during the previous year, leading to Persian invasions of Upper Mesopotamia in 542, of Armenia in 543, and of Upper Mesopotamia again in 544. In the course of this last campaign, Edessa was strenuously besieged by the Persians (see on this event, J. B. Segal, Edessa, 'The Blessed City', 105, 113, 158–60). There does not, however, seem to have been at any of these times a Persian advance into southern Anatolia as far as Heracleia (the Hiraqlah of later Islamic historians and geographers, modern Eregli, see on it Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 398–99; Le Strange, Lands, 149; EI², s.v. Eregli (J. H. Mordtmann-F. Taeschner), which, according to the contemporary church historian Evagrius Scholasticus, was not sacked by the Persians till much later, in the time of Justin II (r. 565–78). The mention of Alexandria (in Egypt!) must be a confusion with the Persian invasion of Egypt under Khusraw II Abarwēz some seventy years later in the imperial reign of Heraclius (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1002, pp. 318–19 below). But as al-Ṭabarī says here, Edessa had been forced to pay an indemnity to the Persians after the final siege, and the peace or five years' truce of 545 beween Khusraw and Justinian involved the handing over by the Greeks of a substantial indemnity. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, I, 427–40; idem, History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius I to the Death of Justinian, I, 91–112; Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, II, 492–502; Frye, "The Political History," 155–56; Lang, "Iran, Armenia and Georgia," 521.

400. Presumably a repetition of the notice by al-Ṭabarī at I, 895, p. 151 above, of the emperor's Caucasian expedition.

401. An anticipatory mention of the South Arabian expedition, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 947ff., pp. 238ff. below.

402. Following the text's n. f, with the correct reading of the Sprenger ms. al-baḥr for the text's al-Baḥrayn.

403. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 899–900, p. 161 below.

turned his attention once more to affairs needing his personal care. After this, he led an expedition against the Hephthalites, seeking revenge for his grandfather Fayrūz. Previously, Anūsharwān had married Khāqān's daughter, so he now wrote to him before setting off on the expedition, informing him of his intentions and enjoining him to march against the Hephthalites. Anūsharwān came up against them, killed their king, and extirpated the whole of his family. He penetrated to Balkh and what lies beyond it and quartered his troops in Farghānah. He then returned home from Khurāsān.[404] When he got back to al-Madā'in, a deputation came to him seeking help against the Abyssinians. So he sent back with them one of his commanders heading an army of the men of Daylam and adjacent regions; they killed the Abyssinian Masrūq in Yemen and remained there.[405]

Thus Kisrā enjoyed an unbroken run of victories and conquests; all the nations were in awe of him; and numerous delegations from the Turks, the Chinese, the Khazars, and similar [distant] nations thronged his court. He lavished generosity on scholars. He reigned for forty-eight years. The birth of the Prophet fell within

---

404. In the account of these events at I, 895, p. 152 above, it is the Khāqān of the Turks who kills the Hephthalite king W.r.z/Warāz. The name of the Turkish princess whom Khusraw is said here to have married (the future mother of his successor Hormizd IV) is given by al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 211 = § 632 as the un-Turkish-looking Fāqum (thus vocalized by Pellat; the reading is dubious, but an Armenian author has Kaïēn, according to Nöldeke, trans. 264 n. 4). Although an Arabic geographer like Ibn Khurradādhbih, al-Masālik wa-al-mamālik, 30, says that Khusraw supposedly constructed the town of Farghānah, it seems most unlikely that Sāsānid power ever extended into the Farghānah valley of Central Asia. Marquart, Ērānšahr, 219–20, endeavored to make sense of this piece of information by relating it to a Wādī Farghānah south of Baghlān in the southern part of Ṭukhāristān, mentioned in the accounts of the Arab invasions of northern Afghanistan; but this seems very forced. See also Nöldeke, trans. 167 nn. 2–3.

405. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 948–50, 952–57, pp. 238–42, 244–50 below, for the story of the expedition to Yemen. The Daylamīs, mountaineers from the region of Daylam in the Elburz Mountains at the southwestern corner of the Caspian Sea, were often employed as mercenary infantrymen and alpine troops by the Sāsānids, and Procopius mentions Dolomitae in Khusraw's operations in Georgia and Lazica. See *EI*², s.v. Daylam (V. Minorsky). Khusraw's recourse to marginal peoples like the Daylamīs seems to have arisen from an increasing shortage of military manpower from the traditional Persian sources, i.e., the indigenous mailed cavalrymen of the aswār class (on whom see n. 258 above), during his reign, and part of what Zeev Rubin has called the "barbarization" of the Persian army at this time, a parallel to what happened in the Roman world. See Rubin, "The Reforms of Khusro Anūshirwān," 284–85.

the latter part of Anūsharwān's reign.[406] Hishām [Ibn al-Kalbī] has related that Anūsharwān's reign was (only) forty-seven years. He also related that 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the Messenger of God's father, was born during his reign [in the twenty-fourth year of this, and that he died] in the forty-second year of his dominion.[407]

Hishām also related: When Anūsharwān's position became assured, he sent a message to al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān the Elder (al-Akbar), whose mother was Mā' al-Samā', a woman of al-Namir [tribe], and appointed him as king over al-Ḥīrah and the lands over which the House of al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr Ākil al-Murār[408] used to [900] rule, and al-Mundhir remained in this office continuously until he died.[409] He also related: Anūsharwān led an expedition against the 406. This based on the traditional dating of the Prophet's birth to ca. 570. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 900, pp. 163–64 and nn. 414, 640 below.

407. The words between the parentheses supplied by Nöldeke, trans. 168, from other, parallel texts as necessary to complete the text where there is an obvious omission.

408. How Ḥujr, the essential founder of Kindī greatness in Najd at this time (see p. 122 and n. 312 above) and grandfather of al-Ḥārith (on whom, see Olinder, The Kings of Kinda, 51–69), gained the nickname ākil al-murār, "eater of bitter herbs," is unclear, although the Arabic sources give two not very convincing explanations (see Olinder, op. cit., 42; Robin, "Le royaume ḥujride," 3). But Arabic murār is virtually identical with Akkadian murāru, "bitter lettuce," and possibly connected with irrū, "a medical plant of the Cucurbilaceae family, possibly the colocynth" (see The Assyrian Dictionary of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, Letter M, Part II, 218, Letters I–J, 182–83). R. Campbell Thompson thought that irrū was Papaver, probably rhoeas L., the poppy (A Dictionary of Assyrian Botany, 223–29). We are clearly dealing with bitter herbs used as a medicament, and possibly, in the light of Campbell Thompson's definition of irrū, with a pain-killing or narcotic drug.

409. Concerning Khusraw's apppointment (or more probably, confirmation; see pp. 140–41 and n. 362 above) of al-Mundhir III as his deputy on the fringes of Iraq and in northern and eastern Arabia, al-Ṭabarī records, at I, 958, p. 253 below, this time from Ibn Isḥāq, that, after the peace treaty of 531 with Justinian, the Persian emperor appointed the Lakhmid as ruler over all the Arabian lands as far as Baḥrayn, 'Umān, Yamāmah, al-Ṭā'if, and Ḥijāz. See Smith, "Events in Arabia in the Sixth Century A.D.," 442, and al-Ṭabarī, I, 958, pp. 252–53 below). The rivalry of the houses of Lakhm and Kindah was thus bound to be intensified.

As well as Kindah's rivaling with Lakhm over control of Najd, the lands of Baḥrayn and Hajar in eastern Arabia were controled at this time by a subordinate branch of Kindah under Mu'āwiyah al-Jawn ("the dark colored one"), brother of 'Amr al-Maqṣūr and son of Ḥujr, which persisted there under Mu'āwiyah's descendants until the time of the Prophet (see Olinder, "Āl al-Ǧaun of the Family of Ākil al-Murār," 208–29). As noted at p. 122 n. 312 above, it certainly seems that there was a Kindī "kingdom," or rather, an assemblage of tribes ruled by a Kindī chief

Burjān, then turned back and built [the town of] al-Bāb and the Caspian Gates (al-Abwāb).[410]

[The History of al-Ḥīrah]

Hishām related:[411] There reigned as king over the Arabs, as appointee of the Persian kings after al-Aswad b. al-Mundhir, his centered on Najd and under the suzerainty of the Kings of Ḥimyar, a subordination explicit in two South Arabian inscriptions (Ry 445 and 446) from Ma'sal al-Jumḥ, 240 km/150 miles west-south-west of modern al-Riyāḍ and dating from the mid-fifth century and 631 Ḥimyarite era/A.D. 521–52, respectively. (De Blois is followed here for beginning the Sabaean or Ḥimyarite era in April 110 B.C. rather than 115 B.C., i.e., converting the South Arabian era to the Christian one by subtracting 110 years and not 115 years, the figure which has long been followed ever since Halévy propounded it a century and a quarter ago, since the disparity of only 110 years—a "short chronology"—causes fewer problems that that of 115 years. See de Blois, "The Date of the 'Martyrs of Nagrān,'" 119–20, and also Robin, who follows de Blois in this, in his L'Arabie antique de Karib'îl à Mahomet, 33, 151, and his "Le royaume ḥujride," 691; cf. also *EI*², s.v. Ta'rīkh. I, Dates and Eras in the Islamic World, 1. In the Sense of Date, Dating, etc. [de Blois].) The two inscriptions name Kindah and Ma'add as among the Arab auxiliaries and allies of the kings of Ḥimyar (see Robin, "Le royaume ḥujride," 675–95). Dating from some three decades after the second Ma'sal al-Jumḥ inscriptions, the inscription of the well of Murayghān, situated to the north of Najrān and east of what is now now 'Asīr (Ry 506), records that the men of Kindah and Khindif fought in the army of the Abyssinian viceroy Abrahah when this last governor marched against the Lakhmid al-Mundhir III's son 'Amr (the later 'Amr III; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 900, p. 163 and n. 414 below) and his Bedouin allies. The main force under Abrahah himself engaged the Ma'add in a battle at Ḥulubān or Ḥalabān, not far to the south of Ma'sal al-Jumh (the name vocalized as Ḥulubān in al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, I, 491, and Ḥalabān in Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 281–82; see on the place Thilo, Die Ortsnamen in der altarabischen Poesie, 53: a wadi arising in the Arwā chain and running into the Wādī Rikā', cf. his Map D). The Ma'add were decisively defeated and forced to give hostages, while another force, which included men of the tribes of Sa'd and Murād, operated in the territory of the Banū 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah and defeated the 'Āmir at Turabah, some 100 km/60 miles to the east-southeast of al-Ṭā'if. Al-Mundhir then had to sue for peace from Abrahah and send hostages to Yemen. The inscription dates these events to 662 Ḥimyarite era/A.D. 552–53. Much has been written on the inscription and the events it describes. Among all this, see Beeston, "Notes on the Mureighan Inscription," 389–92; Smith, "Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.," 435–37; M. J. Kister, "The Campaign of Ḥulubān. A New Light on the Expedition of Abraha," 425–36.

---

410. That is, against the Bulghārs of the Middle Volga; this must be a legendary touch, unless it is a reminiscence of the events already noted in al-Ṭabarī, I, 895–96, pp. 151–53 above. On Bāb al-Abwāb or Darband, see pp. 151, 153 and nn. 390, 394 above.

411. A continuation of Ibn al-Kalbī's narrative interrupted in al-Ṭabarī, I, 892, p. 146 above.

brother al-Mundhir b. al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān, whose mother was Hirr bt. al-Nu'mān, and who reigned for seven years. After him there reigned al-Nu'mān b. al-Aswad b. al-Mundhir, whose mother was Umm al-Malik bt. 'Amr b. Ḥujr, the sister of al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr al-Kindī, who reigned for four years. Then there was appointed in his stead Abū Ya'fur b. 'Alqamah b. Mālik b. 'Adī b. al-Dhumayl b. Thawr b. Asas b. Rab[412] b. Numārah b. Lakhm, who reigned for three years. Then there reigned al-Mundhir b. Imri' al-Qays al-Bad', i.e., Dhū al-Qarnayn. Hishām related: He was only thus called on account of two plaits made from his hair.[413] His mother was Mā' al-Samā', that is, Māriyah bt. 'Awf b. Jusham b. Hilāl b. Rabī'ah b. Zayd Manāt b. 'Amir al-Ḍaḥyān b. Sa'd b. al-Khazraj b. Taym Allāh b. al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ. He reigned for a total of forty-nine years. Then there reigned his son 'Amr b. al-Mundhir, whose mother was Hind bt. al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr b. Ḥujr Ākil al-Murār and who reigned for ten years.[414] He related: After 'Amr b. Hind had been reigning for eight years and eight months, the Messenger of God was born; that was in the time of Anūshar-

412. Reading uncertain.

413. An unconvincing explanation for an appellation already well known as a by-name that was generally applied to Alexander the Great in Arabic lore, including in the Qur'ān; see n. 443 below. Its origin, if ever known, must have been forgotten by Ibn al-Kalbī's time.

414. Ibn al-Kalbī's filiation of the Lakhmid kings has come down to us in two slightly different versions, the one given here by al-Ṭabarī (and in part, in various other places in his History) and the other utilized by Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rikh, 83–97, for his section on the Lakhmids. Sidney Smith thought that Ibn al-Kalbī derived information here from a Sāsānid register of years, "used with remarkable fidelity." The two versions are compared, together with others in the Arabic historical sources, and a harmonization attempted, by Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 5off.; see now Smith, "Events in Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.," 429–30.

The accession of 'Amr III b. al-Mundhir III, also called 'Amr b. Hind after his mother, the Kindī princess, should be placed in 554, with what was apparently a smooth succession to his father, and the duration of his reign was sixteen years (as in Rothstein's table, 53, following the figure of sixteen in Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, op. cit. 94, pace the one given here by al-Ṭabarī of ten years. This would place 'Amr's death—as a result of being assassinated by the poet 'Amr b. Kulthūm—in 569 or in 570, the traditional but impossible date given for the "Year of the Elephant" at Mecca. See for 'Amr's reign (he had a reputation for firm rule and cruel behavior, seen in the celebrated affair of the "letter of al-Mutalammis," see n. 774 below), Nöldeke, trans. 170 n. 1, 172 n. 1; Rothstein, op. cit., 94–102; EI[2], s.v. 'Amr b. Hind (A.J. Wensinck). See for the chronological difficulties involved in placing the Prophet Muḥammad's birth in the eighth year of 'Amr's reign, Smith, op. cit., 434.

wān and the "Year of the Elephant" in which al-Ashram Abū
[901] Yaksūm led an attack on the Ka'bah.[415]

[The History of Yemen] Mention of the Rest of the Story of Tubba' in the Days of Qubādh and the Time of Anūsharwān and the Persians' Dispatch of an Army to Yemen in Order to Combat the Abyssinians, and the Reason for This Last.[416]

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, who said: When Tubba' II (al-Ākhar), that is, Tubān As'ad Abū Karib, came back from the East, he traveled via Medina.[417] When he had passed by it at the beginning of his expedition (i.e., on his outward journey), he had not aroused any feelings of disquiet among its people, but had left behind there in their midst one of his sons, who had [subsequently] been treacherously slain.

---

415. See on this attack, al-Ṭabarī, I, 936–46, pp. 222–35 below. The patronymic Abū Yaksūm refers to the Abyssinian viceroy of South Arabia, Abrahah, also known as al-Ashram "the man with his nose-tip cut off," whose son Yaksūm was to succeed him as governor in South Arabia. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 931, p. 213, below, for the alleged occasion of this mutilation, and I, 945, pp. 235–36 below, for Yaksūm's reign. The actual name Yaksūm must stem from the toponym Aksum, the capital of the first Abyssinian kingdom, which lasted up to this sixth century

416. Nöldeke omitted from his translation the section beginning here at I, 901 l. 1, as far as 917 l. 17.

417. The following section, up to I, 917 l. 17, depends on the parallel account of Ibn Isḥāq, in essence only moderately different from that of Ibn al-Kalbī, but it must be taken as a later growth of legendary history of a type similar to that in the Alexander Romance, which may have influenced it. The section is reproduced substantially by Ibn Isḥāq in the Sīrat al-nabī of Ibn Hishām, ed. Wüstenfeld, 12ff. = ed. al-Saqqā et al. I, 19ff., trans., 6ff.; cf. Ibn Hishām, Kitāb al-tījān, 297–300, and F. Krenkow, "The Two Oldest Books on Arabic Folklore," 227–28.

Abū Karib As'ad himself was, however, a fully historical person, leaving aside the legendary accretions, the 'bkrb 's'd of the Ḥimyaritic inscriptions. In the first half of the fourth century he expanded his territories from southwestern and southern Arabia into central Arabia. He inflated the royal title of the founder Shamir Yur'ish from that of "lord of Saba, Dhū Raydān, Ḥaḍramawt and Ymnt" to include "and of their Arabs (i.e., Bedouins) in Ṭwd^{m} and Tihāmah," and succeeding Tubba' kings also used this fuller title (in Classical Arabic, ṭawd means "mountain"; for al-Hamdānī, Ṣifat jazīrat al-'Arab, 371, al-Ṭawd denoted the mountain range of the Sarāt, which divided Yemen between its coastland, tihāmah, and its inland plateau, najd). His fame ensured the later growth around him of a fantastic romance and epic similar to that of, and, as noted above, conceivably inspired by, that of Alexander the Great. See EI^{2}, s.v. Tubba' (A. F. L. Beeston).

Hence he now came to the town with the intention of reducing it to ruins, extirpating its people and cutting down its date palms. When they heard of his plans, this tribe (ḥayy) of the Anṣār banded together against him in order to defend themselves. Their chief at that time was 'Amr b. al-Ṭallah, one of the Banū al-Najjār, and then of the Banū 'Amr b. Mabdhūl.[418] They sallied forth to attack Tubba'. When Tubba' had encamped [with his troops] by the Medinans, one of the latter from the Banū 'Adī b. al-Najjār, called Aḥmar, had killed one of Tubba''s followers whom he had found cutting down the date clusters of a tree that belonged to him. He had therefore struck him with his reaping hook and killed him, saying, "The fruit belongs to the one who nurtures it and makes it grow!" After killing him, he had thrown the corpse into a well-known local well called Dhāt Tūmān (?); this naturally increased Tubba''s rage against them, and the two sides became engaged in making war and fighting other. He related: The Anṣār assert that they used to fight Tubba' by day but treat him as a guest each night. Tubba' was amazed at this and used to say, "By God, these people of ours are generous of heart!"

While he was engaged thus, there came to him two rabbis from [902] the Jews of the Banū Qurayẓah, learned scholars with firmly grounded knowledge, who had heard about Tubba''s intention of destroying the town and its people.[419] They told him, "O King, don't do it, for if you persist in carrying out your plan, something will intervene to prevent you, and we fear that you will bring down on yourself speedy retribution." He said to them, "How can

418. This is an anachronism, in that the designation of Anṣār "Helpers" was only given to his supporters in Medina by the Prophet after his hijrah of 622, and an inaccuracy in that it was not, of course, a tribal name. The Arabs inhabiting Yathrib, as it was mainly called in pre-Islamic times (see n. 370 above), were from the Banū Qaylah bt. Hālik, with its two branches of the Aws and the Khazraj. Al-Najjār were a clan of the Khazraj, and the 'Amr b. Mabdhūl part of their subclan Māzin. The 'Adī mentioned below were another subclan. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 176–77, 185, II, 31, 34–35, 347: Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, 256; Montgomery Watt, Muhammad at Medina, genealogical table at 154.

419. Qurayẓah were one of the three main Jewish tribes in Medina, confederates of the Aws; they nevertheless suffered the massacre of their menfolk and the enslavement of their women and children by Muḥammad in 6/627 after the siege of Medina by Quraysh and their allies. See Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 273–77; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 193ff.; *EI*², s.v. Ḳurayẓa (W. M. Watt).

that be?" They replied, "It is the place to which a prophet, who will arise out of the tribe of Quraysh at the end of time, will migrate, and it will be his home and resting place." After having heard these words, Tubba' desisted from what he had intended to do regarding Medina, perceiving that the two rabbis had special knowledge and being amazed at what he had heard from them. He departed from Medina, took them with him to Yemen, and embraced their religion. The names of the two rabbis were Ka'b and Asad, both from the Banū Qurayẓah and paternal cousins of each other.[420] They were the most knowledgeable persons of their age, as Ibn Ḥumayd has mentioned to me—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yazīd b. 'Amr—Abān b. Abī 'Ayyāsh—Anas b. Mālik—shaykhs from his people (sc., of Medina) who went back to the Jāhiliyyah.

A certain poet of the Anṣār, one Khālid[421] b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. Ghaziyyah b. 'Amr b. 'Abd b. 'Awf b. Ghanm b. Mālik b. al-Najjār, recited these verses about the warfare between the Medinans and Tubba', vaunting 'Amr b. al-Ṭallah and mentioning his merits and his resolute defense:

Has he relinquished youthful folly, or has its remembrance ceased? Or has he obtained his fill of pleasure?
Or have you remembered youth? And what a memory of youth or of its times you have![422]
For indeed, it was a young man's war (literally, the war of a beast which sheds its two teeth next to the incisors at its fourth or later year, rubā'ī, or of a young man similarly shedding teeth, rabā'ī), whose like brings to a youth experience and esteem.[423]

---

420 The names of the two rabbis as given here come from the Ibn Isḥāq version of this story, from an uncertain source; but Michael Lecker has recently pointed out that the late-period historian of Medina Nūr al-Dīn 'Alī b. Aḥmad al-Samhūdī (d. 911/1506) cites an alternative tradition from the second/eighth-century historian of Medina Ibn Zabālah that the names of the two men were Suḥayt/Sukhayt and Munabbih, from the Medinan Jewish tribe of Hadl, who were actually clients of the more powerful Qurayẓah. See al-Samhūdī, Wafā' al-wafā, I, 190; Lecker, "The Conversion of Ḥimyar to Judaism and the Jewish Banū Hadl of Medina," 134–35.

421. The Cairo text, II, 106, has for this name khāl "the maternal uncle of. . . ."

422. An alternative translation of the second sentence in the line might be "And what is it that you remember? Youth or the passing of the whole span of life?"

423. Following Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCI, Thorbecke's reading ātā, "brings to," for the text's atā, "comes." One might also render the last word

So ask 'Imrān or ask Asd, then, at the time when [the army] came, when the morning star was still visible,[424]
An army headed by Abū Karib, with their bodies clad in long coats of mail and with pungent reek.
Then they said, Who is coming along with them, the Banū 'Awf or al-Najarah?
O Banū al-Najjār, indeed we have a burden of taking vengeance on them from long ago![425]
Then there went forth to encounter them in battle a body of lofty warriors ('ashannaqah),[426] whose extent was like that of a sheet of falling rain drops.[427]
A chief who is on a level of prestige with kings; whoever would make war on 'Amr does not realize his eminence.

A man of the Anṣār, mentioning their fierce resistance to Tubba', has said:

You impose upon me, among other duties in regard to it, [defense of] the date palm groves of al-Asāwīf and al-Manṣa'ah,[428]

'ibarah as "a moral example."

424. 'Imrān is not common in tribal genealogies, but may conceivably refer to the 'Imrān b. Hudhmah, a branch of the tribe of Muzaynah who lived to the south of Medina; see Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 88, II, 357; *EI*², s.v. Muzayna (F. M. Donner). Asd is, of course, the great tribe of Asd or Azd ('sd being the form in the South Arabian inscriptions), with its two branches originally centered on 'Umān and the Sarāt mountain chain in 'Asīr respectively; see *EI*², s.v. Azd (G. Strenziok).

425. The name 'Awf occurs in the genealogies of a large nuumber of Arab tribes, while al-Najjār b. Tha'labah were a subclan of the Medinan Khazraj; see Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 185, II, 442. What is unclear is whether the Najarah are identical with the Banū al-Najjār of the next line, the difficulty in identifying them as a single unit being that the 'Awf and the Najarah are apparently among the attackers, whereas one would expect the Banū al-Najjār to be among the defenders of their town.

426. Ibn Hishām, ed. Wüstenfeld, 14 = ed. Muṣṭafā al-Saqqā et al., I, 23, has musāyifah, "a body of swordsmen," for this rare word 'ashannaqah, hence probably a lectio facilior.

427. Ibn Hishām, loc. cit., inserts here a line, "Among them is 'Amr b. Ṭallah; may God grant him long life for the welfare of his people!" which serves as a link between the preceding and following verses and elucidates the 'Amr who is subsequently praised.

428. Al-Asāwīf is the plural, used here for metrical purposes, one assumes, of al-Aswaf, a place outside Medina but regarded as coming within the Ḥaram estab-

Date palm groves the Banū Mālik have protected from the terrifying cavalry hosts of Abū Karib.

He related: Tubba' and his people were devotees of idols and worshiped them. He set out toward Mecca, this being on his route back to Yemen, until when he was at al-Duff in the district of Jumdān, between 'Usfān and Amaj, a point along his way between Mecca and Medina,[429] a group of men from Hudhayl[430] met him and said, "O king, allow us to lead you to an ancient, largely obliterated treasury which previous monarchs have overlooked and which contains pearls, chrysoliths, rubies, gold, and silver." He replied, "Yes, indeed," and they went on to say, "[It is] a temple in Mecca which its people worship and pray by."[431] The Hudhalīs, [904] however, intended by that Tubba''s destruction, because they knew full well that if any king had any bad intentions concerning the Ka'bah or acted deceitfully in regard to it, he would perish. When he had agreed to their proposal, he sent for the two rabbis lished by the Prophet around the town. See Majd al-Dīn Ibn al-Athīr, al-Nihāyah fī gharīb al-ḥadīth, II, 422; al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, I, 151; al-Samhūdī, Wafā' al-wafā, IV, 1125–26. Al-Manṣa'ah, on the contrary, would be the singular of a place-name normally found in the plural, al-Manāṣi', literally "places set apart," i.e., for purposes of fulfilling the needs of nature, outside Medina, specifically for the women of the town to use at night, and figuring as such in the famous ḥadīth al-ifk, "affair of the lie," involving 'Ā'ishah and her calumniators. See Majd al-Dīn Ibn Athīr, op. cit., V, 65; al-Samhūdī, op. cit., IV, 1313.

---

429. These places all lay to the north of Mecca, with 'Usfān in the transition zone between the coastal plain, the Tihāmah, and the Ḥijāz mountain chain, the Sarāt, and the others on the road to Medina across the mountains. For al-Duff, see Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 458. For Jumdān, see al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, II, 391–92, and Yāqūt, op. cit., II, 162, respectively, describing it as a mountain in the territory of Sulaym and a mountain in the ḥarrah, or lava field, of Ḍariyyah. 'Usfān is frequently mentioned in early Islamic sources as two stages from Mecca, and still exists as a village. See al-Bakrī, op. cit., III, 942–43, placing it in the territory of the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq of Khuzā'ah; Yāqūt, op. cit., IV, 120–21; Thilo, Die Ortsmanen in der altarabischen Poesie, 109 and Map C; Abdullah Al-Wohaibi, The Northern Hijaz in the Writings of the Arab Geographers 800–1150, 284–89. Amaj was an oasis settlement in the territory of Khuzā'ah. According to al-Bakrī, op. cit., I, 190–92, and according to Yāqūt, op. cit., I, 249–50, it was in the region of Medina; see also Al-Wohaibi, op. cit., 120–22, 186.

430. Hudhayl b. Mudrikah were a tribe, accounted North Arab in genealogy, from the Khindif branch of Muḍar, hence related to Quraysh of Mecca, whose territory was in the vicinity of Mecca and al-Ṭā'if. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 3, 58, II, 7, 286; EI², s.v. Hudhayl (G. Rentz).

431. That is, the Ka'bah, regarded, as is stated below, as having been founded by Ibrāhīm (Abraham) and his son Ismā'īl (Ishmael).

and asked them about it. They told him: "The sole intention of these people is to bring about your destruction and the destruction of your army. If you do what they are urging you to do, you and everyone with you will assuredly perish en bloc." Tubba' said, "What then do you advise me to do when I get to the temple?" They replied, "When you get there, do as its devotees do: circumambulate it, venerate and honor it, shave your head in its presence and behave with humility until you leave its precincts." He asked them, "What is preventing you yourselves from doing that?" They retorted, "By God, it is indeed the temple of our forefather Abraham, and it is just as we have informed you; but the local people have interposed as obstacles, between us and the temple, various idols they have set up around it, and blood they shed there. They are unclean polytheists," or words to that effect.[432]

Tubba' recognized the soundness of their advice and the veraciousness of their words. He had the group of Hudhalīs brought in, and cut off their hands and feet. Then he proceeded onwards till he reached Mecca. It was revealed to him in a dream that he should cover over the temple, so he covered it with sheets of woven palm leaves. Then in a second dream it was revealed to him that he should cover it with something better than that, so he covered it with Yemeni cloth (al-ma'āfir). Then in a third dream, that he should cover it with something even better than that, so he covered it with women's robes and pieces of finely woven Yemeni cloth joined together (al-mulā'ah wa-al-waṣā'il). According to what they assert, Tubba' was the first person to put a covering over the Ka'bah.[433] He also ordered its guardians, from Jurhum,[434]

---

432. According to Muslim lore, the primitive monotheism of Abraham, the millat Ibrāhīm, became corrupted after his time by polytheistic practices such as are mentioned here, so that by Muḥammad's time it had become an idol temple. Whether the ṭawāf or circumambulation, and the requirement of shaving the head, part of the iḥrām, practices mentioned here, were part of the rites of the Ka'bah in the two or three centuries before the coming of Muḥammad, the age of the Tubba's, is unknown; but it seems quite likely that such taboos and ritual practices did exist well before their formalization under Islam as the manāsik al-ḥajj. See M. Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Le pélerinage à la Mekke, étude d'histoire religieuse, 30ff.; *EI*², s.v. Ka'ba (A. J. Wensinck).

433. For the kiswah or covering, see Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Le pélerinage à la Mekke, 33; idem, "Le voile de la Ka'ba," 5–21; *EI*², s.v. Ka'ba. 1. (A.J. Wensinck and J. Jomier).

434. Jurhum were an ancient tribe, accounted Yemeni in genealogy, who were said to have migrated northward to Ḥijāz and to have taken over Mecca and its

to look after it and to keep it in a state of ritual purity, not letting any blood, dead bodies, or mīlāth, that is, [cloth used for] menstruation, come near it, and he provided it with a door and a key. Then he set out for Yemen accompanied by his troops and the two rabbis. When he reached Yemen he summoned its people to enter into the same religion as he had done, but they refused until they were able to test it by means of ordeal by fire, which they had in Yemen.[435]

[905] Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Abū Mālik b. Tha'labah b. Abī Mālik al-Quraẓī,[436] who said: I heard Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh relate that, when Tubba' drew near to Yemen in order to enter it, the Ḥimyarites blocked his way to it, telling him that he could not enter it because he had abandoned their religion. He invited them to accept his (new) faith, saying, "It is a better religion than yours." They retorted, "In that case, come and settle the matter with us by the ordeal of fire," and he agreed. He related: According to what the Yemenis assert, there was in Yemen a fire, by means of which they would settle matters in dispute among themselves; the fire would devour the wrongdoer but leave the one who had suffered injury unscathed. When they told this to Tubba', he replied, "You have made a fair proposition." So his people (i.e., the Ḥimyarites) went forth with their idols and with other sacred objects they were accustomed to utilize in their religion, while the two rabbis went forth with their sacred codices (maṣāḥifihimā)[437] hanging round their necks until they halted in front of the fire by the place where it blazed forth. The fire leapt out toward them, and when it neared them they withdrew from it in great fear. But those people present urged them onward and instructed them to stand firm. So they stood shrine from the Amelekites before being themselves displaced by the local Ḥijāzī tribe of Khuzā'ah. Individuals with the nisbah of al-Jurhumī were still known in the time of Muḥammad. See *EI*², s.v. Djurhum or Djurham (W. M. Watt).

---

435. This story is also in Ibn Hishām, ed. Wüstenfeld, 14–15 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 237, trans. 8–9; idem, Kitāb al-Tījān, 294–96; al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, I, 84–86.

436. Some male members of the Jewish tribe of Qurayẓah apparently survived the massacre mentioned in n. 419 above.

437. These muṣḥafs could have been made up of flat leaves, loose or sewn, or of rolled-up leaves, both procedures being apparently known in earliest Islam and doubtless before then. See *EI*², s.v. Ṣaḥīfa (A. Ghédira).

their ground until the fire covered them and consumed the idols and the sacred objects they had brought along, together with the men of Ḥimyar who were bearing them. The two rabbis then went forth with their sacred codices round their necks, with their foreheads dripping with sweat but the fire did not harm them at all. At this, the Ḥimyarites agreed to accept Tubba"s religion; from this time onward, and because of this episode, was the origin of Judaism in Yemen.

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—one of his colleagues, that the two rabbis and the Ḥimyarites who went out with them at that same time only followed the track of the fire in order to repel it, for they said that whoever was able to drive it back was the most worthy of credence. When some of the Ḥimyarites came with their idols near to it in order to drive it back, the fire came on at them in order to consume them, hence they retreated and were unable to drive it back. But when the two rabbis drew near to it after that, and began to recite the Torah, the fire began to recede until they had driven it back to its place of origin. Thereupon, the Ḥimyarites adopted the two rabbis' religion. [906]

Now Ri'ām was one of the temples they used to venerate and where they offered up slaughtered beasts and from which they used to speak under inspiration, this during the time when they were polytheists.[438] The two rabbis told Tubba' that it was only a demon (shayṭān) that lured them into evil ways and made them its sport, and they asked him to let them deal with it how they would. He replied, "Just go ahead with it!." The Yemenis assert that the two rabbis drew out from it a black dog, which they slaughtered. They also tore down that temple; its remains, according to what has been mentioned to me, can still be seen today in Yemen at Ri'ām, with traces of the blood that used to be poured over it.[439]

438. Al-Hamdānī, Ṣifat jazīrat al-'Arab, 268, 365, describes Riyām/Ri'ām as one of the fortresses and castles (maḥāfid, quṣūr; for the first term, sing. maḥfad, maḥfid, see C. Landberg, Glossaire datînois, I, 442–30) of Yemen and as one of the shrines of the Arabs (mawāḍi' al-'ibādah), located in the territory of the Hamdān (i.e., in that part of northern Yemen between Ṣan'ā' and Ṣa'dah). Ibn al-Kalbī, Kitāb al-aṣnām, ed. Aḥmad Zakī Pasha, in Klinke-Rosenberger, Das Götzenbuch, text, 7–8, Ger. trans. 35, comm. 87, Eng. trans. Faris, 10–11, states that it was a sanctuary of the Ḥimyarites at Ṣan'ā' and that there was an oracle there. The existence of both the place and the shrine at Rym^{um} where the god Ta'lab was venerated, is confirmed by South Arabian inscriptions. See Fahd, Le panthéon de l'Arabie centrale à la veille de l'hégire, 141–43; W. W. Müller, "Ancient Castles Mentioned in the Eighth Volume of al-Hamdānī's Iklīl," 154.

Tubba' composed the following verses about that journey of his; what he had intended to do at Medina and the Ka'bah; how he dealt with the men of Hudhayl when they told him what they in fact told him; what he did regarding the Holy House when he came to Mecca, that is, putting a cover over it and purifying it; and what the two rabbis told him about the Messenger of God's future role:

Why [O my soul] is your sleep troubled, like that of one with bleary, diseased eyes, suffering from sleeplessness, as if kept awake incessantly?
Feeling rage against two Jewish tribes who settled at Yathrib, who richly deserve the punishment of a day of violence![440]
When I made my dwelling place at Medina, my slumber there was sweet and refreshing.
I made space for a dwelling place on a hill between al-'Aqīq and [907] Baqī' al-Gharqad.[441]
We left behind its tract of dark-colored rocks and its plateaux, and its salt flats extending on a bare plain,
And we descended to Yathrib, with our breasts raging with anger at the killing of a slaughtered one (i.e., Tubba''s son).

---

439. This story is also in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 17–18 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 24–28, trans. 10–11, idem, Kitāb al-tījān, 37–38.

440. There were, of course, more than two Jewish tribes living in Medina at the time of the hijrah and almost certainly before then. Their presence there may even date to the diaspora from Palestine down the Wādī al-Qurā in western Arabia after such cataclysms for the Jewish people as the Roman emperor Titus's sack of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and the suppression of the revolt of Bar Kokhba in A.D. 132; the question of the origins of the communities of Jews (or Judaised Arabs?) in such oases of western Arabia as Fadak, Khaybar and Medina has been much discussed, without finality having been reached. For Judaism in South Arabia, see n. 486 below.

441. The Wādī al-'Aqīq lay just to the west of Medina and is expressly lauded in Islamic tradition as "the blessed valley" because of the Prophet's fondness for it. See *EI*², s.v. al-'Aḳīḳ (G. Rentz). Baqī' al-Gharqad was the first Muslim cemetery in Medina, much venerated in later times because so many of the Prophet's family, the Companions, and other notable figures of early Islam were buried there. See *EI*², s.v. Baḳī' al-Gharḳad (A. J. Wensinck and A. S. Bazmee Ansari).

I have sworn a deliberate, binding vow, an oath which is, by your life, not to be rescinded,
"If I come to Yathrib, I will not suffer to remain in its central parts a single date cluster or any ripe dates."
Until there came to me a learned scholar of Qurayẓah, a rabbi to whom, by your life, the Jews accorded primacy.
He said, "Remove yourself from a settlement which is preserved [by God] for the prophet of Mecca from Quraysh, a divinely guided one."
So I forgave them without any reproach, and left them to the requital of an everlasting day (sc., the Day of Judgment).
And I left them to God, for whose forgiveness I hope on the Day of Reckoning, [escaping] from the stoked-up flames of Hell.
I left behind at Yathrib for him a group of men from our people, men of personal achievement and valor, whose deeds are praised,
A group of men who will bring victory in their train; I hope thereby a reward from the lord of one worthy of praise.[442]
I did not realize that there was a pure house, consecrated to God in the hollow of Mecca, where He is worshiped, Until there came to me servile wretches from Hudhayl, at al- [908] Duff of Jumdān above the ascent of the hill (al-musnad).
They said, "[There is] at Mecca a house of ancient, forgotten wealth, with treasures of pearls and chrysoliths."
I wanted to get at them, but my Lord interposed between me and them, for God repels [profane ones] who would destroy the house of worship.
Hence I renounced my intentions against it and against the people of Yathrib, and left them as an example to the discerning.
Dhū al-Qarnayn before me submitted himself [to God], a king to whom the other kings became humble and thronged [his court].[443]

---

442. rabbi muḥammadi, which could be taken as presaging the coming of the Prophet Muḥammad.

443 "The man with the two horns" of Qur'ān, XVIII, 82–97/83–97, generally identified in Muslim lore with Alexander the Great, regarded by some authorities as a proto-Muslim because he spoke to the people of the West about God's punish-

He reigned over the Eastern and Western lands, yet sought the means of knowledge from a wise, rightly guided scholar.
He witnessed the setting of the sun in its resting place into a pool of black and foetid slime.
Before his time, Bilqīs was my paternal forebear (literally, "aunt") and ruled over them until the hoopoe came to her.[444]

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: They assert that, in regard to this tribe (ḥayy) of the Anṣār, Tubba' was only enraged at them because of the Jews who lived among them. Tubba' intended to destroy them when he came to them at Medina, but the Anṣār restrained him from them until he then departed. This was the reason for his saying in his poem, ment for the wicked and His reward for the righteous, though it was disputed whether he was a prophet. See *EI*², s.v. al-Iskandar (W. M. Watt). Tubba"s citation here of Dhū al-Qarnayn as a predecessor no doubt reflects the elaboration in early Islamic times of South Arabian legends and folk-tales, which assigned to Alexander a place in the glorious past of Yemen, as a counterbalance to the North Arabs' glorying in the fact that it was from them that the Prophet Muḥammad had arisen. See Tilman Nagel, Alexander der Grosse in der frühislamischen Volksliteratur, 6off.

---

444. This story is given in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 12–18 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 20–28, trans. 7–12, including the text of the whole poem. Guillaume wondered how Ibn Isḥāq came to insert so patently spurious a poem into a serious historical work. Bilqīs was the name given in Muslim lore to the Queen of Sheba (not actually given a personal name) in Qur'ān, XXVII, 15–45, to whom the hoopoe (hudhud) is said to have brought a letter from King Solomon. See *EI*², s.v. Bilḳīs (E. Ullendorff); J. Briend, in Supplément au dictionnaire de la Bible, s.v. Sheba. I. "Dans la Bible," cols. 1043–46.

It is quite possible that Solomon had some diplomatic contacts with some Arabian queen, though whether these really were with a monarch in South Arabia or whether the name of Saba, as being that of a well-known, mighty kingdom, was later attached to the story, is impossible to say. However, there was a historical Bilqīs, and the late Jacqueline Pirenne worked out from genealogical information in al-Hamdānī's Iklīl that her husband was in fact a qayl or local prince of Yemen called Baril or Barig Dhū Bata', known from South Arabian inscriptions and to be placed in the mid-third century A.D., and that the monarch whom Bilqīs and her husband visited was an Arab king, the famous Odenathus/Udhaynah of Palmyra, ally of the Romans against the Persians. The identification of the king thus visited with Solomon would accordingly stem from the existing identification in Jewish lore and legend of the Old Testament monarch with the city-state of Palmyra. See Pirenne, "Who Was the Suleyman visited by al-Hamdani's Bilqis, Queen of Himyar?," 27–45.

Feeling rage against two Jewish tribes who settled at Yathrib, who richly deserve the punishment of a day of violence! [909]

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: Before this, there had come to Tubba' Shāfi' b. Kulayb al-Ṣadafī, who was a soothsayer (kāhin). He stayed with Tubba', and when he signified his intention to say goodbye, Tubba' said, "What does there remain of your learning?" Shāfi' replied, "An eloquent piece of historical lore—and a veracious item of knowledge."[445] He said, "Can you find a people with a kingdom equal in status to mine?" Shāfi' replied, "No, except that the king of Ghassān has numerous offspring (najl)." Tubba' said, "Can you find any king superior to him in status?" He replied, "Yes." He said, "Who has such a kingdom?" He replied, "I find it belonging to a pious and God-fearing man—who has been made strong by conquests—and who has been described in the Scriptures (al-zabūr, literally "the Psalms of David")[446]—his community is given a superior status in the sacred books (al-sufūr)—and he will dispel darkness with light—Aḥmad the prophet—blessed be his community until he comes!—[He is] one of the Banū Lu'ayy—and then of the Banū Quṣayy."[447] Tubba' sent for a copy of the scrip-

445. The kāhin's utterance here is, as usual with such gnomic pronouncements, in assonantal, rhymed prose (saj'). See Fahd, La divination arabe. Etudes religieuses, sociologiques et folkloriques sur le milieu natif de l'Islam, 151–53; EI², s.v. Sadj'. i. As Magical Utterances in Pre-Islamic Arabian Usage (T. Fahd).

446. This term is used in the Qur'ān, in the singular, as here, for the Psalms, but in the plural al-zubur for written inscriptions in general; A. Jeffery, The Foreign Vocabulary of the Qur'ān, 148–49, see also EI¹, s.v. Zabūr (J. Horovitz), derived it from the Christian Orient. However, Mr. F. C. de Blois has pointed out to the present writer that a Sabaean verb zbr, "to write, inscribe," is now attested on the inscribed sticks that have been recently coming to light in Yemen, as described by W. W. Müller, "L'écriture zabūr du Yémen pre-islamique dans la tradition arabe," 35–39, who traces what appears to be the subsequent usage of the verb zabara in early Classical Arabic, perhaps influenced by Yemeni precursors and influences. It is accordingly possible that one should translate al-Ṭabarī's text here, wa-wuṣifa fī al-zabūr, as "and who has been described in the ancient written texts," and the subsequent mention of Tubba''s sending for a copy of al-zabūr (here grammatically feminine, as if a collective) as simply for "ancient written documents."

447. Quṣayy was the semilegendary hero of the Banū Lu'ayy of Fihr or Quraysh who was an ancestor, separated by five generations, of Muḥammad/Aḥmad. He is said to have restored the Ka'bah to the primitive monotheistic worship of the millat Ibrāhīm after the cult there had lapsed into pantheism under Jurhum (on whom see n. 434 above). See EI², s.v. Ḳuṣayy (G. Levi Della Vida).

tures and perused them; and lo and behold, he found there the Prophet's description!

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, to whom someone had transmitted from Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās—others of the scholars of Yemen who relate traditions. Some of them transmitted part of the story, but all of that is gathered together in this present story, that there was a king from the Lakhm in Yemen among the Tubba's of Ḥimyar, called Rabī'ah b. Naṣr. Before his period of royal power in Yemen there had reigned Tubba' I, who was Zayd b. 'Amr Dhī al-Adh'ār b. Abrahah Dhī al-Manār b. al-Rā'ish b. Qays b. Ṣayfī b. Saba' the Younger b. Kahf al-Ẓulm b. Zayd b. Sahl b. 'Amr b. Qays b. Mu'āwiyah b. Jusham b. Wā'il b. al-Ghawth b. Qaṭan b. 'Arīb b. Zuhayr b. Ayman b. Hamaysa' b. al-'Aranjaj Ḥimyar b. Saba' the Elder b. Ya'rub b. Yashjub b. Qaḥṭān.[448] Saba''s name was (really) 'Abd Shams, and he was only called Saba', as they assert, because [910] he was the first to take captives (sabā) among the Arabs.[449] This is the ruling house of the kingdom of Ḥimyar, among whom were the Tubba's.

After Tubba' I there came Zayd b. 'Amr and[450] Shamir Yur'ish b. Yāsir Yun'im b. 'Amr Dhī al-Adh'ār his paternal cousin.[451] It was

448. The genealogy is here taken back to Qaḥṭān, regarded as the progenitor of the South Arabs as 'Adnān was of the North ones, Ḥimyar being accounted, with Kahlān, as one of the two main subdivisions of Qaḥṭān. The name Qaḥṭān was connected by the Arab genealogists with the Old Testament name Yoqṭān/Joktan (cf. Gen. x. 28; I Chron. i. 20), but this seems phonologically hazardous. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 176, II, 31–33, 455; *EI*², s.v. Ḳaḥṭān (A. Fischer-A. K. Irvine).

449. The Sabaeans were reckoned by the Arab genealogists as stemming from Saba', called personally 'Āmir b. Yashjub. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 176, II, 491. In the Old Testament, Səbā figures in Gen. x. 7, as the son of Cush, son of Ham, and Shəbā in I Chron. i. 9, as a son of Joktan. Briend notes that Səbā (with initial samekh, occurring five times in the Old Testament) seems to have a different geographical connotation from Shəbā (with initial shin, occurring twenty-three times in the Old Testament), which seems definitely to be placed in southwestern part of Arabia. See Supplément au dictionnaire de la Bible, s.v. Sheba. I, col. 1046.

450. Supplying the "and" from the Cairo text, II, 111.

451. More correctly, Sh.m.r Yuhar'ish (on the form of the first element in the name, see n. 364 above), as the name appears in South Arabian inscriptions. He and his father Yāsir^{um} Yuhan'im were ruling jointly in 385 Ḥimyarite era/A.D. 285–86 as founders of the Ḥimyarite line, since a decade or so before this Sh.m.r Yuhar'ish

Shamir Yur'ish who raided China, built Samarqand,[452] and laid out as an encampment (ḥayyara) al-Ḥīrah,[453] and it was he who recited the verses,

I am Shamir Abū Karib al-Yamānī; I urged on the horses from Yemen and Syria,
In order that I might attack the slaves who had rebelled against us, [when we were] in the lands beyond China, in 'Athm and Yām,[454]
And then we shall inflict judgment in their lands with a just decision, which not a single youth shall survive.

. . . and so on to the end of the ode.

He related: Then there came after Shamir Yur'ish the son of Yāsir Yun'im, Tubba' the Lesser; namely, Tubān As'ad Abū Karib b. Malkī Karib b. Zayd b. Tubba' I b. 'Amr Dhī al-Adh'ār.[455] It was he who came to Medina and who took back the two Jewish rabbis to Yemen, who venerated the Holy House and put a covering on it and who recited the poetry which is well known.[456] All these reigned before the royal power of Rabī'ah b. Naṣr al-Lakhmī, and had taken over Yemen from the kings of Saba' and Ḥaḍramawt in order to consolidate the new united kingdom in South Arabia (see n. 314 above). See G. Ryckmans, L'institution monarchique en Arabie méridionale avant l'Islam. Ma'în et Saba, 210–12; Robin, in Supplément au dictionnaire de la Bible, s.v. Sheba. II, cols. 1102, 1139–40.

---

452. See for details of these legendary trans-Asian raids, al-Ṭabarī, I, 890–92, pp. 142–45 above.

453. Virtually nothing is known of the history of al-Ḥīrah before the Lakhmids built it up into their capital (see nn. 76–79 above), but this story of its foundation by the Tubba's is pure invention, conceivably influenced, however, by the fact that Lakhm were considered genealogically to be a South Arab tribe (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 834, p. 44 and n. 132 above).

454. The Yām b. Aṣbā were a component tribe of the South Arabian Hamdān living in the Najrān area and several times mentioned by al-Hamdānī in his geographical work. The Banū Yām gave their name to one of the districts (mikhlāf, pl. makhālīf, see n. 462 below) of Yemen, that around their home. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 229, II, 47, 590; *EI*², s.v. Yām (G. R. Smith). The reading 'Athm is uncertain, but al-Maqdisī, Aḥsan al-taqāsīm, 88, registers a place 'Asham in the mikhlāf of the Tihāmah; al-Hamdānī, Ṣifat jazīrat al-'Arab, 259, mentions this also as a mine (ma'din) in the Tihāmah of Yemen, while Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 126, has an 'Ashm in the northern Tihāmah.

455. See n. 417 above, for his place as founder of the Tubba' line.

456. This tale is given in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 12 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 20, trans. 7; idem, Kitāb al-tījān, 294–96; cf. Krenkow, "The Two Oldest Books on Arabic Folklore," 227.

when the latter died, the whole of the royal authority in Yemen reverted to Ḥassān b. Tubān (or Tibān) As'ad Abī Karib b. Malkī Karib b. Zayd b. 'Amr Dhī al-Adh'ār.

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, from a [911] certain scholar, that Rabī'ah b. Naṣr had a dream that alarmed him and that continued to disquiet him.[457] When he had this dream, he sent out enquiries among the people of his kingdom and gathered together in his presence every soothsayer, magician, drawer of omens from the flight of birds,[458] and astrologer. Then he informed them, "I have had a dream which has alarmed me and caused me disquiet, so tell me its interpretation." They replied, "Recount it to us, so that we might inform you of its meaning." He replied, however, "If I recount it to you, I shall have no confidence that you will be able to tell me its correct interpretation; the only person who will know its correct interpretation is the one who already knows about the dream without my telling him." When Rabī'ah had said all this to them, one of the assembled group of experts on dreams said, "If the king requires this, then he should send for Saṭīḥ and Shiqq, for there is no one more knowledgeable than these two, and they will certainly be able to tell you what you ask." Saṭīḥ's (real) name was Rabī' b. Rabī'ah b. Mas'ūd

457. What we have here is a story from the South Arabian tradition, meant to explain the presence of the (genealogically) South Arabian Lakhmids in Iraq and al-Ḥīrah. The story is traced back to the time of a generation after Shamir Yur'ish/Yuhar'ish, i.e., the first part of the fourth century, and Rabī'ah b. Naṣr al-Lakhmī is made the father of 'Adī, who in the Lakhmid king lists dependent upon Ibn al-Kalbī (see n. 414 above) is regarded as the progenitor of the line, the first figure in the royal genealogy, father of 'Amr I, the father of Imru' al-Qays I. At the end of the story of the dream, the Lakhmids are made to migrate from Yemen to al-Ḥīrah in order to escape the prophesied invasion of the Abyssinians, being allowed to settle at al-Ḥīrah by the Persian king Shāpūr I (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 913–14, p. 182 below, and Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 39–40, who states that we know, concerning the origins of the kingdom based on al-Ḥīrah, "so gut wie nichts").

458. See for this person, the 'ā'if, al-Ṭabarī, I, 1058, p. 395 and n. 970 above. Concerning this series of persons skilled in various types of prognostication, cf. the series of "magicians, enchanters, sorcerers, and the Chaldaeans" whom Nebuchadnezzar summoned to interpret his dreams in Daniel ii. 2. For the practice of the interpretation of dreams, oneiromancy, a pseudo-science whose literature goes back through Classical Antiquity to Assyrian times and which in the Islamic period produced a considerable number of works on ta'bīr al-ru'yā, dream interpretation books, see Fahd, La divination arabe, 247–367, and *EI*², s.v. Ru'yā (H. Daiber).

b. Māzin b. Dhi'b b. 'Adī b. Māzin b. Ghassān, and because of his genealogical connections with Dhi'b he was called al-Dhi'bī. Shiqq was the son of Ṣa'b b. Yashkur b. Ruhm b. Afrak b. Nadhīr b. Qays b. 'Abqar b. Anmār.[459]

When they told Rabī'ah that, he sent for the two men. Saṭīḥ came to him before Shiqq; there were no soothsayers (kuhhān) like them in their time. So when Saṭīḥ arrived, the king summoned him and said, "O Saṭīḥ, I have had a dream which has alarmed me and disquieted me, so tell me about it, for if you comprehend the dream correctly, you will know correctly its interpretation." Saṭīḥ replied, "I will do this. You saw in your dream a skull (jumjumah) (Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] says: I have found the rendering of it in other places as '. . . I saw blazing coals, ḥumamah')—which came forth from the darkness—and fell upon the lowlands descending to the sea—and devoured there everything with a skull!" The king said, "O Saṭīḥ, you have got it exactly right; so what, in your opinion, is the interpretation of it?" Saṭīḥ answered, "I swear by the serpent which is between the two *ḥarrah*s[460]—the Abyssinians (al-Ḥabash)[461] will certainly swoop down on your land —and will then rule over all the land from [912] Abyan to Jurash."[462]

---

459. Saṭīḥ and Shiqq appear in Arabic lore as legendary personages, often described as barely human monsters, and they have roles in pre-Islamic history as diviners: here for the Lakhmid Rabī'ah but also (anachronistically) for al-Nu'mān (III) b. al-Mundhir (IV) and Khusraw Anūsharwān in predicting the fall of the Persian kingdom and the triumph of the Arabs (al-Ṭabarī, I, 981–84, pp. 285–89 below). See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 39; *EI*², s.vv. Saṭīḥ b. Rabī'a (T. Fahd) and Shiḳḳ (B. Carra de Vaux and T. Fahd).

460. The geographers enumerate large numbers of *ḥarrah*s, basaltic lava fields, in the region between the Ḥawrān in southern Syria and Medina. See the long section in Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 245–50 (paraphrased and discussed by O. Loth, "Die Vulkanregionen von Arabien nach Yāḳūt," 365–82); *EI*², s.v. Ḥarra (ed.). Here the reference, if at all specific, is probably to two of the *ḥarrah*s in the vicinity of Medina, which included the Ḥarrat Wāqim, site of a famous battle in 63/683 when the Umayyad army under Muslim b. 'Uqbah al-Murrī defeated the Medinans there; see Loth, op. cit., 380.

461. This designates here the people of al-Ḥabashah, ḥbs²t of the later Sabaean inscriptions. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥabashat (A. K. Irvine). As observed by Irvine, there is no evidence for the statement in earlier authorities like Glaser and Rossini there that the Ḥbs²t may have been a South Arabian tribe in origin.

462. Abyan was a mikhlāf of the southernmost tip of Arabia, comprising Aden and its eastward-stretching hinterland; see *EI*², s.v. Abyan (O. Löfgren). Jurash,

The king said to Saṭīḥ, "By your father! O Saṭīḥ, this is indeed distressing and painful for us; but when will this take place—in my own time, or subsequently?" Saṭīḥ replied, "Nay, indeed, a good while after it—more than sixty or seventy years will elapse." The king said, "Will that dominion of theirs endure, or will it be cut short?" he answered, "Nay, it will be cut short after seventy-odd years have gone by—and then all of them there will be slain or will be expelled from it as fugitives." The king said, "Who, then, will assume that task of killing and expelling them?" Saṭīḥ replied, "Iram of Dhū Yazan[463]—who will come forth against them from Aden—and not leave a single one of them in Yemen." The king enquired, "Will Iram's dominion there endure, or will it be cut short?" He replied, "It will indeed be cut short." The king said, "And who will cut it short?" He replied, "A prophet—a pure one—to whom the inspired revelation (al-waḥy) will come—from on high." The king asked, "Who will this prophet spring from?" He replied, "[He will be] a man from the progeny of Ghālib b.

---

frequently mentioned by al-Hamdānī, was an important town and a mikhlāf in mediaeval Islamic times, situated in northern Yemen to the northwest of Najrān. See al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, II, 376; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 126.

Mikhlāf, used in the early Islamic sources on Yemen in particular (although no longer used as an administrative term in modern Yemen), is said by the geographers to be the equivalent of kūrah. It may have a tenuous relationship to Sabaean ḫlf "vicinity of a town," but a form mḫlf has not so far been attested in the inscriptions. See Beeston et alii, Sabaic Dictionary, 60; *EI*², s.v. Mikhlāf (C. E. Bosworth).

463. Muslim lore identified Iram with the Biblical Aram, son of Shem (Gen. x. 22–23; I Chron, I. 17), and made various peoples of Arabia his descendants. When the Qur'ān, LXXXIX, 6, speaks of Iram dhāt 'imād, it is probably referring to a tribe or people, here linked with the legendary giant race of 'Ād. See al-Hamdānī, al-Iklīl. al-Juz' al-thāmin, 33, trans. Faris, The Antiquities of South Arabia, 29–30; Nashwān al-Ḥimyarī, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns im Šams al-'ulūm, 2; *EI*², s.v. Iram (W. M. Watt).

Dhū Yaz'an or Yazan was one of the Ḥimyarite kings of the first half of the sixth century, and father of Sayf b. Dhī Yazan who secured the help of Khusraw Anūsharwān to expel the Abyssinians from Yemen; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 946ff., pp. 236ff. and n. 585 below. The component dhū in his name is the South Arabian relative pronoun d, often used to indicate clan or group affiliation, thence "the chief [of such a group]," as here. See Biella, Dictionary of Old South Arabic, Sabaean Dialect, 89–90; Beeston, Sabaic Grammar, §27:2. The Muslim Arabs regarded names thus compounded as so characteristic of South Arabian monarchical terminology that they used dhū, pl. adhwā', as a generic term for South Arabian rulers. See Nashwān al-Ḥimyarī, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns, 39. 116; *EI*², s.v. Adhwā' (O. Löfgren).

Fihr—son of Mālik b. al-Naḍr[464]—his dominion over his people shall last until the end of time." The king said, "O Saṭīḥ, will time (al-dahr) have an end?" He replied, "Yes, a day on which the first generations and the last generations wil be assembled—the righteous will be joyful on it—but the evildoers shall be made wretched." The king said, "Is what you are informing us true, O Saṭīḥ?" the latter replied, "Yes, by the redness of the dying sun at evening—and the beginning of the darkness of night—and the dawn when it is complete—what I have told you is undoubtedly true."

When Saṭīḥ had finished, Shiqq arrived, so the king summoned him. He said, "O Shiqq, I have had a dream that has alarmed and disquieted me, so tell me about it, for if you comprehend the dream correctly, you will know correctly its interpretation," just as he had said to Saṭīḥ. But he concealed from him what Saṭīḥ had said in order that he might see whether the two interpretations agreed or differed. Shiqq said, "Yes, you saw a skull—which came forth from the darkness—and fell upon all the land, meadows, and [913] thickets—and devoured everything there with living breath." When that king perceived that the words of the two soothsayers agreed with each other totally, he said to Shiqq, "O Shiqq, you have got it exactly right, so what, in your opinion, is the interpretation of it?" Shiqq replied, "I swear by the men living between the two *ḥarrah*s—the blacks will certainly come down on your land—and will seize custody of every tender one from your hands—and will then rule over all the land from Abyan to Najrān."[465]

The king exclaimed, "By your father! O Shiqq, this is indeed distressing and painful for us; but when will this take place—in my own time, or subsequently?" Shiqq answered, "Nay indeed, a stretch of time after you—then a mighty one, lofty of status, shall rescue you from it—and will make them taste the deepest abasement." The king said, "Who is this person mighty of status?"

---

464. That is, from Quraysh, these being persons figuring in the genealogy of the tribe back to Ma'add b. 'Adnān. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 4; *EI*², s.v. Ḳuraysh (W. M. Watt).

465. Again implying the whole length of Yemen, since Najrān lay on its north-eastern fringes. See al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, IV, 1298–99; Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 266–71; *EI*², s.v. Nadjrān (Irfan Shahîd).

Shiqq retorted, "A youth neither base nor inadequate for what he attempts—he will issue forth from the house of Dhū Yazan." The king said, "Will his dominion endure, or will it be cut short?" He replied, "Indeed, it will be ended by a prophet who will be sent—who will come with right and justice—among the people of religion and virtue—the dominion will remain among his people until the Day of Separation. One may ask, 'What is the Day of Separation?'[466] —The reply is, the day on which those near to God will be recompensed—invocations from the heavens will be made—which both the quick and the dead shall hear—and on which the people will be gathered together at the appointed place[467]—on which there will be salvation and blessings for those who fear God." The king said, "Is what you say true, O Shiqq?" The latter replied, "Yes, by the lord of heaven and earth—and the highlands and the lowlands which lie between them—what I have communicated to you is indeed the truth, in which there is no dissimulation."

When the king had finished questioning the two men, there came into his mind that what the two of them had told him regarding the invasion of the Ethiopians was really going to take place, so he fitted out his sons and other members of his house for the journey to Iraq, together with what they needed, and wrote on their behalf to one of the kings of Persia called Shābūr, son of Khurrazād,[468] who allowed them to settle at al-Ḥīrah. Al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir, the king of al-Ḥīrah, was a descendant of Rabīʾah b.
[914] Naṣr; he is al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir— b. al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir b. ʿAmr b. ʿAdī b. Rabīʾah b. Naṣr, that same king in the genealogy and the lore of the scholars (ahl) of Yemen.[469]

---

466. Echoing the Qurʾānic usage of the eschatological concept of the yawm al-faṣl, the day of separation or distinction between those who will be saved and those who will be damned, as expounded n XXXVII, 21, etc., and especially in LXXVII, 13, 14, 38.

467. That is, the ḥashr or "crowding together" for the Last Judgment. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳiyāma (L. Gardet).

468. Presumably the reference is to Shābūr I, since his father Ardashīr I's mother was Khurrazād. See Justi, Namenbuch, 96–97.

469. This story is in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 9–12 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 15–19, trans. 4–6, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 418–20, and cf. Fahd, La divination arabe, 250–52. As noted in n. 457 above, the dream described thus becomes an explanation for the movement of a South Arabian group like the

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: When Saṭīḥ and Shiqq told that to Rabī'ah b. Naṣr, and Rabī'ah did with regard to his sons and other members of his house what he in fact did, the mention of all this spread among the Arabs, and they talked about it extensively until his fame and his reputation for knowledge became widely disseminated among them. Hence when the Ethiopians occupied Yemen, and the events which they had previously been talking about, including the interpretations of the two soothsayers, came to pass, al-A'shā—that is, al-A'shā of the Banū Qays b. Tha'labah al-Bakrī[470]—said in some of the poetry he recited, mentioning the events involving those two soothsayers Saṭīḥ and Shiqq:

A woman with her eyelids never looked forth like with a look full of penetration, as when al-Dhi'bī made pronouncements when he spoke in saj'.

Saṭīḥ used only to be called al-Dhi'bī by the Arabs because he came from the progeny of Dhi'b b.'Adī. When Rabī'ah b. Naṣr died and the royal power in Yemen became concentrated into the hands of Ḥassān b. Tubān As'ad Abī Karib b. Malkī Karib b. Zayd b. 'Amr Dhī al-Adh'ār,[471] one of the factors involving the eruption of the Ethiopians, the transfer of the royal power from Ḥimyar, and the ending of their period of dominion—and there is a cause for everything—was that Ḥassān b. Tubān As'ad Abī Karib led an expedition with the army of Yemen, aiming at overrunning the land of the Arabs and the land of the Persians, just as the Tubba's had been wont to do previously. But when the expedition reached

---

Lakhmid family from Yemen to Iraq.

470. The celebrated poet al-A'shā Maymūn b. Qays, often ranked for his poetic genius with the authors of the Seven Mu'allaqāt, came from the Qays b. Tha'labah of Bakr b. Wā'il (d. after 3/625), grew up in the Christian environment of al-Ḥīrah and eulogized inter alios Iyās b. Qabīṣah, the appointee of the Persians to the governorship of al-Ḥīrah after the deposition and death of al-Nu'mān V b. al-Mundhir II (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1029–30, p. 359 below). His life was much bound up with political and military events along the desert frontiers of Iraq. The verse is from his qaṣīdah beginning with the formulaic hemistich Bānat Su'ād wa-amsā ḥabluhā inqaṭa'a, in Dīwān, ed. Geyer, Gedichte von 'Abû Baṣîr Maimûn ibn Qais al-A'šâ, 74, no. 13, v. 16. See on the poet Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe, II, 321–25; EI², s.v. al-A'shā, Maymūn b. Ḳays (W. Caskel).

471. Nashwān al-Ḥimyarī, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns, 38, has a fanciful explanation for the princely name Dhū al-Adh'ār.

a certain spot in the land of Iraq, Ḥimyar and the tribes of Yemen refused to go on further with him and wanted to return to their own homeland and families. Hence they approached and spoke with one of Ḥassān's brothers, who was with him in the army, called ʿAmr, saying, "Kill your brother Ḥassān, and we will make you king over us in his stead and you can lead us back to our homeland." He agreed to their plan, and Ḥassān's brother and his followers from Ḥimyar and the tribes of Yemen agreed to kill [915] Ḥassān, except for Dhū Ruʿayn al-Ḥimyarī, who forbade ʿAmr to do this and told him, "You are the ruling house of our kingdom; do not kill your brother and thereby dissolve the uniting bonds of our house," or something like that. But ʿAmr rejected his words, although Dhū Ruʿayn was a leading noble of Ḥimyar.[472] Hence Dhū Ruʿayn obtained a leaf of writing material and inscribed on it:

O who would buy sleeplessness for sleep? The one who passes his nights in a calm and peaceful state is indeed fortunate.
And although Ḥimyar has acted treacherously and faithlessly,
God will hold Dhū Ruʿayn blameless.

Then he sealed the piece of writing and gave it to ʿAmr, telling him, "Keep this document by you on my behalf, for there is in it something which I desire earnestly and have need of" (i.e., for his eventual exculpation), so ʿAmr did that. When Ḥassān got news of what his brother ʿAmr, Ḥimyar, and the tribes of Yemen had resolved upon, that is, his death, he recited to ʿAmr:

O ʿAmr, do not hasten my deathly fate, but take the royal power without using armed force.

But ʿAmr was set on killing him, and in fact did the deed. He then returned to Yemen with his accompanying army. A certain poet of Ḥimyar recited:

When, [I pray] to God, has anyone ever seen, in previous long spans of years, the like of Ḥassān, as a slain one?

472. That Dhū Ruʿayn were a noble family of Ḥimyar is confirmed by Nashwān al-Ḥimyarī, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns, 46, cf. 41, apparently claiming a connection for them with the previous ruling house of Saba'.

The princelets (aqyāl) slew him out of fear lest they be kept at military service, while assuring him, "No harm, no harm!"
(labābi labābi).[473]
Your dead one was the best of us and your living one is lord over us, while all of you are chiefs.

When ʿAmr b. Tubān Asʿad Abī Karib established himself in Yemen, he was unable to sleep and suffered permanent insomnia, according to what they assert. He found it impossible to sleep. It reduced him to a state of exhaustion, so he set about asking the physicians, and the soothsayers and diviners who work by examining physiognomy, what was the matter with him, saying, "I am deprived of sleep, and can get no rest, and insomnia has reduced me to a state of exhaustion." One of them told him, "By God, no [916] man has ever killed his brother or a blood relation wrongfully, as you killed your brother, without losing his sleep and incurring sleeplessness." On being told this, ʿAmr set about killing all those members of the nobles of Ḥimyar and tribes of Yemen who had urged him to kill his brother Ḥassān, until finally he came to Dhū Ruʿayn. When ʿAmr expressed his intention of killing him, Dhū Ruʿayn said, "You have in your possession a document exonerating me from what you propose to do with me." ʿAmr said, "What is this exculpating document in my possession?" He replied, "Fetch out the paper which I entrusted to you and left with you." The king fetched out the paper, and lo and behold, there was written on it those two verses of poetry:

O who would buy sleeplessness for sleep? The one who passes his nights in a calm and peaceful state is indeed fortunate.

---

473. Nashwān b. Saʿīd, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns, 89, defines qayl as meaning "king" among the Ḥimyarites. It seems to have a fairly late usage in South Arabia in the explicit form qyl, mainly in the fifth and sixth centuries, and to bear the meaning "prince," a potentate subordinate to a malik or king, as well as the meaning of "tribal chief." See G. Ryckmans, "Le Qayl en Arabie méridionale préislamique," 144–55; Biella, Dictionary of Old South Arabic, Sabaean Dialect, 453–54; *EI*², s.v. Ḳayl (A. F. L. Beeston).

The word labābī/labāb^{in} is said by Ibn Isḥāq, in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 19 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 29, trans. 13, to mean in the Ḥimyarite language lā baʾs.

And although Ḥimyar has acted treacherously and faithlessly,
God will hold Dhū Ruʿayn blameless.

When ʿAmr read these two verses, Dhu Ruʿayn told him, "I forbade you to kill your brother, but you would not listen to me; so when you refused thus to listen to me, I left this paper with you as proof of my innocence in regard to you and as exoneration of me vis-à-vis you. I feared that, if you killed him, you would be afflicted as you have in fact been afflicted; and if you intend to inflict on me what I see you have inflicted on those who urged you to kill your brother, this paper will serve as a means of preserving me from your intentions." Hence ʿAmr b. Tubān Asʿad left him alone and did not include him among the nobles of Ḥimyar whom he executed; he recognized that Dhū Ruʿayn had given him wise counsel, if only he had followed it.

ʿAmr b. Tubān Asʿad recited, when he executed those guilty men of Ḥimyar and the people of Yemen who had urged him to kill his brother Ḥassān:

We purchased sleep, when tendons in the neck were drawn tight with what causes sleeplessness and knotting of sinews which will not go away.
They called out together at the time of their treacherous action,
"No harm!" when the exculpation of Dhū Ruʿayn had [917] already been expressed.
We have now executed those responsible for this betrayal, as an act of retaliation for Ibn Ruhm, which does not entail responsibility for a blood feud.
We have executed them in requital for Ḥassān b. Ruhm, for Ḥassān was the one murdered by the ones who stirred up trouble.
We have executed them, so that none of them now remains,
and every eye feels refreshed at their fate.
The eyes of the lamenting women are weeping with grief for the noble women, women of the two armies.
Gentle maidens at nightfall, who are dark eyed when the upper parts of Sirius and Procyon rise.
Hence we are known by our fidelity when our lineage is traced back, and we disassociate ourselves strongly from the one who acts treacherously.

We surpass in eminence all other people, just as pure gold is superior to silver.
We exercise royal power over all other peoples; we have the connections of nobility and power, after the two Tubba's.
We assumed royal power after Dāwūd (David) for a lengthy period, and we made the kings of East and West our slaves.[474]
We wrote down in Ẓafār the ancient writings of glory, so that the chiefs of the two towns (al-qaryatān, sc., Mecca and al-Ṭā'if)[475] might read them.
We are the ones who pursue every burden of revenge when the eloquent ones cry out, "Where, O where [is vengeance to be taken]?"
I shall quench my thirst of [the blood of] the treacherous ones, for treachery has entailed perdition for them and for me (i.e., through his brother's murder).
I obeyed them (i.e., in their evil counsels) and was not well guided; they were seducers into evil ways, who have destroyed my noble reputation and handsome qualities.

He related: Not long afterward, 'Amr b. Tubān died.[476]

Hishām b. Muḥammad related: This 'Amr b. Tubba' was called Mawthabān because he sprang upon (wathaba) his brother Ḥassān

474. The king and prophet Dāwūd/David (whose reign over the Children of Israel is given by al-Ṭabarī in I, 554–72 above, trans. W. M. Brinner, The History of al-Ṭabarī. III. The Children of Israel, 135–51) is presumably adduced here to connect the Tubba's with early prophetic history. For David in Islamic lore, see EI², s.v. Dāwūd (R. Paret).

475. The royal city and capital of the Ḥimyarites appears in South Arabian inscriptions as ẓfr, but was known as such to classical authors from the time of Pliny the Elder (his regia Sapphar) onward. Its ruinous site now lies to the southwest of Yarīm in southern Yemen. It remained of some significance into early Islamic times, and al-Hamdānī describes it both in his Iklīl, 25–29, trans. Faris, 20–26, and in his Ṣifat jazirat al-'Arab, 365, as one of the great fortresses of Yemen. See Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 60; Shahîd, "Byzantium and South Arabia," 29, 43–47; EI¹, s.v. Ẓafār (J. Tkatsch).

Mecca and al-Ṭā'if are usually taken as the referents of "the two towns" in the Qur'ānic passage that this echoes, XLIII, 30/31, speaking of a rajul min al-qaryatayn' 'aẓīm, "a man of the two towns, a respected one," but the context is somewhat obscure and the identification by no means certain. See for this question of the "two towns," Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 114–15.

476. This story appears in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 26–28 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 28–30, trans. 12–13. Cf. also idem, Kitāb al-tījān, 297–98.

at the gap of Nu'm and killed him.[477] He related: The "slope of Nu'm (furḍat Nu'm)" was the desert tract of Ṭawq b. Mālik; Nu'm was the concubine of the Tubba' Ḥassān b. As'ad.[478]

The narrative returns to that of Ibn Isḥāq.[479]

He related: The affairs of Ḥimyar fell into disorder at this point, and the people became split up. A man of Ḥimyar who did not stem from the royal house of Ḥimyar, called Lakhī'athah (?) Yanūf Dhū Shanātir, rose up against them, seized power over them, [918] killed the choicest men of Ḥimyar, and treated with scorn the ruling families of the kingdom.[480] Hence a certain man of Ḥimyar

---

477. Other Arabic sources give an alternative etymology for the cognomen Mawthabān: that rulers were thus called in the language of Ḥimyar because they "sat down" and did not engage in raiding and warfare. See Ibn Hishām, Kitāb al-tījān, 298–99 (with a brief version of the preceding story), and Nashwān al-Ḥimyarī, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns, 113. The confusion stems from the fact that in South Arabian, the prime signification of wṯb was, as in Hebrew, "to sit down," with mwṯb(n) thus meaning "seat, shrine of a god," as opposed to Classical Arabic wathaba "to rise, spring up," although another range of meanings for South Arabian wṯb does exist, "to attack, assault," to which the cognomen given here by al-Ṭabarī of Mawthabān could be attached. See Beeston et al., Sabaic Dictionary, 165–66; Biella, Dictionary of Old South Arabic, Sabaean Dialect, 153–54. The confusion that could arise out of the two opposing senses of the root forms the basis of favorite anecdotes in the sources in which a man dies or is killed through misunderstanding the South Arabian sense of the word. See al-Hamdānī, Iklīl, 32, trans. Faris, 28; Nashwān al-Ḥimyari, loc. cit.; Robin, in L'Arabie antique de Karib'īl à Mahomet. Nouvelles données sur l'histoire des Arabes grâce aux inscriptions, 108.

478. According to the geographers, the furḍat Nu'm lay in Jazīrah, in the tract of land along the Euphrates, where, so Yāqūt says, Ḥassān b. Tubba' had built a palace for this umm walad of his. See al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, IV, 1211; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 251.

479. Nöldeke's translation resumes here. He regarded the following material as still essentially legendary and fabulous, but considered that it was connected with such historical events as the persecution of the Christians of Yemen, the resultant Abyssinian occupation, and the eventual Persian conquest, hence as such worthy of translation; see his trans. 172 n. 4.

480. The episode of Lakhī'athah or Lakhnī'athah is somewhat mysterious. The name is variously written in the Arabic sources, e.g., Lakhnī'ah in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 19 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 30), but Nöldeke, trans. 173 n. 1, suggested the form Lakhī'athah on the basis of its form in the South Arabian inscriptions known at that time, in which Ynf is likewise attested. Professor Christian Robin has suggested (personal communication) that it is a corruption of a very common personal name Lḥy 't, often shortened to Lḥy't, which would mean "'Atht[ar] illuminates" (after Ge'ez laḥaya "to be shining, to gleam"); it would seem that ḥ was only feebly aspirated in Ḥimyaritic speech, since the name passed mentioned what was destroying the fabric of Ḥimyar, rending apart its unity and getting rid of its choicest men:

Ḥimyar is massacring its own sons and expelling its own princes, and creating humiliation for itself with its own hands.
Destroying its own worldly prosperity with light-headed fantasies of its own, but what it destroyed of its religion was even greater.
In the same way, earlier generations brought down evil on themselves, through their oppression and profligacy, and then perished.[481]

Lakhī'athah Yanūf Dhū Shanātir brought about all that for them. He was an evildoer, being allegedly a practitioner of sodomy. In addition to the killing and oppression he inflicted upon them, when he heard that a youth from the royal family had reached the age of puberty, he sent for him and ravished him in an upper chamber he had had constructed for this purpose, so that the youth could never rule after him (i.e., because of the dishonor). He would then go out from that upper chamber to his guards and those of his army who were present—these people being at a lower level—with a toothpick (siwāk) he had placed in his mouth,[482] into Classical Arabic as Lahī'ah.

---

Ma'dī Karib, probably the last of the Tubba's (al-Ṭabarī's "the royal house of Ḥimyar") is attested in inscriptions as ruling in 631 Ḥimyarite era/A.D. 521–22. We have therefore only a year or so for Lakhī'athah's inscription and the accession of Dhū Nuwās. One suggestion for resolving this tight chronology was put forward by Altheim and Stiehl, Die Araber in der Alten Welt, V/1, 377–78: that the title Ma'dī Karib Ya'fur was the throne-name assumed by the usurping Lakhī'athah, just as his successor Dhū Nuwās was to assume the throne-name of Yūsuf As'ar Yath'ar (see n. 488 below). But this suggestion does not seem to have found much favor. At all events, one can only treat the tale of Lakhī'athah's sodomitical proclivities as a pretext for his murder with caution.

Concerning Lakhī'athah's nickname or cognomen, Nashwān al-Ḥimyarī, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns, 58, says that shuntur means "finger" in the Ḥimyarī language. But when linked with dhū, one would more naturally expect a place-name; none like Shanātir is, however, so far attested.

481. As noted by Nöldeke, trans. 174 n. 1, the wording of the poem, with such words in it as ḍayya'at, ẓulm, isrāf, takhsaru, etc., is very reminiscent of Qur'ānic phraseology and concepts.

482. That is, a piece of wood with the end incised for use as a toothbrush. It has been suggested that the use by the Arabs of such a primitive toothbrush or tooth-that is, in order to let them know that he had acomplished his purpose with the youth. Then he would release the youth and go forth and appear before the guards and the people, having completely disgraced the youth.

At last it was the turn of the last of the youths from that line of kings, Zur'ah Dhū Nuwās b. Tubān As'ad Abī Karib b. Malkī Karib b. Zayd b. 'Amr Dhī al-Adh'ār the brother of Ḥassān.[483] Zur'ah had been only a small boy when his brother was killed, and had grown up into a fine and handsome youth, with an attractive appearance and intelligence. Lakhī'athah Yanūf Dhū Shanātir sent for him in order to do with him as was his wont with the princes of the royal house before him. When the messenger came to Zur'ah, he realized what Lakhī'athah intended to do, so he took a slim-bladed, sharp knife and placed it between his sandal and the sole of his [919] foot. Then he set out to Lakhī'athah with the latter's envoy. When Lakhī'athah was alone with Zur'ah in that upper chamber of his, he locked the door on the two of them and pounced upon Zur'ah. But Dhū Nuwās leaped on him first with the knife and stabbed him with it until he had killed him. Then he cut off his head and stuck it in the window niche of that upper chamber of Lakhī'athah's, from where he was accustomed to show himself to his guards and troops. He took that toothpick of Lakhī'athah's and stuck it in the latter's mouth, and went forth to the people. They said to him, "Dhū Nuwās—was it wetness or dryness?" He an-pick was influenced by the similar Persian religious custom, and that the Arabic term may stem from MP sawāk*, "scraper," from the verb sūdan, "to scrape, rub." See Shaked, "Some Iranian Themes in Islamic Literature," 149 and n. 35, citing Goldziher; *EI*², s.v. Miswāk (A. J. Wensinck).

---

483. Unlike Lakhī'athah, Dhū Nuwās is a fully historical figure, mentioned in Byzantine sources, e.g., in the Greek of the Martyrium Arethae as Dounaas. An Arabic etymology for his name is given in the Arabic sources, e.g., Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, *Aghānī*³, XXII, 318, and Nashwān al-Ḥimyarī, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns, 106, as "the man with the dangling forelock, long hair," but again is more likely to relate to a place name, or possibly to a deity. See on him further, nn. 486, 488, 506 below, and Nöldeke, trans. 174 n. 3, who also notes that Zur'ah is likewise a historically-attested name, since one of the local princes of Yemen who sent to the Prophet in autumn of the year 9/630 offering their acceptance of Islam, was Zur'ah Dhū Yazan, quite possibly a descendant of Dhū Nuwās; it was to him that Muḥammad sent a group of ṣadaqah collectors headed by Mu'ādh b. Jabal. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 955–57 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., IV, 235–36, tr. 642–44.

swered, "Ask n.kh.mās[484]—'s.t.r.ṭ.bān Dhū Nuwās—'s.t.r.ṭ.bān Dhū Nuwās—[he is] unharmed (lā ba's)." They went off to look when he called to them in these terms, and lo, there was the severed head of Lakhī'athah Yanūf Dhū Shanātir in the window niche, with his toothpick in his mouth, which Dhū Nuwās had jammed there! Ḥimyar and the guards went off after Dhū Nuwās until they caught up with him and told him, "The only fitting person to rule over us is yourself, since you have rid us of this abominable fellow." They therefore made him king, and Ḥimyar and the tribes of Yemen rallied round him.[485] He was the last of the kings of Ḥimyar. He became a convert to Judaism (tahawwada), and the Ḥimyarites followed him in this path. He adopted the name of Yūsuf (i.e., Joseph) and reigned for a considerable time.[486]

---

484. According to Ibn Hishām's gloss, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 20 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 31, tr. 14, n.khmās was a Ḥimyarī word for "head." The rest of this puzzling saying clearly has an obscene reference, as the word seemingly figuring in it—ist, "anus"—implies, explicit in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], xxii, 319.

485. This story comes also in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 19–20 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 30–31, tr. 13–14; idem, Kitāb al-tījān, 300–301; Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], xxii, 318–19.

486. The questions of the date of the appearance of Judaism in Yemen, the extent of that faith's spread from the ruler and nobles downward to the generality of the population, and the nature and quality of that Judaism, have excited much discussion.

There seems no reason to doubt the reports (al-Ṭabarī, I, 892, 902, 905, pp. 145, 165–66, 170–71 above: one of Ibn Isḥāq's informants for these seems to have been Abū Mālik b. Tha'labah b. Abī Mālik al-Quraẓī, whose grandfather had been a Jewish client of Kindah and who had migrated from Yemen to Yathrib; see M. Lecker, "Abū Mālik 'Abdallāh b. Sām of Kinda, a Jewish convert to Islam," 280–82) that Abū Karib As'ad accepted the Jewish faith in some form or other when he was at Yathrib in the first half of the fifth century and that the faith was already known at the Ḥimyarite court in the time of his father Malkī Karib, i.e., the end of the fourth century, when paganism was abandoned for monotheism. The implantation of a genuine Judaism there around that time would be parallel to the contemporaneous consolidation of the Christian community at Najrān, for which see n. 487 below. See Smith, "Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.," 462–63; J. Ryckmans, "Le Christianisme en Arabie du Sud préislamique," 417–19. 426–28, 447; Lecker, "The Conversion of Ḥimyar to Judaism and the Jewish Banū Hadl of Medina," 129–36.

There is epigraphic evidence for the existence of adherents of Judaism in Yemen proper during the later fifth century, in that the Bayt al-Ashwal I inscription was erected at Ẓafār by a man called Yhwd' Ykf/Yehūdā Yakkuf (for Yankuf), clearly a native South Arabian, who invokes "the Lord of Heaven and Earth" and "His

There were in Najrān remnants of people who adhered to the religion of ʿĪsā (Jesus), followers of the Gospel, virtuous and upright.[487] They had a head, of this same faith, called ʿAbdallāh b. al-Thāmir. The place where that faith originally took root was Najrān, which at that time was in the center of the land of the Arabs; people (s²ʿb) Israel" and who mentions the king Dhara' 'amar Ayman (II), who ruled in the later fourth century. See Müller, "Eine hebraeisch-sabaeische Bilinguis aus Bait al-Ašwal," 117–23; Robin, in L'Arabie antique de Karib'îl à Mahomet, 145–46. Judaism seems to have made rapid advances at the Ḥimyarite court, with three of the leading noble families, those of Hamdān, Yaz'an, and Haṣbaḥ, becoming converts. There was in the later fifth and early sixth centuries an important Jewish trading community on the island of Yotabē (not yet specifically located, but somewhere near the mouth of the Gulf of ʿAqabah; see Smith, "Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.," 428–29; Z. Rubin, "Byzantium and Southern Arabia—the Policy of Anastasius," 388–89), which was controlled by a local chief called Amorcesos and which probably served as a base for mercantile activities down the Red Sea as far as the shores of Yemen.

---

We cannot judge how far below the level of the royal family and that of the great nobles this adherence to Judaism may have penetrated; but more controversial is the nature and quality of the faith as implanted in South Arabia—was it recognizably Rabbinical Judaism or was it an aspect of the monotheistic faith "Raḥmānism," another aspect of which may have been the ascetic monotheism of the *ḥanīf*s during the period just before Muḥammad's call to prophethood? After ca. A.D. 450–60 the South Arabian inscriptions begin to give the "Lord of Heaven and Earth" the proper name of Raḥmānān, one equally used by the Christian monotheists and, in the early seventh century, by Muḥammad's rival among the Banū Ḥanīfah of al-Yamāma, Musaylimah. It does seem that, sixty or so years later, a ruler like Yūsuf As'ar Dhū Nuwās was an enthusiastic Jewish believer. Jacques Ryckmans stressed that the name Raḥmānān in South Arabia must have come originally from a Jewish milieu, almost certainly the Jewish communities of Medina and the settlements of the Wādī al-Qurā, since the term stems from the Aramaic Raḥmānā, frequent in the Babylonian Talmud and sporadically found in the Jerusalem one, while rare in Christian texts of the time. But he went on to suggest that Raḥmānān became generalized in South Arabian monotheistic usage, not least among Christians, via the Christian community in Najrān, by the end of the fifth century, since it appears in an inscription of the Christian king Sumu-yafa' Ašwa', installed by the Ethiopians after the death of Dhū Nuwās (see n. 518 below), for the first person of the Trinity. See Ryckmans, "Le Christianisme en Arabie du Sud préislamique," 436–40; Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 100–06; Beeston, "Judaism and Christianity in Pre-Islamic Yemen," 271–78; idem, "Himyarite Monotheism," 149–54; Rubin, op. cit., 387–88; Robin, in op. cit., 145–47; idem, in Supplément au dictionnaire de la Bible, s.v. Sheba. II, cols. 1115–16, 1190–92.

Concerning the length of Dhū Nuwās's reign, tradition gives him one of thirty-eight years, a vastly exaggerated number; see n. 488 below.

487. In Muslim eyes, Christianity had in general degenerated by the time of the Prophet's coming, leaving only "remnants" such as those mentioned here. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 177 n. 2.

Shahîd has propounded that Najrān at this time came definitely within the its people, like all the rest of the Arabs, were (originally) idol worshipers. At that point, a man called Faymiyūn, from the rem-

Arabic cultural and liguistic sector of the Arabian Peninsula rather than the Sabaean-Ḥimyarite one, on the basis of the Arabic names of the Martyrs of Najrān and the existence there in the sixth century of a school of Arabic poets; but this suggestion is rejected by such experts on South Arabian languages as W. W. Müller.

The advent of Christianity to Najrān was part of a general percolation of monotheistic religions, specifically Judaism and Christianity, into the Arabian Peninsula (for Judaism in western and southern Arabia, see n. 486 above, and for Judaism at Najrān specifically, where the community seems to have been an old, established one, see Lecker, "Judaism among Kinda and the Ridda of Kinda," 635–36). Already in the mid-fourth century, the king of Ḥimyar had received a diplomatic mission sent by the Byzantine emperor Constantius II (r. 337–61) under Theophilus "the Indian" (who was actually from the island of Socotra, the whole region of South Arabia and the Gulf of Aden shores being often referred to vaguely in Byzantine sources as "India"), an Arian in faith like his master, and the king had undertaken to build three churches within his dominions. Later in that same century, Abū Karib As'ad and others of his family adopted a monotheism that involved some form of Judaism (see n. 486 above). There may well have been some political factors at work here, since the Abyssinian kingdom of Axum was at this time adopting Christianity and the faith was also spreading among the Arabs of the northern and eastern fringes of the Peninsula. The Ḥimyarite rulers may have wished to counter a possible threat of intervention on religious grounds from outside—intervention which was, indeed, to materialize when the power of the Ḥimyarite monarchy went into decline in the early sixth century. J. Ryckmans opined that both Nestorianism and Monophysitism were represented within the Najrān Christian community, but that the former was likely to have been more favorably regarded by the Jewish or Judaizing Ḥimyarite kings of the eighty years or so before the Abyssinian intervention in favor of Monophysitism, and that the celebrated persecutions at Najrān were essentially of the Monophysites there, with the Nestorians merely looking on, if not actively encouraging the Himyarite rulers; see his "Le Christianisme en Arabie du Sud préislamique," 448, 450–52. Through Abyssinian enthusiasm for Monophysitism, and a distinct Byzantine preference for it over Nestorianism (see n. 511 below), Najrān itself became the focus in the sixth century for something like an Arabian national church, Monophysite in theology. From the time of the Byzantine emperor Anastasius I (r. 491–518), the Ḥimyarites had a bishop of their own, probably a Syrian and Monophysite in theology, called Silvanus, and we know the names of two Monophysite bishops, both named Paul, consecrated for Najrān itself around this time (see below). During the early Islamic period, despite the deportations of Christians from Najrān to Iraq by the second caliph 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, the faith was to survive there (as also in the island of Socotra, in the Gulf of Aden) into mediaeval Islamic times. The Nestorian Church in Iraq had contacts with Christians in southwestern Arabia for some three centuries after the advent of Islam: the Patriarch Timothy ordained a bishop for Yemen and Ṣan'ā' in ca. 800, and John IV answered questions from a priest "of the people of Yemen" in ca. 900. See Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, III, 230; Beaucamp and Robin, "Le Christianisme dans la péninsule arabique d'après l'épigraphie et l'archéologie," 56–57; *EI*², s.v. Nadjrān (Irfan Shahîd).

But before the consolidation of Christianity in Najrān under Byzantine and Abyssinian influence came about, the desire of the Ḥimyarite ruling strata to nants of the adherents of that faith had come among them; he summoned them to his religion and they adopted it.

Hishām related: [He was] Zur'ah Dhū Nuwās, but when he be-[920] came a convert to Judaism, he assumed the name of Yūsuf.[488] It

---

preserve their national identity and culture between the two powerful Christian realms of Byzantium and Abyssinia, had inevitably entailed a growing hostility toward the indigenous Monophysite Christian community, even if for political rather than strictly religious reasons. There was persecution under Sharaḥbi'īl Yakuf (known to have been reigning in 472), when we know from an Ethiopic hagiographical work that the missionary Azqīr (whose name Ryckmans linked, through deformed transcriptions, with the Yazdīn of a Persian romance centered round one of the Persian Christian martyrs; Beeston suggested a possible connection with Arabic al-Dhakīr "the famed, reputed one") was killed, possibly for proselytizing but certainly with some sort of Jewish involvement in the deed (see Ryckmans, op. cit., 441–43; Beeston, "The Martyrdom of Azqir," 5–10; Rubin, "Byzantium, and Southern Arabia—the Policy of Anastasius," 387–88); and Paul, the first bishop of Najrān, was martyred at the Ḥimyarite capital Ẓafār, stoned by the Jews there, at an unknown date before 521 but possibly before 504, as is known from the Syriac martyrological literature. Intervention by Abyssinia was not long in coming, and it seems that Yūsuf As'ar Dhū Nuwās's predecessor Ma'dī Karib Ya'fur was placed on the throne of Ḥimyar by the Abyssinians in late 518 or early 519, as part of a direct extension of Abyssinian influence into Yemen, involving even a permanent mission in Ẓafār, where (judging from their names) Abyssinian representatives built a palace for themselves during the reign of Ma'dī Karib Ya'fur's predecessor Marthad 'ilān Yanūf. The stage was thus set for the culmination of what had probably been a series of persecutions of the Christians of Najrān, the most notorious being that in the proto-nationalist, pro-Jewish reaction, which intensified under Yūsuf As'ar Dhū Nuwās; see the following note. On the vestiges Arabian Christianity has left in the epigraphy and archaeology of the peninsula, see Beaucamp and Robin, op. cit., 45–61; on the position of Christianity in the politics and diplomacy of southwestern Arabia at this time, Robin, "Le royaume ḥujride," 699–702; and on the faith there in general, the references in the following note.

Nöldeke, trans. 177 n. 3, thought that Faymiyūn was most likely a shortened form of Euphemion, so that this Greek name would point to a man coming from the Byzantine lands. But since his time there has been further investigation of the origins of this story of the introduction of Christianity to Najrān, in particular, by A. Moberg. Moberg traced the story of the Arabic sources, with its theme of the wandering ascetic from Syria, to Persian Christian romantic legends of Yazdīn-Pethion, involving the martydom in Persia in 447 of Pethion, whose name yielded the Arabic form Faymiyūn. See the discussion of his views in J. Ryckmans, op. cit., 441–42.

The story of 'Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir is given in al-Ṭabarī, I, 923–25, pp. 200–202 below.

488. The actual name of Dhū Nuwās (this being a nickname or cognomen, see n. 483 above), of the family of Yaz'an, emerges from an inscription dating from the month of Dhū Madhra'ān 633 of the Ḥimyarite era/June–July 523. His name is given in the inscription as Yusuf/Yūsuf (replacing Yanūf ?) As'ar Yath'ar, with the title "king of all the tribes, 's²'b^n," a much more modest one than the usual was he who had the trench (al-ukhdūd) dug out at Najrān and killed the Christians.[489]

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Mughīrah b. Abī Labīd, a freedman of al-Akhnas—Wahb b. Munabbih al-Yamānī,[490] who related to them that the grandiloquent ones of the Ḥimyarite kings, such as "king of Saba', Dhū Raydān, Ḥaḍramawt, and Yamanat, together with the Arabs of the Ṭawd and the Tihāmat" (see nn. 314, 417 above) and one which seems to reflect the fact that, as an usurper, his rule was illegitimate.

---

Dhū Nuwās replaced the last Tubba' ruler Ma'dī Karib Ya'fur between June 521 and June 522, and was defeated by the Abyssinians soon after Pentecost 525, killing himself shortly afterward (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 927–28, p. 207 below). Whatever the nature of his commitment to Judaism (see n. 486 above)—and Shahîd has suggested that he may well have started off as a Christian and as the designated successor of Ma'dī Karib (but see above)—he embarked in 523 on his campaign to eliminate the Abyssinians and the indigenous Christians of southwestern Arabia. The eight hundred-strong Abyssinian community in Ẓafār was put to death and the Abyssinian-held fortresses in Shamir taken. Tihāmah was conquered, and Najrān compelled to give hostages and to endure a blockade. Then in November of that same year 523, Najrān was attacked and occupied, its Christian population massacred, the churches burned down, and Greek and Abyssinian traders there killed. See R. Bell, The Origin of Islam in Its Christian Environment, 33–63; Smith, "Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.," 459–60; G. Ryckmans, "Le Christianisme en Arabie du Sud préislamique," 413–53; Altheim and Stiehl, Die Araber in der Alten Welt, V/1, 373–85; idem, Christentum am Roten Meer, I, 442–43; Shahîd, The Martyrs of Najrân. New Documents, 266–68; Trimingham, Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, 297–99; Müller, "Survey of the History of the Arabian Peninsula," 129; Robin, in op. cit., 151–52; EI², s.vv. Dhū Nuwās (M. R. Al-Assouad), Mathāmina (Chr. Robin); n. 506 below.

The chronology adopted here for these events, including the actual martyrdoms at Najrān and the happenings following on from them, is that put forward, after a very thorough sifting of the evidence (from Byzantine Greek and Syriac sources and from contemporary South Arabian inscriptions) by François de Blois, that the martyrdoms took place at the traditional date of 523 and not in 518, as argued by, e.g., Rubin and Shahîd. See de Blois, "The Date of the "Martyrs of Nagrān," 110–27.

489. Traditional Qur'ānic exegesis regarded the aṣḥāb al-ukhdūd, "companions of the trench," of LXXXV, 4–8, as being the Christian martyrs of Najrān, praised for their steadfastness in the face of immolation or, occasionally, connected with the three men in Nebuchadnezzar's fiery furnace of Daniel, iii. 13ff. Joseph Halévy, on his pioneer expedition into Yemen in 1869–70 sponsored by the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, found that the Najrān of that time was called Madīnat al-Khudūd (< Ukhdūd); see his "Rapport sur une mission archéologique dans le Yémen," 37–40. The connection with the martyrs of Najrān was upheld by older generations of Western scholars, e.g., Nöldeke, in his Geschichte des Qorāns, I, 97 n. 3, and (originally) Richard Bell in his The Origin of Islam in Its Christian Environment, 38, 68. But it is now generally recognized as being not a specifically historical reference but, rather, an eschatological one, the "companions of the trench" being unbelievers destined for Hell Fire because of what they had done to implantation of that religion (sc., Christianity) in Najrān arose from the fact that there was a man from the remnants of the followers of the faith of ʿĪsā b. Maryam called Faymiyūn,—a pious man, a zealous fighter for the faith and an ascetic, one whose prayers were answered by God.[491] He used to wander forth, staying in villages. As soon as he became known in one village (sc., as a holy man and wonder worker), he would leave it for another village where he was not known. He lived entirely off what his own hand gained; he was a builder, who worked with mud brick. He used to keep Sunday holy, and when this day came round would do no work but would go out into a desert place and pray and worship there until it was evening. He was once in one of the villages of Syria, performing those rites of his away from human gaze, when a local man called Ṣāliḥ realized what sort of an exalted religious state Faymiyūn had attained and felt a love for him such as he had never felt for anything previously.[492] He followed Faymiyūn around wherever he went, unperceived by Faymiyūn, until on one occasion Faymiyūn went forth into the desert on Sunday, as was his custom, followed by Ṣāliḥ, unbeknown to Faymiyūn. Ṣāliḥ sat down in a place where he could see the believers (v. 7). See Bell, ed. Bosworth and M. E. J. Richardson, A Commentary on the Qur'ān, II, 517; *EI*², s.v. Aṣḥāb al-ukhdūd (R. Paret).

---

490. The Tābiʿ or Successor Abū ʿAbdallāh Wahb b. Munabbih (b. ca. 34/654–55, d. 110/728 or 114/732) was one of the most knowledgeable of Umayyad period historians, especially regarding the "Stories of the Prophets" and regarding South Arabian lore, having been himself born, of Persian stock, at Dhimār to the north of Ṣanʿā'. He seems to have been able to draw on both Jewish and Christian traditions (in the latter case, notably for the story of the events here at Najrān); it is regrettable that his Kitāb al-mulūk al-mutawwajah min Ḥimyar wa-akhbārihim waqiṣaṣih wa-qubūrihim wa-ashʿārihimm is only known through later citations, including extensively in the first part of Ibn Hishām's Kitāb al-tāj, which depends heavily on Wahb. See Krenkow, "The Two Oldest Books on Arabic Folklore," 56ff.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 305–307; *EI*², s.v. Wahb b. Munabbih (R. G. Khoury).

491. Nöldeke, trans. 177 n. 3, regarded the following tale of Faymiyūn and Ṣāliḥ, and its sequel, the tale of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Thāmir, as nothing but pious legend, but Trimingham, Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, 294–95, thought that they should not be discounted as complete inventions but should be considered as reflections of later Islamic attempts to iluminate the background of the Prophet's life and to elucidate supposed Qurʾānic references to events in Najrān (but see on these references, n. 489 above).

492. The name Ṣāliḥ has connotations of "piety, God-fearingness," and also evokes the name of the Qurʾānic native Arabian prophet sent to warn Thamūd. As a personal name, it seems to be very rare in pre-Islamic usage. See *EI*², s.v. Ṣāliḥ (A. Rippin).

Faymiyūn, but in a place concealed from Faymiyūn, not wishing the latter to know where he was. Faymiyūn started praying, but while he was preoccupied with this, a tinnīn, a serpent with seven heads, slid up to him.[493] On seeing it, Faymiyūn called down a curse on it, and it died. Ṣāliḥ saw the tinnīn, but did not know what had happened to it, and feared for Faymiyūn's safety. Hence he was overcome with concern for him and cried out, "O Faymiyūn, a tinnīn has just come up to you!" But Faymiyūn paid no attention to him and kept on with his worship and prayers until he had completed them. Evening having come on, he returned, knowing that he had been recognized; Ṣāliḥ likewise knew that Faymiyūn had seen where he was. Ṣāliḥ addressed him, saying, "O Faymiyūn, God knows that I have never loved anything as much as I love you; I want to accompany you and be with you wherever you may go." Faymiyūn replied, "As you wish. You see what my work is, but if you believe that you are strong enough to undertake it yourself, well and good." Ṣāliḥ accordingly remained with him closely, but the people of the village were on the verge of discovering Faymiyūn's real nature. For when one of God's servants with some disease suddenly crossed his path, Faymiyūn prayed for him, and he was cured; but when he was summoned to a sick person, he refused to go. Now one of the people of that village had a son who had some affliction (ḍarīr),[494] and he asked about Faymiyūn's conduct. He was told that he never came when expressly summoned but that he was a man who did building work for people in return for his hire. So the man went along to that son of his, and put him in his room and threw a garment over him. Then he went to Faymiyūn and asked him, "O Faymiyūn, I want some building work done in my house, so come back with me and have a look at it, so that I can discuss conditions with you." Faymiyūn went back with him and entered the room. He next said, "What do you want done in your house?" The man replied, "So-and-so," and whisked away the garment from of the lad, saying, "O Faymiyūn, one of God's servants has been afflicted as you can see; so pray to God for him!" Faymiyūn exclaimed [921]

493. The tinnīn appears as a seven-headed dragon in Jewish Haggadic lore, taken over subsequently into the Islamic qiṣaṣ al-anbiyā' stories; see, e.g., W. M. Thackston Jr., The Tales of the Prophets of al-Kisa'i, Boston 1978, 201.

494. Thus in the context, rather than "blind."

when he saw the boy, "O God, Your enemy has entered into the sound health which You bestowed on one of your servants in order to destroy it, so cure him, restore him to health and protect him from the Devil!" The boy thereupon got up and was completely free of any defect.

Faymiyūn now realized that he was recognized, so departed from the village, with Ṣāliḥ accompanying him. On one occasion, he was walking somewhere in Syria and passed by a large tree. A man called down to him from the tree, saying, "Is that Faymiyūn?" The latter replied, "Yes." The man said, "I have been continuously awaiting you and have kept saying, 'When is he coming?' until I heard your voice and knew that you were its owner. Don't go away until you have prayed over my grave, for I am now at the point of death." He related: He did die at that moment, and Faymiyūn prayed over him and buried him.[495] Then [922] he departed, accompanied by Ṣāliḥ, until the two of them set foot in part of the land of the Arabs. But the Arabs swept down on them, and a caravan of some Arab group snatched them up, carried them off, and finally sold them in Najrān.

At that period, the people of Najrān followed the religion of the Arabs, worshiping a lofty date palm in their midst. Every year they had a festival, when they hung on that tree every fine garment they could find and also women's ornaments. Then they went forth and devoted themselves to worship of it for the whole day.[496] One of the nobles of Najrān purchased Faymiyūn, and another man purchased Ṣāliḥ. Now one night Faymiyūn stood up in a hut (bayt) his master had allotted to him, praying, when the whole hut

---

495. The man in the tree was presumably a dendrite, a tree-dwelling ascetic, with a way of life analogous to that of a stylite or pillar dweller.

496. The worship of sacred trees was a standard feature of ancient Semitic religion, attested among the Canaanites, Phoenicians, etc. In Arabia, as well as this date palm at Najrān, there was the acacia tree (samurah) at al-Nakhlah, between Mecca and al-Ṭā'if, embodiment of the goodess al-'Uzzā, and the great tree at Ḥunayn called dhāt anwāṭ "[tree] on which date baskets, etc., are hung," to which the people of pre-Islamic Mecca used to resort and bring gifts. See Robertson Smith, Lectures on the Religion of the Semites. First Series. The Fundamental Institutions, 185ff; J. Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidentums[2], 36, 104–105; H. Lammens, Le berceau de l'Islam, 7–72; Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 79–80; Fahd, Le panthéon de l'Arabie centrale à la veille de l'hégire, 31–32, 58. Nöldeke, trans. 181 n. 1, attributed the hanging of women's ornaments on the tree to the fact that the word for date palm, nakhlah, is of feminine gender in Arabic.

was filled with light as if from a lamp, until it was completely illuminated but without the presence of any lamp. Faymiyūn's master saw this, and the sight filled him with wonder. He asked Faymiyūn about his religion, and the latter told him about it. Faymiyūn explained to him: "You people are completely in error; this date palm can neither harm nor benefit, and if I were to invoke against it the One whom I worship, He would destroy it. He is God, the One, without any partner."[497] He related: His master told him, "Do that, and if you can bring that to pass, we will embrace your religion and abandon the one we used to hold." He related: Faymiyūn arose, purified himself, prayed two *rak'ah*s,[498] and then invoked God's curse on the date palm. God sent a wind that tore it up from its roots and cast it down. At that, the people of Najrān followed Faymiyūn and adopted his religion. He instructed them in the law (sharī'ah) of the faith of 'Īsā b. Maryam. But after that, various innovations (aḥdāth)[499] came into their faith, as into that of their coreligionists in every land. From this center, the Christianity of Najrān spread in the land of the Arabs—all this being the report of Wahb b. Munabbih concerning the people of Najrān.[500]

There related to us Ḥumayd—Salamah, who said: There related [923] to us Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Ziyād, a freedman of the Banū Hāshim—Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Qurazī.[501] He said: There related to us also Muḥammad b. Isḥāq from a man of the people of 497. Anticipating, in its Qur'ānic phraseology regarding God's unity, tawḥīd, Muḥammad's denunciation, in his later years at Mecca, of the "Daughters of Allāh," the three pagan goddesses worshiped by Quraysh, as having no spiritual efficacity, either positive or negative. See on this last episode, involving the so-called Satanic verses, Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 100–109.

498. Looking forward to the rak'ah, the act of bowing and bending, which forms part of the Muslim ṣalāt.

499 This seems to be the sense here of aḥdāth, rather than the general one of "events, happenings."

500. This tale, of no direct relevance to the drama of political and military events in South Arabia that swirled around such figures as Dhū Nuwās and Abrahah, is given in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 20–22 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 32–35, tr. 14–16.

501. Muḥammad b. Ka'b (d. 118/736), descended from the Medinan Jewish clan of Qurayẓah, was a Successor famed both as an early Qur'ān commentator and as a retailer of akhbār, historical traditions, and in this last utilized by Ibn Isḥāq. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 32.

Najrān: The people of Najrān were polytheists who worshiped idols. In one of their villages near Najrān—Najrān being the major urban center there, in which the people of that region used to come together—there was a sorcerer who used to teach magic to the Najrān youths. When Faymiyūn took up residence in Najrān (He related: They did not call him by the name which Wahb b. Munabbih gives him, but they simply said "a man took up residence there"), he put up a tent between Najrān and that village where the sorcerer lived. The people of Najrān began to send their boys to that sorcerer, who then taught them magic. Hence al-Thāmir sent his son ʿAbdallāh b. al-Thāmir, together with the other youths of the people of Najrān. When ʿAbdallāh b. al-Thāmir passed by the man in the tent, he was astonished by what he saw of the man's praying and acts of devotion, and began to sit with him and listen to him, until he surrendered himself to God (aslama), acknowledged God's unity, and worshiped Him. He set about asking the man about the Greatest Name (of God), but although the man knew it, he concealed it from him with the words, "O my nephew, you will not be able to bear it; I fear you are too weak for it."[502] He therefore refused to tell him. Meanwhile, al-Thāmir, the father of ʿAbdallāh, had no idea that his son ʿAbdallāh was not going along [regularly] to the sorcerer just as the other youths were doing. When ʿAbdallāh saw that his master had kept the knowledge [of God's Greatest Name] from him and was afraid for his weakness, he took a number of arrows and gathered them together.[503] Every name of God that he knew he wrote on an arrow, every name on a single arrow. When he had counted all the names,[504] he lit a fire for this special purpose and began to throw the arrows on it one by one, until he finally reached the arrow with the Greatest Name of God [on it]. He threw it on the fire, but it immediately sprang out completely undamaged. He went up to it and grasped it, and then went to his master and informed him [924] that he had now come to know the name his master had concealed from him. His master questioned him about it, and the youth replied that it was such-and-such. His master said, "How did you come to know it?" The boy told him how he had set about discovering it. He related: He then said, "O my nephew, you have got it correctly, but keep it to yourself—yet I don't think you actually will."

502. This is what became the Islamic equivalent of the Jewish name of God, the tetragrammaton yhwh, ha-shem ha-məfōrāsh, known only to the High Priest, who was only allowed to pronounce it once a year. In Islam, the secret name of God becomes a word of power, whose possessor can wreak with it mighty, supernatural deeds. See Nöldeke, trans. 183 n. 1.

503 Arrows were used for oracular and divinatory purposes in some sectors at least of ancient Semitic religion, as in Ezek. xxi. 21, where the king of Babylon consults his divining arrows. In Qur'ān, V, 4/3, al-istiqsām bi-al-azlām, "division [of a sacrificial offering] by means of arrows," which is said to have been practiced in the Kaʿbah of pre-Islamic times before the image of the god Hubal (see Ibn al-Kalbī, Kitāb al-aṣnām, 17, tr. Klinke-Rosenberger, 44 and 114–15 n. 256, tr. Faris 23–24; al-Ṭabarī, I, 1075–78), is denounced as a relic of paganism. See Fahd, La divination arabe, 181–82; *EI*², s.v. Istiḳsām (T. Fahd).

Thereafter, whenever 'Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir came to Najrān and met any sick person there he would invariably say, "O servant of God, will you confess the unity of God and adopt my religion, so that [if you do], I may invoke the blessing of God and He will cure you of your affliction?" The sick person would assent. 'Abdallāh would thereupon proclaim God's unity, submit himself to God, and pray to Him, so that the man was then healed. In the end, there was no sick or maimed person left in Najrān who did not come to him and then followed him in his faith; 'Abdallāh invoked God's blessing on the sick person and he was healed. Ultimately, the news of his activity reached the king of Najrān. He sent for 'Abdallāh and accused him: "You have corrupted the people of my town and have set yourself against my religion and that of my forefathers; I shall inflict exemplary punishment on you!" 'Abdallāh replied, "You have no power to do that." The king set about dispatching him to a high mountain, from whose summit he was hurled down; but he fell to the ground totally unhurt. Next, the king had him consigned to some waters at Najrān, [deep] stretches of water out of which nothing had ever emerged alive. He was thrown into them, but again came out unharmed.

Having thus triumphed over the king, 'Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir told him, "By God, you will never be able to kill me until you confess the unity of God and believe in my own system of belief; but if you do that, you will be given power over me and will be able to kill me." That king thereupon confessed the unity of God and bore witness to the creed of 'Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir. He then struck him with a staff he had in his hand, striking his head with a blow of only moderate violence, thereby killing him; but the king himself then dropped dead on the spot. The people of Najrān accepted the faith of 'Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir en masse, and henceforth held fast to the gospel and the law that Jesus son of Mary had [925] brought. Subsequently, they were affected by the events that also affected their coreligionists. This was the origin of Christianity at Najrān.[505]

504. A total formalized in later Muslim piety as the "Ninety-nine Most Beautiful Names" of God. See *EI*², s.v. al-Asmā' al-ḥusnā (L. Gardet).

Such is the report of Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Qurazī and another scholar of Najrān knowledgeable about that event; but God is the most knowledgeable [about all this].

He [i.e., Ibn Isḥāq] related: Dhū Nuwās marched against them with his forces of the Ḥimyarites and the tribes of Yemen. He gathered the people of Najrān together, and summoned them to the Jewish faith, offering them the choice between that and being killed. They chose being killed, so he dug out for them the trench (al-ukhdūd). He burnt some of them with fire, slew some violently with the sword, and mutilated them savagely until he had killed nearly twenty thousand of them.[506] Out of them there es-

505. There was pointed out to Halévy, at the ruins of the old town of Najrān, a mosque built at the tomb of 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāmir (sic), described to him as the first Muslim apostle to the district, although scholars in Najrān attributed the tomb to a saint of pre-Islamic times; see his "Rapport sur une mission archéologique dans le Yémen," 39–40. Today, there is a police post in the Wādī Najrān named Qaṣr 'Abdallāh b. Thāmir after the nearby supposed tomb of the walī of this name, see Beaucamp and Robin, "Le Christianisme dans la péninsule arabique d'après l'épigraphie et l'archéologie," 53–54 and n. 49.

506. Ibn Isḥāq has more detail here than Ibn al-Kalbī on the actual martyrdom of the Christians. Although the Syriac Book of the Himyarites, composed in the second quarter of the sixth century and therefore very close to the time in question, i.e., 523, mentions nothing about the Christians being put in a pit, the recently discovered Syriac "new" letter of Simeon of Bēth Arshām specifically says that two thousand Christians were immolated when their church was burned. See Shahîd's edition, translation, and study, The Martyrs of Najrân. New Documents.

Dhū Nuwās's policy here may not have been one that he conceived and pursued entirely of his own accord, in isolation from outside considerations, given the possible background of his conversion to some form of Judaism (see n. 486 above). That it was aimed at countering an extension of Christian Abyssinan influence in Yemen is clear, but Dhū Nuwās may have looked for support in another quarter of Arabia. M. J. Kister has suggested, with impressive documentation, that the caped only one man, called Daws Dhū Tha'labān, on one of his horses, who traveled through the sands until he threw his pursuers off.[507]

He related: I have heard a certain man from the people of Yemen say that the man who escaped from them was a man of Najrān called Jabbār (var. Ḥayyān) b. Fayḍ. He related: In my view, the more authentic of the two reports is that of the man who narrated to me that it was Daws Dhū Tha'labān.

Dhū Nuwās returned with his forces to Ṣan'ā' in the land of Yemen.[508] Concerning Dhū Nuwās and his troops, there narrated Lakhmid king of al-Ḥīrah al-Mundhir III (on whom see nn. 362, 409 above) exerted a measure of control across Najd as far as Medina, with the backing of his suzerains the Sāsānids, for whom an 'āmil collected taxes in Medina at this time; see his "Al-Ḥīra. Some Notes on Its Relations with Arabia," 144–49. From this possibility of an alliance between the pagan Lakhmid rulers with the Jewish tribes in Medina, who were still dominant over the local Arabs of the Yathrib oasis during the first half of the sixth century, Shahîd and Altheim and Stiehl have gone on to suggest that Dhū Nuwās, in his anti-Abyssinian and anti-Christian policies at Najrān and in Yemen, looked to al-Mundhir for at least moral and perhaps diplomatic backing, given the apparent connection of the later Ḥimyarite kings' Jewish tendencies or sympathies with Medina (cf. the tale, in al-Ṭabarī, I, 901–905, pp. 164–70 above, of Tubān As'ad Abū Karib's espousal of Judaism when passing through Medina, and also n. 486 above). Furthermore, Ḥamza al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 113, states that "Dhū Nuwās halted at Yathrib when once he was passing through, and was favorably impressed by the Jewish faith. Hence he adopted it for himself, and the Jews of Yathrib incited him to attack Najrān and to inflict trials and tribulations on the Christians there." Al-Mundhir, for his part, would have welcomed an opportunity to counteract Abyssinian power over southwestern Arabia. See Nöldeke, trans. 183 n. 1; Bell, The Origin of Islam in Its Christian Environment, 36–39; Altheim and Stiehl, Die Araber in der Alten Welt, V/1, 359–61; eidem, Christentum am Roten Meer, I, 440–41; Shahîd, The Martyrs of Najrân, 266–68; Trimingham, Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, 297; Rubin, "Byzantium and Southern Arabia—the Policy of Anastasius," 401–402.

---

However, by the time the Abyssinians appeared in Yemen in 525 in order to avenge the Martyrs of Najrān and the Abyssinians slain in southwestern Arabia, al-Mundhir was in no position to offer any military help, being hard pressed by his rivals of Kindah and being shortly afterward ejected, albeit temporarily, from his own capital al-Ḥīrah by the Kindī al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr (see n. 362 above).

507. Dhū Tha'labān was the name of one of the eight great noble families of Ḥimyar, influential either during the period of independent Ḥimyarite royal power or during that of Abyssinian and then Persian domination over southwestern Arabia that followed the extinction of the Ḥimyarite ruling dynasty, Tha'lab being apparently a tribal name. Epigraphic evidence does support the fact that the Dhū Tha'labān came from the Najrān area. See Nöldeke, trans. 186 n. 1; *EI*², s.v. al-Mathāmina (Chr. Robin).

508. Ṣan'ā' emerges into prominence only in the inscriptions of the third cento us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, who said: God sent down to His Messenger the words "Slain were the Men of the Trench, with the fire abounding in fuel," to His words ". . . and God, the Mighty, the Praiseworthy."[509] It is said that 'Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir, their leader and imām, was among those whom Dhū Nuwās killed, but it is also said that 'Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir was killed before that event, killed by a previous ruler. He was the founder of that faith [at Najrān], and Dhū Nuwās only slew adherents of 'Abdallāh's religion who came after him.

As for Hishām b. Muḥammad, he says that the royal power in [926] Yemen was handed down continuously, with no one venturing to contest it until the Abyssinians (al-Ḥabashah) seized control of their land in the time of Anūsharwān. He related: The reason for their conquest was that Dhū Nuwās the Ḥimyarite exercised royal power in Yemen at that time, and he was an adherent of the Jewish faith. There came to him a Jew called Daws from the people of Najrān, who told him that the people of Najrān had unjustly slain his two sons;[510] he now sought Dhū Nuwās's help against tury A.D., although it doubtless had a history before that time. It was a ḥgr/ḥajar or town in what was at that time the petty kingdom of Samay, which was seemingly linked in some sort of federal arrangement with Saba'. It was a military center, as the probable connection of its name with the Sabaean root ṣ.n.', "to fortify [a place]," indicates (al-Hamdānī, Ṣifat jazīrat al-'Arab, 81, states however that the town's ancient name was Azāl). Ṣan'ā' seems to have reached a peak of importance within the wider Sabaean state at this time, with one of its kings, Ilisharaḥ Yaḥḍab, named in Islamic sources (e.g., Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 210). As builder of the famous castle of Ghumdān (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 928, p. 209 and n. 520 below). After this, Ṣan'ā' suffered a temporary eclipse when power shifted to the Ḥimyarite dynasty of the Tubba's, with their capital at Ẓafār (see n. 475 above). Neither Ṣan'ā' nor Ghumdān figure in inscriptions dating from the fourth to the sixth centuries. The town does nevertheless seem to have had within it during pre-Islamic times a mḥrm/maḥram, a place to which access was prohibited or restricted, usually for religious or cultic reasons, and R. B. Serjeant suggested that the pre-Islamic hijrah or sacred area of Ṣan'ā' may have existed in parallel with the Ḥaram of Mecca. One can therefore easily comprehend that the profanation of the Christian church built at Ṣan'ā' by Abrahah (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 934, 943, pp. 217, 232–33 below) was a particularly heinous action if, as seems possible, the church was situated in the maḥram area. See Shahîd, "Byzantium and South Arabia," 81–83; Beeston, "Pre-Islamic Ṣan'ā'," 36–38; Serjeant, "Ṣan'ā' the 'Protected', Hijrah," 39–40; *EI*², s.v. Ṣan'ā' (G. R. Smith).

---

509. See n. 489 above.

510. Nöldeke thought that, given the deeply rooted hostility of Eastern Christians toward Jews, this incident was perfectly possible.

them. The people of Najrān were Christians. Dhū Nuwās was a fervent partisan of the Jewish faith, so he led an expedition against the people of Najrān, killing large numbers of them. A man from the people of Najrān fled and in due course came to the King of Abyssinia. He informed the king of what the Yemenis had committed and gave him a copy of the Gospels partly burned by the fire. The King of Abyssinia said to him: "I have plenty of men, but no ships [to transport them]; but I will write to Qayṣar [i.e., the Byzantine Emperor] asking him to send me ships for transporting the soldiers." Hence he wrote to Qayṣar about this matter, enclosing the [partly] burned copy of the Gospels, and Qayṣar dispatched a large number of ships.[511]

---

511. Refugees from Najrān and the other places in Yemen and Ḥaḍramawt where there had been persecutions (the Syriac Book of the Ḥimyarites mentions that these occurred in five towns, Ẓafār, Najrān, "the town of Ḥaḍramawt," Mārib, and [Ha]jjarēn; see Shahîd, "Byzantium in South Arabia," 38) probably managed to escape to Abyssinia and possibly to Byzantine territory at the head of the Red Sea. At all events, the news speedily reached the Christian kingdoms of Axum and Byzantium, and the sufferings of the Najrānites entered their martyrologies (the Ethiopian Church adopted into its calendar the commemoration of the samā'tāta Neğrān, "witnesses of Najrān," on 26 November; see H. M. Hyatt, The Church of Abyssinia, 32). The martyrdoms at Najrān involved essentially, as noted in n. 487 above, the local Monophysites, and the Church of Abyssinia was also Monophysite. Byzantium was Melkite, and persecuted Monophysites within the empire's boundaries, but southwestern Arabia was sufficiently far from the imperial heartlands for theological niceties not to count in the face of a Judaizing ruler and his persecution of Christians. Justin halted his own persection of the Monophysites within his dominions, and utilized the Monophysite Patriarch of Alexandria as his intermediary with the Abyssinian Najāshī or Negus in Axum.

Eventually, a fleet of some sixty merchant ships commandeered by the Byzantine authorities set out from Adulis, the port of Axum on what is now the Eritrean coast under the leadership of the king in Axum, Kālēb, who had the regnal name of Ĕlla Aṣbĕḥa (rendered by Procopius, The Persian War, I.xx.1–13, as Hellēsthaios for Hellesbaios; in a South Arabian inscription 'l'ṣbḥ). This was probably in the spring or summer of 525. Kālēb's activities as the restorer of Christianity in South Arabia were to earn him great renown within the church. After disposing of Dhū Nuwās, Ĕlla Aṣbĕḥa seems to have erected a victory inscription in Ge'ez, one which is unfortunately only fragmentarily legible, at Mārib. He very probably engaged in a campaign of revenge, slaughtering great numbers of Ḥimyarites and destroying their idols and temples. He certainly embarked upon an extensive program of church building in southwestern Arabia, details of which are given in the Greek—possibly with a Syriac Vorlage—hagiographical Vita Sancti Gregentii, whose extensive information here has been made the subject of a close study by Irfan Shahîd. See Nöldeke, trans. 188 n. 1; Smith, "Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.," 454–55; Murad Kamil, "An Ethiopian Inscription found at

The narrative returns to that of Ibn Isḥāq. There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm, who related that there was a man from the people of Najrān in the time of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb[512] who dug up one of the ruined sites of Najrān intending to utilize it, and found [the body of] 'Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir inside a hollow there that had become filled with sand (dafn, difn). He was in a sitting position, with his hand covering the wound from the blow to his head, holding it firmly with that hand. When his hand was lifted off, the wound began to flow with blood, but when his hand was released, he placed it back on the wound and the flow of blood ceased. On [the finger of] his hand was a seal ring, with the inscription "My lord is God." A report was sent to 'Umar telling him the story, and he wrote back to them: "Leave him [927] alone, and replace the grave that was over him," so they did that.[513]

When Daws Dhū Tha'labān threw off his pursuers in this manner, he pressed onward until he came to Qayṣar, the ruler of al-Rūm.[514] He requested his help against Dhū Nuwās and his troops, and told him what his people had suffered from them. Qayṣar replied, however, "Your land is distant from our own and too remote for us to be able to reach it with our own armies, but I will write on your behalf to the king of Abyssinia, for he is a Christian also. He is nearer than us to your land, hence can give you aid, protect you, and exact vengeance on your behalf from those who oppressed you and who violently shed the blood of you and your coreligionists."

Qayṣar sent back Daws with a letter to the king of Abyssinia in which was mentioned Daws's moral entitlement to help and what he and his coreligionists had endured, and Qayṣar commanded the king of Abyssinia to provide Daws with succor and the means for

---

Mareb," 56–57; Altheim and Stiehl, Die Araber in der Alten Welt, V/1, 385–91; eidem, Christentum am Roten Meer, I, 445–57; Shahîd, "Byzantium in South Arabia," 23–94.

512. That is, in the later 630s or early 640s.

513. This same story of the discovery of 'Abdallāh b. al-Thāmir's corpse is found in al-Hamdānī, Iklīl, 134–35, tr. 80–81.

514. Here the narrative returns to the account of Ibn al-Kalbī broken off by this parenthesis from Ibn Isḥāq.

him to exact vengeance for these who had treated him and his fellow Christians wrongfully.

When Daws Dhū Tha'labān presented Qayṣar's letter to the Najāshī,[515] ruler of Abyssinia, the latter sent a force with Daws of seventy thousand Abyssinian troops, appointing as commander over them one of their number, an Abyssinian called Aryāṭ (? Arethas).[516] He laid upon him the following charge: "If you secure the victory over (i.e., Dhū Nuwās and the Yemenis), kill a third of their menfolk, lay waste a third of their land, and capture and enslave a third of their women and children." Aryāṭ set out with his troops. Among these last was Abrahah al-Ashram ("the man with a cut-off nose tip").[517] He crossed the sea with Daws Dhū Tha'labān until they landed on the coast of Yemen. Dhū Nuwās heard of their approach, and he collected together at his side Ḥimyar and those tribes of Yemen owing him obedience, but there were many dissensions and divisions in their ranks on account of the approaching end of the period [appointed by God], the suffering of hardships, and the coming down of punishment. There ensued no real battle and Dhū Nuwās was only able to engage in a certain amount of skirmishing, and then his troops were put to flight and Aryāṭ overran the land with his forces. Hence when Dhū Nuwās saw what had befallen him and his supporters, he headed his horse toward the sea; he whipped it onward and it went into the sea, bearing him through the shallows until it carried him into the [928] deep water. He urged it onward into the open sea, and that was the last ever seen of him.[518]

---

515. An accurate rendering of Ethiopic Nāgāsī, "ruler, king," used also as a regnal title (and Anglicized as Negus). The Najāshī figures extensively in the Sīrah of the Prophet, in the first place in connection with the two hijrahs of the first Muslims from Mecca to Abyssinia. See *EI*², s.v. al-Nadjāshī (E. van Donzel).

516. The reading of this name is uncertain; the manuscripts have Aryāṭ and Arbāṭ, but other renderings are possible. See the detailed discussion of the evidence from parallel Greek sources in Nöldeke, trans. 190 n. 3.

517. Abrahah is the Arabic form of Ethiopic Abrĕha.

518. Dhū Nuwās seems in reality to have been killed by the Abyssinians in battle; this final touch about the mode of his death must be a romanticizing, South Arabian one, as remarked by Nöldeke, trans. 191 n. 2.

The events of the years immediately after Dhū Nuwās's death are somewhat obscure. De Blois has suggested that the Abyssinian invaders, having disposed of Dhū Nuwās, set up a puppet Christian king called Abraham (not to be confused with the subsequent Abrahah) and then withdrew the bulk of their troops back

Aryāṭ marched across Yemen with the Abyssinian army, killing a third of its menfolk, devastating a third of the countryside, and sending back to the Najāshī (the Negus) a third of the captured women and children. He remained there, imposing firm control over the land and reducing it to submission. A certain poet of the Yemenis has said, recalling how Daws Dhū Tha'labān had imposed upon them the yoke of the Abyssinians:

[Do not let anyone act] like Daws, and not like what he has fastened on his saddlebag [for us] (i.e., the yoke of the Abyssinians), that is, what he brought down on them in the shape of the Abyssinians; this has remained a proverbial saying in Yemen up to this day.

Dhū Jadan al-Ḥimyarī[519] recorded the following lines, mentioning Ḥimyar and the humiliations it now suffered after its former across the Bāb al-Mandab. But the Ethiopian hold in Yemen was clearly a precarious one, for within a short time, the anti-Abyssinian party in Yemen apparently got the upper hand once more, necessitating a second Abyssinian invasion at the end of 530 or the beginning of 531 on the pretext of Jewish persecution of the Christians there. This was once more successful. Procopius records the expedition, and his information is confirmed by the Ḥiṣn al-Ghurāb inscription (CIH 621) of 640 Ḥimyarite era/A.D. 530–31, in which a local potentate, the Christian Sumuyafa' Ašwa', records the killing of a local king of the Ḥimyarites and his own subordination to the Ḥbšt: This local potentate is Procopius's Esimiphaios, now appointed king of Yemen under Abyssinian suzerainty. In any event, Sumu-yafa' Ašwa' cannot long have reigned before the usurpation of the former slave Abrahah (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 930ff., pp. 212ff. below). All this implies that there were in fact three Abyssinian invasions of South Arabia within two decades: one ca. 518; a second one between 525 and 527, resulting in the overthrow of Dhū Nuwās and the setting-up of Abraham; and a third one at the end of 530 or beginning of 531 after Abraham's death and the temporary resurgence of the anti-Abyssinian party, resulting in the establishment of Esimphaios. See de Blois, "The Date of the 'Martyrs of Nagrān,'" 119–20. For other reconstructions of events at this time, see Smith, "Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.," 455–56; Altheim and Stiehl, Christentum am Roten Meer, I, 446–47; Robin, in Supplément au dictionnaire de la Bible, s.v Sheba. II, col. 1143; EI[2], s.v. Abraha (A. F. L. Beeston).

---

The story of the persecutions of Najrān and the Abyssinian invasion appears also in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 24–26 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 37–39, tr. 17–18; idem, Kitāb al-tījān, 301–02; Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XVII, 303–305.

519. This poet, much cited by al-Hamdānī in his Iklīl, appears in Nashwān al-Ḥimyarī, passim, as 'Alqamah Dhū Yazan and 'Alqamah b. Dhī Jadan. This name would connect him with Dhū Jadan, one of the eight leading noble families of Ḥimyar (see n. 507 above and n. 585 below), specifically from the Mārib region. See glory, and [recalling] the fortresses of Yemen Aryāṭ had destroyed, in addition to his devastation of the countryside, that is, Silḥīn, Baynūn, and Ghumdān, castles without parallel among mankind:[520]

Gently, [O woman!]. Tears cannot bring back what has gone by, and do not destroy yourself out of grief, recalling those who are dead.
After Baynūn, of which there is no visible trace and vestige, and after Silḥīn, shall men ever construct [such] buildings again?

Dhū Jadan al-Ḥimyarī further said in this connection:

Leave me alone [O woman], may you be deprived of your father!
You will not be able to deflect me from my resolve—may God heap shame on you, you have dried up my spittle!
When, to the music of singing girls, we became exhilarated by wine, and when we were given to drink the finest vintage, [that was indeed good].
Consuming wine is no shame for me, since my drinking companion does not reproach me at all for it.

---

al-Hamdānī, Iklīl, index s.v. (usually cited simply as "'Alqamah"); O. Löfgren, "'Alqama b. Dī Ǧadan und seine Dichtung nach der Iklīl-Auswahl in der Biblioteca Ambrosiana," 199–209; *EI*², s.v. al-Mathāmina (Chr. Robin).

520. These were former castles of pre-Islamic Yemen, and are mentioned as such by authors like al-Hamdānī in the eighth book of his Iklīl devoted to the castles and fortresses of South Arabia, and Nashwān al-Ḥimyarī. Silḥīn or Salḥīn, in South Arabian inscriptions slḥm, was the royal palace of the kings of Saba' at Mārib, the minting center for Sabaean coins and the building in South Arabia most frequently mentioned in the inscriptions. Ghumdān (ġndn, ġmdn) was originally the royal residence at Ṣan'ā' of the Dhū Gurat family, and is particularly frequently cited by the post-Islamic poets as an example of the transience of human achievement; in fact, although allegedly destroyed by the Abyssinian viceroy Abrahah or the Islamic caliph 'Uthmān, it was several times refortified in the early Islamic centuries. Baynūn is located by al-Hamdānī in the eastern part of the lands of the Banū 'Ans. See al-Hamdānī, Iklīl, 3–5, 12–21, 48–51, 54–57, tr. 8–9, 14–19, 36–38, 40; Nashwān al-Ḥimyarī, Die auf Südarabien bezüglichen Angaben Našwāns, 10, 50, 81; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 535–36, III, 235, IV, 215–16; Müller, "Ancient Castles Mentioned in the Eighth Volume of Al-Hamdānī's Iklīl and Evidence of Them in Pre-Islamic Inscription," 141–43, 145–47; Serjeant and R. Lewcock, "The Church (al-Qalīs) of Ṣan'ā' and Ghumdān Castle," 44; *EI*², s.v. Ghumdān (O. Löfgren).

No one can hold back the onslaught of death, even though he were to drink a healing remedy together with sniffing a perfumed medicament.
Nor can any monk in a cell (usṭuwān, literally, doorway, portico)[521] whose walls [are so lofty that they] abut on to [929] the nests (literally, "eggs") of the vulture.
Ghumdān, of which you have been told, and which they constructed with a high roof[522] on a mountain top,
With skilled carpenter's (or smith's) work, and its lower part of hewn stone and choicest damp and smooth clay.
Lamps filled with oil shine forth within it at eventide, like the gleaming of lightning flashes,
Its date palms are planted up against it, and the fresh dates almost bend the branches down to earth with their clusters.
Yet this once-new fortress has now become a pile of ashes, and the consuming flames have transformed its former beauty.
Dhū Nuwās gave himself over to impending death, and he warned his people of the afflictions that were to come upon them.[523]

Ibn Dhi'bah al-Thaqafī[524] recited, remembering Ḥimyar when the black troops swept down on it and what the Ḥimyarite people suffered from them:

By your life, there is no escape for a man when death and old age overtake him!
By your life, a man has no open space to which he can flee, nor indeed, any refuge!
What moralizing example can there be, after what came upon Ḥimyar's tribes one morning,[525]

---

521. For this word (< Greek stōa), see Dozy, Supplément, I, 22.

522. Reading, with al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, I, 87, musmak^{an} (= text, n. a).

523. As Nöldeke observed, trans. 194 n. 1, the poet seems to echo the implication of the prose accounts by Ibn al-Kalbī and Ibn Isḥāq, that Dhū Nuwās was inadequately supported by his own followers, hence willingly sought his own death.

524. Ibn Hishām's gloss in his Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 27 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 41, tr. 695, says that Dhi'bah was this poet's mother's name and that his own name was Rabī'ah b. 'Abd Yālīl b. Sālim . . . Nothing seems to be known about this poet of al-Ṭā'if.

525. One could alternatively translate, "Can there be anything after there came

Namely, a swift-moving gathering of warriors[526] and spearmen, [gleaming in the sun] like the heavens just after rain, With battle cries deafening the charging horses, and with their putting to flight the warriors with their stink,[527] Witches,[528] like the very grains of sand in number, who make the tender branches of trees dry up [at their approach].

As for Hishām b. Muḥammad, he asserts that when the ships sent by Qayṣar reached the Najāshī, the latter transported his army by means of them, and the troops landed on the coast of al-Mandab.[529] He related: When Dhū Nuwās heard of their approach, he wrote to the local princes (maqāwil)[530] summoning them to [930] provide him with military support and to unite in combating the invading army to repel it from their land. But they refused, saying, "Let each man fight for his own princedom (maqwalah) and re-upon Ḥimyar's tribes one morning a cause for bitter tears,," reading, with the Cairo edition, II, 127, dhāt al-'abar for the text's dhāt al-'ibar.

526. Following the emendation bi-alb^{in} ulūb^{in} of Addenda et corrigenda, p. DXCI, cf. Glossarium, p. CLXXXVII.

527. Following the bi-al-dhafar of text, n. e, as also in al-Azraqī and Ibn Hishām; the black Abyssinian warriors are depicted, as often in early Islamic writings on blacks, as stinking.

528. sa'ālā, sa'ālin, pl. of si'lāt, often regarded as the female counterpart of the ghūl, a malevolent, demonic being, hence with the characteristics of a succubus or sometimes as a sāḥirah or witch, enchantress. See G. van Vloten, "Dämonen, Geister und Zauber bei den altern Arabern. Mitteilungen aus Djâhitz' Kitâb al-haiwân," Part I, 179–80; Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidentums^{2}, 152; EI^{2}, s.v. Ghūl (D. B. Macdonald-Ch. Pellat).

529. That is, in the neighborhood of the Bāb al-Mandab, the straits connecting the Red Sea with the Gulf of Aden and the Arabian Sea. South Arabian inscriptions speak of mdbn and its s^{1}s^{1}lt or s^{1}s^{3}lt = silsilah (a chain across an inlet or harbor?) in connection with the events of this period. Al-Hamdāni mentions only the Bāb al-Mandab as a headland dangerous for seamen but locates a town of al-Mandab on or near the Tihāmah coast at an unidentified spot between Farasān and the territory of the Banū Majīd b. Ḥaydān; see his Ṣifat jazīrat al-'Arab, 67, 72, 205, 258, and cf. EI^{2}, s.v. Bāb al-Mandab (G. Rentz). Beeston, "The Chain of al-Mandab," 1–6, discussed the passages of the Arabic historians and al-Hamdānī, and the mentions in the Byzantine Greek Martyrion Aretha, regarding the chain of al-Mandab and the landing(s) of the Abyssinians (since the latter source speaks of two landings, at spots widely apart). He concluded that the reports of an actual chain are fully historical, and thought that its location was at the Khōr Ghurayrah, the inlet immediately behind the Cape of al-Mandab; see his map at p. 4.

530. Sing. miqwal, reflecting the mqwl of South Arabian inscriptions, with the sense "prince, minor ruler," or the residence of such a ruler, and cognate with qayl (on which see n. 473 above). See Beeston et al., Sabaic Dictionary, 110; Biella, Dictionary of Old South Arabic, Sabaean Dialect, 449.

gion." When Dhū Nuwās saw that, he had a large number of keys made, and then loaded them on to a troop of camels and set out until he came up with the [Abyssinian] host. He said: "These are the keys to the treasuries of Yemen, which I have brought to you. You can have the money and the land, but spare the menfolk and the women and children." The army's leader said, "I will write to the king," so he wrote to the Najāshī. The latter wrote back to the leader ordering him to take possession from the Yemenis of the treasuries. Dhū Nuwās accompanied them until, when he brought them into Ṣan'ā', he told the leader, "Dispatch trusted members of your troops to take possession of these treasuries." The leader divided up his trusted followers into detachments to go and take possession of the treasuries, handing over the keys to them. [Meanwhile,] Dhū Nuwās's letters had been sent to every region, containing the message "Slaughter every black bull within your land." Hence they massacred the Abyssinians so that none were left alive except for those who managed to escape.

The Najāshī heard what Dhū Nuwās had done and sent against him seventy thousand men under the command of two leaders, one of them being Abrahah al-Ashram. When they reached Ṣan'ā' and Dhū Nuwās realized that he had not the strength to withstand them, he rode off on his horse, came to the edge of the sea amd rushed headlong into it; this was the last ever seen of Dhū Nuwās.

Abrahah set himself up as ruler over Ṣan'ā' and its dependent districts (makhālīf),[531] but did not send any tribute or captured plunder back to the Najāshī. The latter was informed that Abrahah had thrown off his obedience and now considered himself an independent potentate. Hence the Najāshī sent against him an army commanded by one of his retainers called Aryāṭ. When Aryāṭ reached his camping place, Abrahah sent a message to him in these terms: "We are linked together by both the same homeland and the same faith, so we ought to look to the interests of our fellow countrymen and coreligionists who make up the troops who are with us respectively. So if you are agreeable, engage me in single combat, and whichever of us overcomes his opponent shall have the kingship, and the Abyssinians will not be killed because of our quarrel." Aryāṭ agreed to this, but Abrahah planned to act deceitfully with him. They appointed a place where the two of them were to meet [for the fight], but Abrahah placed in an ambush for Aryāṭ one of his slaves called '.r.n.j.d.h (?), in a depression [931] in the ground, near the spot where they were to fight. When they met together, Aryāṭ moved forward first and lunged at Abrahah with his spear; but the spear slipped from off Abrahah's head and sliced off the end of his nose, hence his nickname of al-Ashram. Then '.r.n.j.d.h rose out from the depression and lunged with his spear at Aryāṭ, piercing his body and killing him. Abrahah said to '.r.n.j.d.h, "Name your own reward!" The latter said, "I claim the right to sexual intercourse with every women of Yemen before her marriage with her husband." Abrahah replied, "I concede that to you." '.r.n.j.d.h continued to enforce this right[532] for a long period, until the people of Yemen rose up against him and killed him. Abrahah said, "The time has at last come for you to act as free men."[533]

531. For mikhlāf, see n. 462 above.

News of the killing of Aryāṭ reached the Najāshī, and he therefore swore that he would not rest in his mind until he had shed Abrahah's blood and overrun his land. News of the Najāshī's oath reached Abrahah, and he accordingly wrote back to him, "O king, Aryāṭ was merely your slave, and I am your slave also, He advanced against me with the intention of weakening your royal power and of slaughtering your troops. I asked him to stop fighting me until until I might send an envoy to you; if, then, you should order him to desist from attacking me, [all right,] but if not, I would hand over to him all my power and possessions. However, he refused to accept anything except to make war on me. I thus attacked him and gained the upper hand over him. Any power that I possess is yours, but I have heard that you have sworn not to stop until you shed my blood and overrun my land. Hence I have now forwarded to you a phial of my blood and a leather bag of soil from my territory. By means of these, you will be able to secure release from your oath. I ask for the completion of your favor upon me, O king, for I am merely your slave; any power and splendor which I have is your power and splendor." The Najāshī regarded him [once more] with favor, and confirmed him in his office.[534]

532. Reading, with Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCI, fa-ghabara for the text's fa-'abara.

533. That is, for them no longer to support the dishonoring of their womenfolk. On the military struggle beween Aryāṭ and Abrahah, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 943, p. 232 and n. 571 below.

The narrative returns to that of Ibn Isḥāq. He related: Aryāṭ remained in Yemen for several years in the course of that period of his rule. Then Abrahah the Abyssinian, who was one of his troops, [932] fought with him over the Abyssinian dominion in Yemen until the Abyssinians became split into two groups, with one faction joining up with each contender. Then one of them marched against the other. When the troops drew near and approached each other, Abrahah sent a message to Aryāṭ: "You will not wish to cause the Abyssinians to encounter each other in battle to the point that you destroy part of them, so come out against me and fight, and I will come out against you and fight, and whichever of us is able to smite his opponent, the latter's troops will come over and join the victor." Aryāṭ sent a reply: "You have proposed a just procedure, so come forth [against me]." Abrahah went forth; he was short, fleshy, and with a stout body, and held fast to the Christian faith. Aryāṭ marched out against him; he was a powerful, tall, and handsome man, and bore a spear in his hand. Behind Abrahah was a hillock that protected his rear, and concealed behind it was one of his slaves called 'Atwadah ('Atūdah). When the two contestants drew near to each other, Aryāṭ raised his spear and struck Abrahah's head with it, aiming at the top of his skull. But the spear-blow fell across Abrahah's forehead and split his eyebrow, eye, nose, and lip; for this reason, Abrahah was called al-Ashram. Abrahah's slave boy 'Atwadah sprang upon Aryāṭ from behind Abrahah and killed him. Aryāṭ's troops then went over to Abrahah, so that all the Abyssinians in Yemen rallied to his side. 'Atwadah said concerning the killing of Aryāṭ: "I am 'Atwadah—from a base stock—without a noble father or mother," meaning, "Abrahah's slave has killed you."

534. As described in n. 518 above, the invading Abyssinians set up in Yemen a ruler, Sumu-yafa' Ašwa', Procopius's Esimphaios, who was now subordinate to the Abyssinian king Ĕlla Aṣbĕḥa, Procopius's Hellesthaios. Abrahah, originally the slave of a Greek merchant in Adulis, led a revolt of malcontent Abyssinian troops against Sumu-yafa' in ca. 533, and replaced him as ruler in Yemen; subsequent expeditions sent in the next year or so by Ĕlla Aṣbĕḥa, which must be the ones led by Aryāṭ in al-Ṭabarī's account here, were unable to dislodge Abrahah. After the Abyssinian king's death in ca. 536, the fait accompli of Abrahah's dominion in South Arabia was recognized by Ĕlla Aṣbĕḥa's successors in Axum, but Abrahah would only agree to pay tribute to the Byzantine emperor Justinian I, as a remote suzerain unlikely to interfere in Yemeni affairs and trouble his untrammeled power there, rather than to the much closer Abyssinian king. In 657 Ḥimyarite era/A.D. 547–48, the celebrated inscription of Abrahah recording repairs to the Mārib dam mentions that he quelled a rebellion by a son of Sumu-yafa'. See Smith, "Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.," 459; Altheim and Stiehl, Christentum am Roten Meer, I, 449–51; Trimingham, Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, 300–301; *EI*², s.v. Abraha (A. F. L. Beeston).

The circumstantial detail in the accounts both of Ibn Isḥāq and Ibn al-Kalbī regarding Abrahah's dealings with Aryāṭ and 'Atwadah/'Atūdah must be legendary additions to the basic fact of Abrahah's assumption of power in Yemen. Al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 88, in his account of these events, has some additional touches, such as the fact that the Najāshī's residence was in arḍ Aksūm in the land of the Ḥabash. Even by early Islamic times, the name of Axum had virtually disappeared from Arab consciousness. It is mentioned in poetry written about Abrahah's "Expedition of the Elephant" against Mecca, with Abrahah called Abū Yaksūm, and 'Adī b. Zayd speaks of the āl Barbar wa-al-Yaksūm = the Abyssinians, but when al-Hamdānī and Nashwān b. Sa'īd mentioned it, it must have been a term from the remote past. See 'Adī b., Zayd, Dīwān, 47 no., 5; Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 39–40, 45 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 61, 70, tr. 29, 33. Nöldeke, trans. 198 n. 2, took Barbar as a place name, the ancient form of modern Berbera = the coasts of Somaliland and Eritrea in general, and the name Barbaria for this is certainly found in the Periplus of the Erythraean Sea.

He related: Al-Ashram at this point said to 'Atwadah, "Choose what you wish, O 'Atwadah . . .[535] even though you have killed him; we have only now the responsibility for paying Aryāṭ's blood money." 'Atwadah replied, "My choice is that I should have the [933] first opportunity for sexual intercourse with every bride from the people of Yemen before she enters the possession of her husband," and Abrahah granted him this. He then handed over the blood money for Aryāṭ. Everything Abrahah did was without the knowledge of the Najāshī, king of the Abyssinians.

When news of all that reached the latter, he became filled with rage and said, "He has attacked my own commander and killed him without any instruction from me!" He swore an oath that he would not leave Abrahah in power until he had overrun his land and cut off his forelock. When Abraham heard this, he shaved his head and filled a leather sack with the soil of Yemen, and then sent it to the Najāshī with the message: "O King, Aryāṭ was only your slave, and I am your slave too. We disputed about your command; both of us owed you obedience, but I was stronger in directing the affairs of the Abyssinians, firmer and more skillful in statesmanship regarding them. When I heard about the king's oath, I shaved my head completely, and I have dispatched to him a sack of the earth of Yemen in order that the king may put it under his feet and thus fulfill his oath." When this message reached the Najāshī, he showed Abrahah his favor [once more] and wrote back to him: "I confirm you in your office in the land of Yemen until such time as a further command of mine reaches you."

535. According to the editor of the Cairo text, II, 129 n. 4, something has dropped out here.

When Abrahah perceived that the Najāshī had shown him favor and had appointed him viceroy over the Abyssinian troops and the land of Yemen, he sent to Abū Murrah b. Dhī Yazan and took from him his wife Rayḥānah bt. ʿAlqamah b. Mālik b. Zayd b. Kahlān. The father of Rayḥānah was Dhū Jadan. Abū Murrah had a son by her, Maʿdī Karib b. Abī Murrah. She now had a son by Abrahah, after Abū Murrah, Masrūq b. Abrahah and a daughter by him, Basbāsah. Abū Murrah fled from him. Abrahah remained in Yemen, while his slave ʿAtwadah was for a long time exercising there the right Abrahah had conceded to him as ʿAtwadah's chosen reward; but then a man of Ḥimyar or of Khathʿam[536] attacked ʿAtwadah and killed him. When Abrahah received the news of his death—and Abrahah was a magnanimous, noble leader, piously [934] attached to his Christian religion[537]—he exclaimed, "The time is nigh for you, O people of Yemen, to have over you a man of solid judgment who is able to exercise the self-control appropriate to men of character. By God, if I had known, when I let ʿAtwadah choose his own reward, that he would ask what he did, I would never have allowed him the choice and would never have heaped favors on him in any way. I swear by God, there shall be no blood price exacted from you for his death, and you will not receive any untoward retribution from me for his death."[538]

536. Khathʿam b. Anmār were an Arab tribe of the Sarāt mountain region between al-Ṭāʾif and Najrān, i.e., the hinterland of the modern province of ʿAsīr, although the tribe is not mentioned as such in the South Arabian inscriptions (personal communication from Professor Chr. Robin). As al-Ṭabarī relates, I, 936–37, pp. 221–23 below, Abrahah is said to have marched into their territory en route for Mecca at the time of the "Expedition of the Elephant," defeated the Khathʿam, and compelled their chief to guide him along the road to Mecca as far as al-Ṭāʾif. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 234, I, 45, 345; *EI*², s.v. Khathʿam (G. Levi Della Vida).

537. As Nöldeke remarked, trans. 200 n. 3, such an encomium hardly squares with Abrahah's long tolerance of ʿAtwadah's behavior or with his own appropriation of Abū Murrah b. Dhī Yazan's wife.

He [Ibn Isḥāq] related: Abrahah now built the cathedral church (qalīs, qullays) at Ṣan'ā'—such a church as had never been constructed on earth in its time. He then wrote to the Najāshī, king of the Abyssinians: "O king, I have constructed for you a church whose like has never been built for any monarch before you. I shall not give up until I have diverted the Arab pilgrims to it."[539] When

538. Al-Ṭabarī has thus given two versions of Abrahah's rise to power and fame, those of Ibn al-Kalbī and of Ibn Isḥāq, the two accounts being substantially in agreement. But in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XVII, 304–307, a fuller form of what was given by al-Dīnawarī in his al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 62, there is a third account, in which Abrahah is a subordinate commander of 'Aryāṭ's, of low birth (lā bayta lahu), who kills Aryāṭ with a poisoned dagger. Abrahah's lowly birth may be the origin of Procopius's tale that Abrahah was originally a slave in Adulis. See Nöldeke, trans. 200 n. 4.

539. qalīs, qullays, via Syriac qəlēsā, from Greek ekklēsia. The site of this famous church is still shown in Ṣan'ā' as a large, shallow pit lined with courses of rubble masonry and called Ghurqat al-Qalīs/al-Qullays, and Serjeant and Lewcock saw no reason to doubt that this site, near the citadel, is indeed that of Abrahah's building, which had a west-east orientation like that of the Axumite churches of Abyssinia. Al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 88–90, citing information from "trustworthy Yemeni shaykhs at Ṣan'ā'," provides a highly detailed and plausible account of the structure, stating that building stone for it was taken from the "palace of Bilqīs" at Mārib, and giving copious measurements of its various features. He further mentions a dome at what would have been the east end of the church, and in this last were two ornamented beams of teak (sāj) called Ku'ayb al-Aḥ.w.zī (this latter component of the name said to mean al-Ḥurr, "the free one," "in their language") and his wife, respectively, which were considered as objects of superstitious reverence. Shahîd has plausibly suggested that the dome covered a martyrium or shrine and that the images of Ku'ayb, and his wife were originally those of saints and martyrs, very probably those of Najrān: Ku'ayb's name might be a reminscence of the Najrān martyr al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b and his wife could be the most celebrated women martyr of Najrān, Ruhaymah. Around the church was a large, open area to accommodate pilgrims and visitors, and corresponding to the Ḥaram around the Meccan Ka'bah. Al-Azraqī, op. cit., 91–92, further describes how the church continued in use by the Christian community of Ṣan'ā' (which may have persisted up to the fourth/tenth century or beyond) until the 'Abbāsid caliph al-Manṣūr ordered his governor in Yemen al-'Abbās b. al-Rabī' al-Ḥārithī to demolish it, a process that was accomplished but resented by the Ṣan'ānīs, both Christian and Muslim, because of their reverence for Ku'ayb and his wife. Hence Nöldeke's comment, trans. 201 n. 1, that Christianity put down only weak roots in Yemen and at the time of the coming of Islam to the province had left hardly any trace, is clearly wrong. See Bell, The Origin of Islam in Its Christian Environment, 39–41;

the Arabs fell to talking about Abrahah's letter to the Najāshī, one of the men charged with intercalating the calendar (al-nasa'ah) flew into a rage. He was one of the Banū Fuqaym, part of the larger tribal group of the Banū Mālik.[540] He set out until he came to the cathedral church and then defecated (qa'ada) in it, and then departed and reached his own land. Abrahah was informed about the incident and demanded, "Who perpetrated this deed?" They told him, "A man from that House at Mecca, to which the Arabs make pilgrimage, did it, because he had heard your words 'I shall divert the Arab pilgrims to it (i.e., the new cathedral).' He became enraged, came here, and defecated in it, aiming to show that it was not worthy of that purpose." Abrahah himself became full of ire and swore that he would march against the House and demolish it.[541]

Now Abrahah had in his retinue some men of the Arabs who had come to him seeking his bounty, including Muḥammad b. Khuzā'ī b. Ḥuzābah of the Banū Dhakwān and then of the larger tribal group of the Banū Sulaym,[542] together with a group of his

---

Trimingham, Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, 304; Shahîd, "Byzantium in South Arabia," 81–83; Serjeant and Lewcock, "The Church (al-Qalīs) of Ṣan'ā' and Ghumdān Castle," 44–48; Robin, in Supplément au dictionnaire de la Bible, s.v. Sheba. II, cols. 1192–93.

540. The Fuqaym b. 'Adī were a branch of Mālik of Kinānah, a Ḥijāzī tribe who dwelt in the vicinity of Mecca and from whom sprang Quṣayy, founder of Quraysh's fortunes in Mecca. They were said to have been entrusted, in pre-Islamic times, with the periodic intercalation of an extra month in the lunar calendar in order to make the Ḥajj or Pilgrimage coincide with the fairs and markets that accompanied it. If it had been true that Abrahah had planned to build up Ṣan'ā' into a pilgrimage center rivaling Mecca, the Banū Fuqaym's function as nasa'ah or intercalators would have become otiose. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 30 = ed. Saqqā et al., I, 44–47, tr. 21–22; Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, Kitāb al-muḥabbar, 156–57; Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I,. Table 47, II, 6, 247; al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 125; *EI*², s.v. Kināna (W. M. Watt), Nasī' (A. Moberg).

541. The Arabic sources have differing information on the location of Abrahah's church (Ṣan'ā', Najrān, or a place on the seashore) and on the person(s) desecrating it (Nufayl b. Ḥabīb al-Khath'amī, a man or men from Kinānah, etc.), but all of them point to Quraysh of Mecca being the real instigators of the desecration or burning of the church, Kinānah being of course closely connected with Quraysh. See Kister, "Some Reports Concerning Mecca. From Jāhiliyya to Islam," 63–65 (utilizing information from Ps.-al-Aṣma'ī, Nihāyat al-arab fī akhbār al-Furs wa-al-'Arab; see on this work n. 624 below).

542. Dhakwān b. Tha'labah were one of the three great subdivisions of the fellow tribesmen, including his brother, Qays b. Khuzā'ī. While they were at Abrahah's court, there came round unexpectedly for them one of Abrahah's festivals. He sent along to them on that [935] feast day some of his morning meal. Abrahah used to eat [animals'] testicles. When Abrahah's food was brought to them, they protested, "By God, if we eat this the Arabs will never stop blaming us for it as long as we live![543] Muḥammad b. Khuzā'ī arose and went to Abrahah, saying, "O king, today is our festival when we eat only the flank and forelegs [of beasts]." Abrahah replied, "We will send you what you like; I was only showing honor to you with food from my morning meal because of your high status in my eyes." He then crowned Muḥammad b. Khuzā'ī and appointed him governor over Muḍar. He further commanded him to go out among the [Arab] people and summon them to make pilgrimage to the cathedral, the church he had built. So Muḥammad b. Khuzā'ī went off until he reached a spot in the territory of the Banū Kinānah. Meanwhile, the people of Tihāmah[544] had received information about Muḥammad's mission and what he was aiming to do, so they dispatched against him a man of Hudhayl called powerful North Arab tribe of Sulaym b. Manṣūr, whose territories in Ḥijāz lay between Mecca and Medina, but bordered closely on Mecca; in both the pre-Islamic and the post-Islamic periods, Dhakwān were the closest Sulamī allies of the Meccans, intermarrying with some of the leading clans of Quraysh, including Umayya. Muḥammad b. Khuzā'ī b. 'Alqama b. Ḥuzābah, who is said here to have been appointed chief over the tribes of Muḍar for Abrahah and who, according to Ibn Sa'd, was actually crowned by Abrahah, has a certain fame through being one of the few people who bore the name Muḥammad in the Jāhiliyyah. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 125, II, 18–19, 235, 517; Muḥammad b. al-Ḥabīb, Kitāb al-muḥabbar, 130; idem, Kitāb al-munammaq, 68–72; M. J. Kister, "Some Reports Concerning Mecca. From Jāhiliyya to Islam," 72; Lecker, The Banū Sulaym. A Contribution to the Study of Early Islam, 91–98, 108–19; EI², s.v. Sulaym (Lecker).

---

543. The Arabs are reported to have been repelled by certain of the customs and food practices of the Abyssinians; cf. the poet of Hudhayl's revulsion from his Abyssinian wife cited by Nöldeke, trans. 203 n. 2. But it seems strange that the Arabs of that time should have objected to eating animals' testicles when, at the present day, they are eaten as a delicacy all over the Middle East.

544. That is, the lowland strip along the Red Sea shores, running the length of what was in later times the provinces of Ḥijāz, 'Asīr and Yemen. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 63–64; EI², s.v. Tihāma (G. R. Smith; and for its pre-Islamic history, Robin, "La Tihāma yéménite avant l'Islam: Notes d'histoire et de géographie historique," 222–33.

'Urwah b. Ḥayyāḍ al-Milāṣī[545] who shot Muḥammad with an arrow and killed him. Muḥammad's brother Qays was with him, and when Muḥammad was killed, he fled and went to Abrahah, informing him of Muḥammad's death. This sent Abrahah into an even greater rage and fury, and he swore that he would lead an expedition against the Banū Kinānah and tear down the House [at Mecca].[546]

Hishām b. Muḥammad related, however, as follows: After the Najāshī had restored Abrahah to favor and had confirmed him in his charge, the latter built the church at Ṣan'ā'. He made it a marvelous building, whose like had never been seen before, using gold and remarkable dyestuffs and stains. He wrote to Qayṣar

545. The Milāṣ b. Ṣāhilah were a subdivision of Hudhayl. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 58, II, 407.

546. Abrahah's appointment of Muḥammad b. Khuzā'ī and then his invasion of Ḥijāz, which later Meccan lore may have transformed into the "Expedition of the Elephant," seems to have been part of a far-reaching policy of extending Abrahah's dominion into central and even northern Arabia, confronting there Persia and its allies, through alliances with and favors to the Bedouin tribes of those regions. This was clearly the case with the expedition which he led into central Arabia in ca. 552, which included contingents from Kindah and Ma'add and which defeated the Lakhmid al-Mundhir III at Ḥulubān or Ḥalabān (see n. 409 above). The poet of al-Ṭā'if, Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt, an older contemporary of the Prophet Muḥammad, speaks of "kings of Kindah, heroic warriors, fierce in battle, falcons" around Abrahah's elephant in the expedition of that name (Sharḥ dīwān Umayyah, ed. Sayf al-Dīn al-Kātib and Aḥmad 'Iṣām al-Kātib, 65; Bahjah 'Abd al-Ghafūr al-Ḥadīthī, Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt, ḥayātuhu wa-shi'ruhu, 337–38 no. 154; Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 40 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 62, tr. 30). Procopius states that the Byzantine emperor tried to bring together in an alliance "Qays," specified in a parallel source as "the prince of Kindah and Ma'add," with the viceroy of the Abyssinians (cited by Nöldeke, trans. 204 n. 2).

It is clear that Abrahah's expedition to Mecca, whatever its place in the history and chronology of events at that time (see regarding this, n. 563 below), contained substantial bodies of Arab tribesmen as well as a core of Abyssinian troops, even though the account of Ibn Isḥāq, in al-Ṭabarī, I, 936, p. 222 below, speaks—for obvious reasons of Arab-Islamic national pride—of the attackers as being wholly Abyssinians and of the Arabs as solidly united against them in defense of the Holy House in Mecca. Abrahah received a welcome in al-Ṭā'if and assistance to find his way to Mecca (al-Ṭabarī, I, 937, p. 223 below), and varying traditions on the expedition speak of participation in Abrahah's army by South Arab tribes like 'Akk, Ash'ar, Khath'am, Balḥārith, and Khawlān, and by North Arab tribes like Sulaym of Muḍar. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb in his Munammaq, 70, refers to the incident of the Muḍarī troops recoiling from eating animals' testicles and implies that the food habits of North and South Arabs were different. See Kister, "Some Reports Concerning Mecca. From Jāhiliya to Islam," 67–73.

telling him that he intended to build a church at Ṣan'ā' whose traces and whose fame would last forever and asked for the emperor's aid in this. Qayṣar accordingly sent back to him skilled artisans, mosaic cubes, and marble.[547] When the building was completed, Abrahah wrote to the Najāshī that he planned to divert to it the pilgrims of the Arabs. When the Arabs heard that, they [936] regarded it with perturbation and it assumed momentous proportions in their eyes. A man from the Banū Mālik b. Kinānah went off until he reached Yemen, entered the temple, and defecated in it. Abrahah's wrath was aroused, and he resolved to lead an expedition against Mecca and to raze the House to the ground. He set off with the Abyssinian army, including the elephant.[548] Dhū Nafar al-Ḥimyarī encountered him in battle. Abrahah fought with him and captured him. Dhū Nafar pleaded, "O king, I am nothing but your slave, so spare me, for keeping me alive will be more useful to you than killing me"; so he spared him. Abrahah marched onward. Nufayl b. Ḥabīb al-Khath'amī opposed him, but Abrahah engaged him in battle, putting his supporters to flight and capturing him. Nufayl asked Abrahah to spare him; Abrahah agreed, and made him his guide in the land of the Arabs.

547. This seems perfectly feasible, given that, in early Islamic times, the Umayyad caliph al-Walīd I asked the Byzantine emperor (presumably Justinian II) to send skilled artisans and mosaic cubes (al-fusayfisā', from Greek psēphos, the word used here in al-Ṭabarī's text) for the decoration of the Umayyad Mosque at Damascus and the Prophet's Mosque at Medina. See H. A. R. Gibb, "Arab-Byzantine Relations under the Umayyad Caliphate," 51–56. As mentioned in n. 539 above, we have highly detailed descriptions of the interior decoration of Abrahah's church, which included a lavish use of tropical hardwoods, gold, silver, mosaic cubes, jewels, etc., in both the portico (aywān) of the church and the part of the basilica beneath the dome (qubbah). It is improbable that all this could have been achieved without outside assistance. The completed building must indeed have seemed like a wonder of the world, and explains the attachment of the local people, both Christian and Muslim, to it (see n. 539 above). As well as the account by al-Azraqī referred to in the above-mentioned note, see also the account of the church by the thirteenth-century Egyptian Coptic author Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Armanī (one which may possibly have been influenced by the author's knowledge of Egyptian church interiors), The Churches and Monasteries of Egypt, trans. B. J. A. Evetts, 300–302; Serjeant and Lewcock, "The Church (al-Qalīs) of Ṣan'ā' and Ghumdān Castle," 47.

548. Nöldeke, trans. 206 n. 1, cites the Byzantine historian John Malalas that the Abyssinian king rode one of the four elephants pulling the royal coach or cart. Whether Abrahah actually rode on the elephant here is not explicit.

The narrative returns to the account of Ibn Isḥāq. He said: When Abrahah decided on an expedition against the House [at Mecca], he ordered the Abyssinians to prepare for the campaign and put themselves in a state of readiness, and he set out with the army and with the elephant. He related: The Arabs heard about this; they found the news alarming and were filled with fear at it. They regarded fighting in defense of the Ka'bah, God's Holy House, as a duty laid upon them when they heard of Abrahah's intention to tear it down. A man who was one of the nobles of the Yemenis called Dhū Nafar rose up against him and summoned his people, and those of the Arabs who responded to his call, to make war on Abrahah and oppose him strenuously in defense of God's House and in the face of Abrahah's intention of demolishing and reducing it to a pile of ruins. A certain number rallied to his side. He confronted Abrahah, but Abrahah attacked him, and Dhū Nafar and his followers were put to flight. He himself was taken prisoner and brought before Abrahah. The latter was on the point of killing him when Dhū Nafar said to him: "O king, don't put me to death, for it may be that my presence at your side could be more advantageous for you than killing me." Abrahah therefore desisted from killing him, but kept him in captivity by him, loaded with fetters; Abrahah was a magnanimous man.

After this, Abrahah continued onward in accordance with his plan, intending to do what he had set out to do, until when he reached the territory of the Khath'am, he was opposed by Nufayl [937] b. Ḥabīb al-Khath'amī with a force from the two component tribes of Khath'am, Shahrān, and Nāhis,[549] and others from the tribes of the Arabs who followed him. He attacked Abrahah, but the latter routed him. He was taken prisoner and brought before Abrahah. Abrahah intended to put Nufayl to death, but he pleaded with him: "O king, don't kill me, for I will act as your guide through the land of the Arabs; these two hands of mine are your sureties for the obedience and good behavior of the two tribes of Khath'am, Shahrān, and Nāhis." Hence Abrahah spared him and released him. Abrahah went forth with Nufayl, the latter acting as his guide along the road until they reached al-Ṭā'if.[550] Mas'ūd b. Mu'attib came out with the men of Thaqīf,[551] and addressed Abrahah: "O king, we are your servants, obedient and submissive to you, and you will not find us offering any resistance to you. This house of ours (they meant [the house of] Allāt) is not the House which you seek. You want the House which is at Mecca (they meant the Ka'bah), and we will send a man with you who will guide you." He therefore passed them over and did not molest them.

549. In the genealogy of Khath'am, these two subdivisions were the descendants of two of the great-grandsons of Khath'am b. Anmār; the name of Shahrān survives today. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 124–25, II, 345.

They sent with him Abū Righāl [as guide], and Abrahah departed, accompanied by Abū Righāl, until the latter brought him as far as al-Mughammis. As soon as he had conducted Abrahah thither, Abū Righāl died at that very place. The Arabs subsequently hurled stones at his grave; it is this grave at which people hurl stones at al-Mughammis [today].[552] When Abrahah en-

550. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, Munammaq, 68, says that Abrahah gathered together a force, "a motley crew of the evildoers of the Arabs" (fussāq al-'Arab wa-ṭakhārīrihim), mainly from Khath'am and the Banū Munabbih b. Ka'b b. al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b, said to have been traditionally hostile to the Ka'bah, and all under Nufayl's leadership. This author, at least, does concede that, pace Ibn Isḥāq (see n. 546 above) Arabs were included in Abrahah's army.

551. As Mas'ūd b. Mu'attib says here, the shrine of the pre-Islamic goddess Allāt was located at al-Ṭā'if, and the popularity of its cult made it a considerable rival to that of Allāh in the Ka'bah of Mecca during pre-Islamic times, until the shrine was despoiled and destroyed at the surrender of al-Ṭā'if in 8/630.

'Urwah b. Mas'ūd was one of the leaders of the Aḥlāf group of Thaqīf during the time of the Prophet's career; Aḥlāf were more inclined toward conciliation with the Prophet than the other group of Thaqīf, the Banū Mālik. 'Urwah was in fact assassinated on his return from the Prophet's side in Medina, allegedly having become a secret Muslim working for the surrender of his town to the Muslims; he thereby earned the Islamic designations of shahīd, "martyr," and of ṣaḥābī, Companion of the Prophet. See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 102–04; EI², s.v. 'Urwa b. Mas'ūd (C. E. Bosworth).

552. Abū Righāl is at best a semilegendary figure, the story of whose guiding Abrahah to Mecca may have been elaborated as part of the anti-Thaqafī bias of pietistic Muslim circles hostile to the role of prominent men of al-Ṭā'if within the Umayyad caliphate like 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Abīhi and al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. However, the practice of stoning Abū Righāl's alleged burial place must have developed early, as attested to by mention of it in a verse of the Umayyad poet Jarīr (d. 110/728–29 or shortly thereafter) cited by al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 93. Al-Mughammis or al-Mughammas was a valley just off the Mecca to al-Ṭā'if road on the edge of the Ḥaram of Mecca. See al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, III, 1248; Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 161–62; EI², s.vv. Abū Righāl (S. A. Bonebakker) and al-Mughammas camped at al-Mughammis, he sent forward one of the Abyssinians called al-Aswad b. Maqṣūd (or Mafṣūd) with a troop of cavalry until al-Aswad reached Mecca, from where he sent back to Abrahah captured beasts taken from the people of Mecca, Quraysh, and others. Among these, Abrahah acquired two hundred camels belonging to 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim, at that time the paramount chief and lord of Quraysh.[553] Quraysh, Kinānah, Hudhayl, and all the rest of the people who dwelled in the Holy Enclosure (al-Ḥaram) contemplated giving fight to Abrahah's forces, but then realized that they lacked the power to resist him, so renounced the idea.

[938] Abrahah sent Ḥunāṭah al-Ḥimyarī to Mecca and instructed him: "Ask who is the lord and noble leader of this territory, and then inform him that the king tells them, 'I have not come to make war on you, but have merely come to destroy the House. If you do not wish to defend it by force of arms, then there will be no need for us to shed your blood; and if he (i.e., 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib) does not intend to oppose us by fighting, then bring him back to me.'" Now when Ḥunāṭah entered Mecca, he asked who was the lord and noble leader of Quraysh, and was told that this was 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf b. Quṣayy; so he went to him and delivered the message Abrahah had commanded him to communicate. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib replied, "By God, we don't want to fight with him, for we have no power to do so. But this is the Holy House of God and the House of His friend Ibrāhīm (Abraham)," or words to that effect, "and if He defends it against him, well, it is

---

(ed.). The custom of stoning Abū Righāl's grave bears an obvious resemblance to the ritual stoning of Satan at Minā in the course of the Pilgrimage ceremonies. See *EI*², s.v. Djamra (F. Buhl-J. Jomier).

Nöldeke, trans. 208 n. 1, citing the anthology al-Kāmil of al-Mubarrad, noted that in post-Islamic times Hudhayl were still reviled for having guided the Abyssinians against the Ka'bah, but he considered this to be really an echo of the alleged role of Hudhalīs in guiding Tubba' Tubān As'ad Abū Karib against the Ka'bah, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 903–904, pp. 168–69 above.

553. The importance of the figure of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, great-grandson of Quṣayy and grandfather of the Prophet, has doubtless been inflated by Islamic tradition. At the time of Abrahah, he was clan chief of Hāshim and probably the de facto leader of a group of Meccan clans who tried to negotiate with Abrahah if only to gain some advantage over their rivals within Mecca, but we have no solid information about his role here, and Nöldeke, 209 n. 1, was justly skeptical. See Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 113–16; Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 30–33; *EI*², s.v. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib (W. M. Watt).

His House and His sanctuary; whereas if He allows Abrahah to get possession of it, then, by God, we have no one who can defend it from him," or words to that effect. Ḥunāṭah told him, "You must come back [with us] to the king, for he has ordered me to bring you to him."

Ḥunāṭah accordingly set off with 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the latter accompanied by one of his sons, until they reached the army camp. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib enquired after Dhū Nafar, who was a friend of his, and was directed to him, Dhū Nafar being however in confinement. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib said, "O Dhū Nafar, have you any means of relief for the trouble which has come upon us?" The latter replied, "What relief is possible from a man held captive at the king's hand, one who expects to be killed at any moment (literally, "in the morning or evening")? I can't avail at all in regard to your misfortune, except that Unays, the keeper of the elephant, is a friend of mine. I will send a message to him and will commend you to him, put the case to him for helping you as strongly as possible, and ask him to try to arrange an audience for you with the king. So make your request to him, and Unays will intercede with him on your behalf as skillfully as possible for him." 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib responded, "That's as much as I can hope." Dhū Nafar accordingly sent a message to Unays, and came to him[554] saying, "O Unays, 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib is the chief of Quraysh and master of the Meccan caravan ('īr);[555] he feeds the people on the plains and the wild beasts on the mountain peaks.[556] The king has seized two hundred of his camels, so I ask permission for him to come before [939]

554. Following the suggested emendation of text, n. e, fa-jā'ahu.

555. Thus in text, in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 51, and in al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 94, but Ibn Hishām, op. cit., ed. Wüstenfeld, 33, trans. 25, has 'ayn, "well," i.e., the well of Zamzam in Mecca.

556. An allusion to the rifādah, the supplying of provisions to pilgrims and traders coming to Mecca for the Ḥajj and its attendant fairs. It was linked to another service, that of siqāyah, the supplying of water, nabīdh or date wine, and the semiliquid foodstuff sawīq to the pilgrims also. Both of these were said to have been established in Mecca by Quṣayy for the 'Abd al-Dār clan but usurped by the 'Abd Manāf clan, of whom Hāshim were a component. These rights are adduced by later Islamic authors as showing the nobility of the Prophet's clan in pre-Islamic times, but in reality must have been not so much philanthropic or social services as much as lucrative sources of revenue for the holders Hāshim. See Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Le pélerinage à la Mekke, 89–101; Bosworth, "The Terminology of the History of the Arabs in the Jāhiliyya According to Khwārazmī's 'Keys of the Sciences,'" 31–33.

the king, and be as useful as possible on his behalf." Unays replied, "I'll do that." Unays spoke to Abrahah, saying, "O king, this is the chief of Quraysh, now in your court, who is seeking an audience of you. He is master of the Meccan caravan, and feeds the people on the plain and the wild beasts on the mountain peaks. So grant him permission to come before you, so that he may tell you his request, and treat him kindly!"

He related: Abrahah granted 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib an audience. Now 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib was an impressive, handsome, and well-built man. When Abrahah beheld him, he treated him with too great a respect and kindness to allow 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib to sit below him. Abrahah did not, however, want the Abyssinians to see him letting 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib sit at his side on his royal throne, so he came down from his throne and then sat on his carpet, bidding 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib sit on it also by his side. He then told his interpreter to ask him what was his request of the king. The interpreter passed these words on to 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, and the latter said, "My request of the king is that he should give me back the two hundred camels of mine which he has seized." When the interpreter informed Abrahah of this, Abrahah told him through the interpreter, "You impressed me favorably when I saw you, but I went off you (zahidtu fīka) when you spoke to me. Do you speak to me about the two hundred camels which I seized, and brush aside a House that enshrines your religion and the religion of your forefathers, and which I have come to destroy, and say nothing to me about it?" 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib replied: "I am the owner of the camels; the House has a lord of its own who will defend it." Abrahah said, "He won't be able to defend it against me!" But 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib retorted, "That's your own affair; just give me back my camels!"

A certain learned scholar has asserted that 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib had gone to Abrahah, when the latter sent Ḥunāṭah to him, accompanied by Ya'mar[557] b. Nufāthah b. 'Adī b. al-Du'il b. Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah, who was at that time chief of the Banū Kinānah, and Khuwaylid b. Wāthilah al-Hudhalī, chief of Hudhayl at the time. They offered Abrahah a third of the wealth (amwāl) of [940] Tihāmah if he would go back home and not destroy the House, but he refused. But God is more knowing [about the truth of this]. At any rate, Abrahah had meanwhile restored to ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib the camels he had seized.

557. Following the correct reading for this name in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-Nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 34 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 52, trans. 25, and in al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 95, against the 'Amr of the text.

When they left him, ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib went back to Quraysh and told them the news. He ordered them to go forth from Mecca and seek refuge on the mountain tops and in the defiles, fearing violent behavior from the [Abyssinian] army. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib then arose and took hold of the door-ring, that of the door of the Kaʿbah, and a group of Quraysh stood with him praying to God and imploring His help against Abrahah and his troops. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib recited at the time when he took hold of the door-ring of the Kaʿbah:

O Lord, I don't hope for any one but you against them!
O Lord, defend your sacred area (ḥimā) from them![558]
Indeed, the enemy of the House is the one who is attacking you!
Repel them lest they lay waste Your settlements!

Then he further recited:

O God, a servant [of God] defends his dwelling, so protect Your dwelling places and their people (ḥilālak)![559]
Let not their cross and their cunning craft (miḥāl) prevail over Your cunning craft on the morrow![560]
But if You do that (i.e., abandon them), then it may be something which seems most appropriate [for You] and an affair which appears best to you.

---

558. In pre-Islamic Arabia, ḥimā, "protected area," denoted a stretch of pasture or hunting or other desirable land set aside for the use of a particular group and protected by that group. Many *ḥimā*s gradually acquired taboos and a religious aura from tribal deities, hence by the time of the coming of Islam, the Ḥaram of Mecca had become the protected area par excellence. See Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidentums[2], 105–09; Lammens, Le berceau de l'Islam, 60–64; EI[2], s.v. Ḥimā (J. Chelhod).

559. Reading thus for the text's ḥalālak (ḥilāl = pl. of ḥillah), following Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCII, and Glossarium, p. CXCIX, but with more or less the same meaning anyway.

560. Reading ghadw[an] for the text's ʿadw[an], following Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCII. The verse echoes the Qurʾānic use of miḥāl "the cunning craft and force [of God]" in sūrah XIII, 14/13, God being depicted elsewhere in the Qurʾān (II, 47/54. VIII, 30) as "the best of those who use craft and guile, makr."

And if You do that, well, it is an affair which will complete your [divine] plan of action.
When some person comes to you seeking peace, we hope that [941] You will act toward us in a like manner.
Then they turned back, having gained nothing but humiliation; perdition was coming upon them there.
I never heard of the most reprobate of men who desired glory and who then violated the sanctity of Your sacred enclosure (ḥarām).
They brought into action the assembled host of their land and the elephant, in order to capture and enslave members of your families.
They attacked your sacred area (ḥimā) with their cunning, out of sheer savagery (jahl^{an}), and paid no heed to Your exaltedness.[561]

Then ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib let go of the ring of the door, the door of the Kaʿbah, and set off with his companions of Quraysh to the mountain tops and sought refuge there, in expectation of what Abrahah was going to do in Mecca when he entered it. Next morning, Abrahah prepared to enter Mecca, got ready his elephant (whose name was Maḥmūd), and drew up his army. Abrahah was determined upon destroying the House and then returning to Yemen. When they drove the elephant forward, Nufayl b. Ḥabīb al-Khathʿamī came up and stood by its flank. He then got hold of its ear and said, "Kneel, O Maḥmūd, and go [then] straight back whence you came, for you are in God's sacred territory!" Then he let go its ear; the elephant knelt down,[562] while Nufayl b. Ḥabīb made off at top speed and clambered up the mountain. The soldiers beat the elephant to make it get up, but it refused. They beat its head with a battle axe to make it get up, but it still refused. They stuck hooks into its soft underbelly and scarified it to make it rise, and yet again it refused. But then they turned it round to face back to Yemen (i.e., southward); it got up and trotted off. They

561. Nöldeke notes in text, n. d, that the last three verses of this poem are in a different meter (wāfir) from the rest of it (kāmil) and that some manuscripts have rearranged the wording of these three verses to make them fit the kāmil meter of the whole poem. Otherwise, one must assume that we have here verses from two separate poems, even though they share the same rhyme in -ak/-ik.

562. As pointed out by Nöldeke, trans. 213 n. 1, elephants do not kneel down like camels, a fact already recognized by one of the scholiasts of Ibn Hishām.

pointed it in the direction of Syria (i.e., northwards), and it behaved exactly the same. They pointed it in the direction of the east, and it again did likewise; but when they made it face Mecca, it knelt down.

God now sent down on them a flock of birds, like swallows, each bird bearing three stones like chick peas and lentils, one [942] stone in its beak and two in its claws. Everyone whom the birds hit [with the stones] perished, although not all of them were in fact hit.[563] They retreated in haste along the road they had come,

563. The description of the divine visitation on Abrahah's impious forces is connected, as here, by the compilers of the Sīrah of the Prophet and subsequent commentators with Qur'ān, CV, Sūrat al-Fīl. But as both Gordon Newby and Irfan Shahîd have noted, the connection is by no means explicit in the Qur'ān. There is no mention in the sūrah of place or time, the object of the attack or the identity of the attackers themselves. Moreover, Shahîd adds that the agents of the destruction of the aṣḥāb al-fīl are by no means clearly the birds of vv. 3–4, described there as sweeping down in flocks (abābīl) bearing sijjīl. These last have been traditionally interpreted as "stones of baked clay," and this meaning fits the context here and in the other two Qur'ānic attestations of the word, cf. *EI*², s.v. Sidjdjīl (V. Vacca-Ed.); but F. de Blois now suggests that sijjīl stems ultimately from the pre-Islamic religious tradition of North Arabia and may even have been in origin the name of a local deity, see his forthcoming "Ḥijāratun min sijjīl." The birds may have been scavengers after the work of destruction wrought by God Himself, if one follows the variant reading yarmīhim, "[He] pelted them," for the accepted text tarmīhim, "[they, i.e., the birds] pelted them." Shahîd doubts whether Muḥammad's Meccan audience could have been misled by assumptions about an event that had taken place only two generations previously. Instead, we must regard the later Islamic tradition as supplying a specific reference for what was, at the time of its revelation in Mecca, rather, an eschatological description of the imminence of punishment for unbelieving peoples. See G. H. Newby, "Abraha and Sennacherib: A Talmudic Parallel to the Tafsīr on Sūrat al-Fīl," 433–34; I. Shahîd, "Two Qur'ānic Sūras: al-Fīl and Quraysh," 431, 433–44; and cf. R. Paret, *Der Koran. Kommentar und Konkordanz*², 522.

Whatever the original significance and message of Sūrat al-Fīl, rationalizing interpretations of the story of Abrahah's abortive expedition against Mecca arose early, mainly involving the explanation that the attacking forces were struck down by mass disease or by an epidemic, such as measles or smallpox mentioned by al-Ṭabarī, I, 945, p. 235 below, reducing Abrahah's combatant power and compelling a withdrawal. An explanation from smallpox was put forward in *ḥadīth*s going back to the Successor 'Ikrimah (d. 105/723–24), and in one line of poetry cited by Ibn Isḥāq from the verse written on the "Expedition of the Elephant" by Muḥammad's opponent in Mecca, 'Abdallāh b. al-Ziba'rā al-Sahmī (on whom, see Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, *Aghānī*³, XV, 139–84), "Sixty thousand men (i.e., Abrahah's forces) did not return to their land, and their sick ones did not survive after the return home." See Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 39 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 59, tr. 28; *EI*², s.v. al-Fīl (A. F. L. Beeston).

The historicity of some move by Abrahah against Mecca seems likely, given the undoubted fact that his sphere of military activity extended as far as central Araasking Nufayl b. Ḥabīb to guide them along the way to Yemen. When Nufayl b. Ḥabīb saw what God had sent down on them as punishment, he said:

Where can a man flee, when God is pursuing [him]? Al-Ashram
(i.e., Abrahah) is the conquered one, not the conqueror!
Ho, Rudaynah,[564] may greetings be upon you! When we went forth this morning, our eyes rejoiced at you!
A seeker after fire from among you came to us yesterday evening, but he was unable to get anything from us.
If you had been able to see, O Rudaynah—but you were not able to see it—what we saw in the vicinity of al-Muḥaṣṣab,[565]

---

bia, where he aimed at countering an extension of Lakhmid power and, behind that, Persian influence, on the evidence of the well of Murayghān inscription dating from 662 Ḥimyarite era/A.D. 552–53 (a terminus ad quem for dating this campaign being, in any case, Abrahah's opponent al-Mundhir III of al-Ḥīrah's death in 554; see further on this episode, n. 409 above). How much later than this date Abrahah could have mounted the "Expedition of the Elephant" is uncertain, but must have been very soon afterward. The inscription commemorating Abrahah's repair of the Dam of Mārib has the date 658 Ḥimyarite era/A.D. 548–49 (Smith, "Events in South Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.," 437–41), but Abrahah had to die and be succeeded in South Arabia by his two sons Yaksūm and Masrūq before the appearance of the Persians in Yemen in 570 (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 945–46, pp. 235–36 below). It has been suggested that the campaign of Abrahah, with its victories over Ma'add and other tribes at Ḥulubān/Ḥalabān, and the victory of his Kindah and Sa'd-Murād confederates over the 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah at Turabah, were either a preparation for an expedition against Mecca shortly afterward or the basis for a later tradition growing out of an Abyssinian expedition against Mecca. Going a step further, Altheim and Stiehl have very plausibly suggested that the Meccan expedition was actually part of the general operations of Abrahah in central Arabia during the course of 552. The chronological differences arising out of the fact that the Islamic tradition generally placed the Prophet's birth in the "Year of the Elephant," conventionally taken as A.D. 570, may not be unresolvable, since M. J. Kister, following H. Lammens, has pointed out the existence of traditions giving a different birth date for Muḥammad, including one in Ibn al-Kalbī that he was born twenty-three years after the "Expedition of the Elephant" and one going back to al-Zuhrī which, by a computation involving the dates of various events mentioned in the ḥadīth, would fix the "Year of the Elephant" in 552, i.e., precisely the year the Ry 506 inscription records for Abrahah's military operations. See Lammens, "L'âge de Mahomet et la chronologie de la Sîra," 211–12, and the full discussion in Kister, "The Campaign of Ḥulubān," 426–28.

564. That is, the poet is, in accordance with poetic convention, addressing a real or imaginary beloved, Rudaynah.

565. Literally, "ground strewn with pebbles," a valley near Minā through which the pilgrims pass on the return from Minā to Mecca at the end of the Ḥajj. On halting there, taḥṣīb, the act of throwing pebbles, is a recommended (mustaḥabb)

You would have exonerated me and praised my good judgment, and not have grieved over what has passed and gone between us.[566]
I praised God when I saw with my own eyes the birds, but feared that the stones might be rained upon us.
All the people are asking for Nufayl, as though I owed the Abyssinians a debt.[567]

As they retreated, the Abyssinian troops were continually falling by the wayside and perishing at every watering place (or halting place, manhal). Abrahah was smitten in his body; they carried him with them, with his fingers dropping off one by one. As each finger dropped off, there followed a purulent sore in its place, which exuded pus and blood, until they brought him to Ṣan'ā', with him looking like a newly born chick (i.e., plucked and emaciated). They allege that, as he died, his heart burst out from his breast.[568]

Al-Ḥārith related to me, saying: There related to us Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar[569]—'Abdallāh b. 'Uthmān b. Abī Sulaymān—his father. There also related to us from Muḥammad action, and this may be a reminiscence of a pre-Islamic rite, perhaps one of lapidation. See al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, IV, 1192; Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 62; Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Le pélerinage à la Mekke, 303–304.

---

566. Taking baynā as standing for baynanā.

567. Nöldeke, trans. 214 n. 2, commented that these verses are ostensibly part of a longer poem but contain many details and features have no connection with the supposed circumstances of their composition. In fact, they correspond in verse form, rhyme, and, to some extent, in wording, to an old poem in the Ḥamāsah anthology of the 'Abbāsid poet Abū Tammām, demonstrating that the verses have been modeled on this latter poem.

568. This tale of the manner of Abrahah's death is perhaps a transference to him of the army's being afflicted by disease, see n. 563 above. It is also given in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 36 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 55–56, tr. 27, and al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 97–98, the latter author adding that some stragglers and deserters from the Abyssinian army, and other elements had been attached to it, came into Mecca and stayed there, working as laborers and camel herders. This seems quite feasible, but less so the khabar going back to 'Ā'ishah (born ca. 614) quoted by al-Azraqī, op. cit., 98, 103, according to which she saw the elephant's conductor and its groom as blind beggars for food in the center of Mecca. See Nöldeke, trans. 219 n. 1; also Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, Munammaq, 73–76.

569. That is, the khabar here goes back to Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī (d. 207/823), a member of the Medinan historical school who worked in Baghdad, and to his secretary and transmitter, Ibn Sa'd (d. 230/845). See Sezgin, GAS, I, 294–97, 300–301; *EI*², s.vv. Ibn Sa'd (J.W. Fück) and al-Wāḳidī (S. Leder).

b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Salmānī—his father. There also related to [943] us ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. Zuhayr al-Kaʿbī—Abū Mālik al-Ḥimyarī—ʿAṭāʾ b. Yasār. There also related to us Muḥammad b. Abī Saʿīd al-Thaqafī—Yaʿlā b. ʿAṭāʾ—Wakīʿ b. ʿUdus—his paternal uncle Abū Bazīn al-ʿUqaylī. There also related to us Saʿīd b. Muslim—ʿAbdallāh b. Kathīr—Mujāhid—Ibn ʿAbbās. Parts of some narratives are combined with others. They say: Al-Najāshī had dispatched Aryāṭ Abū Ṣaḥam[570] with a force of four thousand men to Yemen. He subjugated and conquered it. He gave rewards to the local kings but treated the poor with contempt. There arose a man from among the Abyssinians called Abrahah al-Ashram Abū Yaksūm. He invited the people to give him allegiance, and they responded, so he then killed Aryāṭ and seized control of Yemen.[571] He observed the local people getting ready, at the time of the festival, for pilgrimage to the Holy House [in Mecca], and asked, "Where are the people going?" They told him that they were making pilgrimage to God's House at Mecca. He enquired, "What is it made of?" They replied, "Of stone." He said, "What is its covering (kiswah)?" They responded, "The striped Yemeni cloth (al-waṣāʾil), which comes from here."[572] Abrahah swore, "By the Messiah! I will certainly build for you something better than that!" So he built for them a house constructed from white,

---

570. Thus in the text; the Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCII, prefer the reading Aṣḥam (which would mean "dust-colored, yellowish, tinged with black"). However, Nöldeke, trans. 215 and n. 2, states that Ḍaḥam or Ṣaḥam is the correct reading, as in the name of the Ethiopian king Ella Ṣaḥam.

571. What Ibn Saʿd says here of Aryāṭ's discriminatory policy as a cause of his downfall is confirmed by extra details in the Nihāyat al-irab (see for this n. 624 below): that Aryāṭ, a noble and nephew of the Najāshī, appropriated captured booty and other wealth for himself, the nobility, and chiefs of the Abyssinians. Abrahah, himself of servile origin, was thus able to champion the cause of the excluded rank and file and the lower classes, and was able to lead an uprising against Aryāṭ in the name of equality of treatment. See von Gutschmid, "Bemerkungen zu Tabari's Sasanidengeschichte, übersetzt von Th. Nöldeke," 738–40; Kister, "Some Reports Concerning Mecca. From Jāhiliyya to Islam," 61–63 n. 5.

572. For the kiswah, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 904, p. 169 and n. 433 above, where the Tubbaʿ Asʿad Abū Karib is said first to have covered the Kaʿbah with Yemeni maʿāfirī cloth, Yemen being traditionally famed for its textiles. There seems to have been an ancient tradition in Arabia of covering qubbahs, i.e., tents and similar structures housing sacred objects, with materials like skins and cloth, according to H. Lammens, "Le culte des bétyles et les processions religieuses chez les Arabes préislamiques," 130–32, 138–42.

red, yellow, and black marble, and adorned it with gold and silver, and encompassed it with jewels. He provided it with doors made with sheets of gold and with golden nails, and set the space between them with jewels, which included an enormous ruby. He provided it with a covered sanctuary (ḥijāb), in which sweet-smelling aloes wood was continually burnt, and its walls were smeared with musk, thereby darkening the walls until the jewels [encrusted on them] appeared sunken. He gave orders to the people, and they made pilgrimage to it, as did a large number of the tribes of the Arabs over a period of years. There lived permanently within this temple men who made perpetual adoration and service to God there, and who devoted themselves to worshiping Him in it.

Nufayl al-Khath'amī was planning to do by stealth something unpleasant to it.[573] One night, when he saw no one moving around, he got up and took some excrement and smeared the apse of the high altar (qiblah)[574] of the temple with it, and he gathered together some putrefying animal carcases and threw them into it. Abrahah was told about this; he became extremely angry and exclaimed, "The Arabs have only done this out of vexation on account of their own House; I shall certainly destroy it stone by stone!" He wrote to the Najāshī informing him of that and asking the Najāshī to send him his elephant Maḥmūd—this being an elephant unparalleled in the whole earth for its size, stout body, and strength. The Najāshī accordingly dispatched it to him. [944]

Once the elephant had arrived, Abrahah set out with his army, accompanied by the king of Ḥimyar[575] and Nufayl b. Ḥabīb al-Khath'amī. When he reached the Sacred Enclosure (al-ḥaram), he commanded his troops to raid the beasts of the local people. They captured some camels belonging to 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. It happened

573. kāna yu'arriḍu lahu; for arraḍa, see Glossarium, p. CXI. Here we have a variation from the man of the Banū Fuqaym who is responsible for the desecration of the church in Ibn Isḥāq's account given by al-Ṭabarī, I, 934, p. 218 above, and, since Nufayl is said at I, 937, p. 223 above, to have guided Abrahah to al-Ṭā'if, a confusion also. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 62–63, has "a man from the people of al-Tihāmah" as the perpetrator of the deed.

574. The use here of the technical term qiblah, literally, "direction to be faced [in the Muslim worship]," is an anachronism.

575. The malik Ḥimyar must be Dhū Nafar, called at I, 936, p. 222 above, "one of the nobles of Ḥimyar."

that Nufayl was a friend of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib's, so the latter spoke to Nufayl about his camels. Nufayl, therefore, spoke to Abrahah, saying, "O king, there has come to you the lord of the Arabs, the most distinguished of them in status and the foremost of them in nobility—he gives people swift horses as mounts, bestows largesse, and feeds whatever the wind blows along." He brought him into Abrahah's presence, and the latter said [to 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib], "What's your request?" 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib replied, "That you should give me back my camels." Abrahah retorted, "I consider what I have just heard from you nothing but fraud. I had expected that you would speak to me about your House, which is your source of nobility and pride." But 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib merely said, "Give me back my camels and do what you like with the House, for it has a lord who will protect it." So Abrahah ordered the camels to be returned to him.

When 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib took possession of them, he draped the soles of sandals round their necks, marked them as intended sacrifices, offered them as gifts [to the Sacred Enclosure], and let them scatter throughout the sacred enclosure. [He did that] so that if anyone of them should be seized [by the Abyssinians], the lord of the Sacred Enclosure would thereby become angered.[576] 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, accompanied by 'Amr b. 'Ā'idh b. 'Imrān b. Makhzūm, Muṭ'im b. 'Adī and Abū Mas'ūd al-Thaqafī, went up to Mount Ḥirā'[577] and recited:

O God, a man defends his dwelling, so protect your dwelling places and their people (ḥilālak).
Let not their cross and their cunning craft overcome Your cunning craft on the morrow.

---

576. Qur'ān, V, 2, refers to the qalā'id, necklets hung round the necks of animals destined for sacrifice, budn, part of the sha'ā'ir Allāh mentioned in XXII, 37/36. There is also reference in V, 102/103, to various types of camel, including the sā'ibah, the waṣīlah and the ḥāmī, left to roam freely after dedication to God. See Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidentums[2], 112ff.; EI[2], s.v. Baḥīra (A. J. Wensinck). Seizure by the Abyssinians of the camels released by 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib would thus incur Allāh's wrath.

577. Ḥirā' or Ḥarā' was a mountain outside Mecca mentioned later in the Sīrah as a place where Muḥammad, in the period before his public ministry, would spend time in taḥannuth, pious and ascetic exercises. See Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 132; Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 40, 44; EI[2], s.v. Ḥirā' (T. H. Weir-W. M. Watt).

But if You do abandon them and our qiblah, then it may well be something which seems best to You. [945]

He related: The birds flew in from the sea successively. Each bird had three stones, two in its claws and one in its beak. They hurled down the stones upon the Abyssinian troops, and everyone who was hit suffered either a severe wound or else that spot erupted into blisters and pustules. (That was the first time that smallpox and measles and bitter shrubs appeared [in the land].) Thus the stones snuffed them out completely, and God sent a torrential flow of water, which swept them all away and hurled them into the sea.[578] He related: Abrahah and the survivors who were with him took to flight. Abrahah's limbs began to drop off one by one. As for Maḥmūd, the Najāshī's elephant, it lay down and would not venture[579] into the Sacred Enclosure and was thus preserved in safety; but regarding the other elephant, it ventured into the Sacred Enclosure and it suffered a hail of stones.[580] It is also said that there were thirteen elephants. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib went down from Mount Ḥirā' and two of the Abyssinians came up to him, kissed his hand and said, "You were more knowledgeable [than us]."

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Ya'qūb b. 'Utbah b. al-Mughīrah b. al-Akmas, who said that the first time measles and smallpox were seen in the land of the Arabs was in that year, as also the first tme for bitter shrubs like rue, colocynth, and gigantic swallow-wort[581] to be seen.

Ibn Isḥāq says: On Abrahah's death, there succeeded to power in Yemen over the Abyssinians his son Yaksūm b. Abrahah. Abrahah's patronymic[582] was from him. Ḥimyar and the tribes of the Arabs submitted, and the Abyssinians treated them oppressively,

---

578. That is, a sayl, the torrent from a sudden rainstorm, typical of the erratic weather conditions in the mountains in the western part of the Arabian Peninsula. In Arabic lore, the sweeping away of peoples by such inundations is not infrequent; cf. the sayl al-'arim, "bursting of the dam by a torrent," in Qur'ān, XXXIV, 15/16. See Lammens, Le berceau de l'Islam, 23–25.

579. wa-lam yashja' 'alā . . .; for this verb, see Glossarium, p. CCCVI.

580. Following the text's fa-ḥuṣiba; one might also read fa-ḥaṣaba "and it suffered blisters and pustules," as taken by Nöldeke in his trans. 209.

581. That is, Asclepias gigantea L.

582. That is, Abū Yaksūm. According to Nöldeke, trans. 219 n. 3, there exists a coin minted by Yaksūm.

taking their women as sexual partners, killing their menfolk, and employing their sons as interpreters between themselves and the Arabs.[583] He related: After God hurled back the Abyssinians from Mecca, and the latter received the punishment described above, the Arabs treated Quraysh with great honor, saying, "[They are] the people of God; God fought on their behalf and relieved them of the burden of their enemies.

He related: On Yaksūm b. Abrahah's death, there succeeded to power in Yemen his brother Masrūq b. Abrahah. The burden of oppression on the people of Yemen became protracted. The Abyssinian dominion in Yemen extending from the time when [946] Aryāṭ came to Yemen until the Persians killed Masrūq and expelled the Abyssinians from the land, was seventy-two years. During that period, four kings ruled there successively: Aryāṭ, then Abrahah, then Yaksūm b. Abrahah, and finally, Masrūq b. Abrahah.[584]

Sayf b. Dhī Yazan al-Ḥimyarī, whose patronymic was Abū Murrah, went forth until he reached the court of Qayṣar, king of al-Rūm.[585] He complained to Qayṣar about what they were suffer-

583. According to al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 63, Yaksūm was worse and more malevolent than his father, and his brother Masrūq yet more so. Yaksūm's tenure of power is very summarily treated in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 41 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 63, tr. 30; see also idem, Kitāb al-tījān, 303, cf. Krenkow, "The Two Oldest Books on Arabic Folklore," 229.

584. The seventy-two years given here for the Abyssianian domination must be a considerable exaggeration, since this rule extended in reality only from 525 to ca. 570, i.e., forty-five years. In Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XVII, 311, the respective reigns of the Abyssinian governors are given: Aryāṭ, twenty years; Abrahah, twenty-three years; Yaksūm, nineteen years (thus also in al-Dīnawarī); Masrūq, twelve years; total, seventy-four years. Of these, that of Aryāṭ is much exaggerated; Abrahah was certainly still alive in 552, the date of the well of Murayghān inscription, itself five years after his Dam of Mārib inscription. This would leave eighteen years at most for the combined reigns of Yaksūm and Masrūq. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 220 n. 3.

585. Yazan was one of the great families of South Arabia, accounted one of the Mathāminah, influential in Ḥaḍramawt and known (as Yz'n) in inscriptions from the mid-fifth century A.D. onward. It appears that their original center was in the Wādī 'Amāqīn area near al-Ḥawṭah in what became in modern times the hinterland of al-Mukalla. The family or clan appears in early times in association with the ancient Sabaean family or clan of Gadan or Dhū Gadan. By the early sixth century, the Yazan probably dominated all the Ḥaḍramawt and the Ẓufār coastlands as well as the island of Socotra, whence their title of Dhū implying lordship. Members of the family served the last Tubba' Ma'dī Karib and then Dhū Nuwās as ing, and asked hm to expel the Abyssinians and take over the rule there personally.[586] [He asked him to] send what forces he pleased of the Byzantines, and then the rule over Yemen would be his; but Qayṣar would not satisfy his plea, and he got none of the satisfaction he sought from Qayṣar.

So he set out again until he arrived at al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir's court at al-Ḥīrah. Al-Nu'mān was Kisrā's governor over al-Ḥīrah and adjacent parts of Iraq in the land of the Arabs.[587] Sayf b. Dhī Yazan now complained to al-Nu'mān about the oppression and humiliation the people of Yemen were suffering. Al-Nu'mān replied, "I have the obligation of paying a formal visit to Kisrā every year, so stay with me until the time for it comes round, and I will take you with me." He related: So he remained with al-Nu'mān until the latter set off on his visit to Kisrā, accompanied by Sayf b. Dhī Yazan. When al-Nu'mān came into Kisrā's presence and had completed his own business with the king, he mentioned to him Sayf b. Dhī Yazan and the reason for his coming to him, requesting an audience for him; Kisrā granted this. Kisrā was in his throne chamber (aywān majlisihi), where his crown was kept. This crown was like a huge grain measure (qanqal),[588] and set with rubies, emeralds, pearls, gold, and silver, and was suspended by a military commanders, and it was perhaps the connection with the latter that led to a tradition, given by al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 63, that Sayf b. Dhī Yazan was a descendant of Dhū Nuwās. Little is in fact known about Sayf, whose activities as leader of the "patriotic" reaction against the Abyssinians in 570 fall outside the period for which we have epigraphic evidence; his role in later Arabic popular epic literature has no known historical basis. See M. A. Bafaqih, "New Light on the Yazanite Dynasty," 5–6; *EI*², s.vv. Mathāmina (Chr. Robin), Sayf b. Dhī Yazan (J. P. Guillaume: entirely on the romance) and Yazan (A. F. L. Beeston).

---

586. The Byzantine emperor at this time was Justin II (r. 565–78). There is no record in Byzantine sources of this alleged embassy from South Arabia.

587. This is a patent confusion with the last Lakhmid, al-Nu'mān III b. al-Mundhir IV (r. ca. 580–602); the ruler in al-Ḥīrah at this time must have been 'Amr II b. al-Mundhir III (b. Hind) or his brother and successor Qābūs b. al-Mundhir III. See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 96–105. In Ibn al-Kalbī's version of these events (al-Ṭabarī, I, 950, p. 242, cf. n. 596 below), the conjecture is expressed that it was 'Amr b. Hind.

588. In al-Khwārazmī's Mafātīḥ al-'ulūm, 67, the qanqal is a large measure of capacity used in Iraq and equalling three thousand raṭls, i.e., two "equalised" kurrs, but the latter measure itself varied considerably even within the Sawād of Iraq. See Bosworth, "Abū 'Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the Technical Terms of the Secretary's Art," 148–49.

golden chain from the top of the dome of that chamber. The crown was too heavy for his neck to bear, so he concealed himself in robes until he sat down on that throne; his head was inserted into the crown, and when he had settled down comfortably on his throne, the robes were whisked away from him. Everyone who saw him for the first time fell down on his knees out of awe for [947] him, hence Sayf b. Dhī Yazan sank down on his knees when he entered his presence.

Then he addressed Kisrā, "O king, ravens have seized control over our land," and when Kisrā asked him, "Which ravens, those from Abyssinia or those from Sind?"[589] he replied: "The Abyssinians, and I have come to you imploring help against them and for you to expel them from our midst. You can then assume the royal power in my land, for you are more loved by us than them." Kisrā retorted, "Your land is far away from our own one, and your land is poor in resources: nothing there but sheep and camels, which are no use to us. I am not prepared to commit a Persian army to the land of the Arabs; there is no good reason why I should do this." However, he ordered Sayf b. Dhī Yazan to be given ten thousand dirhams of full weight, and gave him a fine robe of honor. Sayf b. Dhī Yazan took the money, went forth, and began distributing it wholesale among the people, so that boys, slave boys, and slave girls seized it avidly. Very soon, this was reported to Kisrā, who was told, "The Arab to whom you gave a sum of money is scattering the dirhams among the people, and slave boys, boys, and slave girls are scrambling for them." Kisrā said, "There is something strange about this man, bring him back to me!" When Sayf b. Dhī Yazan came into his presence, Kisrā said, "This is what you do with a royal gift! You distribute it among the people?" Sayf b. Dhī Yazan responded, "And what exactly should I do with the king's gift, when the mountains of the land from which I have come are composed wholly of gold and silver?"[590] [He said this] in order to excite the emperor's cupidity, when the latter saw how little Sayf

589. Since the ancient Persians tended to classify all blacks as "Indians," a usage taken over by Greek and Syriac writers, there arose uncertainty over the geographical extent of "India," which could cover South Arabia and the Horn of Africa. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 222 n. 2.

590. Sayf b. Dhī Yazan's boast reflects the ancients' belief that South Arabia was a land of famed wealth, with its precious metals, perfumes and aromatic substances, etc.

was concerned about the money. [He continued] "I have only made my way to the king that he might preserve me from tyranny and relieve me of humiliation." Kisrā said to him, "Remain here with me while I consider your case;" so he remained at Kisrā's court.

Kisrā assembled his Marzbāns and the sagacious advisers he was wont to consult, and said, "What do you think about this man and the proposition he has made?" One of them said, "O king, you have in your prisons various men whom you have incarcerated in [948] preparation for killing them. Why don't you send them back with Sayf? If they perish, well, that is the fate you ordained for them, and if they gain control of his land it will be an additional kingdom to your own." Kisrā exclaimed, "That's a good idea. Count for me how many men there are in my prisons." These men were counted up, and they found a total of eight hundred men in the prisons. Kisrā then ordered, "Find out the man among them with the best achievements and lineage, and make him the commander over them." They found that the best person qualified in these respects was Wahriz, who was a man of mature years.[591] Kisrā accordingly sent him with Sayf and appointed him commander of his troops.

591. In the Arabic sources, noble birth from various origins is attributed to Wahriz, e.g., in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 43 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 65, trans. 31, that he was of advanced age and of good, unspecified, family; in al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 63–64, that he was a centenarian (!) and the son of Kānjār, of noble stock but imprisoned because he had taken to highway robbery; in al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, III, 163 = § 1016, that he was the Ispabadh of Daylam; and in Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 52, that he was from the progeny of Bihāfarīdūn, son of Sāsān, son of Bahman, son of Isfandiyār. It would be usual for the commander of an expedition to be of high rank and birth, but unlikely that his troops, if they had been rescued from incarceration and the threat of death, to have been of good stock also, as is asserted by a poet of Ḥaḍramawt cited by al-Mas'ūdī, op. cit., III, 164 = § 1017 ("... from the clan of Sāsān and the clan of Mahrasan") and by Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, loc. cit. Such claims to exalted origins were doubtless fabricated by or for the descendants of the Persians in Yemen, the so-called Abnā', the children of unions between Persians and Arabs in Yemen. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 223 n. 2. But in any case, these reports from Ibn Isḥāq and Ibn al-Kalbī (for the latter report, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 952–53, pp. 244–45 below) that Yemen was conquered by a force of gaolbirds and desperadoes must be regarded as romantic accretions to the real story of the Persian expeditionary force to Yemen as mentioned at I, 899, p. 160 above: that Wahriz's force was composed of tough Daylamī mountaineers, recruited as mercenaries for the specific task, see n. 405 above.

Wahriz/Wahrīz is presumably MP Weh-rēz, "having a good abundance," see Justi, Namenbuch, 340. It seems, however, to have been in origin a title rather than a personal name; Procopius, describing an expedition sent by the emperor Kawād I into Georgia and Lazica, calls its commander a "Persian" named Boēs, who had the

He provided them with eight ships, each one carrying a hundred men plus equipment and supplies for the sea voyage. However, when they got out into the open sea, two of the ships foundered with everyone and everything in them. But six ships safely reached the coast of Yemen in the region of Aden, and these contained six hundred men, including Wahriz and Sayf b. Dhī Yazan. When they were safely on dry land in the land of Yemen, Wahriz said to Sayf, "What resources do you have?" Sayf replied, "As many Arab soldiers and Arab horses as you wish; I will put my leg on your leg [over this], so that we either die together or conquer together." Wahriz said, "You have spoken fairly and eloquently." Sayf now brought to Wahriz's standard those of his people who were in his obedience.

Masrūq b. Abrahah heard about their arrival. He assembled round himself the Abyssinian army and marched against them. The two armies moved close to each other and encamped in close proximity to each other. Wahriz now sent one of his sons called Nawzādh[592] with a cavalry detachment and instructed him, "Engage in skirmishing with the enemy army, so that we may get to know their mode of fighting." Nawzādh sallied forth and engaged in some skirmishing with them, but then got himself into a spot from which extrication was impossible, and the enemy killed him. This aroused Wahriz to a frenzy of rage and made him more determined to fight them. When the opposing troops were drawn [949] up in ranks against each other, Wahriz said, "Point out their king for me." They replied, "Do you see a man on an elephant, with a crown on his head and a red ruby on his forehead?" He said, "Yes," and they retorted, "That's their king!" He said, "Leave him alone for the present," and they waited a long time. Then he said, "What's he riding?" They replied, "He has mounted a horse now." He said, "Leave him alone," and again they waited a long time. He said, "What's he riding now?" They replied, "He has mounted a mule now." Wahriz said, "A wild ass's filly! He is a weak individual, and so is his kingdom! Are you listening to me properly? I am going to shoot at him. If you observe his guards still standing title Ourazēs, which would appear to be *Wahriz. See *EI*², s.vv. Daylam (V. Minorsky), and Wahriz (C. E. Bosworth).

---

592. That is, "the newborn." See Justi, Namenbuch, 227.

around and not moving, then stand fast until I give you the command [to advance], for I shall have missed him. But if you see the enemy troops crowding round him and sticking close to him, I shall have hit the man, so launch an attack on them!" Then he strung his bow (according to what has been asserted, none but Wahriz himself could bend it because of its strength). He ordered his eylids to be fastened up,[593] placed an arrow in his bow, braced the bow as widely as possible until, when it was fully extended, he released it. The arrow struck the ruby on Masrūq's forehead, and penetrated through his head, coming out at the nape of the neck. Masrūq was thrown backward from his mount, and the Abyssinians crowded round him closely. The Persians charged at them, and the Abyssinians were defeated. The Persians made great slaughter, and groups of the Abyssinians fled in all directions.[594] Wahriz advanced against Ṣan'ā' with the intention of entering it, but when he reached the city gate, he said, "My banner shall never enter [a town] lowered! Break down the gateway!" The gateway of Ṣan'ā' was accordingly demolished, and he then entered it with his banner raised high and borne in front of him.

Once he had secured dominion over Yemen and had expelled the Abyssinians from it, Wahriz wrote to Kisrā, "I have subdued Yemen for you and have driven out those Abyssinians who occupied it," and he forwarded to him wealth. Kisrā wrote back ordering him to set up Sayf b. Dhī Yazan as ruler of Yemen and its territories, and he imposed on Sayf the responsibility for the poll

593. That is, because the muscles of his eyelids were relaxed with old age and drooped over his eyes. A similar explanation is given for the name of a Persian commander in the fighting with the Arabs during the caliph 'Umar I's reign, one Dhū al-Ḥājib ("the man with the eyelid") Mardānshāh; see al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 251. This seems to have been something of a topos in early Arabic, since a leader of the Banū 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah at the late sixth-century "Day of Jabalah" (see *EI*², s.v. Djabala [F. Buhl-R. H. Headley]) is likewise said to have had his eyelids falling into his eyes. See Naqā'iḍ Jarīr wa-al-Farazdaq, II, 657, 1062, and cf. Caskel, Aiyām al-'arab. Studien zur altarabischen Epik, 36.

594. As noted by Nöldeke, trans. 226 n. 2, the story of Wahriz's battle with Masrūq is also given by Ibn Qutaybah, 'Uyūn al-akhbār, I, 149, from "the books of the Persians." In his account, Wahriz has drawn from his quiver an arrow of good omen with his wife's name inscribed on it, which he interprets as Persian zanān, "women," and then as the exhortation zan ān, "strike that [person]," hence he launches the arrow at Masrūq and kills him, as al-Ṭabarī relates. Cf. also Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 81.

[950] tax and the land tax, which he was to send to Kisrā annually as fixed sums. He also ordered Wahriz to return to him, and Wahriz did this. Sayf b. Dhī Yazan was thus appointed as ruler over Yemen as his father Dhū Yazan, one of the kings of Yemen, had been [before him]. This is what Ibn Ḥumayd transmitted to us—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq concerning the affairs of Ḥimyar, the Abyssinians and their rule, and Kisrā's dispatch of an expedition to attack the Abyssinians in Yemen.[595]

As for Hishām b. Muḥammad, he relates as follows. After Abrahah, there reigned Yaksūm and then Masrūq. He related: It was this last whom Wahriz killed in the reign of Kisrā, son of Qubādh, and then expelled the Abyssinians from Yemen. He related: Among what he related is that Abū Murrah al-Fayyāḍ Dhū Yazan was one of the nobles of Yemen. He had a wife Rayḥānah bt. Dhī Jadan, and she presented him with a boy, whom he called Ma'dī Karib. She was beautiful, hence al-Ashram took her away from Abū Murrah and forced her to marry him. Abū Murrah departed from Yemen and came to one of the kings of the house of al-Mundhir—I think it was 'Amr b. Hind[596]—and asked him to write on his behalf to Kisrā, asking him to tell Kisrā about his high worth, his nobility, and his aid and support for Kisrā in any affair in which he could help the emperor. [The ruler in question from the house of al-Mundhir] replied, "Don't act rashly; I am obliged to visit Kisrā each year, and the time for this is so-and-so." Hence Abū Murrah remained at his court until he accompanied the ruler on his visit to Kisrā. 'Amr b. Hind went into Kisrā's presence; he mentioned to him Dhū Yazan's nobility and lofty estate, and sought permission for him to have an audience of the emperor. Dhū Yazan went in, and 'Amr made space for Dhū Yazan to go before him. When Kisrā observed that, he realized that 'Amr could have treated Dhū Yazan thus in his presence only out of regard for his nobility. When Dhū Yazan went up to the emperor, the latter treated him kindly and questioned him in a friendly way, saying to

595. The story of Sayf b. Dhī Yazan's appeal to Kisrā and the Persian conquest of Yemen by Wahriz and his force is given by Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 41–45 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 64–70, tr. 30–33; idem, Kitāb al-tījān, 306–309, cf. Krenkow, "The Two Oldest Books on Arabic Folklore," 229.

596. As noted in n. 587 above, Ibn al-Kalbī's conjecture here is probably correct.

him, "What has brought you here?" Dhū Yazan replied, "O king, the blacks have seized from us power over our own land, and have committed things so frightful that my respect for the king makes [951] me shrink from mentioning them. If the king were to offer us help without our having to ask for it [formally], that would be appropriate for him because of his excellence, nobility, and preeminence over the rest of monarchs; why should this not be so, when we have made our way toward him, full of expectations regarding him, hoping that God will smash our enemies, aid us against them, and procure for us revenge over them? If the king sees fit to make our speculations come true, fulfill our hopes and send back with me an army that will eject this enemy from our land so that he may add it to his own kingdom—for it is one of the most fertile of lands and most amply endowed with resources, not like the region of the Arabian peninsula bordering on his empire [at present]—he may do all this."

Kisrā replied. "I know well that your land is as you describe it; but which blacks are they who have conquered it, the Abyssinians or the Sindīs?" Dhū Yazan said, "The Abyssinians." Anūsharwān said, "I would certainly like to make your speculations come true, and would like to enable you to go back home with your request fulfilled; but the way to your land is difficult for the army, and I would not like rashly to commit my troops. But let me think about your request. Meanwhile, you can stay here with whatever you like." He ordered Dhū Yazan to be given suitable lodging and to be treated hospitably. He remained at Kisrā's court until he died. Abū Murrah had composed an ode in the Ḥimyaritic language in which he eulogised Kisrā. When it was translated for him, he was delighted with it.[597]

---

597. The South Arabian language had, in fact, been in steep decline long before this time, and the story of Abū Murrah being able to compose a poem in the "Ḥimyaritic language" must be apocryphal. Chr. Robin, basing himself on such indications as a perceptible decline in the quality and correctness of the Sabaean language in the later inscriptions, believes that it had yielded place, as a spoken tongue, to early (North) Arabic by the fourth century A.D. Hence after ca. 400 it was only a learned language, increasingly poorly known, although still used epigraphically for a further century and a half. The latest dated inscription so far discovered, CIH 325, comes from 669 of the Ḥimyarite era, hence A.D. 559–60, although some graffiti found in northern Yemen at Umm Laylā north of Ṣa'dah, in North Arabic language and South Arabian script, probably date from the beginning

Rayḥānah bt. Dhī Jadan gave birth to a son of Abrahah al-Ashram's, whom he called Masrūq. Ma'dī Karib b. Dhī Yazan grew up with his mother Rayḥānah in Abrahah's house. One of Abrahah's sons satirized him, and said to him, "May God curse you! And may God curse your father!" Ma'dī Karib had never realized that al-Ashram was anyone but his own father. He went along to his mother and said to her, "Who is my father?" She replied, "Al-Ashram." He retorted, "No, by God, he is not my father; if he were really my father, so-and-so would not have satirized me." So she told him that his father was [in reality] Abū Murrah al-Fayyāḍ, and communicated to him the whole story. All this had a profound [952] effect on the lad's mind, but he bided his time for a long period.

Then al-Ashram died, followed by the death of his son Yaksūm. Dhū Yazan's son set out, making for the king of the Byzantines' (al-Rūm) court, avoiding Kisrā because he had delayed so long in helping his father. But he did not get what he wanted from the king of the Byzantines, and found him taking the side of the Abyssinians because they shared a common religious allegiance. Hence he turned away from the Byzantine court and made for the court of Kisrā. He presented himself before Kisrā one day, when he was on horseback, and called out to him, "O king, my future heritage lies in your hands!" Kisrā summoned him when he had dismounted and asked him, "Who are you, and what is this heritage of yours?" Dhū Yazan's son replied, "I am the son of the senior chief (shaykh) of the Yemenis, Dhū Yazan, whom you promised to aid, but then [in the end] he died at your court and in your entourage. That promise is my rightful due, and a heritage which you have an obligation to fulfill for me." Kisrā relented toward him and ordered him to be given a sum of money. The lad went out and began to scatter the dirhams about, and the people scrambled for them. Kisrā sent a message to him, "What has led you to do what you have done?" The lad replied, "I didn't come to

---

of Islam. See Robin, "Résultats épigraphiques et archéologiques de deux brefs séjours en République arabe du Yémen," 188–93.

In the fourth/tenth century, al-Ḥasan al-Hamdānī was able in his Iklīl, Book VIII, 122–23, tr. 72–73, to give the values of the letters of the South Arabian script (musnad), but was only able with difficulty to read a few names of the inscriptions. See Robin, L'Arabie antique de Karib'îl à Mahomet, 15, 19–20, 134–35; idem, in Supplément au dictionnaire de la Bible, s.v. Sheba. II, cols. 1216–17.

you seeking money, but rather, I came to you seeking men and that you should preserve me from humiliation." Kisrā was pleased with this rejoinder and sent back a message to him, "Stay here while I look into your case."

Kisrā then sought counsel from his ministers concerning sending an army back with him. The [Chief] Mōbadh said to him, "This lad has a just claim upon us, through his journey here and the death of his father at the king's court and in his entourage, and because of the promises made by the king to him previously. Now in the king's prisons are men of valor and martial strength. Let the king send these men with Dhū Yazan's son; if they secure a victory, it will be a triumph for the king; if they all perish, he will have secured his own peace of mind [from the threat of them] and will have relieved the citizens of the kingdom of them. That would not be far from the correct line of action." Kisrā said, "This is a sound piece of advice," and he gave orders for the men of this description in the prisons to be counted. They extended to eight hundred men. He appointed as commander over them a com- [953] mander from among his cavalrymen (asāwiratihi) called Wahriz, whom Kisrā accounted the equal of a thousand cavalrymen. He supplied them with weapons and equipment and ordered them to be transported in eight ships, each one containing a hundred men.

They set forth on the seas, but two ships out of the eight foundered, leaving six safe and sound. They landed on the coast of Ḥaḍramawt.[598] Masrūq marched out against them with an army of one hundred thousand men, including Abyssinians, Ḥimyarites, and Bedouins. [However,] a considerable number of people joined the son of Dhū Yazan. Wahriz encamped on the sea coast, placing the sea at his back. When Masrūq saw how few were their numbers, he became eager to engage them. He sent a message to Wahriz, "What has brought you here? You have only the [few] men whom I can see, while I have [the large number] whom you can see. You have recklessly put yourself and your followers at risk, but if you like, I will allow you to return to your homeland; I shall not hurl satires at you, nor will there be inflicted upon you any unpleasant action on my part or on that of my troops. Or if you wish, I will march out against you immediately. Or yet again, if you wish, I will allow you a period of respite (ajal) so that you may consider your position and take counsel with your followers." Wahriz realized how strong they were and perceived that he could not match their strength. So he sent to Masrūq the message, "All right, grant a period of respite for us both; give me an engagement and compact, and receive in return the same promises from me, that neither side should fight with the other until the period of truce is up and until we can see our [correct] course of action." Masrūq agreed to that.

598. It seems likely that the ships, buffeted by storms, would come up on the Ḥaḍramawt coast, and apparently the landing was in the vicinity of al-Shiḥr. The Ḥaḍramī poet cited by al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, III, 164 = § 1017, says that the ships were washed up at M.th.w.b, read by Pellat as Mathwab but read by Nöldeke, trans. 230 n. 2, as Manūb. A Manūb cerainly existed in Ḥaḍramawt in Islamic times, and it is mentioned by al-Hamdānī, Ṣifat jazīrat al-'Arab, 172 and n. 2, 215, but described by him as a wadi with villages in the territory of Kindah and in the Shibām/al-Qārah region, i.e., well inland and away from the coast. Al-Bakrī's listing of Manūb, in his Mu'jam mā ista'jam, I, 316–17, IV, 1273, is vague and unhelpful.

Each side remained within its encampment. Then, when ten days had elapsed of the standstill in hostilities, Wahriz's son set off on one of his horses and went forward until he drew near to the enemy's encampment. But his horse carried him onward into the midst of their encampment, and they killed him, Wahriz being unaware of all this. When the news of the killing of his son reached him, he sent a message to Masrūq, "There has been, as you well know, a compact between us, so why did you kill my son?" Masrūq sent a message back, "Your son charged into the [954] midst of our encampment, and some irresponsible elements of our army sprang up and killed him. I myself strongly disapprove of his killing." Wahriz said to the messenger, "Tell him that he was not my son, but only the son of a whore (zāniyah); if he had been my son, he would have patiently waited and not broken the truce between us until it had come to an end."[599] Then he ordered the corpse to be thrown down on to the ground, where his body could be seen, and he swore an oath that he would not drink wine nor

599. Nöldeke, trans. 232 n. 1, explained that Wahriz disowns his son and refuses any responsibility for him because he does not wish to have to accept blood money for him from the Abyssinians; the blood money will be their own blood. Also, the killing of the Persian, though half-justified, will incur divine retribution for the breach of the oath-protected truce.

rub his head with any scented oil until the truce should come to its end.

When there was just one day left of the truce, Wahriz gave orders for the ships in which they had sailed to be set on fire, and likewise with regard to all superfluous clothing they had with them, leaving his men only with what they had on their backs. Next, he ordered all their provisions to be brought out and instructed his men, "Eat up this food!" So they ate up [as much as they could]. When they had finished, he ordered what remained to be thrown in the sea. At that point, he stood up in their midst and made a speech, saying to them, "Regarding the ships of yours which I caused to be burned, I wanted you to realize that there is no way for you ever to return home. Concerning your clothing which I had burned, it was arousing my ire that, should the Abyssinians gain the victory over you, it should fall into their hands. As for your food which I caused to be thrown into the sea, I would not wish any of you to have food for himself to exist on for a single day [if we should be defeated]. If you are people who will fight alongside me and endure the heat of battle, let me know this now; but if you will not do this, I shall fall upon this sword of mine until it comes out of my back, for I have no mind ever to let the Abyssinians gain power over me alive. So consider you own position now, since I, your commander, have chosen this course for myself." They responded, "Indeed, we will fight alongside you, until either we are dead to the last man or we are victorious!"

On the morn of the day when the truce ended, Wahriz arranged his troops for the fight, with the sea at their rear. He went up to [955] them and exhorted them forcefully to remain steadfast in battle, and told them that they had two possible ways forward: either to be victorious over their enemy or to die gloriously. He ordered them to have their bows bent and strung, and said, "When I give you the order to shoot, let fly at them swiftly with a five-arrow volley (bi-al-banjakān)."[600] The people of Yemen had never seen war arrows before this occasion. Masrūq advanced with a host that appeared limitless, on an elephant, wearing a crown on his head and with a ruby the size of an egg on his forehead; he could not conceive the possibility of anything except victory. Wahriz's sight had become poor through old age, and he said, "Show me their leader." He was informed, "It's the man on the elephant," but then very soon afterward Masrūq got down from the elephant and mounted a horse. So they exclaimed, "He's now mounted a horse." Wahriz said, "Prop open my eyelids"—they had fallen down over his eyes on account of his age[601]—so they held them up with a bandage. He then took out an arrow, placed it in the center (kabid)[602] of his bow and said, "Point out for me Masrūq." They did that for him, until Wahriz was sure of him, and then he gave the order "Shoot!" He himself pulled on his bow until, when he had drawn it to its utmost, he released the arrow. It sped forward as if it were a tightly stretched rope, and struck Masrūq's forehead. He fell from his mount. A great number of men were killed by that rain of arrows. When they saw their commander felled to the ground, their front rank crumbled, and there was nothing for it but flight.

600. This seems to be the meaning here, since Persian panj, "five," is clearly an element of the word, presumably panjagān, "five-fold," in origin. It is presumably related to the banjakiyyah of al-Jawālīqī, al-Mu'arrab, 71: a volley of five arrows, mentioned in a context which speaks of the Khurāsānians. Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 81 n. 7, less plausibly interprets banjakān as referring to five-pointed or five-barbed arrows ("fünfzackige [Pfeile]").

Wahriz immediately gave orders for the burial of his son's corpse, and ordered that Masrūq's corpse be thrown down in its place. Booty was found in the defeated army's encampment in quantities beyond measure and beyond enumeration. Each individual Persian cavalryman got fifty or sixty Abyssinians, Ḥimyarites, or Bedouin as captives, and drove them along, unresisting, before him in bonds. Wahriz said, "Leave the Ḥimyarites and Bedouin alone, just hunt down the blacks and don't leave a single one alive." The Abyssinians were massacred on that day [956] until not a single one of their host remained. A Bedouin managed to flee on his camel and galloped onward day and night. Then he happened to turn round and saw an arrow stuck in his provision bag behind the saddle. He exclaimed, "The devil take it! (literally, "Woe to your mother!")—has it traversed such a wide distance or traveled so far!" He thought that the arrow had caught up with him!

601. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 949, p. 241 above.

602. For the technical term kabid al-qaws (kabid, literally "liver" "center, heart of a thing"), see J. D. Latham and W. F. Paterson, Saracen Archery, 161, 184: exactly, "the point the arrow passes when shot," i.e., the arrow pass.

Wahriz advanced until he entered Ṣan'ā' and reduced to submission the whole land of Yemen. He sent out governors to the provincial districts (makhālīf). Abū al-Ṣalt, the father of Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt al-Thaqafī,[603] says concerning the son of Dhū Yazan, his adventures, and those of Wahriz and the Persians, the following verses:

Let those who are like the son of Dhū Yazan seek vengeance, a man who spent several years traveling across the seas on account of his enemies.

He came to Heraclius, at a time when his enemies were already falling into discord and perturbation, but he did not secure from him any part of what he sought.

Then after seven years he turned toward Kisrā; how far away did you have to travel!

Until at last he brought with him the Free Ones (Banū al-Aḥrār, i.e., the Persians),[604] whom he bore along; by my life, you spent long in strenuous activity!

---

603. Ibn Hishām's scholion to Ibn Isḥāq's text here, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 44 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 67–68, tr. 698, states that some authorities ascribe the poetry to the son Umayyah, who was a contemporary of the Prophet but, on account of the links between al-Ṭā'if and Quraysh, was a supporter of Muḥammad's opponents; he seems to have been dead by the time of the fatḥ, the conquest of Mecca, in 8/630. See Sharḥ dīwān Umayyah, 65; al-Ḥadīthī, Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt, ḥayātuhu wa-shi'ruhu, 344 n. 158; Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe, II, 304–306; Sezgin, GAS, II, 298–300, IX, 277; EI², s.v. Umayya b. Abi 'l-Ṣalt (J. E. Montgomery).

Ibn Hishām's text has for the name Hiraql in v. 2 the more general Qayṣar, "emperor," and if this is the older and better reading, it would point to the poem's being either contemporaneous with the events described or at least written not long afterward, by Abū al-Ṣalt rather than by his son Umayyah. If the reading Hiraql should be correct, then the poem would date from at least one or two generations after the events, since Heraclius reigned 610–41, The reading Hiraql would certainly appear to predate al-Ṭabarī, since it is the one found in the Kitāb al-shi'r wa-al-shu'arā', 281, of Ibn Qutaybah (d. 276/889), repeated also in al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 99.

604. Banū al-aḥrār is a frequent designation in early Arabic usage for the Persians encountered by them along the borders of Iraq and during the conquest of Iraq and Persia, e.g., at the engagements of Dhū Qār (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1036, p. 367 below) and al-Qādisiyyah. We find the equivalent eleutheroi used by Josephus for the Parthians as the equivalent of the social-military Persian term underlaying the Arabic expression, i.e., āzādhagān (in origin, Avestan āzāta-"agnate, born into a clan" "freeman (as opposed to a slave)" and, in a narrower sense, "noble," "free"),

Who is like Kisrā, the supreme king (shahanshāh) over the dependent kings, or like Wahriz on the day of the army, when he attacked furiously!
What a remarkable band went forth! You will never see among men their likes again!
Outstanding warriors, noble chiefs, gleaming ones, marzbāns, [957] lions who train their cubs in the thickets,
Who shoot from highly bent bows, as if they were camel saddles, with long, slim arrows which bring the one who is hit to a speedy death.
You loosed lions against black dogs, and their scattered fugitives have spread through the land in full flight.
So drink with full peace of mind, wearing your crown and reclining high on Ghumdān in a house which you have made [once more] frequented.
Indulge freely in the use of musk, for they (i.e., your enemies) are in complete disarray, and on this day let your two luxurious robes trail freely!
These are noble deeds! Not two wooden bowls of milk mingled with water, which subsequently turned to urine.[605]

---

i.e., noble ones," the class of great and lesser landowners, i.e., aristocrats and gentry, who supplied the military commanders and the élite cavalrymen of the army and upon whom the Persian kings had depended since Achaemenid times. De Blois has suggested that the expression Banū al-aḥrār, with its apparently otiose use of the component banū, reflects Aramaic usage and that the Arabs may have adopted it from Aramaic-speaking population of the Sāsānid empire in Mesopotamia. See Nöldeke, trans. 235 n. 2; De Blois, "'Freemen' and 'Nobles' in Iranian and Semitic Languages," 5–15; EIr, s.v. Aḥrār or Banu 'l-Aḥrār (C. E. Bosworth); and cf. n. 258 above.

605. This last verse has the ring of a proverbial saying. According to the scholion of Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 44 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 68–69, tr. 698, the poem was correctly transmitted by Ibn Isḥāq except for the last verse, actually by the mukhaḍram poet and Companion of the Prophet al-Nābighah al-Ja'dī (died toward the end of the seventh century?), on whom see Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe, III, 477–79; Sezgin, GAS, II, 245–47, IX, 274; *EI*², s.v al-Nābigha al-Dja'dī (A. Arazi).

For other sources on Sayf b. Dhī Yazan's appeal for help and Khusraw Anusharwān's despatch of Wahriz and his army, see al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 187, 226–27; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 64; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 52–53, 114–15; Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, *Aghānī*³, XVII, 308–13; al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 98–99. See also Christensen, Sassanides, 368–69, 373; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 158; Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 606–607. Two further verses of the poem are given by al-Azraqī and Nashwān al-

The story returns to the narrative of Ibn Isḥāq.

He related: Wahriz went back to Kisrā, having appointed Sayf as king of Yemen. The latter now fell upon the Abyssinians and began to kill them, ripping open the pregnant womenfolk to tear out the fetuses, until he had exterminated the Abyssinians, apart from an insignificant, wretched few whom he took into his service as slaves. Some of these he employed as runners to go before him with their spears. Sayf carried on thus only for a short while before he went forth one day, with the Abyssinians running before him with their spears, until suddenly he found himself surrounded by them, and they attacked him with their spears, killing him. One of the Abyssinians assumed power over them, and carried out a policy of killing the Yemenis, creating havoc and wreaking all manner of evil. When news of this reached Kisrā, he dispatched Wahriz against them with four thousand Persian troops and ordered him not to leave alive in Yemen a single black, nor the child of an Arab woman by a black, whether young or old, nor to leave alive a single man with crisp and curly hair in whose generation the blacks had been involved. Wahriz advanced until he entered [958]
Yemen, and did all that, killing every Abyssinian he could find. Then he wrote to Kisrā informing him of what he had done. Kisrā appointed him as viceroy over Yemen. He ruled over it, and levied taxation on it for Kisrā until he died.[606]

After him, Kisrā made his son al-Marzubān, son of Wahriz, viceroy, who governed the land until he died. Then Kisrā appointed al-

---

Ḥimyarī; see Nöldeke, trans. 235 nn. 4–5.

Frye, loc. cit., makes the point that, by the time of the invasion, the pro-Byzantine attitude of the Monophysite Christians in South Arabia, so decisive at the time of the Najrān persecutions and the first Abyssinian intervention in Yemen, changed (i.e., by 570). But in fact, Justin continued his predecessors' policy of tolerance toward religious dissidents during the first five or six years of his reign, and only in 572, i.e., after the Persians had appeared in Yemen, did he start to persecute the Samaritans and Christian Monophysite dissidents under the influence of the Chalcedonian Patriarch of Constantinople, John Sirimis. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 76.

606. According to al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 64, Wahriz governed Yemen for five years. On his deathbed, he shot an arrow, which fell at the spot where his tomb was to be; "to this day," says the historian, "the place is called the maqbarat Wahriz." This same tale is given later by al-Ṭabarī, I, 988, p. 294 below, as part of Ibn al-Kalbī's narrative.

Bīnajān (?), son of al-Marzubān,[607] son of Wahriz, until he also died. Then Kisrā[608] appointed after him Khurrakhusrah, son of al-Bīnajān, son of al-Marzubān, son of Wahriz. The latter governed Yemen, but then Kisrā grew angry with him and swore that the Yemenis should bring Khurrakhusrah to him at his court borne on their shoulders. This they did. When Khurrakhusrah came before Kisrā, one of the Persian great men went right up to him and laid across him a sword that belonged to Kisrā's father. Kisrā therefore granted him security from being killed, but dismissed him from his post and sent Bādhān[609] to Yemen [as governor] instead. Bādhān remained in that office until the time when God sent His Messenger Muḥammad.[610]

[Resumption of the History of Kisrā Anūsharwān]

It is related that there was a peace accord and a truce between Kisrā Anūsharwān and Yakhṭiyānūs (Justinian), king Byzantines. Discord and emnity arose between a man of the Arabs called Khālid b. Jabalah,[611] whom Yakhṭiyānūs had appointed over the

---

607. In Ibn al-Kalbī's version of these events, i.e., in al-Ṭabarī, I, 988, p. 294, and cf. n. 693 below, al-Marzubān appears as al-M.r.w.zān, a better reading, probably to be vocalized as al-Marūzān. Likewise, al-Bīnajān appears as Z.y.n, perhaps for W.y.n, according to the suggestion of Marquart in Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCII, whereas Nöldeke thought it more likely that this consonant ductus contained the names of two persons, W.y.n and W.y.n.jān. But in the version of Ibn Isḥāq at I, 958 n. d, Nöldeke adduced the name of a commander mentioned by the contemporary Byzantine historian Menander Protector, one Binganēs.

608. The Kisrā in question must be, of course, Khusraw II Abarwēz (r. 591–628).

609. Perhaps originally Bādhām, in which case the etymology would be presumably from bādām, "almond." The name is in fact attested in Middle Persian as w'd'm. See Justi, Namenbuch, 56, connecting it with NP bād, Avestan vāta-, the spirit of the wind; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 914; EI[2] Suppl., s.v. Bādhām, Bādhān (C. E. Bosworth).

610. This marks the end of this extended section on the history of Yemen, and the narrative now resumes from Persian sources as a parallel to that already given by al-Ṭabarī at I, 898–99, pp. 157–59 above.

611. That is, the Jafnid/Ghassānid ruler, the greatest of his line, correctly, al-Ḥārith b. Jabalah or Arethas (r. 529–69). (Nöldeke, trans. 238 nn. 2–3, pointed out that al-Ṭabarī's form Khālid arises from the ambiguities of the Pahlavi script, as does the kh for st in Yakhṭiyānūs = Justinian, showing that al-Ṭabarī's ultimate source here must have been a Persian one.) Al-Ḥārith was a redoubtable foederatus or ally of the Byzantines, stemming as he did from a fervently Christian, albeit Monophysite, Arab family. He fought at the side of the Greeks in two major wars, Arabs of Syria, and a man from Lakhm called al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān,[612] whom Kisrā had appointed over the lands extending from 'Umān, al-Baḥrayn and al-Yamāmah to al-Ṭā'if and the rest of Ḥijāz and all the Arabs of the intervening lands. Khālid b. Jabalah raided al-Mundhir's territory and wrought great slaughter among his subjects and seized as plunder extensive lands of his. Al-Mundhir laid a complaint about this before Kisrā, and asked him to write to the king of the Byzantines requesting the latter to secure justice for him against Khālid. Kisrā therefore wrote to [959]

Yakhṭiyānūs mentioning the agreement regarding the truce and peace between the two sides and informing him of what al-Mundhir, his governor over the Arabs [within the Persian sphere of influence], had suffered at the hands of Khālid b. Jabalah, whom Yakhṭiyānūs had appointed governor over the Arabs within his dominions. He further asked him to command Khālid to return all the plunder he had driven off from al-Mundhir's territory and lands and [to command Khālid] to hand over the blood price for the Arabs whom he had killed and who were in al-Mundhir's jurisdiction and to furnish justice to al-Mundhir against Khālid. Yakhṭiyānūs was not to treat what Kisrā had written lightheartedly and contemptuously; [if he were to do so,] then this would be the cause of the rupturing of the agreement and truce between them. Kisrā sent a stream of letters to Yakhṭiyānūs urging him to furnish justice to al-Mundhir, but Yakhṭiyānūs paid no heed.

Hence Kisrā got ready his forces and led an expedition of some ninety thousand warriors against Yakhṭiyānūs's lands.[613] He cap-including at the battle of Callinicum (the Arabic al-Raqqah) in 531, and himself defeated and in 554 killed the Lakhmid al-Mundhir III at the battle of al-Ḥiyār at Chalcis (the Arabic Qinnasrīn) (possibly the yawm Ḥalīmah—Ḥalīmah being al-Ḥārith's daughter—of the Arabic ayyām al-'Arab literature), a decisive victory not merely as an intra-Arab clash but an event which gave the Ghassānids the preponderance over the Lakhmids for a long time to come. See on al-Ḥārith and the battle of Chalcis, Nöldeke, Die Ghassânidische Fürsten, 17–19; Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 83–87; Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century, I/1, 63–82, 134ff., 236–66; *EI*², s.vv. Ghassān and al-Ḥārith b. Djabala (I. Shahîd).

---

612. That is, al-Mundhir III, who played this leading rôle in the extension of Persian power into eastern and central Arabia and, indeed, as far as Ḥijāz. See nn. 409, 563 above.

613. This is the renewed, second war of the Persian emperor with Justinian, spanning 540–45, with the campaign against Antioch already described at I, 898, p. 157 and nn. 398–99 above. The events in question form the very detailed narrative tured by force of arms the towns of Dārā, al-Ruhā (Edessa), Manbij, Qinnasrīn, Aleppo, Antioch (which was the finest town in Syria), Fāmiyah (Apamea), Ḥimṣ (Homs), and numerous other towns in the neighborhood of these towns;[614] he appropriated all the wealth (or: beasts, al-amwāl) and moveable goods in them; and he took captive all the inhabitants of Antioch, deported them to the Sawād, and gave orders for a town to be built for them at the side of Ctesiphon exactly on the pattern of the original Antioch, as I have already mentioned previously. He resettled the people of Antioch there; this is the town called al-Rūmiyyah. He erected this district into an administrative division (kūrah), which was to comprise four subdistricts (ṭassūjs): that of Upper Nahrawān, that of Lower Nahrawān, that of Bādarāyā, and that of Bākusāyā.[615] He allotted of Procopius in the later part of Book I and then Book II of The Persian War, in which the historian highlights the deeds of the general Belisarius, first appointed Magister Militum per Orientem in 529 and whom Procopius himself served as symboulos, i.e., as legal adviser and secretary. See Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, 8, 157–70.

---

614. Of these towns of Upper Jazīrah and northern and central Syria, Nöldeke, trans. 239 n. 2 noted that Aleppo, Antioch, and Apamea (situated on the Orontes, to the northwest of Ḥamāt: see Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 227; Le Strange, Palestine, 384–85; EI², s.v. Afāmiya [H. A. R. Gibb]) were conquered by the force of Persian arms, while Daras/Dārā (see for this n. 398 above), Edessa, Manbij (the classical Hierapolis, an important military post commanding crossings of the upper Euphrates: see Yāqūt, op. cit., V, 205–207; Le Strange, op. cit., 107; EI², s.v. Manbidj [N. Elisséff]), and Qinnasrīn (the classical Chalcis to the south of Aleppo: see Yāqūt, op. cit., IV, 403–404; Le Strange, Palestine, 486–87; EI², s.v. Ḳinnasrīn [Elisséff]) purchased their safety from the Persians by handing over substantial indemnities. Emesa or Ḥimṣ also suffered badly.

615. Nahrawān was the district containing an extensive canal system to the east of the Tigris and in the region of the lower Diyālā river, with its center at the town of Nahrawān, which lay to the northeast of where the later Baghdad was to be situated. The canal system doubtless dates in some form from ancient times, but Khusraw Anūsharwān developed it extensively and caused to be dug a lengthy feeder channel, al-Qāṭūl al-Kisrawī, "the Imperial cut," from the Tigris near the later Sāmarrā to the Diyālā below Ba'qūbā. At various places, there were shādhurwāns or weirs (see for these, n. 94 above) dating from Sāsānid times. The kūrah mentioned here was one created with the city of Weh-Antioch-i Khusraw/Rūmiyyah where the people deported from Antioch in Syria were settled ca. 540. The Arabic sources actually list five ṭassūjs of the Nahrawān kūrah, the additional one being that of Middle Nahrawān. Bādarāyā and Bākusāyā (Aramaic Bēth Darāyā and Bēth Kosāyā) formed the region of Bandanījīn, stretching from the east of Nahrawān to the fringes of the Zagros range and the border with the province of Media or Jibāl. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 317–18, 327, V, 324–27; Le Strange, Lands, 57–61; Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, III, 245–49; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Con-

living allowances for the people whom he had transported from Antioch to al-Rūmiyyah, and appointed as overseer of their affairs [960] a man from the Christian community of Ahwāz called Barāz,[616] whom he had earlier made head of the the artisans and craftsemen working for him. This Kisrā did out of tenderness and sympathy for those captives, and also with the administrative aim of causing them to feel at home with Barāz, because he was their coreligionist, and making them regard him with trust. As for the remainder of the towns of Syria and Egypt,[617] Yakhṭiyānūs bought Kisrā off from them with a very large sum, which he handed over to the Persian king, and he undertook to pay ransom money to him each year in return for Kisrā's undertaking not to raid his lands. He wrote for Kisrā a document enshrining these terms, which he and the Byzantine great men of state sealed officially. They accordingly paid this sum annually.[618]

The rulers of Persia before Kisrā Anūsharwān used to levy land tax (kharāj) on the administrative divisions (kuwar), a third or quarter or fifth or sixth [of their produce], according to the water supply and the degree of cultivation; and poll tax (jizyat al-jamājim) according to a fixed sum.[619] King Qubādh, son of Fayrūz quest, 138–40; *EI*², s.vv. Badra (S. H. Longrigg) and al-Nahrawān (M. J. Morony).

---

616. As explained in n. 393 above, this is the New Persian form of MP Warāz, etc., meaning literally "boar, wild boar," an animal admired for its strength and tenacity; see on it the references in that note.

617. Again, as in al-Ṭabarī, I, 898, p. 158 above, a confusion with the campaign early in the seventh century of Khusraw II Abarwēz.

618. Nöldeke, trans. 240 n. 4, noted that al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 69, names a certain Sharwīn of Dastabā as wakīl or overseer of payment of the tribute, but that there is uncertainty in other sources regarding this personage.

619. Since jumjumah means "skull," its plural use in jizyat al-jamājimah conveys literally the idea of a poll tax. Al-Khwārazmī, Mafātīḥ al-'ulūm, 58, equates māl al-jamājim with māl al-jawālī, that money paid in the first place by non-Muslims expelled from the Arabian peninsula by the caliph 'Umar I but then applied to all Dhimmīs, "Protected peoples," liable to poll tax, whether émigrés or not; see Bosworth, "Abū 'Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the Technical Terms of the Secretary's Art," 132. It has been known for some time, including from Talmudic references to it, that the Sāsānids levied a poll tax (the kargā, kərāgā) as well as a land tax (ṭasqā) and a further land tax (mənātā də malkā, "the king's share"; different from the ṭasqā!), but much remains obscure about this fiscal system. See Grignaschi, "La riforma tributaria di Ḫosrō I e il feudalesimo sassanide," 113–15; Rubin, "The Reforms of Khusro Anūshirwān," 231–32). Whether there was any continuity between this Sāsānid poll tax and the early Islamic jizyah on the Dhimmīs, is unclear; it may have been just one among several contributory strands in ordered, toward the end of his reign, a cadastral survey (masḥ al-arḍ), comprising plains and mountains alike, so that the correct amount of land tax could be levied on the lands.[620] This was carried out, except that Qubādh's death supervened before that survey could be completed. Hence when his son Kisrā succeeded to power, he gave orders for it to be carried through to its end and for an enumeration to be made of date palms, olive trees, and heads (i.e., of those liable to the poll tax). He then ordered his secretaries to calculate the grand total of that, and he issued a general summons to the people. He commanded the secretary responsible for the land tax to read out to them the total tax liabilities from the land and the numbers of date palms, olive trees, and heads. The secretary read all this out to them, after which Kisrā said to them, "We have judged it advisable to establish the rates of taxation (waḍā'i') on the basis of what has been enumerated of the various *jarīb*s of this cadastral survey[621]—date palms, olive trees, and heads—and we ordain that the taxation [961] should be paid in installments spread over the year, in three installments. In this way, sums of money will be stored in our treasuries so that, should any emergency arise along one of our vulnerable frontiers or on any one of our distant boundaries, a breach of the borders or anything else untoward, and we have a need to deal with it and to nip it in the bud, involving the expenditure of money on this, we shall have money stored up here, ready and to the emergence of this Islamic tax. See Nöldeke, trans. 241 n. 1; Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, 15, 132, 141.

---

620. Such surveys were frequently used by later, Islamic rulers as the bases for new tax assessments, involving the assessment of growing crops (takhmīn) and the sharing out of the harvested crop between the tax collector and the cultivator (muqāsamah), the technique of surveying being called misāḥah. See *EI*², s.vv. Ḳānūn. ii. Cadaster (Cl. Cahen), Kharādj. I. In the Central and Western Islamic Lands (Cahen) and Misāḥa. 1. In the Central Islamic Lands (C. E. Bosworth).

621. Al-Khwārazmī, Mafātīḥ al-'ulūm, 66, 67, tr. in Bosworth, "Abū 'Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the Technical Terms of the Secretary's Art," 148–49, states that the jarīb was a measurement of surface area equaling thirty-six hundred square *dhirā'*s or cubits, although of a fluctuating equivalence in Khurāsān. The jarīb was, in fact, the basic measurement for area in early Islamic times, still in use today in Persia, officially equaling one hectare, as well as being a measure of capacity for grain, etc.; but in origin it was the amount of agricultural land which could be sown with a jarīb's measure of grain. See Nöldeke, trans. 242 n. 2; *EI*², s.v. Misāḥa. 1.

hand, since we do not wish to have to levy a fresh installment of taxation for that emergency. So what do you think about the procedure we have envisaged and agreed upon?"

None of those present offered him any further advice or uttered a single word. Kisrā repeated these words to them three times. Then a man stood up from out of the expanse of persons present and said to Kisrā, "O king—may God grant you long life!—are you estabishing a perpetual basis for this land tax on transient foundations: a vine that may die, land sown with corn that may wither, a water channel that may dry up, and a spring or qanāt whose water supply may be cut off?" Kisrā replied, "O troublesome, ill-omened fellow, what class of people do you come from?" The man said, "I am one of the secretaries." Kisrā gave orders, "Have him beaten with ink holders (al-dawā) until he dies."[622] Hence the secretaries in particular beat him with their ink holders, seeking to disassociate themselves, in Kisrā's eyes, from the man's views and utterance, until they killed him. The people said, "O king, we are in full agreement with the land tax which you are imposing on us."

Kisrā chose some men of sound judgment and wise counsel, and ordered them to investigate the various types of crops the cadastral survey had revealed for him, the numbers of date palms and olive trees, and the numbers of heads of those liable for the poll tax. On that basis, they were to fix the rates of taxation by the yardsticks of what they perceived would ensure the well-being of his subjects and ample means of sustenance for them. They were to report the results of this to him. Each man of them now spoke, according to the measure of his perception, regarding those rates [962] of taxation which were to be fixed. They discussed the matter among themselves at length, and finally agreed to base the land tax on the products that maintained alive men and beasts, these being: wheat, barley, rice, grapes, trefoil and clover (riṭāb),[623] date

622. These would be ink holders of what later became the typical Islamic pattern, with a heavy head to hold the actual ink and with a handle. This secretary courageous enough to protest against Khusraw's measures is making the point adumbrated in n. 624 below: that fixed rate taxes will leave the cultivator at the mercy of crop failures or natural disasters, which will make him unable to find the money demanded.

623. As Nöldeke, trans. 244 n. 1, notes, al-Mas'ūdī in his Murūj, II, 204–205 = § 627, specifies that Anūsharwān's land-tax measures were only for Iraq, the richest palms, and olive trees. They fixed the land tax rate for every jarīb of land planted with trefoil and clover, seven dirhams; on every four Persian date palms, one dirham; on every six date palms of lesser quality (daqal), the same figure; and every six olive tree stacks, the same figure. They only levied tax on date palms planted in enclosures or grouped together, not those growing as isolated trees. Everything apart from these seven types of crops from the earth they left tax free, and the people were to have a satisfactory standard of life from them.[624] province of the empire. He also explains the stress on the annual fodder plants trefoil and clover (raṭbah, pl. riṭāb = Persian aspist) from the outstanding importance of horses in an army composed essentially of cavalrymen.

---

624. This land-tax reform was really begun by Kawād I but completed by Khusraw Anūsharwān. Previously, the land tax had been proportional to the harvest, but this basis, though apparently fair, had the disadvantage that the cultivators' harvested crop might rot before the state's assessor could arrive and extract the ruler's share. Hence a fixed unit of the land, the jarīb, was now taken as the basis for assessment, and from the ruler's point of view, such a reform was highly advantageous since it gave promise of a fixed and predictable income from taxation. It was, however, less advantageous to the cultivator (despite what could be said, as noted above, about the possibility of the crop rotting or failing before the state's assessor arrived). Whatever the yield from his crops, he was obliged to pay the fixed sum stipulated, might have to sell his harvest at a time of glut and low prices, or borrow money at excessive interest, and could thus be left either starving or burdened with debt. See D. C. Dennett, Conversion and the Poll Tax in Early Islam, 14–15; Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, 110, 117, 119; Crone, "Kavād's Heresy and Mazdak's Revolt," 33–34.

The topic of Anūsharwān's land-tax reforms, involving such questions as the stimulus for them (did the Mazdakite movement play any rôle here?), the precise nature of the reforms, and their social effects, has been long recognized as a crucial episode in Sāsānid history, one with repercussions that continued into the early Islamic period for the land and fiscal systems in the Persian lands and Iraq.

Al-Ṭabarī's account is basic, and is largely corroborated by the poetic one in Firdawsī's Shāh-nāmah; the ultimate source must have been the Khwadāy-nāmag, as also for al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 71–72, in his parallel section on the land tax in the time of Anūsharwān. But the Italian scholar Mario Grignaschi has, in a series of publications, drawn attention to several other little-known but relevant sources. These include the anonymous Nihāyat al-arab fī akhbār al-Furs wa-al-'Arab, in the past attributed to the philologist al-Aṣma'ī but in fact by some unknown author of the third/ninth century, still substantially unpublished (but see below), and rejected by Nöldeke, trans. 475–76, as an inferior version of al-Dīnawarī's Long Histories. See Grignaschi, "La Nihāyatu l-'arab fī aḫbāri-l-Furs wa-l-'Arab (première partie)," 15–67; idem, "La Nihāyatu 'l-arab fī aḫbāri l-Furs wa-l-'Arab et les Siyaru mulūki l-'Aǧam du Ps. Ibn al-Muqaffa'," 83–102. There is further a Sīrat Anūshirwān, which claims to be the emperor's autobiography and which is preserved within the text of the Būyid historian Mis-

They imposed the poll tax on everyone except for people from noble families, great men, warriors, hērbadhs, secretaries, and those in the king's service, and made them liable for it according to four levels, of twelve, eight, six, and four dirhams according to the richness or poverty of the person in question.[625] The poll tax kawayh's Tajārib al-umam. See Grignaschi, "Quelques spécimens de la littérature sassanide conservée dans les bibliothèques d'Istanbul," 16–45.

---

Grignaschi used these sources in his closely argued article "La riforma tributaria di Ḫosrō I e il feudalesimo sassanide," 87–138, to which he appended the texts of relevant extracts from the above-mentioned Sīrat Anūshirwān and the Nihāyat al-arab bearing on Khusraw's reforms. The topic has been recently subjected to a thoroughgoing analysis by Zeev Rubin in his "The Reforms of Khusro Anūshirwān," 227–97. Rubin compares the relevant sections of al-Ṭabarī, the Nihāyah, and al-Dīnawarī and notes that the account of the Nihāyah is perceptibly less favorable to Khusraw than al-Ṭabarī's: instead of the vigorous, single-minded monarch of the latter historian, the Nihāyah's Khusraw emerges as a somewhat hesitant person who has to explain and justify his proposed reforms. All three accounts neverthless seem to go back to a common tradition put together in early 'Abbāsid times within Shu'ūbī circles.

The social and political chaos of the decades before Khusraw's accession were obviously a stimulus for the fiscal reforms begun by Kawād and carried through by his son. Rubin also avers that we should examine the reforms against the background of the general economic situation of the Sāsānid state. First, it benefited from the commerce of the Orient, which had largely to pass through its territories or through Indian Ocean and Arabian Sea waters which the Persian could controled en route for the Mediterranean world. Nor were the financial subsidies that the Byzantine empire had to pay as the price of peace in the Near East negligible contributions to the economic health of Persia. Second, the fiscal reforms should be considered together with Khusraw's military reforms, already examined by Geo Widengren as part of his general survey of the Persian army as a feudal force from Achaemenid to Sāsānid times (see his "Recherches sur le feudalisme iranien," 152–74. There is also particular detail on military affairs in the Sīrat Anūshīrwān, see Grignaschi, "Quelques spécimens de la littérature sassanide conservée dans les bibliothèques d'Istanbul," 20–21). Despite the envisaged rise in revenue yields envisaged by the reforms, there does not seem ever to have been enough money available to finance a large, professional army of mailed cavalrymen directly recruited and paid by the monarch and freeing him from dependence on the military services of the great noble families of Persia and their retinues. Hence there seems to have evolved the practice of bringing in manpower from non-Persian, mercenary sources, such as Turks and Hephthalites from Central Asia and Bactria, Daylamīs from the Elburz mountain region, and Arabs from the desert fringes of Iraq. Khusraw was here continuing a process already begun under Kawād, who had regained his throne and been kept in power by the backing of Hephthalite mercenaries, links with the Hephthalites having been forged during his enforced exile within their lands in the 490s.

Finally, the course and development of Khusraw's fiscal system are briefly touched upon by Rubin. The system must have changed even within the course of his long reign, and was already showing signs of decay by the end of that time. The

was not to be levied on those below twenty or above fifty years of age. They brought their tax assessments before Kisrā; he approved them and ordered them to be put into force and for tax collecting to be done on their basis annually, in three installments each of four months. These he called '.b.rās.yār (?), meaning "an arrangement mutually agreed upon by all."[626] It was these tax assessments 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb followed when he conquered the Persian lands and levied taxation on the "protected peoples" (ahl al-dhimmah) there, except that he levied taxation on every uncultivated (ghāmir) piece of land according to its potential yield, at the same rate as he levied on sown land. Also, he levied on every jarīb [963] of land growing wheat or barley from one to two additional *qafīz*s control system of the provincial judges, in fact district mōbadhs of the Zoroastrian state church (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 963, p. 261 below) probably proved no less susceptible to corrupt practices than any other officials in a similar situation. Under Khusraw's son and successor Hormizd IV, the great military families of the provinces gained excessive opportunities for exploiting the peasantry, and Rubin speculates that Hormizd's reputed violence against the military aristocracy (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 988–89, p. 295 below) may have been a desperate attempt to stem corruption and oppression and to salvage something of Khusraw's sytem. The cataclysmic events toward the end of Khusraw II Abarwēz's reign must have plunged the system into deeper malfunction. It nevertheless survived intact enough to be taken over by the Muslims when they overran Iraq and Persia, basically as the misāḥah system, but was at least in part converted into muqāsamah in the early 'Abbāsid period, a reversion to the system before the reforms of Kawād and Anūsharwān. See Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, 109–13.

---

625. The poll tax (see n. 619 above) had previously been a fixed sum that the assessors and collectors had had to divide out as best they could. The exemptions for the royal family, aristocracy, soldiers (al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 71, specifies here marāzibah and asāwirah [al-Ṭabarī has, less specifically, for these two classes 'uẓamā' and muqātilah] and kuttāb), secretaries, and the Zoroastrian priests increased their position as privileged castes. While the tax liabilities of the middle and lower classes were theoretically meant to compensate for the royal service and religious duties that they were unable to perform, in practice, payment of these taxes amounted to an acknowledgment of social inferiority. As mentioned in n. 619 above, the existence of this Sāsānid institution may have been a contributory factor when the nascent Islamic state evolved the poll tax (jizyah) and applied it to the Dhimmīs as a mark of their social and religious degradation and second-class citizenship compared with the Muslim Arabs, but this is speculative.

626. This term is wholly obscure. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 71, says that the warehouses where the three installments of collected produce were stored were called sarāy simarrah (text, shimarrah), i.e., "house for the three (sic) times (marrah) [of collection]"; cf. the loan word in Arabic samarjā or samaraj, see Asya Asbaghi, Persische Lehnwörter im Arabischen, 165: "Steuer in drei Stufen."

of wheat; this he used for feeding his army.[627] But in the specific case of Iraq, 'Umar did not make any arrangements contrary to those of Kisrā regarding the jarībs of land and regarding the date palms, olive trees, and the heads [of those liable to the poll tax], and he excluded from liability to taxation the people's means of daily sustenance, as Kisrā had done.[628]

Kisrā ordered the new tax assessments to be written down in several copies. One copy was to be kept in his own chancery close at his hand; one copy was sent to the land-tax collectors ('ummāl al-kharāj) for them to collect taxation on its basis; and another copy was sent to the judges of the administrative divisions (quḍāt al-kuwar). The judges were charged with the duty of intervening between the tax collectors and the people if the tax collectors in the administrative districts attempted to raise an additional sum above the amount laid down in the master copy of the tax assessment in the chancery, of which they had received a copy. Also, the judges were to exempt from land tax those whose tillage or other tax-attracting produce had been damaged or badly affected in any way, according to the seriousness of that damage or defect. Regarding those persons liable for the poll tax who had died, or who had passed the age of fifty, collecting the taxation was likewise suspended; the judges were to write back to Kisrā about the tax exemptions here, which they had granted so that Kisrā might issue appropriate instructions to his tax collectors. Furthermore,

627. As with the jarīb, the qafīz was a measure both of surface area (one-tenth of a jarīb, i.e., 360 square *dhirā'*s or cubits, according to al-Khwārazmī, Mafātīḥ al-'ulūm, 66) and also one of capacity (ibid. 67–68, giving the varying equivalences of the basically Iraqi qafīz for different parts of the Persian lands, where the manā was the normal measure for capacity). See Nöldeke, trans. 246 n. 6; Bosworth, "Abū 'Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the Technical Terms of the Secretary's Art," 148–50, citing information from W. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte umgerechnet ins metrische System, 16–23.

628. On 'Umar's misāḥah, see Dennett, Conversion and the Poll Tax in Early Islam, 22ff., and Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, 119–20. Regarding 'Umar's procedure over the land tax, there are actually contradictory reports in the Arabic sources concerned with the postconquest Sawād of Iraq. Thus according to al-Māwardī, 'Umar imposed on the Sawād a flat rate of one dirham and one qafīz of produce for the provisioning of the Arab warriors (but in other parts of Iraq, the rate varied according to the crop); but according to Abū Yūsuf, 'Umar taxed land according to the crop grown there. In reality, the disparity only arises, suggested Dennett, because the two viewpoints reflect changes in 'Umar's prescriptions here.

the judges were not to let the tax collectors levy taxation on persons aged less than twenty.[629]

Kisrā had appointed over the department of the warriors (dīwān al-muqātilah) a man from the secretarial class who was outstanding for his noble birth, martial virtues, sufficiency, and capability, called Bābak, son of '.l.y.r.wān (?).[630] This last said to Kisrā, "My function cannot properly be carried out unless I have a free hand at putting into practice what seems best to me for the good conduct of the king's affairs in regard to his army." Kisrā granted Bābak this. Bābak now gave orders for the construction of a platform in the place where army reviews were customarily held, carpets from Sūsanjird and woolen rugs were laid on it, and cushions provided for him to lean back upon. He then took up his place on all those coverings.

Bābak's herald now proclaimed throughout those troops present [964] in Kisrā's army camp that the cavalrymen were to present themselves before him for inspection on their mounts and with their weapons, and the infantrymen with their requisite weapons. The troops massed together in front of him in the manner Bābak had stipulated they were to parade, but he did not see Kisrā present in their ranks, so he told them to go back. His herald made the same proclamation on the next day, and the troops gathered round him again; but when he still could not discern Kisrā among them, he told them to go back and reappear before him next morning. He instructed his herald to proclaim on the third day, "Let no one present in the army camp lag behind, even if he is honored by possessing a crown and a throne," for Bābak had resolved that there should be no exception in his favor and no partiality shown to him (i.e., to Kisrā). The message reached Kisrā, and he placed the crown on his head, girded on the weapons of a soldier, and then went along to Bābak so that he might present himself for inspection by him.

The equipment that a cavalryman of the army had to take along with him comprised horse mail, soldier's mailed coat, breastplate,

629. These judges from the religious institution were presumably mōbadhs who administered the Zoroastrian church law; here they are charged with protecting the taxpayers from tyranny and exploitation by the taxcollectors.

630. Nöldeke, trans. 247, though that this name might be Bīrawān (?); it is equally corruptly written in al-Dīnawarī's passage on the Sāsānid army review, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 72–73, as al-Nahrawān.

leg armor plates, sword, lance, shield, mace, and, fastened at his waist, a girdle, battle axe, or club, a bow case containing two bows with their strings, thirty arrows, and finally, two plaited cords, which the rider let hang down his back from his helmet.[631] Kisrā presented himself for inspection before Bābak with his weapons all complete except for the two cords he was supposed to tie on his back. Bābak did not pass over his name, but said to him, "O king, you are standing in such a place where all are treated equally, where no partiality on my part can be shown nor any relaxation! So step forward with all the requisite kinds of weapons!" At that point, Kisrā remembered the matter of the two cords, so he let them hang down.

Bābak's herald now sang out in a loud voice, saying, "For the brave warrior, lord of brave warriors, four thousand and one dirhams,"[632] and Bābak passed over his name. Then the king returned home. Now Bābak used to give the king a pay rate superior to that of the rest of the soldiers by one dirham. When Bābak got [965] up from his seat [on the platform], he went to Kisrā and told him, "The lack of consideration that I showed you today, O king, was only so that the function with which you charged me could be thereby properly discharged, because the most secure way of achieving the king's aim is his making my office as firmly based as possible." Kisrā replied, "We don't regard as any lack of consideration for us a procedure that I desire for the furtherance of the welfare of my subjects and by means of which the injury of an injured person may be set right."[633]

---

631. Nöldeke, trans. 248 n. 2, noted that Firdawsī adds to the list the lassoo, characteristic of steppe-dwelling herdsmen, and mentioned by Herodotus, VII. 85, as a weapon of the Iranian tribe of the Sagartians, possibly to be located in northeastern Persia.

632. The "and one" is supplied from the parallel passage in al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 73, as done by Nöldeke in trans. 249, cf. n. 1, and noted in text, n. e; without this amendment, the point made just afterward is lost.

633. Bābak's rôle as head of the military department corresponds to that of the ʿāriḍ who presided over the department of the army, dīwān al-jaysh, dīwān al-jund, in the ʿAbbāsid caliphate and the dīwān al-ʿarḍ in such successor states to it in the Persian lands as those of the Sāmānids, Ṣaffārids, Būyids, and Ghaznavids. The institution of regular inspections of troops was probably an ancient one in Persia. According to Widengren, in Achaemenid times, the Persian army had a rallying point, apparently termed the handaisa-* < handēz, corresponding to Xenophon's exetasis, and there was a secretary, the rēš dupšarri ša ūqu who fulfilled the rôle of Bābak here. From the evidence of the Bablyonian Talmud, the Kisrā now dispatched to Yemen an army under the command of a man from the people of Yemen called Sayfān b. Ma'dī Karib—some authorities aver, however, that he was called Sayf b. Dhī Yazan—which killed the blacks there (i.e., the Abyssinians) and conquered the land.[634] Having secured the submission of the land of Yemen, Kisrā sent one of his commanders, with a numerous army, against Sarandīb, the land of precious stones, in the land of India.[635] The commander attacked its king, killed him, and seized control of it, sending back from there to Kisrā abundant wealth and many jewels.

In the land of Persia there were no jackals (banāt āwā),[636] but related term andesaq seems to have been used in Arsacid times. The account given here by al-Ṭabarī and also by al-Dīnawarī of the Sāsanīd army inspection is distinctly imaginative in its details, and can hardly be accepted as firm evidence for detailed Sāsānid practice here. Yet it is likely that there was some department of the bureaucracy concerned with the army and its standard of effectiveness, and precampaign inspections of the Persian army, in the presence of the monarch and the commanders appointed to lead that expedition, are mentioned by Procopius (Christensen, Sassanides, 213–14). The Sīrat Anūshirwān mentions these reviews held by the emperor, and says that they took place in the presence of the qā'id or commander, the pādhguspān or commander-in-chief of the force (the later ispahbadh), the qāḍī or judge, and a trusty secretary appointed directly by the king (amīn min qibalinā). See Widengren, "Recherches sur le feudalisme iranien," 152ff.; Grignaschi, "Quelques spécimens de la littérature sassanide conservée dans les bibliothèques d'Istanbul," 20 and n. 48.

---

For the Islamic period, we have a detailed account of the 'arḍ as practiced in the Ṣaffārid army under 'Amr b. al-Layth (r. 265–87/879–900) in which the Amīr, like Khusraw Anūsharwān, had to be inspected by the 'āriḍ and passed fit for service just like every other soldier. The authority for this is al-Sallāmī, author of a lost history of the governors of Khurāsān, cited in Ibn Khallikān's Wafayāt al-a'yān. Ibn Khallikān juxtaposes this with al-Ṭabarī's account of the Sāsānid inspection in the time of Anūsharwān (actually cited via the historian of Aleppo Ibn al-'Adīm), and notes the similarity between the two procedures. A modern historian like Barthold observed that the resemblances could hardly be coincidental. See Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, VI, 421–23, tr. de Slane, IV, 322–24; W. Barthold, Turkestan Down to the Mongol Invasion[3], 221; Bosworth, "The Armies of the Ṣaffārids," 549–50.

634. This seems to be a purely Persian piece of historical information, perhaps compressed by al-Ṭabarī because of its contradictions with the story of Wahriz's South Arabian expedition given by him at considerable length in I, 952–58, p. 245–51 above. According to Nöldeke, trans. 250 n. 1, we should correct the text's Sayfān (which in Persian would mean "son of Sayf") to Sayf b. Dhī Yazan.

635. Sarandīb was the name given to the island of Ceylon in mediaeval Islamic geographical and historical literature; see EI[2], s.v. Sarandīb (C. E. Bosworth). It was famed in Islamic lore for its supposed wealth. The story of a Sāsānid conquest of Ceylon is, of course, pure legend.

636. The jackal (canis aureus or anthus, in Persian, shaghāl) is in fact widely distributed today in Persia. See Naval Intelligence Division. Admiralty Handbooks, Persia, 209–10.

some of them infiltrated into Persia from the land of the Turks during the reign of Kisrā Anūsharwān. News of this reached Kisrā, and caused him anguish. He summoned the Chief Mōbadh and told him, "We have heard about the appearance of those wild beasts in our land, and it has distressed the people. We are, however, astonished that they consider such an insignificant occurrence as so portentous; tell us what you think about all this." The Chief Mōbadh replied, "O king—may God grant you long life—I have heard our scholars learned in the divine law say that, so long as justice does not overlay tyranny in a land and itself becomes obliterated, the people of that land will be afflicted by incursions of their enemies against them, and all sorts of unpleasant things will gradually come upon them. I have become afraid lest the infiltration of these wild beasts into your land is connected with what I have just told you." Very soon afterward, the news reached [966] Kisrā that a band of Turkish youths had raided the furthest boundaries of his land. He ordered his ministers and provincial governors not to go beyond what was just in the course of their official duties and not to act in any way during the course of those duties except justly. Because of this policy of acting justly, God deflected that enemy from Kisrā's land without his having to make war on them or to undertake great trouble in repelling them.[637]

Kisrā had several handsomely educated sons. From out of those, he appointed as his successor to the throne Hurmuz, whose mother was the daughter of Khātūn and Khāqān,[638] because he knew Hurmuz to be a person who would act with circumspection and fidelity to his word, and because he hoped through this appointment that Hurmuz would keep the kingdom in order and would show strength in directing the government of the land and in ruling over the subjects and treating them suitably.[639]

---

637. The story of an invasion of jackals into Iraq appears in al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 74, but with no mention of an incursion of Turkish youths; here, the depredations of the jackals are attributed to the existence of tyranny and injustice within Anūsharwān's lands, remedied by his appointing a commission of thirteen agents to enquire into the matter, as a result of which the king executed ninety evil officials pour décourager les autres. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 251 n. 1.

638. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 899, p. 160 above.

639. Anūsharwān's designation of Hormizd [IV] sprang no doubt from his mother's royal birth. According to such sources as al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 74–75, and al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 187, the king passed over his other sons because they had mothers of lowly origin and were only awlād sūqah, and chose Hormizd after

The birth of the Messenger of God took place during the reign of Kisrā Anūsharwān, in the year when Abrahah al-Ashram Abū Yaksūm marched against Mecca with the Abyssinians, bringing with him the elephant, having the intention of demolishing the Holy House of God. It happened after forty-two years of Kisrā Anūsharwān's reign had elapsed.[640] In this same year also was the carefully observing his worthy behavior. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 252 n. 3.

---

640. This would make it the year 573. The question of the birth date of Muḥammad is unusually speculative and controversial. A key point is what al-Ṭabarī mentions here, i.e., the date of Abrahah's expedition against Mecca in the "Year of the Elephant," with which the Prophet's birth date is held to coincide. But since the early Islamic historical tradition does not date this expedition, a date of 570 has been calculated backward from the fact that Muḥammad's first call to prophethood, the mabḥath, fell approximately in 610 and from the saying that he was about forty years old when he received this call.

However, this date of 570, while repeated in many of the biographies of Muḥammad, is contradicted both by evidence outside the Islamic tradition, principally from what we know about South Arabian history in the mid-sixth century, and by some reports within the Islamic tradition, which give widely differing dates up to twenty years after the "Year of the Elephant." Already more than 120 years ago, Nöldeke, trans. 204 n. 2, saw that the traditional dating was untenable, adducing among other things Ibn al-Kalbī's assertion that Muḥammad's birth was twenty-three years after Abrahah's expedition (also in his Geschichte des Qorāns, I, 67–70). Lammens pointed out that, if one takes ten years off the traditional birth date of 570, i.e., placing Muḥammad's birth in 580 so that he was fifty-two years old when he died, there is a correspondence with the date for the Prophet's death given by Barhebraeus in his Mukhtaṣar Ta'rīkh al-Duwal, ed. A. Ṣāliḥānī, Beirut 1890, 160, i.e., 892 of the Seleucid era = A.D. 580 (unfortunately Barhebraeus does not say how he acquired this date); see Lammens, "L'âge de Mahomet et la chronologie de la Sîra," 239–40. Various Islamic traditions stating that Muḥammad was not born in the "Year of the Elephant" have been listed by Kister, see n. 563 above. What we know of Abrahah's policy in pushing his dominion northward from Yemen into Ḥijāz and central Arabia places his activities in the 550s, as attested by the well of Murayghān inscription from 552–53. Whether an attack on Mecca was part of the campaign of Abrahah to Ḥulubān or another campaign mounted into Ḥijāz shortly afteward is discussed in n. 563 above. All in all, it does not seem feasible to uphold the date of 570 as being that of the Prophet's birth. Furthermore, L. I. Conrad, in a detailed discussion of the whole topic, has pointed out how little interested were the Arabs of north and central Arabia in questions of firm dating and chronology, seen in the vagueness and confusedness over the chronological order and relationship to each other of the ayyām al-'Arab, the battles of the pre-Islamic Arabs. Hence the figure of forty years for Muḥammad's life before his call to nubuwwah—apart from the fact that "forty" is a literary topos in both ancient and mediaeval times for a number with connotations of perfection, completion, and culmination—must be regarded as a symbolic rather than a chronologically exact one. See his "Abraha and Muḥammad. Some Observations Apropos of Chronology and Literary Topoi in the Early Arabic Historical Tradition," 225–40.

"Day of Jabalah," one of the celebrated "days" (i.e., battles) of the Arabs.[641]

641. Jabalah, an isolated mountain in Najd some 150 km/90 miles south of 'Unayzah (al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, II, 365–66; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 104), was the scene of the yawm [shi'b] Jabalah or yawm al-Nūq between 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah and 'Abs on one side, and Tamīm, supported by Dhubyān, Asad, a contingent from al-Ḥīrah and men of Kindah from the Āl Jawnah then ruling in Baḥrayn (see n. 312 above), accounted as one of the most celebrated battles of the Arabs. 'Āmir and their allies were victorious, and one result was the shattering of Kindī power in Najd (see Olinder, "Āl al-Ğaun of the Family of Ākil al-Murār," 214–25; because two members of the line of Jawn took part in the battle, the encounter is also known as the yawm al-Jawnayn). The historical traditions vary concerning the date of the "Day of Jabalah"; some place it in the year of Muḥammad's birth, others seventeen or nineteen years before that. In reality, if the Lakhmid king who sent a contingent was, as the historical traditions say, al-Nu'mān (III) b. al-Mundhir (IV), then the date cannot be before 580, the year of his accession. See Caskel, Aijām al-'Arab. Studien zur altarabischen Epik, 11, 34, 36–37, 62, translating at 95–97 part of the Naqā'iḍ Jarīr wa-al-Farazdaq, II, 654ff., describing the "Day"; *EI*², s.vv. Djabala (F. Buhl-R. L. Headley), Shi'b Djabala (I. Shahîd).

Mention of the Birth of the Messenger of God

There related to us Ibn al-Muthannā—Wahb b. Jarīr—his father, who said: I heard Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh b. Qays b. Makhramah—his father—his grandfather, who said:
[967] The Messenger of God and myself were born in the Year of the Elephant.

He related: ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān asked Qubāth b. Ashyam, a member of the Banū ʿAmr b. Layth, "Who is the greater in build (akbar), you or the Messenger of God?" He replied, "The Messenger of God is greater in build than I, although I preceded him in date of birth (anā aqdam minhu fī al-mīlād); I saw the elephant's dung, dark colored and reduced to a powdery form, one year after the beast's appearance. I also saw Umayyah b. ʿAbd Shams as a very old man being led around by his slave." His son said, "O Qubāth, you have the best knowledge; what do you say?"

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh b. Qays b. Makhramah—his father—his grandfather Qays b. Makhramah, who said: The Messenger of God and myself were born in the Year of the Elephant, and we were coevals of each other.

There was narrated to me a narrative going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said: ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, the Messenger of God's father, was born in the twenty-fourth year of Kisrā Anūsharwān's period of power, and the Messenger of God was born in the forty-second year of his period of power.[642]

642. That is, ʿAbdallāh would have been born, on this reckoning, in 555 and his son Muḥammad in 573.

I was informed by Yūsuf b. Mu'īn—Ḥajjāj b. Muḥammad—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās, who said: The Messenger of God was born in the Year of the Elephant.

I was informed by Ibrāhīm b. al-Mundhir—'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Thābit—al-Zubayr b. Mūsā—Abū al-Ḥuwayrith, who said: I heard 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān say to Qubāth b. Ashyam al-Kinānī al-Laythī, O Qubāth, who is the greater in body, you or the Messenger of God?" He replied, "The Messenger of God was greater in body than me, but I am older than him. The Messenger of God was born in the Year of the Elephant, and my mother stood with me by a pile of the elephant's dung, when it was crumbling away to powder, at a time when I was nevertheless able to understand what it was."

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: The Messenger of God was born in the Year of the Elephant, [968] on Monday, the twelfth of the month of Rabī' I. It is said that he was born in the house known as that of Ibn Yūsuf. It is further said that the Messenger of God gave this house to 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib, who retained ownership of it until he died, when his son sold it to Muḥammad b. Yūsuf, brother of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. Muḥammad rebuilt the house called that of Ibn Yūsuf, and incorporated that new part into the house as a whole. Later, al-Khayzurān separated the new part from the house as a whole and made it into a mosque, which then came into use for public worship.[643]

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: Among what people relate is the assertion—but God is the most knowing [about the truth]—that Āminah bt. Wahb, the Messenger of God's mother, used to relate that when she became pregnant, people came to her and said, "You are bearing the lord of this community (sayyid hādhihi al-ummah), and when he drops to the ground [from you], exclaim, 'I seek refuge in the One God—from the evil of every envious one,' and then name him Muḥammad." When she was pregnant with him, she dreamed that there came forth from her a light, by which she could discern the fortresses (quṣūr) of Buṣrā in the land of Syria.[644] When she actually gave birth to him, she sent a message to the child's grandfather 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib: "A baby boy has been born for you, so come and see him." He indeed came along and saw the child, and she told him about the dream she had had while pregnant with the child, what had been told her regarding him and what she had been commanded to call the child.[645]

643. Muḥammad had made this house over to 'Alī's half-brother 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib when he left Mecca on the Hijrah to Medina; with al-Khayzurān's purchase of it, the house returned to the family of Hāshim. See al-Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 422; Nabia Abbott, Two Queens of Baghdad, Mother and Wife of Hārūn al-Rashīd, 118–19.

There related to us Muḥammad b. Sinān al-Qazzāz—Ya'qūb b. Muḥammad al-Zuhrī—'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Imrān—'Abdallāh b.

---

644. Buṣrā or Boṣrā was an ancient town of the Ḥawrān in southern Syria, to the south of the modern Jabal al-Durūz. At the time of Muḥammad's birth it was an important center of Byzantine power and of Eastern Christianity. Muslim legend later made the Arabs' capture of Buṣrā, the first town of the Byzantines to fall into their hands, into a sign of divine favor for Muḥammad's mission. It also had a continued fame as the place to which the youthful Muḥammad is said to have journeyed in the company of his uncle Abū Ṭālib and where he is said to have met the Christian monk Baḥīrā or Buḥayrā, who foretold the boy's coming greatness as a prophet. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 441–42; Le Strange, Palestine, 425–26; T. Andrae, Die Person Muhammeds in Lehre und Glauben seiner Gemeinde, 38; M. Lings. Muhammad, His Life based on the Earliest Sources, 29–30; *EI*², s.vv. Baḥīrā and Boṣrā (A. Abel).

645. Āminah bt. Wahb b. 'Abd al-Manāf was from the Meccan clan of Zuhrah. Her apparently uxorilocal marriage with 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib was ended by the latter's premature death (see n. 662 below), and she herself died when Muḥammad was only six years old, leaving him to his paternal grandfather's care. See *EI*², s.v. Āmina (W. M. Watt). Popular belief and lore in early Islam attributed various supernatural details to Aminah's pregnancy and the birth of Muḥammad, including the story of the dream of divine radiance, "the light of prophethood," the averring that she was bearing "the lord of this community," and the remarkable ease of her giving birth to him, clean, with cut umbilical cord and circumcised, after which the infant placed his hands on the ground and gave thanks to heaven. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 102, 106 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 166–67, 175, tr. 69, 72; Ibn Sa'd, Kitāb al-Ṭabaqāt al-kabīr, I/1, 60–61, 63–64. On the topic of Muḥammad's being born circumcised and the fact that, according to some traditions, Muḥammad was only one of a series of prophets born circumcised, see Kister, " . . . And he was born circumcised. . . . ' Some Notes on Circumcision in Ḥadīth," 10–30 and esp. 13–16.

Modern scholars have pointed out the resemblance of many of these details to the stories of the birth and early life of other great religious leaders. Thus the nūr muḥammadī parallels the old Iranian idea of the divine fortune or glory of kings, xvarənah, MP farrah, NP farr (see n. 232 above), which manifested itself, according to the account in the Dēnkard, at the time of Zoroaster's birth, and the light at the births of Krishna and the Buddha, while the announcement of Aminah's forthcoming delivery of a child is like that of Mary glorying in her conception of Jesus in the Magnificat. See I. Goldziher, "Neuplatonische und gnostische Elemente im Ḥadīt," 328–30; Andrae, Die Person Muhammeds, 28–33, 319–21; idem, Mohammed, sein Leben und Glaube, 28–29

'Uthmān b. Abī Sulaymān b. Jubayr b. Muṭ'im—his father—Ibn Abī Suwayd al-Thaqafī—'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ—his mother, who said that she was present at the Messenger of God's mother [969]
Āminah bt. Wahb's giving birth, this being during the night, and Āminah said, "What is this thing which I can see from the house, lighting everything up, and I can also see the stars drawing near me to such a point that I can say that they are falling on top of me."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: People assert that 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib picked up the child and took it along to Hubal,[646] in the heart of the Ka'bah, and stood by him, praying to God and giving thanks for what He had vouchsafed him. Then he went forth with the child and handed him over to his mother. He sought out for the child foster mothers,[647] and asked a woman to foster him, one from the Banū Sa'd b. Bakr called Ḥalīmah bt. Abī Dhu'ayb, Abū Dhu'ayb being 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Shijnah b. Jābir b. Rizām b. Nāṣirah b. Quṣiyyah b. Sa'd b. Bakr b. Hawāzin b. Manṣūr b. 'Ikrimaha b. Khaṣafah b. Qays b. 'Aylān b. Muḍar. The name of the Messenger of God's foster father was al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. Rifā'ah b. Mallān b. Nāṣirah b. Quṣiyyah b. Sa'd b, Bakr b. Hawāzin b. Manṣūr b. 'Ikrimah b. Khaṣafah b. Qays b. 'Aylān b. Muḍar. The names of his foster brother and sisters were 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith, and Unaysah bt. al-Ḥārith and Judhāmah[648] bt. al-Ḥārith, respectively. The latter was in practice called al-Shaymā',[649] a name that prevailed over her proper name so that,

646. The cult of the god Hubal was said to have been introduced into Mecca by a man of Khuzā'ah, 'Amr b. Luḥayy. He became an especially popular god in the pantheon of the Ka'bah, before whom divination by means of arrows (cleromancy, the istiqsām bi-al-azlām of Qur'ān, V, 4/3), so that Wellhausen speculated (*Reste arabischen Heidentums*², 75) whether the worship of Hubal was not identical with, or paved the way for, the worship of Allāh there. This seems, however, unlikely, especially as, at the battle of Uḥud in the course of the warfare between Quraysh of Mecca and the Muslims in Medina, the clash between the Meccans' god Hubal and the Muslims' Allāh is stressed. See Fahd, Le panthéon de l'Arabie centrale à la veille de l'Hégire, 95–103; *EI*², s.v. Hubal (T. Fahd).

647. ruḍa'ā', literally "children suckling at the breast," sing. raḍī', hence used here by metonymy for "foster mothers" or for some expression like dhawāt or ulāt/ūlāt al-raḍā'ah.

648. In parallel sources we have the variants Khidhāmah and Ḥudhāfah for this name.

649. Literally, "the woman marked by a mole (shāmah)."

among her people, she was known exclusively by it. [The mother of these foster siblings was] Ḥalīmah bt. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith, (foster) mother of the Messenger of God. It is asserted that al-Shaymāʾ used to carry the Messenger of God in her bosom, as also did her own mother while the boy was in her care.[650]

As for the report from an authority other than Ibn Isḥāq, he relates concerning that: There related to me al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Mūsā b. Shaybah—ʿUmayrah bt. ʿUbaydallāh b. Kaʿb b. Mālik—Barrah bt. Abī Tujzaʾah, who said:
[970] The first person who suckled the Messenger of God for a few days was Thuwaybah, with milk for a son of hers called Masrūḥ, before Ḥalīmah was put forward; she had previously suckled Ḥamzah b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, and after him she suckled Abū Salamah b. ʿAbd al-Asad al-Makhzūmī.

There related to us Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, also Hannād b. al-Sarī—Yūnus b. Bukayr—Ibn Isḥāq, also Hārūn b. Idrīs al-Aṣamm—al-Muḥāribī—Ibn Isḥāq, also Saʿīd b. Yaḥyā al-Umawī—his paternal uncle Muḥammad b. Saʿīd—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Jahm b. Abī al-Jahm, a mawlā of ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar—ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib, who said: Ḥalīmah bt. Abī Dhuʾayb al-Saʿdiyyah, the Messenger of God's (foster) mother who suckled him, used to relate that she went forth from her land, accompanied by her husband and an infant son of hers whom she was nursing, with a group of women from the Banū Saʿd b. Bakr, seeking for babies whom they could foster. This was, she related, in a year of severe drought, which had left nothing. [She related:] I set out on a greyish-white she-ass of mine, together with an old she-camel which was not, by God, yielding a drop [of milk]. We could not sleep the whole night because of our child's crying from hunger. There was nothing in my breasts to satisfy him, and nothing in our she-camel to provide him with nourishment, but we were hoping for rain and for relief.

650. Ḥalīmah's tribe Saʿd b. Bakr were part of the Hawāzin confederation, who lived in Ḥijāz in the vicinity of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif. When women of Saʿd b. Bakr were captured by Muḥammad on his defeat of Hawāzin at the battle of Ḥunayn in 8/630, he honored Ḥalīmah's daughter al-Shaymāʾ and responded favorably to appeals by the menfolk of the tribe on the basis of their foster relationship. See *EI*², s.vv. Ḥalīma bint Abī Dhuʾayb and Saʿd b. Bakr (W. M. Watt).

I set off on that she-ass of mine, but through weakness and emaciation it was jaded, and lagged behind the rest of the group until that became an irritation for them. Finally, we reached Mecca, where we sought for children to foster. The Messenger of God was offered to every one of the women, but each one rejected him when told that he was an orphan, since we hoped for the customary payment from the child's father. We would say, "An [971] orphan! And what are his mother and grandfather likely to do?" Hence for that reason we spurned him. Every woman in the group that had come with me had found a child to foster except myself. When we decided to depart, I said to my husband, "I dislike the idea of returning with my group of women companions without having taken a foster child; by God, I shall go back to that orphan and take him." My husband said, "You are free to do as you wish; perhaps God will send us a blessing on his account." She related: I took him up and brought him back to my traveling baggage. When I placed him in my bosom, my breasts immediately began to flow for him with all the milk he desired. He sucked until he was full up, as did also his (foster) brother. Then they both slept, whereas previously he had not been able to sleep. My husband arose and went to that old she-camel of ours and looked at it, and lo and behold, her udders were full. He milked it, and we both drank of the milk until we were finally refreshed and replete, and we passed a happy night. She related: When it was morning, my husband said to me, "By God, O Ḥalīmah, do you realize that you have taken a blessed creature?" I replied, "By God, I hope so." She related: Then we set off. I rode that she-ass of mine and carried him with me, and by God, she went ahead through the party of riders so that none of their other male asses could keep up with it, to the point that my women companions were saying to me, "O Ibnat Abī Dhu'ayb! Wait for us! Isn't this she-ass of yours the one on which you started out?" and they commented, "By God, there is something extraordinary about it!" She related: We then reached our camping grounds in the country of the Banū Sa'd; and [972] I do not known any of God's lands more barren than that.

[She related:] When we had him with us, my flock used to come back to us in the evening satiated and full of milk. We would milk them and drink the milk, while other people could not draw a drop or find anything in their beasts' udders, until those of our tribes who had fixed dwelling places (al-ḥāḍir min qawminā) used to tell their shepherds, "Woe to you! Send your flocks to pasture where Ibnat Abī Dhu'ayb's shepherd sends his flock!" But their flocks nevertheless would come back in the evening hungry, not yielding a drop of milk, while my flock would come back satiated and full of milk. We kept on recognizing increased bounty from God through the child, until two years had gone by, when I weaned him. He was growing up into a boy such as none of the other lads were, so that by the time he was two years old, he was a well-formed child beyond the age of suckling. We brought him to his [real] mother, although we were very eager for him to continue staying with us because of the blessing we observed he had brought us. So we talked with his mother and said to her, "O wet nurse (ẓi'r),[651] I should like you to leave my little boy with me [for a further period], until he becomes big and sturdy, for I fear his succumbing to the plague in Mecca." She related: We kept on at her until she sent him back with us.[652]

She related: We brought him back, and by God, a few months after our return with him, he and his (foster) brother were with some lambs of ours, behind our tents, when his (foster) brother came running toward us and told me and his (foster) father, "Two men wearing white robes have come to that Qurashī brother of mine, and have laid him down on the ground and slit open his belly and are at this moment stirring it up." She related: His (foster) father and I ran swiftly out and found him standing there with a livid face. She related: His father and I rushed to his side and said to him, "What's the matter, my dear son?" He replied, "Two men wearing white robes came up to me, laid me down on the ground, slit open my belly, and searched within it for something I know not what." She said: We took him back with us to our tent. She related: His (foster) father said to me: "O Ḥalīmah, by God, I fear that this child may have been struck by some malady, so take [973] him back to his family before the results of the attack become manifest." She related: So we picked him up and bore him back to his mother. She asked, "What has made you bring him back, O wet nurse, when you were formerly so anxious for his welfare and for his remaining with you?" She related: I said, "God has allowed my (foster) son to grow up so far, and I have fulfilled the duties incumbent upon me. I now fear that something untoward may afflict him, so I have handed him back to you as you desire." Āminah asked me, "What's all this that has happened to you? Tell me the truth!" She related: She would not leave me alone until I had told her the whole story. She asked, "Were you then afraid a demon (al-shayṭān) had possessed him?" She related: I replied, "Yes." She exclaimed, "By God, indeed no! No demon has power over him. My dear son has a great future before him; shall I not tell you his story?" She related: I answered, "Yes, please." Āminah said, "When I became pregnant with him, a light went forth from me which illuminated all the fortresses of Buṣrā in the land of Syria for me, and thereafter I bore him, and by God, I never had a pregnancy that was easier and smoother than the one with him. Then when I gave birth to him, he slid out, and placed his hands on the ground and raised his head toward the heavens. Leave him now, and go back with your task honorably fulfilled."

651. As Guillaume observed, Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, trans. 71 n. 1, the implication that Āminah was not Muḥammad's biological mother is rather strange.

652. These miraculous events attending Ḥalīmah's suckling of the infant Muḥammad, the abundance of milk from the animals in time of dearth, and the revival of the flagging donkey, are part of the traditional Sīrah of the Prophet. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 103–105 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 171–73, tr. 70–71; Ibn Sa'd, Kitāb al-Ṭabaqāt al-kabīr, I/1, 69–70; and cf. Lings, Muhammad, 25–26. See for modern discussions of these miraculous details, Andrae, Die Person Muhammeds. 28ff.; Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 117–17; Watt. Muhammad at Mecca, 33–36; Annemarie Schimmel, And Muhammad Is His Messenger. The Veneration of the Prophet in Islamic Piety, 10.

There related to us Naṣr b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Azdī—Muḥammad b. Yaʿlā—ʿUmar b. Ṣubayḥ—Thawr b. Yazīd al-Shaʾmī—Makḥūl al-Shaʾmī—Shaddād b. Aws, who said: Once, while we were sitting with the Messenger of God, there approached a shaykh of the Banū ʿĀmir, who was the leading chief and sayyid of his tribe and descendant of a great shaykh, leaning upon a staff, and appeared before the Messenger of God, standing here, and attributed the latter genealogically to his grandfather, saying thus, "O Ibn ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, I have been informed that you claim to be the Messenger of God to the people (al-nās) and that [you claim that] God has sent you with the message which He entrusted to Ibrāhīm (Abraham), Mūsā (Moses), ʿĪsā (Jesus), and [974] other prophets. [I am further informed] that you have pronounced a momentous message (fawwahta bi-'aẓīm[in]).[653] But the prophets and the representatives of God (al-khulafā') have stemmed only from two houses of the Children of Israel, whereas you come from a people who worship these stones and idols. So what connection have you with prophethood? Nevertheless, every utterance has its core of truth, so tell me about the truth of your words and the beginnings of your claim to prophethood." He related: The Prophet was pleasurably impressed by his question, and replied, "O brother of the Banū 'Āmir, this affair you are asking me about has indeed its own story and place (or: occasion) where (or: when) it should be recounted, so sit down!"

The man bent his legs and then knelt down just as a camel does, and the Prophet faced him and began to speak. He said: "O brother of the Banū 'Āmir, the truth of my words and the beginnings of my claim to prophethood lie in the fact that I am what my forefather Abraham prayed for and the good news of my brother Jesus, son of Mary. I was my mother's first born, and she conceived and bore me as the heaviest burden she had ever borne and began to complain of the weight she felt to her fellow wives (or: fellow womenfolk, ṣawāḥibihā). Then my mother saw in a dream that what she bore in her womb was a light, and she said, "I began to follow the light with my gaze, and the light went before my gaze until it lit up for me the whole eastern and western limits of the earth." Then she gave birth to me, and I grew up. When I grew up, the idols of Quraysh were rendered hateful to me, as was also poetry.[654] I was offered for suckling among the Banū Layth b. Bakr.[655]

---

653. This seems to be the sense here of fawwaha, although the lexica only give the meaning for this form II verb of "[God] created someone with a wide mouth."

654. In the years at Mecca before his call to prophethood, Muḥammad is said to have recoiled from swearing by Allāt and al-'Uzzā, but this premature rejection of polytheism may be a retrojection of subsequent attitudes. Also, Muḥammad's rejection of poetry was not presumably from lack of interest or for aesthetic reasons but, as is clear from Qur'ān, XXVI, 221–26, cf. LXIX, 40–43, because the themes of poetry were the expression par excellence of the old pagan order, with its violence, its emphasis on revenge, and its proclamation of trust in human effort as a major factor in life, attitudes which the new faith of Islam aimed at countering or transforming.

655. In al-Ṭabarī, I, 969, p. 271 above, Ḥalīmah's tribe is the Banū Sa'd b. Bakr. Layth b. Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt were one of the main branches of Kinānah; see Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 36, II, 6, 376.

One day, I was away from the rest of my people in the bottom of a wadi, with a group of children of my own age, and we were playing at throwing between us pieces of camels' dung. Suddenly, a group of three men approached us, bearing a gold pitcher filled with snow. They took me out of the group of my friends, and the latter fled until they reached the edge of the wadi. Then they came back to the group of three and said, "What do you intend to do with this lad? He is not one of us but is the son of the lord of Quraysh, and is an orphan, for whom a wet nurse was sought among us; he has no father. What good will killing him bring you, [975] and what will you gain from that? But if you are determined ineluctably on killing him, then choose one of us, whichever you like; let him come to you in his stead, and then kill him; but leave this lad alone, he is an orphan." However, when the children saw the group of three men returning no answer to them, they fled at top speed back to the tribe, telling them what had happened and imploring help against the men.

One of the three men came up to me and laid me gently on the ground, and then split open my body from the division of my rib cage (mafraq ṣadrī) to the end of the pubic hair, while I was watching all this but not feeling any touch at all. He then took out the viscera from my abdomen and washed them with that snow. He washed them carefully and replaced them. Then the second man stood up and said to his companion, "Stand aside," and he drew him away from me. He then put his hand into my insides and brought forth my heart, with me watching all the time. He split it asunder, extracted a black drop and threw the drop aside. He went on to say: In his hand, at his right side, there was as if he were holding something, and lo and behold, just by me was a seal ring in his hand, emitting light that dazzled anyone looking at it, and by means of which he sealed my heart so that it became filled with light; this was the light of prophethood and wisdom. Then he returned it to its place. I felt the coolness of that seal ring in my heart for a long time afterward. The third man now said to his companion, "Stand aside from me," and he passed his hand over my body from the division of my rib cage to the end of the pubic hair, and that slit was henceforth healed together, by God's permission. He now took my hand and gently made me get up from my resting place, and said to the first man, who had slit open my body, "Weigh him against ten of his community!" They weighed me against them, and I outweighed them. Next he said, "Weigh him against a hundred of his community!" They weighed me against them, and I outweighed them. Finally he said, "Weigh him against a thousand of his community!" They weighed me against them, and I outweighed them. He then said, "Let him be; even if you were to weigh him against the whole of his community, he would outweigh them all!" He related: They then clasped me to [976] their breasts, and kissed my head and the place between my eyes. They said to me, "O my dear one, you have not been rendered terrified. If only you knew the goodness and benefit that is intended through you, you would rejoice and be refreshed."

He related: While we were engaged thus, behold, I found the tribe at my side, who had come in their entirety, and there was my mother, who was [really] my wet nurse, in the forefront of the tribe, crying out at the top of her voice and saying, "Alas for a poor, weak one!" He related: They crowded round me and fell upon me, kissing my head and the place between my eyes, and said, "Good for you O poor, weak one!" Then my wet nurse lamented, "Alas for a solitary one!" at which they crowded round and fell upon me and clasped me to their breasts, kissing my head and the place between my eyes, and said, "Good for you, O solitary one, for you are not a solitary one—indeed God, His angels, and all the believers of the people of the earth are with you!" But my wet nurse still lamented, "Alas for an orphan, treated as a weak one among your companions and then killed because of your weakness!" at which they crowded round and fell upon me and clasped me to their breasts, kissing my head and the place between my eyes, and said, "Good for you, O orphan, how noble you are in the sight of God! If you only knew what goodness and blessing is intended through you!" He related: They [i.e., the three miraculous visitants] brought me to the edge of the wadi. When my mother, who was [really] my wet nurse, saw me, she cried out, "O my dear son! Do I really see you still alive?" and she came up to me, fell upon me and clasped me to her breast. And by Him in whose hand is my soul, I was within her bosom, she having clasped me to her, while my hand was still in the hand of one of the three men. I began to turn toward them, imagining that the members of the tribe could see them [also], but they could not in fact see them. One of the members of the tribe commented, "Some touch of madness or a visitation of the jinn has affected this lad; let us take him along to our soothsayer and medicine man (kāhin), so that he may examine him and cure him." I said to him, "O so-and-so, nothing such as you mention has affected me; my mental faculties are intact and [977] my heart is sound; I am not afflicted by any malady."[656] My father said—he being the husband of my wet nurse—"Do you not perceive that what he says is the speech of a perfectly sound person? I fully expect that no affliction will permanently affect my son." They nevertheless agreed upon taking me along to the soothsayer, and they carried me until they came to him. When they related to him the story of what had happened to me, he told them, "Shut up, until I hear from the child himself, for he knows more about what happened to him than you do." He questioned me, and I told him my story, from beginning to end. When he had heard my words, he sprang up and clasped me to his breast, and then called out in the loudest possible voice, "O Arabs, O Arabs, forward! Kill this lad, and kill me with him, for by Allāt and al-'Uzzā, if you let him be and he reaches the age of puberty, he will most certainly subvert your religion, declare your minds and those of your forefathers to be deluded, oppose your way of life, and bring forward for you a religion of whose like you have never heard." I made for my foster mother, and she snatched me away from his bosom, saying, "You yourself are certainly more deranged and more possessed by the jinn than this son of mine, and if I had only known that you would have made such a pronouncement as this, I would not have brought him along to you. Seek out for yourself someone who will kill you, for I am not going to kill this lad!" Then they bore me along and handed me back to my family. I subsequently lost all fear of what had been done to me, and the traces of that cut from my breast to the end of the pubic hair became just a faint line. This, O brother of the Banū 'Āmir, is the truth of my words and the beginnings of my claim to prophethood.[657]

---

656. qalabah, literally "a condition or malady for which the afflicted one should be turned over and examined," apparently a disease of camels and horses; according to the lexicographers, it was only used in negative contexts, as here. See Lane, Lexicon, 2554b–c.

657. The story of the opening of Muḥammad's breast has been first given by al-

The ʿĀmirī exclaimed, "I call to witness God, than whom there is no other god, that your calling is a true one, so give me information about various things I am going to ask you." The Prophet replied, "Ask what you want (sal ʿanka)" (before this, the Prophet always used to say to a questioner, "Ask whatever you wish and about what seems good to you," sal ʿammā shiʾta wa-ʿammā badā laka; he only said to the ʿĀmirī on that particular day sal ʿanka because that was a dialectical peculiarity [lughah] of the Banū ʿĀmir). The Prophet spoke to him concerning what he knew.

[978] The ʿĀmirī said, "Tell me, O Ibn ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, about that which increases one's knowledge." The Prophet re-

---

Ṭabarī at I, 972–73, pp. 274–75 above, on the basis of four isnāds all going through Ibn Isḥāq and in a fairly brief form. It is now given in greater detail in a khabar going back to Shaddād b. ʿAmr b. Thābit (nephew of the poet of Medina Ḥassān b. Thābit, died 58/678; see Ibn Saʿd, Kitāb al-ṭabaqāt al-kabīr, VII/2, 124). Then thirdly, we have at I, 979, p. 282 below, a briefer version in a khabar going back to Khālid b. Maʿdān al-Kalāʿī (known as an ascetic and as a trustworthy authority, thiqah, for ḥadīth transmission, died 103/721–22; see Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 162). Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 105–06 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 173–76, tr. 71–72, gives, of course, the first version, that through Ibn Isḥāq, as does Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., I/1, 70.

Again, this story can be paralleled in the lore and legend of many other human societies. The visitation by angels or spirits, the slitting open of Muḥammad's belly, the removal of the black spot of sin and purification by washing with snow, all suggest ritual cleansing and the communication of extraordinary powers. In the Jāhiliyyah, it was often held that the jinn could communicate poetic inspiration to a man by similar means. Goldziher, in his Abhandlungen zur arabischen Philologie, I, 213, cited as a parallel to the history of the opening of Muḥammad's breast what the sister of the poet of al-Ṭāʾif, Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt (on whom see n. 603 above) is said to have told the Prophet that a jinnī in the form of a vulture opened the breast of the sleeping Umayyah, filled his breast with something unspecified and then closed it up. This gave the prophet Umayyah the inspiration for introducing wise aphorisms (ḥikmah) into his poems and also the idea of divine unity (tawḥīd).

What connection the story of Muḥammad and his supernatural visitants has with the words of Qurʾān, XCIV, 1–2, "Did We not open your breast, And removed from you your burden?" is unclear. The Qurʾān commentators take this figuratively rather than literally (i.e., with the verb sharaḥa in a-lam nashraḥ ṣadraka taken as meaning "to remove, lift away" rather than "to cut open": see Paret, Der Koran. Kommentar und Konkordanz, 515–16; Bell, A Commentary on the Qurʾān, II, 554), that God opened up thereby Muḥammad's awareness of the spiritual world; but there is always the possibility that the story of the opening of Muḥammad's breast may have evolved to explain the Qurʾānic passage in a literal sense. See Andrae, Die Person Muhammeds, 32–34; Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 35–36; H. Birkeland, The Legend of the Opening of Muhammad's Breast, passim; Schimmel, And Muhammad Is His Messenger, 67–69.

plied, "The process of learning." The ʿĀmirī asked, "Tell me what points toward knowledge." The Prophet replied, "Asking questions." The ʿĀmirī asked, "Tell me about that which increases in evil." The Prophet replied, "Persistence [in evil ways]." The ʿĀmirī asked, "Tell me, is piety of any avail after evil doing?" The Prophet replied, "Yes, repentance (tawbah) cleanses from sin, and good deeds sweep away evil deeds. If a servant [of God] mentions his Lord's name when he is enjoying ease of life, God will aid him in times of distress." The ʿĀmirī said, "How can that be, O Ibn ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib?" The Prophet replied, "This is because God says, 'No, by my power and exaltedness, I shall not gather together for My servant two causes of security, nor shall I ever gather together for him two causes of fear. If he shows fear toward Me in this present world, he will feel secure from Me (i.e., from my wrath) on the Day when I shall gather together all my servants in the sacred enclosure (ḥaẓīrat al-quds).[658] This feeling of security will remain with him perpetually and I shall not withhold my blessings from him when I do deny blessings [from others]. But if he feels secure from Me (i.e., self-sufficient) in this present world, he will fear Me on the day when I shall gather together all my servants at a specified time on an appointed day, and his fear will remain with him perpetually.'"

The ʿĀmirī said, "Tell me, O Ibn ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, to what are you summoning people?" The Prophet replied, "I am summoning people to worship the One God, who has no partners, and that you should throw off allegiance to idols, proclaim your disbelief in Allāt and al-ʿUzzā, affirm your belief in the Book or the prophets which have come from God, perform the five acts of worship with all their significant details, fast for a month in each year, and hand over poor tax on your wealth, [for if you do so,] God will purify you by means of it and render your wealth wholesome for you. Also, that you should perform the Pilgrimage to the [Holy] House when you are able to do this, perform the major ablution (ghusl) after major bodily pollution (janābah),[659] and believe in death and the resurrection after death, and in the Garden and Hell Fire." The [979] 'Āmirī said, "O Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, if I do all that, what will be my reward?" The Prophet replied, "The Garden of Eden, from below which springs of water flow, in which [those who are saved] will remain forever, that is the reward of those who aim at righteousness."[660] The 'Āmirī said, "O Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, is there, as well as all that, any advantage for this present life, for I find ease and pleasantness of daily life attractive?" The Prophet replied, "Yes, indeed, success and a firm place in the land."[661] He related: The 'Āmirī responded to the Prophet's call and turned to God.

658. The Cairo text of al-Ṭabarī, II, 164, has ḥaẓīrat al-firdaws "enclosure of Paradise," as in ms. P. of the Leiden text, see n. e. The reference is to the gathering together of the saved after the Last Judgment, as foretold in Qurʾān, XIX, 85/88, and their admittance to Paradise. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳiyāma (L. Gardet).

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Thawr b. Yazīd—Khālid b. Ma'dān al-Kalā'ī, who said: A group of the Messenger of God's followers asked, "O Messenger of God, tell us about yourself!" He replied, "Yes, I will. I am what my forefather Abraham prayed for and the good news of Jesus. My mother saw in a dream when she bore me within her womb that there came forth from her a light which illuminated for her the fortresses of Buṣrā in the land of Syria. I was offered for suckling to the women of the Banū Sa'd b. Bakr. Once when I was with one of my (foster) brothers, behind our tents, tending our lambs, there came to me two men wearing white robe and bearing a golden pitcher filled with snow. They took hold of me, split open my belly and then extracted from it my heart, which they split open, taking out from it a black blood clot. They threw it aside, and then washed my belly and my heart with that snow, until they had cleansed it. Then one of them said to his companion, 'Weigh him with ten of his community,' so he weighed me with them, and I was equal to them in weight. Then he said, 'Weigh him with a hundred of his community,' so he weighed me with them, and I was equal to them in weight. Then he said, 'Weigh him with a thousand of his community,' so he weighed me with them, and I was equal to them in weight. Finally, he said, 'Leave him alone, for even if I were to weigh him with [the whole of] his community, he would be equal to them.'"

659. That is, the major ablution required after such polluting events as sexual intercourse, contact with menstrual blood, etc. See *EI*², s.v. Ghusl (G. H. Bousquet).

660. Qur'ān, XX, 78/76. For this interpretation of tazakkā in a late Meccan-early Medinan context, see Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 165–66.

661. Again echoing Qur'ānic phraseology, in which al-tamakkun fī al-arḍ, "establishing a firm place in the land," is often a reward for the righteous.

Ibn Isḥāq says: 'Abd Allāh b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the Messenger of God's father, died at a time when the Messenger of God's mother, Āminah bt. Wahb b. 'Abd Manāf b. Zuhrah, was pregnant with him.

As for Hishām [b. Muḥammad], he says: 'Abdallāh, the Messenger of God's father, died when the Messenger of God was twenty-eight months old.[662] [980]

There related to me al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd, who said: Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī stated that the firmly accepted belief, from which none of our companions differ, is that 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib came back from Syria in a caravan of Quraysh's and encamped at Medina, and he remained there until he died. He was buried in the building (dār) of al-Nābighah, in the small hut (al-dār al-ṣughrā), [which is], when you go into the building, on your left, within the house (bayt).[663]

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī, who said that the Messenger of God's mother Āminah died at al-Abwā' between Mecca and Medina when the Messenger of God

662. Ibn Isḥāq preferred the view that 'Abdallāh died before Āminah gave birth to Muḥammad, although one line of transmission adds that he died when Muḥammad was twenty-eight months old. Other authorities mentioned, such as Ibn al-Kalbī cited here, give figures like twenty-eight months or seven months for Muḥammad's age at his father's death. Half-a-century later than Ibn Isḥāq, however, the historian al-Wāqidī (on whom see n. 1020 below) had much more circumstantial detail about the time and place of 'Abdallāh's death (cf. below and n. 663). See Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 102 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 167, tr. 69; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/1, 61–62; and the detailed discussion of the varying reports on 'Abdallāh's death in Lecker, "The Death of the Prophet Muḥammad's Father: Did Wāqidī Invent Some of the Evidence?" 9–27.

663. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/1, 61, following reports used by al-Wāqidī, says that 'Abdallāh was taken ill on the way back from Syria, was unable to carry on the journey to Mecca and died at Medina among his maternal kinsmen, the Banū 'Adī b. al-Najjār (his grandfather Hāshim having married Salmā bt. 'Amr from this Medinan clan, see Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 88 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 144–45, tr. 59; Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., I/1, 46).

was six years old, She had brought him to Medina to let him visit his maternal uncles of the Banū 'Adī b. al-Najjār, but she died on the way back to Medina with him.[664]

Al-Ḥārith related to me—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Ibn Jurayj—'Uthmān b. Ṣafwān, who said that Āminah bt. Wahb's grave is in the ravine of Abū Dharr at Mecca.

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-'Abbās b. 'Abdallāh b. Ma'bad b. al-'Abbās—some member of his family, who said that 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib died when the Messenger of God was eight years old. But another authority says that 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib died when the Messenger of God was ten years old.

There related to us Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ṭalḥah b. 'Amr al-Ḥaḍramī—'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ—Ibn 'Abbās, who said: The Prophet [981] was in the care of Abū Ṭālib after his grandfather 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, and became the latter's child as if he were part of himself.[665]

The story returns to the completion of the reign of Kisrā Anūsharwān.

---

664. Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 107 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., I, 177, tr. 73, and Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/1, 73–74, confirm that Āminah died at al-Abwā' when Muḥammad was six years old, and state that the Prophet visited and tended her grave and mourned over her when he was en route for al-Ḥudaybiyah in 6/628. Al-Abwā' lay just north of Mecca along the Medina road; it was said to be the goal of Muḥammad's first ghazwah or raid against the Banū Ḍamrah and the Banū Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt of Kinānah only twelve months after the Hijrah. See al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, I, 102; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 79–80; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 84, 340; Al-Wohaibi, The Northern Hijaz, 35–40.

665. ghumṣ^{an} rumṣ^{an} . . . saqīl^{an} dahīn^{an}, literally, "like the wet and dry dirty matter which collects in the inner corner of the eye . . . and like something smooth and anointed with oil."

[The Remainder of Kisrā Anūsharwān's Reign and the Last Sāsānid Kings]

There related to us 'Alī b. Ḥarb al-Mawṣilī—Abū Ayyūb Ya'lā b. 'Imrān al-Bajalī—Makhzūm b. Hāni' al-Makhzūmī—his father, who was a hundred and fifty years old. He said: When it was the night in which the Messenger of God was born, the Aywān of Kisrā was shaken and fourteen pinnacles of it fell down;[666] the [sacred] fire of Fārs, which had not previously been extinguished for a thousand years, was extinguished;[667] the waters of the lake of Sāwah sank into the earth;[668] and the Chief Mōbadh saw in a dream refractory camels running before noble Arab horses which had crossed the Tigris and had spread through those districts of it.[669] The next morning, Kisrā was affrighted by what he had seen. He resolutely held himself back in patience, but then he considered that he ought not to conceal it from his ministers and Marzbāns. He put on his crown and seated himself on his throne,

666. That is, the Aywān or Ṭāq-i Kisrā, the great Sāsānid palace in the district of Aspānbār at al-Madā'in, on the east bank of the Tigris, where its ruinous partial shell still exists. See Le Strange, Lands, 34; Herrmann, The Iranian Revival, 126–28; *EI*², s.v. al-Madā'in (M. Streck-M. J. Morony).

667. Presumably the great fire temple at Iṣṭakhr, i.e., at Persepolis, at whose ruins al-Mas'ūdī marvelled. See his Murūj, III, 76–77 = § 1403; EIr, s.v. Ātaškada (M. Boyce).

668. Sāwah is a town of northwestern Persia, in the mediaeval Islamic province of Jibāl, not however known to have existed in pre-Islamic times. It was nevertheless made the site of one of these tales of portents announcing the Prophet's birth. See Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 179–80; Le Strange, Lands, 211–12; Schwarz, Iran, 339–42; *EI*², s.v. Sāwa (C. E. Bosworth-H. H. Schaeder).

669. These portents are mentioned also by al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, I, 217, II, 228 = §§ 231, 649.

and gathered them around him. When they were all gathered together around him, he told them why he had sent for them and what he had summoned them for. While they were engaged in all this, a letter arrived bringing news of the extinguishing of the [sacred] fire, so that his distress of spirit increased. The Chief Mōbadh said, "I too—may God grant the king righteousness—had a dream that same night," and he recounted to him his dream about the camels. The king said, "What is this thing, O Chief Mōbadh," although he himself was the most knowing about the real meaning of that. The Chief Mōbadh replied, "An event which is issuing from the Arabs."

On hearing that, Kisrā wrote a letter, as follows: "From Kisrā, the king of kings, to al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir. As follows: Send to me a man who is knowledgeable about what I wish to ask him," so al-Nuʿmān dispatched to him ʿAbd al-Masīḥ b. ʿAmr b. Ḥayyān b. Buqaylah al-Ghassānī.[670] When the letter reached Kisrā, Kisrā asked him, "Do you know what I wish to ask you?"
[982] He replied, "Let the king tell me about it; and if I am knowledgeable about it, [well and good], but if not, I can tell him about someone who will know it for him." Kisrā accordingly told him about his dream. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ said, "A maternal uncle of mine who lives in the elevated regions of Syria, called Saṭīḥ, will have knowledge about it."[671] Kisrā said, "Go to him, and ask him what I have just asked you, and bring me back his answer." ʿAbd al-Masīḥ rode off on his mount until he came to Saṭīḥ, who was, however, on the verge of death. He greeted him and wished him long life, but Saṭīḥ returned no answer. Hence ʿAbd al-Masīḥ began to recite:[672]

---

670. This member of the Christian ʿIbād of al-Ḥīrah seems to have been a historical person, although his role in these events and the attribution to him of an age of 350 years are clearly embellishments. He is said to have negotiated with Khālid b. al-Walīd for the surrender of al-Ḥīrah to the incoming Muslim Arabs. See al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 243; al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, I, 217–22 = §§ 231–33; Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XVI, 194–95.

Buqaylah was one of the clans of al-Ḥīrah, of Ghassānid tribal origin, as appears also from al-Ṭabarī, I, 1023, p. 349 below, which had a castle (qaṣr) of its own. See al-Yaʿqūbī, Kitāb al-buldān, 309, tr. G. Wiet, 140–41; Nöldeke, trans. 254 n. 2; Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 114 n. 2.

671. For Saṭīḥ, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 911ff., pp. 178ff. above.

672. Nöldeke noted, trans. 255 n. 1, that the manuscripts have considerable variation in the readings of various words and in the order of these rajaz verses,

Is the proud lord of Yemen deaf, or does he hear? Or has he gone away, and has the course of untimely death made away with him?
O you who are able to give the interpretation of an affair which was too difficult for this man and that, the shaykh of the tribe, from the house of Sanan, has come to you,
Whose mother is from the house of Dhi'b b. Ḥajan, a blue-eyed one, with sharpened fang, whose ears are ringing,[673]
A shining white one, with an ample cloak and corselet of mail, [983]
the envoy of the prince (qayl) of the Persians, who journeys onward during the time for sleeping.
A stout, compactly built she-camel travels through the land, which conveys me up a rocky slope at one time and down it the next,
Fearing neither thunderbolts nor the misfortunes of time, until it becomes lean and emaciated in the breast and the part between the thighs (i.e., from traveling continuously).
The fine dust of the deserted encampments' traces swirls round it in the wind, as if it were galloping vigorously from the two slopes of Thakan.[674]

When Saṭīḥ heard the verses, he raised his head and said: 'Abd al-Masīḥ—traveling on a camel—to Saṭīḥ—who is already on the brink of the tomb—the king of the sons of Sāsān has sent you—because of the Aywān's being shaken—and the extinguishing of the fires—and the dream of the Chief Mōbadh—of refractory camels running before noble Arab horses—which had crossed the Tigris and spread through those districts of it—O 'Abd al-Masīḥ, with interchanging of hemistichs, and that the text and interpretation of the poem is uncertain in parts. Older poets, as here 'Abd al-Masīḥ, use the mashṭūr form of the rajaz meter in which, in each bayt, every shaṭr rhymes with the following hemistich and not just with regard to the two hemistichs of the first bayt; with a common rhyme for the whole poem, hemistich by hemistich, interchange of hemistichs within *bayt*s is easy. See Wright, A Grammar of the Arabic Language, II, 362A–B.

---

673. Sanan and Dhi'b b. Ḥajan must be tribal groups of Yemen, but do not figure in such works as Ibn al-Kalbī's Jamharat al-nasab or al-Hamdānī's Ṣifat jazīrat al-'Arab.

674. Thakan is listed by al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, I, 342, and Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 82, but with no mention of its location and with this verse as the only shāhid for it.

when there has been much recounting of stories—and the man with the staff has been sent[675]—and the valley of al-Samāwah[676] has overflowed (i.e., with invading troops)—and the waters of the lake of Sāwah have sunk into the earth—and the [sacred] fire of Fārs has been extinguished—then Syria is no longer for Saṭīḥ Syria—kings and queens from amongst them (i.e., the last Sāsānids) shall reign—according to the number of pinnacles (i.e., those fallen from the Aywān)—and everything whose coming is decreed will come." Then Saṭīḥ expired on the spot. 'Abd al-Masīḥ now mounted his steed and recited:

Gird yourself for action, for you are keen in resolution, vigorous! Let not separation and mutability affright you!
If the dominion of the sons of Sāsān escapes from their hands, well, time is made up of different evolutions and lengthy periods.
How oft, O how oft did they reach a lofty stage in which lions [984] which tear their prey were afraid of their mighty onrush!
To them belongs Mihrān, the man of the lofty tower,[677] and his brothers, the two Hurmuzs, Sābūr and [the other] Sābūr.
The people are all half brothers and sisters of each other; when one of them comes to realize that another one has become lacking in some way, that person is cast aside and treated with contempt.
But they are also brothers from the same mother; when they see some item of property, that item is protected and supported in the owner's absence.
Good and bad fortune are closely linked together like a rope binding two camels; good fortune is sought after, but bad fortune is avoided.

When 'Abd al-Masīḥ arrived back to Kisrā, he informed him of Saṭīḥ's words. Kisrā commented, "Once fourteen of us have re-

675. That is, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, the second caliph, mentioned here as bearing his staff of office (hirāwah, the equivalent of the qaḍīb or 'aṣā), with which the stern 'Umar trounced malefactors and which became one of the insignia of the caliphal office. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳaḍīb (D. Sourdel).

676. That is, "the elevated land," the desert region between the Euphrates and Syria. See *EI*², s.v. al-Samāwa (C. E. Bosworth).

677. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 885, p. 131 and n. 340 above.

igned, things will happen!" Ten of them, however, reigned for a total of four years only, and the rest of them held power until the reign of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.[678]

I received reports going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad,[679] who said: [On one occasion,] Wahrīz dispatched wealth and valuable specialities of Yemen to Kisrā. When these reached the territory of the Banū Tamīm, Ṣa'ṣa'ah b. Nājiyah b. 'Iqāl al-Mujāshi'ī[680] summoned the Banū Tamīm to fall upon the caravan, but they refused. When the caravan reached the territory of the Banū Yarbū',[681] Ṣa'ṣa'ah summoned these last to do that, but they were fearful of doing it. He said, O Banū Yarbū', I can foresee that this caravan will pass into the territory of the Banū Bakr b. Wā'il and they will attack it, and they will then use the wealth acquired hereby to make war on you!"[682] When they heard that, they plundered the caravan. A man of the Banū Salīṭ called al-Naṭif seized a saddle bag filled with jewels, hence people said, "He has seized the treasure of al-Naṭif," and this became proverbial. Ṣa'ṣa'ah acquired a palm-leaf basket containing silver ingots. The people of the caravan went to Hawdhah b. 'Alī al-Ḥanafī in al-Yamāmah,[683] who pro-

678. The ten ephemeral rulers mentioned here would presumably be those transient rulers, pretenders, and usurpers who filled the four years or so after Heraclius's invasion of Mesopotamia in 627 had left a legacy of chaos and confusion within the Persian ruling classes; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1045–66, pp. 381–409 below. Of the kings after Anūsharwān, only three persons, Hormizd IV, Khusraw II Abarwēz, and Yazdagird III, could be said to have enjoyed reigns of reasonable duration.

679. Nöldeke, trans. 257 n. 3, noted that the Arabic sources on the conflict of the Persians with the Arabs of Tamīm give considerably varying stories but fall substantially into two versions, the one largely agreeing with the account here, the other, however, quite aberrant; and he stressed the vivacity and generally realistic nature of the Arabic narratives on this topic.

680. Grandfather of the famous Umayyad poet al-Farazdaq, and called muḥyī al-maw'ūdāt "he who restores to life those female children meant for killing," because he ransomed—allegedly as many as three or four hundred—girls about to be slaughtered by their destitute parents. See Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XXI, 276–77.

681. An important group of the Tamīm b. Murr, as were the Mujāshi'. The Salīṭ mentioned below were a subgroup of them. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 68–71, II, 9, 591; EI[2], s.v. Yarbū', Banū (G. Levi Della Vida).

682. The Bakr and the Tamīm were ancient enemies, as was to be seen at the "Day of Dhū Qār," see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1015ff., pp. 338ff. below.

683. Hawdhah was one of the leading men of the Ḥanīfah b. Lujaym, a component tribe of the Bakr and occupiers of the rich eastern Arabian province of alvided them with clothing, food supplies, and mounts, and personally accompanied them until he reached Kisrā's presence. Hawdhah was a handsome and eloquent man, and Kisrā was favorably impressed by him and accounted to his credit what he had done. He called for a circlet of pearls, and it was placed on [985] Hawdhah's head [as a diadem], and he gave him a brocade coat of honor and many other items of clothing; because of all that, Hawdhah was called "the man with the crown." Kisrā said to Hawdhah, "Do you know whether these fellows, who have done this deed, are from your own tribe?" He answered, "No." Kisrā said, "Is there a peace agreement between you and them?" He replied, "[No,] there is death between us." Kisrā said, "Your requirement is now about to be fulfilled," and he resolved to send a force of cavalry against the Banū Tamīm.

He was informed, however, "Their land is a bad land, made up of deserts and wastes, with tracks that cannot be followed. Their water comes from wells, and one cannot be sure that they will not block them up, with the result that your troops will perish." He was advised to write to his governor in al-Baḥrayn, Āzādh Firūz, son of Jushnas, whom the Arabs called al-Muka'bir ("the Mutilator"), because he used to cut off hands and feet.[684] He had sworn not to leave, among the Banū Tamīm, a single eye that could flow with tears. Kisrā followed this advice, and sent an envoy to him. He also summoned Hawdhah again, and gave him a further, fresh lot of honors and presents, and told him, "Travel back with this envoy of mine, and secure a satisfactory solution (i.e., secure re-

---

Yamāmah (see on the Ḥanīfah, Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 156, II, 25, 297). It was to Hawdhah (who was, as emerges from the poem cited by al-Ṭabarī, I, 987, p. 293 below, penultimate verse, a Christian, like much of the Banū Ḥanīfah at this time), together with Thumāmah b. Uthāl, that Muḥammad sent an envoy with a letter for "the king of al-Yamāmah" inviting him to become a Muslim, and Hawdhah was allegedly at one point in correspondence with Muḥammad offering to become a Muslim if he could have the succession to the Prophet's office after Muḥammad's death; but Hawdhah himself died shortly afterward and before the Prophet, probably in 8/630. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed. Wüstenfeld, 971–2 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., IV, 254, tr. 653, 789; al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 86–87; EI[2], s.v. Musaylima (W. Montgomery Watt).

684. After his operations against Tamīm, al-Muka'bir apparently remained in eastern Arabia, since he later led the Persian forces there together with their allies against Abū Bakr's commander al-'Alā' b. al-Ḥaḍramī during the opening years of 'Umar's caliphate, but he eventually submitted and became a Muslim. See al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 85–86.

venge) for both myself and yourself." Hawdhah and the army reached al-Muka'bir just before the time for gleaning. Meanwhile, at that moment the Banū Tamīm had moved to Hajar in order to get provisions and gleanings. Al-Muka'bir's herald proclaimed, "Let those of the Banū Tamīm who are here, come forward, for the king has decreed that provisions and food should be made available for them and divided out among them." They came forward, and he brought them into al-Mushaqqar, which is a fortified place facing another fortress called al-Ṣafā and separated from it by a river called the Muḥallim.[685]

The builder of al-Mushaqqar was one of Kisrā's cavalry troops called Basak (?), son of Māhbūdh,[686] whom Kisrā had sent expressly for its construction. When he began work on it, he was told, "These workmen will not remain in this place unless they are provided with womenfolk; but if you do that, the construction [986] work will be completed, and they will remain working on it until they have finished it." So he had brought for them whores from the regions of the Sawād and al-Ahwāz, and had skins of wine for them, from the land of Fārs, conveyed across the sea. The workmen and the women married each other and begat children, and soon comprised the greater part of the population of the town of Hajar. The people spoke Arabic and claimed kinship with the 'Abd al-Qays. When Islam came, they said to the 'Abd al-Qays, "You know well our numerical strength, our formidable equipment and

685. The port and fortress of al-Mushaqqar was the seat of Persian military power in the region of Hajar or the eastern Arabian shorelands, with the place's foundation variously attributed to the rulers of Kindah, the Persian commander mentioned below, etc. It lay in the territory of the 'Abd al-Qays tribe (on whom see al-Ṭabarī, I, 836, p. 51 and n. 150 above), but its exact site is unknown. See *EI*², s.v. al-Mushaḳḳar (C. E. Bosworth). At all events, it became a notable center for the extension of Sāsānid political control over the western shores of the Persian Gulf. By the mid-sixth century, the Arab poet of Bakr, Ṭarafah b. 'Abd, could call the Arabs of Baḥrayn, with a distinct note of contempt, 'abīd Asbadh (where Asbadh stems from asb, "horse," + ped, "chief, commander," pace Nöldeke's etymology, trans. 260 n. 1, from ispabadh) "slaves of the commander of mounted warriors," i.e., of the Persian mailed cavalrymen, while other poets refer to the Persians settled in eastern Arabia as Asbadhīs. See Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 78–79.

686. On these two names (the second of which is, however, uncertain), see Nöldeke, trans. 260 n. 3, and Justi, Namenbuch, 185 (Māhbōdh), 357–58 (*Wasaka, Vasaces). For the father Māhbūdh, Māhbōdh, who played a great role as commander in fighting between the Persians and Byzantines during Hormizd's reign, see Nöldeke, trans. loc. cit. and 438 n. 4, and n. 703 below.

weapons, and our great proficiency, so enroll us formally among your tribe and give us your daughters in marriage." They responded, "No, but remain here as you were as our brothers and clients (mawālī)." One man of 'Abd al-Qays said, "O tribesmen of 'Abd al-Qays! Follow my suggestion and enroll them as full members of the tribe, for the likes of those people are very much to be desired." But another member of the tribe said, "Aren't you ashamed of yourself? Are you telling us to take into our midst people who, as you know, have such beginnings and origins?" The first man replied, "If you don't adopt them into the tribe, other Arabs will." The second man answered, "In that case, we shan't worry about them in future!" Thereupon, they (i.e., those people from the mixed population of Hajar) became dispersed among the Arabs. Some remained with the 'Abd al-Qays and were then reckoned as part of them, with no one gainsaying this attribution.

Once al-Muka'bir had got the Banū Tamīm within al-Mushaqqar, he massacred their menfolk and spared only the boys. On that day was killed Qa'nab al-Riyāḥī, the knight of the Banū Yarbū'; two men of the Shann, who served the kings [of Persia] with alternate spells of duty, killed him.[687] The boys were put in boats and conveyed across to Fārs; some of them were castrated as eunuchs. Hubayrah b. Ḥudayr al-'Adawī related: After the conquest of Iṣṭakhr, there came to us a number of these deportees, one of them a eunuch and another a tailor.[688] A man of the Banū Tamīm called Ubayy b. Wahb attacked the chain holding the gate [987] [of the city], cut through it, and escaped. He then recited:

I remember Hind, although it is not the time for remembrance;
I remember her, even though several months' journey separates me from her.

687. This encounter was the Yawm al-Ṣafqah, described at length in Abū al-Faraj Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XVII, 318–22, cf. Sir Charles Lyall, Translations from Ancient Arabian Poetry, Chiefly Pre-Islamic, 87–88. Qa'nab b. 'Attāb al-Riyāḥī had been one of the plunderers of the Persian caravan from Yemen (Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, op. cit., XVII, 318). Shann were a clan of 'Abd al-Qays; see Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 168, II, 28, 526.

688. Nöldeke, trans. 262 n. 1, pointed out that the Muslims did not conquer Iṣṭakhr till the 640s (actually in 23/643; see EI[2], s.v. Iṣṭakhr [M. Streck-M. J. Morony]), hence the events mentioned here happened almost certainly later than the time of Khusraw I Anūsharwān, since he died early in 579.

[She is] from Ḥijāz, from the highlands, and her people dwell where the autumn rains pour down, between Zūr and Minwar.[689]
Ho there, has it come to my people, despite the distance separating us, that I defended my sacred interests (dhimārī) on that day of the gateway of al-Mushaqqar?
I struck with my sword the panel of the gateway such a blow, which would have made the most firmly built gateway spring open.

On that day, Hawdhah b. ʿAlī interceded with al-Mukaʿbir for a hundred of the captives from the Banū Tamīm; the latter granted them to Hawdhah on Easter Day, and Hawdhah freed them. Concerning this, al-Aʿshā recited:

Question Tamīm about him, how it was in the days when they were sold, when they came to him as captives, all of them reduced to submissiveness,
In the midst of al-Mushaqqar. among a host of dust-smeared, dark-colored ones (i.e., the victorious army), unable to secure any beneficial aid afer the hurt [they had previously suffered].
He said to the king, "Free a hundred of them," speaking gently, in a low voice, not raising it.
So he released a hundred from the band of captives, and all of them became freed of their bonds.
He put them forward openly, on Easter Day, as an offering, hoping [for a reward] from God for what he had done as a benefit and had wrought. [988]
But they (i.e., the freed Tamīmīs] did not consider as an act of benevolence all that which had just been vouchsafed [for them], even though their spokesman expressed a need for due acknowledgment (or: spoke the truth about it, qāla qā'iluhā ḥaqqᵃⁿ bihā) and exerted himself in that.[690]

689. Nöldeke vocalized muṣāb and translated "on the hills of al-Kharīf," but the vocalization al-maṣāb, "place where rains pour down," is followed here, with al-kharīf in its usual sense of "autumn." Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 216, mentions Manwar as a mountain, but clearly had no idea of its location.

690. al-Aʿshā Maymūn, Dīwān, no. 13, vv. 62–63, 67–69, 71; cf. Lyall, Translations of Ancient Arabian poetry, 88–89.

He describes the Banū Tamīm here as ungrateful.

Hishām related: When Wahriz was close to death—this being toward the end of Anūsharwān's reign—he called for his bow and an arrow, and said, "Set me up," so they did this. He shot the arrow and said, "See where my arrow falls to earth, and make my grave there." His arrow fell behind the monastery—that is, the church near Nu'm, a place called till today "the grave of Wahriz."[691] When the news of Wahriz's death reached Kisrā, he sent out to Yemen a knight called W.y.n (?), who proved a pertinacious tyrant.[692] Hence Hurmuz, the son of Kisrā, dismissed him and apppointed as governor in his stead al-Marūzān.[693] This last remained in Yemen, and had children born there who grew up to the age of puberty.

At this point Kisrā Anūsharwān died, after a reign of forty-eight years.[694]

---

691. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 539, could only conjecture that this place was in the vicinity of Raḥbat Mālik b. Ṭawq, the latter place, in fact, in Syria (ibid., III, 34–36). This dayr Nu'm must, however, have been in Yemen.

692. Marquart surmised that this was the al-Bīnajān of al-Ṭabarī, I, 958, pp. 251–52 above, but the editor Nöldeke thought it more probable that there were two separate persons, W.y.n and W.y.najān (= al-Bīnajān). See Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCIII.

693. Thus corrected in Addenda et emendanda, loc. cit., following Marquart, from the text's al-Marwazān, in the light of the form of the name in parallel Greek and Armenian sources; previously, Nöldeke in his trans. 264 n. 1, had rendered the name as Marwazān.

694. Khusraw I Anūsharwān's reign was 531–79. His name appears on his coins as ḤWSRWB. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 65–66, 380–84, 470–79, Plates XX–XXI, Tables XX–XXV; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 52, Table XI, Plate 12; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 140–44; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Coins," 237.

The Arabic sources devote considerable space to this important reign, concurrent as it was with many events within Arabia significant for the birth of Islam. See Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 663–64; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 186–67; al-Dīnawarī, op. cit., 67–74; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 196–211 = §§ 618–31; idem, Tanbīh, 101–102, tr. 145–46; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 51–53; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 434–42, 455–57. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 159–64, 219–32. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 363–440; Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 228–33; idem, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 153–62, 178; EI², s.vv. Anūsharwān (H. Massé), Kisrā and Sāsānids (M. Morony).

Al-Ṭabarī, in company with other early historical writers like al-Ya'qūbī and Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, does not mention Buzurgmihr/Buzurjmihr, famed sage and minister of Anūsharwān so famed in later Islamic lore and legend (al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 72, has a single, brief reference, but Ibn Qutaybah in his 'Uyūn al-

[Hurmuz]

Then there assumed the royal power Hurmuz. He was the son of King Anūsharwān, and his mother was the daughter of Khāqān the Elder.[695]

I received reports going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said: This Hurmuz, son of Kisrā, was well educated and full of good intentions of benevolence toward the weak and destitute, but he attacked the power of the nobles, so that they showed themselves hostile and hated him, exactly as he in turn hated them. When he assumed the crown, he gathered round himself the members of the nobility of his kingdom. They enthusiastically called down blessings on his head and offered up thanks for his father. Hurmuz gave them promises of benevolent rule; he was anxious to behave toward his subjects with justice but implacable [989] against the great men of the kingdom, because of their oppressing the lowly folk.[696] akhbār has frequent mentions and quotations from his ḥikmah). Extensive mention of him only appears in writers of the mid-fourth/tenth century onward, such as al-Mas'ūdī, al-Tha'ālibī and especially Firdawsī, but thereafter he figures as the epitome of good counsel and wisdom in the "Mirrors for Princes" and similar adab works. This paragon may have arisen out of the Burzmihr who was a secretary of Anūsharwān's but who was, according to the Shāh-nāmah, executed by that ruler's successor Hormizd IV. Christensen, "La légende du sage Buzurjmihr," 81–128, although now outdated, traced how the stories round him first appeared in Middle Persian literature and then grew in the Islamic period. De Blois, in his Burzōy's Voyage to India and the Origin of the Book of Kalīlah wa Dimnah, 48–50, subjects Christensen's ideas to stringent analysis and concludes that Buzurgmihr remains a very shadowy individual, if he existed at all; nor does he think that there are any grounds for identifying him with Khusraw Anūsharwān's physician Burzōy, sent to India, according to the story, to fetch back a copy of the wonderful book Kalīlah wa-Dimnah. See also *EI*², s.v. Buzurgmihr (H. Massé); EIr, s.v. Bozorgmehr-e Boḵtagān (Djalal Khaleghi Motlagh).

---

695. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 899, p. 160 and n. 404. According to al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 74–75, Hormizd was the only son of Anūsharwān's who was born of a noble mother, all the others being awlād sūqah.

696. Hormizd's policy of favoring the masses as a counterweight to the upper classes, who represented a threat to his despotic royal power, is stressed in the Arabic sources. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 75–77, puts into his mouth a lengthy accession speech enunciating guidelines for his future policy, including protection of the weaker, vulnerable members of society (al-ḍu'afā' wa-ahl al-ḍi'ah) against the oppression of the upper classes (al-'ilyah). This was a reversal of his father's cultivation of the support of the nobility and the Zoroastrian clergy, and the hostility of these latter entrenched interests was to contribute to Hor-

His justice reached such a point that he once went to Māh in order to spend the summer there.[697] In the course of his journey thither, he gave orders for it to be proclaimed amongst his troops and all the others in his army camp that they were to avoid the cultivated fields and not to cause harm to any of the landholders (dahāqīn) there. They were also to keep their mounts under control so that they caused no damage to the fields. He appointed a man who was to familiarize himself with the sort of thing that was going on in the army camp and to punish anyone who transgressed his command.

His own son Kisrā was in the army camp, and one of his riding beasts wandered off and strayed into one of the tilled fields along the way, started grazing, and created damage there. The animal was caught and brought to the man whom Hurmuz had appointed to punish anyone who caused damage to the tillage, or the owner of any beast that caused such damage, and to compel the offender to pay compensation. However, the man was not able to enforce Hurmuz's orders against Kisrā nor against any of those in Kisrā's retinue, hence he brought to Hurmuz's notice the damage he had observed that beast causing. Hurmuz ordered that he should crop that animals's ears and dock its tail, and that he should exact compensation from Kisrā. The man left Hurmuz's presence in order to put the king's orders into effect regarding Kisrā and his riding beast, but Kisrā secretly induced a group of the great men to ask him to go easy in putting the command into effect. They met him and talked to him about this, but he refused to listen. They asked him to delay putting into practice Hurmuz's order to him concerning the beast, until they had a chance to speak with the king and to persuade him to leave the animal alone. He agreed to this. That group of great men went to Hurmuz and told him that the steed that had done the damage was an ill-natured beast and mizd's downfall, blinding, and death, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 993, p. 303 below. Nevertheless, Hormizd's justice is stressed, a justice greater than that of Anūsharwān, in the opinion of Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. II, 246–47. Also, Christian sources praise him for his tolerance, which included special favor for the Nestorian Catholicos at Seleucia-Ctesiphon, Īshō'yahb I (in office 582–95). See Nöldeke, trans. 268 n. 3; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 200–203; Christensen, Sassanides, 441–43; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 162.

---

697. See for this place, al-Ṭabarī, I, 865, p. 97 and n. 249 above.

that it had wandered off and entered the tilled field; they asked Hurmuz to withdraw his order that the beast's ears should be cropped and its tail docked because this would be a bad augury for Kisrā. Despite this, Hurmuz refused their request; on his orders, the steed's ears were cropped and its tail docked, and Kisrā was [990] made to pay compensation in the same amount as other people were made to pay. Then Hurmuz moved off from his army camp.[698]

One day, at the time when the vines were ripening, Hurmuz rode out to Sābāṭ near al-Madā'in. His route went past orchards and vineyards. One of the men from Hurmuz's cavalry division who was riding with him noted a vineyard and saw in it partly ripened grapes. He picked some clusters and gave them to a squire (ghulām) who was accompanying him, telling him, "Take these back to our quarters, cook them with some meat, and make a broth out of it, for this is very wholesome and beneficial at this time." The guardian of that vineyard came up to him, gripped him fast and shouted loudly. The man's anxiety about being punished by Hurmuz for picking those grapes reached such a pitch that he handed over to the guardian of the vineyard a belt ornamented with gold, which he was wearing, in exchange for the half-ripe grapes he had picked from his vines, and thereby indemnified himself against punishment. He considered that the guardian's acceptance of the belt from him, and his letting him go free, was an act of grace the guardian had bestowed on him and a kind act he had accorded him.

It is said that Hurmuz was a successful and victorious commander, who never set his hand to anything that he did not attain. He was, moreover, well educated, skillful, and shrewd, but bad intentioned, a defect he inherited from his maternal relations, the Turks. He removed the nobles [from his court and entourage] and killed 13,600 men from the religious classes and from those of good family and noble birth. His sole aim was to win over the lower classes and to make them favorably disposed towards him. He imprisoned a great number of the great men, and degraded them and stripped them of their offices and ranks. He provide well for the mass of troops (al-jund), but deprived the cavalrymen (al-asāwirah) of resources. Hence a great number of those in his entourage became evil intentioned toward him, as a consequence of the fact that God wished to change their (i.e., the Persians') rule and transfer their royal power to someone else. Everything has its own particular cause.[699]

698. This story also in al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 77–78.

[991] The Hērbadhs presented Hurmuz with a petition that embodied their desire to persecute the Christians. The king endorsed the document with the words, "Just as our royal throne cannot stand on its two front legs without the two back ones, our kingdom cannot stand or endure firmly if we cause the Christians and adherents of other faiths, who differ in belief from ourselves, to become hostile to us. So renounce this desire to persecute the Christians and become assiduous in good works, so that the Christians and the adherents of other faiths may see this, praise you for it, and feel themselves drawn toward your religion."[700]

I received reports going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said: The Turks marched out against Hurmuz. Other authorities state that, in the eleventh year of his reign, Shābah, the supreme ruler of the Turks,[701] advanced against him with three hundred 699. Cf. al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 78, and Al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 211–12, the latter source stating that Hormizd killed thirteen thousand from the upper classes (al-khawāṣṣ) of Persia and destroyed the bases of the Zoroastrian state church. The asāwirah or mailed, heavy cavalrymen were recruited from the classes of the nobility and gentry (see n. 258 above), while what is here called the jund represented the infantry and other less favored elements of the forces.

700. As mentioned in n. 696 above, Nestorian Christian sources give a favorable picture of Hormizd and his policies.

701. Shābah (if this is the correct form of a dubiously written name) was more probably a ruler of the northern Hephthalites, or a vassal ruler in the upper Oxus regions of the Turkish, rather than the Qaghan of the Western Turks. In the 580s, Tardu (Chinese, Ta-t'ou), son of Ishtemi or Istemi (see n. 394 above), was Qaghan of what the Chinese knew as the Western Frontier Region, with Central Asia stricto sensu and the fringes of Transoxania controlled by other members of the Turkish ruling house, Taspar (or Taghpar), son of Bumin (r. 572–81), then Nivar (Chinese, She-tu), who was ousted by Apa, son of Muhan (Chinese, Ta-lo-pien), who in 583 founded the state of the Western Turks, until he lost power in 587. See Sinor, "The Establishment and Dissolution of the Türk Empire," 304–306; Sinor and S. G. Klyashtorny, "The Türk Empire," 333–34. None of these names resembles that of Shābah, and these Turkish potentates were in any case too heavily involved in internal warfare and internecine rivalries within Inner Asia to have begun hostilities with an external power like the Sāsānids.

thousand warriors until he reached Bādhghīs and Harāt;[702] that the king of the Byzantines moved into the outer districts of his empire (al-ḍawāḥī) with eighty thousand warriors heading toward him;[703] and that the king of the Khazars moved with a large army toward al-Bāb wa-al-Abwāb (i.e., Darband), wreaking damage and

---

702. Bādhghīs is the region of what is now northwestern Afghanistan lying to the north of Herat, the name being known, in the form Wāitigaēsa, since Avestan times. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 318; Marquart, Ērānšahr, 64–65, 67, 70, 77–78; Le Strange, Lands, 412–13; Barthold, Historical Geography, 47–49; EI[2], s.v. Bādghīs or Bādhghīs (W. Barthold and F. R. Allchin); EIr, s.v Bāḏḡīs. I. General and the early period (C. E. Bosworth).

703. The course of Perso-Byzantine relations after the war of 540–45 between Khusraw Anūsharwān and Justinian (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 958–60, p. 252–55 above) until this point is not noted by al-Ṭabarī but was in fact very eventful. There was a prolonged war in Lazica, the westernmost, coastal region of Georgia, the Colchis of Antiquity, from 549 to 561, in which Persia, endeavoring to extend her influence over Armenia and Georgia, had confronted Byzantium, equally concerned to assert a protectorate over these Christian kingdoms (for Sāsānid policy in Persarmenia, that part of eastern Armenia where the Persians claimed control, see EIr, s.v. Armenia and Iran. ii. The Pre-Islamic Period. 6. The Sasanian Period. II: Persarmenia [M.L. Chaumont]), and this formed the second of Anūsharwān's wars with the Greeks. The peace treaty of 561, the negotiations for which are described in detail by the Greek historian Menander Protector, giving the text of the Greek version of the treaty in extenso, and whose chief Persian representative in them was Īzadh-Gushnasp (later to be a partisan of Bahrām Chūbīn's, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 997, p. 307 below), provided for a fifty years' peace, on analogy with that of 422 between Theodosius II and Bahrām V Gūr, involving Byzantium's paying an annual tribute in return for Persia's renouncing all rights over Lazica and consequent access to the Black Sea. There was also a commercial clause by means of which both powers aimed at controlling—with the imposition of appropriate customs dues—trade conducted by Arab merchants from the Persian Gulf shores and across the Syrian Desert, and a military clause that seems to have aimed at preventing intertribal, or rather, interdynastic hostilities between the respective Arab allies of the Byzantines and Persians, the Jafnids/Ghassānids and the Lakhmids (see Shahîd, "The Arabs in the Peace Treaty of 561," 191–211).

Justinian's expansionist efforts during his long reign were largely concentrated on the west of his empire, and he had been generally content to maintain the status quo in the east. But his nephew and successor Justin II (r. 567–78), having lost much of Italy to the Germanic Lombards who invaded the Po valley in 568, looked to the east for compensatory military glory. Hence the fifty years' peace lasted only ten years. In 572 Justin renounced payment of the tribute and intervened in Armenia to support a revolt of local Christians against the persecutions and attempts to impose Zoroastrianism of the Persian Marzbān Chihr-Gushnasp from the prominent Suren family. By supporting the Armenian rebels, Justin hoped to take advantage of Anūsharwān's preoccupations in the east with the Turkish Khāqān Sinjibū (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 895–96, pp. 152–53 above).

The result was a third war which began with a Persian invasion of Syria, capturing Daras/Dārā and threatening Antioch. The war dragged on for twenty years, destruction.[704] [They further state] that two men from the Arabs, one called ʿAbbās the Squinter and the other ʿAmr the Blue-Eyed One, encamped with a mighty host of Arabs on the banks of the Euphrates and mounted raids against the inhabitants of the Sawād.[705] His enemies became emboldened against him and despite an armistice of 575–78 negotiated on the Persian side by the commander Māhbōdh (whose son Basak (?) is named in al-Ṭabarī, I, 985, p. 291 above, as the fortifier of al-Mushaqqar in eastern Arabia) and on the Greek side by Tiberius (who became emperor as Tiberius II Constantine, r. 578–82, but who was already Caesar and acting emperor after Justin lapsed into insanity in December 574). The truce enabled the Magister Militum per Orientem Maurice (subsequently emperor, r. 582–602) to build up his forces for a campaign in the east in 578, but this was preempted by a Persian invasion, under the general Māhbōdh, of the Armenian Taurus region, checked by a counterattack of Maurice which carried the Byzantine offensive as far as the region of Adiabene in northern Mesopotamia. Attempts at a further peace between Tiberius and Anūsharwān were aborted by the Persian king's sudden death in spring 579, for his successor Hormizd preferred to break off relations and continue the war; a sticking-point was the Byzantines' continued refusal to extradite the Armenian leaders of the 572 revolt in Persarmenia.

---

With the resumption of hostilities, Maurice prepared for war, and now in 580 aimed at involving the Jafnid/Ghassānid al-Mundhir b. al-Ḥārith (r. 569–82) in warfare along the Syrian Desert fringes (see Nöldeke, Die Ghassânischen Fürsten, 27–28; Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century, I/1, 396ff.). After further peace negotiations in 580–81 failed, the Byzantine army under Maurice secured resounding victories in Upper Mesopotamia, including at Constantina/Tall Mawzan, but was still unable to capture the key fortresses of Niṣībīn and Daras/Dārā. The war then continued through Hormizd's reign, with the Byzantine armies commanded by Maurice's brother-in-law Philippicus, by Priscus and then by Phillippicus again till 589, and with fighting concentrated upon such points as Amida/Āmid, Martyropolis/Mayyāfāriqīn, and Daras/Dārā. In 589 Hormizd ordered Bahrām Chūbīn (on whom see n. 706 below), fresh from his victories in the east against the Hephthalites, to invade Siunik' (the region between Lake Sevan and the middle course of the Araxes/Aras river) but Bahrām suffered a decisive defeat at the hands of the Byzantine general Romanus; it was apparently Hormizd's humiliating treament of the momentarily unsuccessful, but until then highly successful, Bahrām (the Greek historians state that the emperor sent to him women's garments, emblems of weakness and cowardice, while Bahrām responded with a letter addressed to his sovereign merely as "Hormizd, son of Khusraw"), which finally provoked him into rebellion against the king.

See on these events, Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, I, 441–68, II, 95–110; idem, History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius to the Death of Justinian, I, 113–23; M. J. Higgins, The Persian War of the Emperor Maurice (582–602). Part I. The Chronology, with a Brief History of the Persian Calendar, 24–41; Christensen, Sassanides, 372–74; Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, II, 503–21; P. Goubert, Byzance avant l'Islam. I. Byzance et l'Orient sous les successeurs de Justinien. L'Empéreur Maurice, 63–127; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 155–56, 158–60, 162–63; Whitby, "Procopius and the Development of Roman Defences in Upper Mesopotamia," 729–30.

raided his lands. They so encompassed his lands that these last became known as a sieve with many holes. It is further said that enemies had encompassed the land of Persia from all sides like the bowstring over the two curved ends of the bow. Shābah, king of the Turks, sent a message to Hurmuz and the great men of the Persians, announcing his advance with his troops and saying, "Put in good repair the bridges over the rivers and wadis so that I may cross over them to your land, and construct bridges over all those [992] rivers which do not already have them. Also, do likewise regarding all the rivers and wadis that lie along my route from your land to that of the Byzantines, because I have determined on marching against them from your land."

Hurmuz became very fearful at all these threats coming upon him, and sought counsel regarding them. The decision was reached for him to move against the king of the Turks. So Hurmuz sent against him a man from the people of al-Rayy called Bahrām, son of Bahrām Jushnas, known as Jūbīn, with twelve thousand men whom Bahrām had personally selected—mature and experienced men, not youngsters.[706] It is stated alternatively that Hur-

---

Ḍawāḥī, sing. ḍāḥiyah, literally, "exposed, outer side," was a term specially used in early Islamic times for the zones of advanced frontier defenses marking the Byzantine-Arab frontier in the Taurus region of southeastern Anatolia.

704. It does seem that the Khazars had become established in the eastern Caucasus region by the later sixth century, see Dunlop, The History of the Jewish Khazars, 43–45; but we have no precise historical mention of this invasion.

705. These two contemptuous and pejorative names (blueness = haggardness, lividness, or blue-eyedness, being regarded as a defect, reflected in the linking of the color with the mujrimīn or sinners at the Last Judgment in Qur'ān, XX, 102) may well be fictitious ones. Nothing is otherwise known of these two raiders from the desert except that al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 212 = § 633, gives 'Amr the further sobriquet of al-Afwah, "the big-mouthed one," and unhelpfully says that the raiders came from the direction of Yemen.

706. Bahrām Chūbīn (literally "wooden," but explicable, according to A. Sh. Shahbazi, see below, from his tall and slender physique, hence with the sense of "lance, javelin shaft") stemmed from the great family of Mihrān (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 885, p. 131 and n. 340 above) in Rayy and was commander on the eastern frontiers of the Sāsānid realm. His military exploits in the east and his subsequent usurpation of royal power made such an impression on popular consciousness that there arose a popular romance in Pahlavi, the no longer extant Wahrām Čōbēn-nāmag. This romance, together with a Book of Rustam and Isfandiyār, was translated into Arabic by a secretary of "Hishām" (the Umayyad caliph Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik?), one Jabalah b. Sālim. See Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 305, 364, tr. Bayard Dodge, II, 589, 716; Nöldeke, trans. 474–48, Excursus 6; Christensen, Romanen om Bahrâm Tschôbîn, et rekonstruktionsforsøg. In his own time, Bahrām had been hailed by muz mustered at that time all those in his capital registered on the dīwān rolls (al-dīwāniyyah),[707] amounting to seventy thousand warriors. Bahrām advanced rapidly with the troops who had joined him until he had passed Harāt and Bādhghīs. Shābah was unaware of Bahrām's presence until the latter fixed his encampment in his vicinity. Messages went backward and forward between them, and clashes of arms, and Bahrām killed Shābah with an arrow shot at him. It is said that, in the realm of the Persians, supreme skill in archery was attributed to three men: '.r.sh.sh.yāṭ.y.n's shot in the war between Manūshihr and Afrāsiyāb (text, "Firāsiyāt");[708]

[993] Sūkhrā's shot in the war against the Turks;[709] and this shot of Bahrām's. He declared Shābah's encampment to be lawful booty, and established himself in that place. B.r.mūdhah,[710] Shābah's many as something of a messianic figure who was to save the Sāsānid kingdom from chaos and to restore the glories of his Arsacid forebears, although subsequent writings on the downfall of the Sāsānid kingdom, written in Pahlavi and stemming from the early Islamic period, generally take what might be called a Persian legitimist view and portray Bahrām as a base-born usurper whose actions contributed to the decline and confusion of the state in its last decades. See K. Czeglédy, "Bahrām Čōbīn and the Persian Apocalyptic Literature," 32–43, and on him on general, Nöldeke, trans. 270 n. 3; Christensen, Sassanides, 443–45; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 163–65; *EI*², s.v. Bahrām (Cl. Huart and H. Massé); EIr, s.v. Bahrām. vii. Bahrām VI Čōbīn (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

---

707. An anachronistic use of the Islamic administrative term, that used to denote the register of names of the Arab muqātilah or warriors and their pay allotments, the system instituted, so the story goes, by the caliph 'Umar I, although the word itself is assumed to stem ultimately from Old Persian dipi-, "document, inscription," but probably with even older antecedents. See EIr, s.v. Dīvān. i. The term (F. C. de Blois), and also al-Ṭabarī, I, 877, p. 116 above, where dīwān is used for the king Fīrūz's perpatetic exchequer.

708. Thus in Nöldeke's text, but n. e offers a variety of readings from the manuscripts, with Marquart, in Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCIV, following Darmesteter, offering also Irishshibāṭīr. For his translation, 271, Nöldeke chose from among the various readings Arishsātīn. The first element of the name is clearly the personal name Arish, the MP form of Avestan Ərəxša-, of uncertain meaning. In Iranian legendary history, Arish or Kay Arish, the Avestan Kawi Arshan, was the celebrated archer who shot an arrow a prodigious distance to establish the boundary between Iran and Afrāsiyāb's Turan, as mentioned here. The Arsacids traced their descent back to Kay Arish, regarded in the Pahlavi sources as the grandson of Kay Kawād. See Nöldeke, trans. 271 n. 2; Justi, Namenbuch, 29–30, 88–89; Mayrhofer, Die altiranischen Namen, 38 no. 114; Yarshater, "Iranian National History." 373, 406, 444, 475. Nöldeke was, however, unable to suggest any plausible explanation of the second element sātīn (or however it should be read)

709. See I, 877, p. 116 above, for this incident.

710. Again a doubtful rendering of a name that does not look very Turkish in its son, who was the equal of his father, marched against Bahrām. Bahrām attacked him, put him to flight, and besieged him in a certain fortress of his. Bahrām pressed B.r.mūdhah so hard that he surrendered to him. Bahrām sent him back captive to Hurmuz and plundered immense treasures that were laid up in the fortress. It is said that he transported to Hurmuz wealth, jewels, vessels, weapons, and other plundered items amounting to two hundred fifty-thousand camels' loads. Hurmuz thanked Bahrām for the booty he had gained and which had reached him.

However, Bahrām was afraid of Hurmuz's violence, as were the troops who were with him, so he threw off allegiance to Hurmuz, advanced toward al-Madā'in, showed vexation at Hurmuz's behavior, and proclaimed that Hurmuz's son Abarwīz was more fitted for the royal power than he. Certain of those in Hurmuz's court circle threw in their lot with the rebels. For this reason Abarwīz, fearing Hurmuz, fled to Azerbaijan; a number of the Marzbāns and Iṣbahbadhs joined him there and gave him their allegiance. The great men and the nobles at al-Madā'in, including Bindūyah (text, "Bindī") and Bisṭām, maternal uncles of Abarwīz, rose up, deposed Hurmuz, blinded him with a red-hot needle but left him alive, shrinking from the crime of actually killing him.[711] present form. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 81, has the much more Turkish-looking Y.l.t.kīn for it, but Nöldeke was very likely correct in suspecting that this was the invention of a later age when names for soldiers, etc., compounded with the ancient Turkish, originally princely, title of tégin were becoming familiar within the Islamic world.

---

711. Bindūyah (a hypocoristic from Winda-(farnah?) "possessing royal glory," see Justi, Namenbuch, 368–69, 370–71) and Bisṭām (see on this name n. 237 above) were members of one of the seven greatest families of Persia, regarded as almost on a level with the families of the Arsacids and Sāsānids, that of Spāhbadh. Their father Shabūr had been killed by Hormizd in his purge of magnates of the realm whom he regarded with suspicion (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 990, p. 297 above), hence the revenge of the two sons in this rebellion against the king. See Nöldeke, trans. 273 n. 1, 439 Excursus 3; EIr, s.v. Besṭām o Bendōy (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

The mode of blinding mentioned here (Ar. samala, Pers. mīl kashīdan) was often employed in order to avoid physical desecration or disfiguring of the body of a person invested with the divinely buttressed aura of kingship, etc. Procopius, The Persian War, I.vi.17, states that the Persians used either to pour boiling olive oil into the victim's wide-open eyes or else to prick the eyeballs with a heated needle. Al-Ṭabarī, I, 998, p. 310 below, and other sources state further that Hormizd was shortly afterward murdered, either directly on Khusraw Abarwēz's orders, as the Byzantine chronicler Theophylactus Simocatta alleges, or with his complicity, as

News of this reached Abarwīz, and he set out from Azerbaijan, with his retinue, for the capital, hastening to get there before Bahrām. Having arrived at al-Madā'in, Abarwīz seized the royal power and prepared to defend himself against Bahrām. The two of them met together on the bank of the Nahrawān river,[712] where disputation and confrontation took place between them. Abarwīz sought to convince Bahrām that he would guarantee his security, exalt him in rank, and raise the status of his governorship; but
[994] Bahrām would not accept that.[713]

Various battles took place between them, until Abarwīz was compelled to flee to Byzantium, seeking help from its king, after a fierce battle and a night attack launched by both sides. It is said that Bahrām had with him a detachment of especially strong troops, including a group of three of the leading Turkish warriors, unequalled among the rest of the Turks for their equestrian skills (furūsiyyah) and their strength, who had undertaken to Bahrām that they would kill Abarwīz. On the morning after the night attack, Abarwīz stood firm and summoned his troops to give battle to Bahrām, but they were reluctant to stir. The group of three Turks attacked him, but Abarwīz went out to engage them and killed them one by one with his own hand. He then abandoned the battlefield, aware that his followers had been reluctant to fight and were wavering in their allegiance. He went to his father at Ctesiphon, entered his presence, told him what was apparent to him regarding his troops' attitude, and sought his advice. Hurmuz advised him to make his way to Mawrīq (Maurice), the king of the Byzantines, in order to seek help from him. He placed his womenfolk and children in a place secure from Bahrām and set off with a small number of companions, including Bindūyah, Bisṭām and Kurdī, brother of Bahrām Jūbīn. He reached Antioch, and wrote to al-Ṭabarī says. See Christensen, Sassanides, 444.

---

712. That is, the canal that ran a two hundred miles' course, parallel to and eastward of the Tigris, from near Takrīt in the north to Mādharāyā in the south. See further on the region of Nahrawān n. 615 above.

713. As Nöldeke, trans. 273 n. 1, and 274 n. 2, observed, the course of all these events, which were to culminate in Khusraw Abarwēz's triumph over Bahrām Chūbīn, is extremely confused in the sources, with Theophylactus having the clearest and fullest narrative here. See Christensen, Sassanides, 444–45; EIr, s.v. Bahrām. vii. Bahrām VI Čōbīn (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

Mawrīq. The latter received him and gave him in marriage his daughter, called Maryam (Mary), who was very precious to him. The complete extent of Hurmuz, son of Kisrā's reign was, according to certain authorities, eleven years, nine months, and ten days, and according to Hishām b. Muḥammad, twelve years.[714]

[Kisrā II Abarwīz]

Then there assumed the royal power Kisrā Abarwīz.[715] [995]

[He was] the son of Hurmuz, the son of Kisrā Anūsharwān, and was one of the outstanding kings of the dynasty in regard to bravery, one of them with the most incisive judgment, and one with the most far-sighted perceptions. According to what has been mentioned, his strength in battle, valor, successfulness, victoriousness, accumulation of wealth and treasuries, the assistance to his cause of fate and of the times, reached a pitch that had never been vouchsafed to any king more exalted than he. Hence he was called Abarwīz, meaning in Arabic "The Victorious One."

---

714. For more detailed comment on these events, including Bahrām's revolt, Khusraw Abarwēz's appeal to the Byzantine emperor Maurice, and his alleged marriage to a Byzantine princess, see the second, fuller narrative of these events by al-Ṭabarī at I, 995ff., pp. 305ff. below.

In the Arabic and Persian sources, the story of the three-sided struggle between Hormizd, Khusraw Abarwēz, and Bahrām Chūbīn is given in detail by al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 79–84 and Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. II, 266ff., and more cursorily by al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 187–91, and al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 212–15 = §§ 633–35. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 444–46; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 164–65, 178; EIr, s.v. Bahrām VI Čōbīn (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

Hormizd IV's period of power was 579–90, see Frye, op. cit., 178. His name appears on his coins as AUHRMZDY. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 66, 384–85, 479–83, Plate XX, Tables XXVI-XXVII; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 52, Table XI, Plate 12; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 145–47; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 237.

The Arabic sources on his reign in general include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 664; al-Ya'qūbī, op. cit., I, 187–91; al-Dīnawarī, op. cit., 74–84; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 195–211 = §§ 617–31; idem, Tanbīh, 102, tr. 146; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 53; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 469–72. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabari-Bal'amī, trans. II, 246–53. Of modern studies, see the ones detailed in the previous paragraph.

715. MP abarwēz, NP parwēz, "victorious." See Justi, Namenbuch, 19; Nöldeke, trans. 275 n. 3. This point is the beginning of the second, fuller narrative of events surrounding the deposition of Hormizd, the revolt of Bahrām Chūbīn and the eventual triumph of Khusraw Abarwēz.

It is mentioned that, when he became apprehensive of what his father Hurmuz intended, on account of the scheming of Bahrām Jūbīn over this, and when it had reached the point that Hurmuz imagined that Abarwīz was planning to seize the royal power for himself, Abarwīz left secretly for Azerbaijan. Subsequently, he proclaimed his cause openly there. When he reached that region, a group of the Iṣbahbadhs and others who were there rallied to him and gave him their allegiance, promising to give him aid, but he made no [positive] steps toward that. It is also said that, when Ādhīn Jushnas,[716] who had been sent to combat Bahrām Jūbīn, was killed, the army accompanying Ādhīn Jushnas scattered and finally made its way to al-Madā'in. Jūbīn pursued them, and Hurmuz's[717] position became very unsure. Ādhīn Jushnas's sister, who had been the youthful companion of Abarwīz, wrote to him, informing him of Hurmuz's weak position as a result of what had happened to Ādhīn Jushnas and telling him that the great men of state had resolved upon deposing Hurmuz. She further told him that, if Jūbīn reached al-Madā'in before he could get there, Jūbīn would occupy it. When the letter reached Abarwīz, he gathered together all the troops he could from Armenia and Azerbaijan, and with them marched on al-Madā'in. The leading figures and nobles rallied to him, full of joy at his arrival. He assumed the royal crown and seated himself on his throne. He said: "It is part of our religion to choose piety [above all other things], and part of our considered opinion to do good works. Our grandfather Kisra, son [996] of Qubādh, was like a parent for you, and our father Hurmuz was a just judge for you; so ensure that you remain obedient and submissive now."

On the third day, Abarwīz went to his father, prostrated himself before him and said, "May God grant you long life, O king! You know that I am innocent of what your false-hearted subjects (literally, "hypocrites," munāfiqūn) did to you. I went into hiding and made for Azerbaijan out of fear that you had the intention to kill me." Hurmuz gave credence to this apology, saying, "O my dear son, I have two requests to make of you, so aid me in implementing these. The first one is that you should take vengeance on my behalf upon those who took part in my deposition and blinding,[718] and that you should show no mercy toward them. The second one is that you should appoint every day three persons of firm judgment to keep me company and that you should instruct them to come into my presence." Abarwīz showed himself humble and submissive toward him, and said, "O king, may God grant you long life! The rebel Bahrām is threatening us from very near and has on his side courage and bravery; we do not at present have the power to stretch forth our hand against those who perpetrated what they did against you, but if God gives me the upper hand over the false-hearted one, then I shall act as your representative and the willing agent of your hand."

716. This name appears variously in the sources. Nöldeke adopted his reading here, see trans. 276 n. 2, on a basis of the readings of al-Ṭabarī and al-Ya'qūbī alone among the sources. Justi, Namenbuch, 5, 354–55, interpreted this putative name as from ādhīn "ornament" + gushnasp "strong, powerful." But Mr F. C. de Blois has pointed out that Justi's translation is certainly wrong: rather, for ādhīn read MP ēwēn "manner, custom" [NP ā'īn], while gushnasp means "stallion" and is also the name of a sacred fire. He suggests that a rendering *Ādur-gushnasp would make better sense here.

717. Correcting the name Bahrām of the text to Hurmuz, as in Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCIV, and Nöldeke, trans. 276.

Bahrām got news of Kisrā's approach and of how the people had made Abarwīz king. He hastened toward al-Madā'in with his troops. Abarwīz sent out spies against him. When Bahrām drew near to him, Abarwīz thought that the best course was to negotiate with him peaceably. So he girded on his weapons, and ordered Bindūyah, Bisṭām, a group of the great men whom he trusted, and a thousand men of his troops to put on their best array and gird on their weapons. Abarwīz set out from his fortress with them against Bahrām, with the people calling down blessings on his head, and surrounded by Bindūyah, Bisṭām, and all the other leading figures until he halted on the bank of the Nahrawān river. When Bahrām perceived the full extent of Abarwīz's panoply, he set out on a piebald mount (birdhawn . . . ablaq), which he especially held dear, wearing no mailed coat and accompanied by Īzadh [997] Jushnas[719] and three men who were kinsmen of the king of the Turks. These last had pledged their lives to Bahrām that they would hand over to him Abarwīz as a prisoner, and he had given them extensive wealth as payment for this.

718. That is, on Bindūyah, Bisṭām, and their allies, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 993, p. 303 above.

719. That is, īzad "God" + gushnasp (see n. 716 above); see Justi, Namenbuch, 145–46, 354–55.

When Bahrām saw Kisrā's fine figure, his splendid outfit, his crown going with him, accompanied by the unfurled banner of Kāwah (dirafsh-i Kābiyān), their supremely mighty flag,[720] and when he saw Bindūyah, Bisṭām, and the rest of the great men, their fine weapons, their splendor, and their mounts, he became downcast at all this, and commented to his companions, "Do you not see that the son of a whore has put on flesh and grown fat, has made the transition from youth to manhood experience, has acquired an ample beard and a full-grown mustache,[721] and his body has become stout." While he was uttering these words, having stationed himself on the bank of the Nahrawān river, Kisrā said to one of those standing with him, "Which of these is Bahrām?" One of Bahrām's brothers called Kurdī, who had never wavered in his allegiance to Abarwīz and had remained one of his followers, said, "May God grant you long life, the man on the piebald steed!" Kisrā began his speech with the following words: "O Bahrām, you are one of the supports of our kingdom and a pillar for our subjects; you have exerted yourself nobly in our service. We have seen fit to choose some day auspicious for you[722] in order to appoint you to

720. This banner is said to have been originally the apron of the blacksmith Kāwah who, in the Iranian national epic, led a successful revolt against the tyrant Zohāk, although the legend is, according to Christensen, of comparatively late, Sāsānid origin. By that time, it was equated with the royal standard of the Persian kings, and several Arabic authors (e.g., al-Ṭabarī, I, 2174–75; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, IV, 224 = § 1556; al-Khwārazmī, Mafātīḥ al-'ulūm, 115) purport to describe it. By the time of these authors, however, the banner had long ceased to exist, being captured, according to the historians, at the decisive battle of al-Qādisiyyah between the Persians and Arabs in 15/636 or 16/637. See Nöldeke, trans. 278 n. 1; Christensen, Les Kayanides, 43; idem, Sassanides, 502–504; *EI*², s.v. Kāwah (Ed.).

721. Following the preferred reading of the Sprenger ms. shāribihī (text, n. c), for the text's shabābihi.

722. That is, auspicious from the astrological aspect. It is emphasized in later Islamic literature, and, in particular, in the works of the third/ninth-century author al-Jāḥiẓ of Baṣrah and apocryphal works attributed to him, that hemerology, the skill of choosing auspicious days for planned actions, had in considerable measure passed to the Arabs from the Persians, with the official astrologers already significant figures at the Sāsānid court. In the Kitāb al-tāj or Kitāb akhlāq al-mulūk, attributed (but almost certainly falsely) to al-Jāḥiẓ, it is stated that when Ardashīr I Pābagān divided up Persian society into four classes (an item of information that figures extensively in the sources; see Marlow, Hierarchy and Egalitar- the office of Iṣbahbadh of the whole land of Persia." Bahrām, however, replied, "But I have chosen for you a day for crucifying you!" Kisrā was filled with trepidation, even though nothing of it showed in his face. Bahrām said to Abarwīz, "O son of an adulteress, raised in the tents of the Kurds!" and other words like it, and accepted nothing whatever of what Abarwīz had offered him. There was mention of Arish, Bahrām's forefather, and Abarwīz reproached him over Arish's obedience to Abarwīz's own forefather Manūshihr.[723] The two of them separated, each one showing the most violent hostility to the other. [998]

Bahrām had a sister called Kurdiyah, one of the most accomplished of women and most endowed of them with qualities, whom he had married.[724] She reproached Bahrām for his evil speech adressed to Kisrā and his attempt to bring him under his own obedience, but he would have none of it. A martial engagement between Kisrā and Bahrām took place. It is said that, on the morning after the night battle, Kisrā sallied forth for combat in person. The three Turks saw him and made for him, but Abarwīz killed them with his own hand. He urged on his troops to battle, but perceived that they were flagging. He decided to go to some other monarch and seek military help from him. He went first to his father [Hurmuz], seeking his advice; Hurmuz considered that Abarwīz's best course was to make his way to the king of the Byzantines. He placed his womenfolk in a secure place and set out with a small body of men, including Bindūyah, Bisṭām, and Bahrām's brother Kurdī. When they left al-Madā'in, the mass of Abarwīz's supporters (al-qawm), however, were afraid that Bahrām would restore Hurmuz to the royal power and write to the king of the Byzantines on his behalf that Abarwīz's delegation be ianism in Islamic Thought, 79–83], physicians, scribes, and astrologers formed the third class. See Kitāb al-tāj, tr. 53; Gabrieli, "Etichetta di corte e costumi sasanidi nel Kitāb Aḫlāq al-Mulūk di al-Ǧāḥiẓ," 296–97; *EI*², s.v. Ikhtiyārāt [T. Fahd].

---

723. On Arish, see n. 708 above, where is mentioned the claims of the Arsacids, Bahrām's alleged forebears, to descent from the Kay Arish of Iranian legendary history.

724. As Nöldeke observed, trans. 279 n. 6, such a marriage would be allowable and even praiseworthy in Zoroastrian law and custom, though repugnant to the Muslim Firdawsī, who suppresses mention of it in the Shāh-nāmah. It would also have been unacceptable to the pre-Islamic Arabs; see Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, 164.

sent back so that they might be put to death. They told this to Abarwīz and sought permission from him to kill Hurmuz; but he made no reply. Hence Bindūyah, Bisṭām, and some of their followers went to Hurmuz, strangled him to death, and then returned to Kisrā. They said, "You can now proceed under the best possible auguries."[725]

They urged on their mounts and came to the Euphrates, crossed it, and took the way through the desert under the guidance of a man called Khurshīdhān,[726] arriving at a certain monastery on the edge of the cultivated land. While they encamped in the courtyard there, a cavalry squadron of Bahrām's, commanded by a man called Bahrām, son of Siyāwush, came upon them by surprise. Once they became aware of this, Bindūyah woke Abarwīz from his slumber and told him, "Use some stratagem [for escaping], for the enemy are on top of you." Kisrā replied, "I have no means of [999] escaping," so Bindūyah told him that he would sacrifice his own life for him, and asked him to hand over his weapons and equipment and to flee with his retainers from the monastery. They did this, and hurried on ahead of the enemy until they were able to conceal themselves in the mountains. When Bahrām, son of Siyāwush, arrived, Bindūyah, girded with Abarwīz's weapons and equipment, showed himself to Bahrām from the top of the monastery, and let Bahrām thereby imagine that he was Abarwīz. He asked Bahrām to grant him a respite until the next morning, when he would peacefully deliver himself into his hands. Hence Bahrām left him alone and only later was his stratagem revealed. Bahrām, son of Siyāwush, took Bindūyah back with him to Jūbīn, who consigned Bindūyah to imprisonment in Bahrām's custody.

It is said that Bahrām [Jūbīn] entered the royal palaces at al-Madā'in and sat down on the royal throne. The prominent leaders and great men of state gathered round him, and Bahrām addressed

725. These words, and those of other sources, no doubt express the degree of Khusraw's complicity in his father's killing: satisfaction with the result without having to stain his own hands with blood. Khusraw's conduct here was certainly Machiavellian; Nöldeke, 281 n. 1, adduces the parallel of the Russian emperor Alexander I, who in 1801 certainly had prior knowledge of the planned murder of his father Paul I.

726. That is, Khurshēdh, Avestan hvarə-xšaēta, literally "sun." See Justi, Namenbuch, 180; Bartholomae, Altiranisches Wörterbuch, col. 1848.

them, abusing Abarwīz violently and blaming him. Several sessions of argument and disputation took place between him and the prominent leaders, all of whom were averse to him. Nevertheless, Bahrām seated himself on the royal throne and had himself crowned, and the people gave him obedience out of fear.[727] It is said that Bahrām, son of Siyāwush, agreed with Bindūyah on assassinating Jūbīn, but the latter got to know about it, and had Bahrām, son of Siyāwush, executed. Bindūyah, however, escaped and managed to reach Azerbaijan.

Abarwīz journeyed onward until he reached Antioch, and from there wrote to Mawrīq, the king of the Byzantines, sending to him a delegation of his retainers and asking him for military aid.[728]

---

727. Bahrām Chūbīn entered Ctesiphon in summer 590. There was clearly a reluctance among the great men of state in the capital that the ancient house of the Sāsānids should be set aside by Bahrām. The latter, for his part, claimed to be the restorer of the even more ancient house of the Arsacids, who had been displaced by the upstart Ardashīr (I) b. Sāsān, son of a mere shepherd, and he took advantage of apocalyptic beliefs which, so he asserted, foretold himself as the future savior of the land of Iran from such external foes as the Byzantines and the Hephthalites. In Ctesiphon he assumed the complete royal style, being crowned and issuing coins, although according to Theophylactus and al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 90, he hedged his bets by proclaiming to the nobles that he was only acting as regent for Hormizd's young son Shahriyār until the latter should reach maturity. Despite his efforts, Bahrām was never able to persuade the Persian aristocracy and the Zoroastrian clergy that he held a social position above their own or that he enjoyed the divine favor, and a strong party of them continued to favor the cause of Khusraw Abarwēz as successor to his father. Bahrām had accordingly to turn to other elements for support, including that of the Jews; subsequently, Khusraw's commander Māhbōdh slaughtered many Jews in retaliation. See Neusner, "Jews in Iran," 916.

Bahrām VI Chūbīn reigned in Ctesiphon 590–91. His name appears on his coins as VRHR'N. See on his coins, Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 66–67, 385–86, 483–84, Plate XX, Table XXVII; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 52, Table XI, Plate 12; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 148–49; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 237.

See on his career and reign Nöldeke, trans. 282 n. 2; Christensen, Sassanides, 444–45; Czeglédy, "Bahrām Čōbīn and the Persian Apocalyptic Literature," 25–27; EIr, s.v. Bahrām. vii. Bahrām VI Čōbīn (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

728. Both the exact date of Khusraw Abarwēz's appeal to Maurice and the exact route he followed from the Persian capital to the Byzantine lands present certain problems. However, it seems likely that the date was the late spring of 590. Antioch, mentioned here by al-Ṭabarī as the place to which Khusraw fled, was deep in Byzantine territory, and it is much more probable, on the basis of fairly exact itineraries in Theophylactus and the Anonymus Guidi, that Khusraw and his entourage traveled from the region of Ctesiphon up the Euphrates valley via Fīrūz-

Mawrīq agreed to this, and things went so far that he gave Abarwīz his daughter Maryam in marriage and had her conveyed to him.[729] Furthermore, he sent to Abarwīz his brother Thiyādhūs (Theodosius)[730] with an army of sixty thousand warriors, headed by a man called Sarjīs (Sergius), who was [in practice] in charge of all the army's affairs, and another man whose strength was equal to a thousand men.[731] He laid down as conditions that Abarwīz should

---

Shāpūr/al-Anbār, Hīt and 'Ānah to Circesium/Qarqīsiyā at the confluence of the Khābūr and Euphrates, the first fortified point within Byzantine territory.

Bahrām had tried to purchase Byzantine neutrality in the struggle by offering to cede Niṣībīn and the lands held by the Persians right up to the Tigris. But Maurice must have felt that it was better for Byzantine interests to have a young and inexperienced Khusraw Abarwēz on the throne than the battle-hardened warrior Bahrām, and he may also have hoped to extract concessions for the Christians within the Persian realm if Khusraw were to prevail. At all events, Maurice disregarded the advice of the Senate in Constantinople, which was suspicious of affordng any help to the ancestral foe, and a Byzantine army to be commanded by the Magister Militum Narses was promised as aid for Khusraw. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 112; Higgins, The Persian War of the Emperor Maurice (582–602), Part I, 42–54; Goubert, Byzance avant l'Islam, I, 131–45.

729. As Nöldeke pointed out, trans. 283 n. 2, the Persian historical tradition and later romantic literature makes this Byzantine princess the mother of Khusraw Abarwēz's son and successor Kawād II Shērōy, whereas the Greek sources do not mention her. Nöldeke did not at the time when he made his translation of al-Ṭabarī know of the Syriac Anonymus Guidi (the earlier, greater part of which may, it has recently been suggested, have been written by Elias of Marw: personal communication from Dr. Sebastian Brock). This chronicle does in fact, mention her as one of Khusraw's two Christian wives (see trans. Nöldeke, 10). Another Syriac chronicler like Dionysius of Tell Maḥrē records the marriage with much circumstantial detail, e.g., that she was accompanied to the Persian capital by bishops and clergy and that Khusraw built for her two places of worship (hayklē), one dedicated to St. Sergius and the other to Mary, the Mother of Jesus (see trans. Palmer, The Seventh Century in the West-Syrian Chronicles, 117). It seems that there was some confusion between the Byzantine princess Maria and the celebrated Shīrīn, Khusraw's beloved, the subject of so many later Persian romances, and Theophylactus makes Sirē likewise of Byzantine origin. However, Shīrīn is said by the Anonymus Guidi, loc. cit., to have been of Aramaean origin from the district around what was later al-Baṣrah. As the mother of Khusraw's son Mardān Shāh and the mother or foster mother of another son, Shahriyār, she showed herself hostile to Shērōy after her husband's death. The historicity of Khusraw's supposed marriage with Maria must remain very dubious. See von Gutschmid, "Bemerkungen zu Tabari's Sasanidengeschichte," 744; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 208–209; Garsoïan, "Byzantium and the Sasanians," 579.

730. Nöldeke, trans. 284 n. 1, corrected "brother" to "son," as in al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 92, and later Persian sources.

731. al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 92, speaks of "ten men from among the treat him with respect and cease requiring the tribute his forefathers had exacted from the kings of the Byzantines. When the Byzantine troops reached Abarwīz, he was filled with joy and allowed them five days' rest after their arrival. Then he reviewed them and appointed officers ('urafā') over them. The army included in its numbers Thiyādhūs, Sarjīs, and the champion warrior who was the equal of a thousand men. He went with them [1000] until he reached Azerbaijan and encamped on a plain called al-Danaq (?).[732] Bindūyah and a man from the Iṣbahbadhs of that region called Mūshīl[733] with forty thousand warriors met up with him there, and people from Fārs, Iṣbahān, and Khurāsān rushed[734] to Abarwīz's standard.

Bahrām got news of Abarwīz's taking up his position on the plain of al-Danaq and set out toward him from al-Madā'in. Several violent clashes took place between them in which the Byzantine champion was killed. It is said that Abarwīz engaged Bahrām's forces, quite separately from the main body of the army, with just fourteen of his soldiers, including Bahrām's brother Kurdī, Bindūyah, Bisṭām, Sabūr, son of Afriyān, Abādh, son of Farrukhzādh, and Farrukh Hurmuz,[735] in a fierce hand-to-hand fight. The Zoroastrians (al-Majūs) assert that Abarwīz got trapped in a defile and Bahrām pursued him thither, but when Bahrām was sure that he had Abarwīz in his power, something that could not be comprehended (i.e., some supernatural power) took the latter up to the Hazārmardān," hazārmard "[having the strength of] a thousand men," being a frequent sobriquet of valiant warriors, as Nöldeke, trans. 284 n. 2, points out.

---

732. Minorsky, "Roman and Byzantine Campaigns in Atropatene," 88–89, discussed the readings for this unidentified name, which include Firdawsī's Dūk, and he thought that MP d.w.k might lie behind it. He also noted the frequent confusion in Arabic orthography of final kāf and lām and the existence of a place name Dūl to the southeast of Lake Urmiya. For the probable location of the final battle between Bahrām and the combined forces of the Byzantine army and Khusraw, see n. 736 below, 733. Reading thus for the text's Mūsīl, since Nöldeke, trans. 285 n. 3, identified him as Mushel, the Armenian ruler of Mūsh in eastern Anatolia, from the famous Mamikonian family.

734. Following the reading wa-inqaḍḍa in Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCIV.

735. Following the reconstruction of these names—all fourteen of them being given in Firdawsī's Shāh-nāmah—in Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCIV, two of them, Sābūr, son of Afriyān, and Abādh, son of Farrukhzād, being to a considerable extent differently rendered in Nöldeke's original edition and his translation, 286, rendering some of the etymological speculations in his n. 2 invalid.

top of the mountain. It is mentioned that the astrologers agreed that Abarwīz would reign for forty-eight years. Abarwīz went out to engage Bahrām in single combat. He wrested Bahrām's spear from his hand and battered his head with it until the spear broke. Bahrām became downhearted about his cause; he grew fearful, and realized that he had no hope of withstanding Abarwīz. Hence he retreated toward Khurāsān and thence to the Turks.[736]

Abarwīz, meanwhile, journeyed to al-Madā'in after he had distributed twenty million [dirhams] among the Byzantine troops and had sent them back to Mawrīq. It is said that Abarwīz wrote a letter to the Christians giving them permission to establish their churches ('imārat biya'ihim) and allowing anyone who wished, with the exception of the Zoroastrians, to adopt their faith.[737] In

736. Bahrām's troops in the vicinity of Nişībīn had at the beginning of 591 gone over to Khusraw's side on hearing of the latter's alliance with the Byzantines, so that Khusraw then controlled Upper Mesopotamia. The combined forces of Narses and Khusraw's general Mābōdh captured Seleucia, Ctesiphon, and Weh Andiyōg Shābūr in summer 591, and Bahrām then faced the combined threat of Narses' army plus a mixed Persian-Armenian-Byzantine force under Bindūyah and the Greek general John Mysticus, moving southward from Armenia into Upper Mesopotamia. In Azerbaijan, on a plain to the east of Lake Urmiya, by a river called by the Byzantine historians Balarath, near the fortified point of Ganzakos (identified by Minorsky with the course of the Müri Chay to the south of modern Marāghah), the armies met. Although Bahrām's army included a contingent of "Turks" plus a troop of war elephants, it was decisively defeated, with the victors seizing Bahrām's royal tent, harem, children, and jewels. He himself managed to escape with a small force of some four thousand men to Nīshāpūr and thence across the Oxus to the "land of the Turks." See Higgins, The Persian War of the Emperor Maurice (582–602), Part I, 51–54; Minorsky, "The Roman and Byzantine Campaigns in Atropatene," 87–91; Goubert, Byzance avant l'Islam, I, 147–62; EIr, s.v. Bahrām. vii. Bahrām (VI) Čōbīn (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

737. As Nöldeke noted, trans. 288 n. 1, Zoroastrian church law—like the subsequent Islamic one—prescribed death as the penalty for apostasy from that faith. The Greek and Syriac sources record that Khusraw Anūsharwān had executed high-born Persian converts to Christianity and had put to death the Monophysite Catholicos because he had baptised members of the imperial family; in the Perso-Byzantine treaty of 562 (see n. 703 above), this penalty for proselytism had been prescribed as the reflex of freedom of worship for the Christians. On Khusraw Abarwēz's policy toward the Christians, see Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 208–35; Asmussen, "Christians in Iran," 946. Labourt highlights the great influence at Khusraw's court of his treasurer, the Nestorian Yazdīn, descendant of the martyr Pethion (see n. 487 above) and the official responsible for collecting the land tax. Yazdīn was a member of a rich and influential Nestorian family from the vicinity of Dastagird in eastern Iraq (see on this place, n. 756 below); a this connection he adduced the fact that Anūsharwān had made a peace agreement with (kāna hādana) Qayṣar regarding the tribute that he exacted from the Byzantine ruler, and had stipulated that [1001] those of his [Zoroastrian] compatriots who were in the Byzantine ruler's lands should be kindly treated and that the monarch should build fire temples for them in his lands. Qayṣar, for his part, had made a similar stipulation in regard to the Christians [in the Persian lands].[738]

Bahrām remained among the Turks, highly honored by the king, until Abarwīz intrigued against him by sending a man called Hurmuz.[739] He sent him to the Turks with valuable jewels and other things, and Hurmuz was able to worm his way into the confidence

---

Yezdīnābādh mentioned in Adiabene may reflect their property interests. This family was for long prominent in the financial administration of the Persian realm, and various of its members were generous benefactors of the Nestorian Church. Nevertheless, the see of Seleucia-Ctesiphon remained vacant from the Catholicos Gregory's death in 609 till the end of Khusraw's reign in 628, and Yazdīn was unable to secure authorisation for his replacement (op. cit., 230–31).

738. The peace treaty of autumn 591, which concluded the Byzantine intervention in Persia, involved honors and presents for the Byzantine commanders and for the Armenian allies of Khusraw, with the Prince Smbat Bagratuni being appointed Marzbān of Hyrcania/Gurgān. Khusraw now renounced his claims to some two-thirds of Armenia. Maurice recovered the town of Martyropolis, captured by the Persians in 588, and Daras/Dārā was returned to him, although there was no question of the wide range of territory promised to Maurice by Bahrām being relinquished, and Nisībīn remained firmly in Persian hands. The financial provisions were important, but the twenty million dirhams mentioned by al-Ṭabarī here were in practice a lesser sum, since they had to be set against the arrears of tribute due from the Byzantines in previous years. In the sphere of protocol, the Persian emperor now for the first time agreed to address the Byzantine monarch as Basileus in official correspondence instead of just Caesar (although it was to be Heraclius in 629, after his crushing victory over the Sāsānids, who was formally to adopt the title Basileus, previously used informally; see I. Shahîd, "The Iranian Factor in Byzantium during the Reign of Heraclius," 295–96). According to Theophylactus, Maurice agreed to leave behind at Ctesiphon a force of one thousand Byzantine troops as Khusraw's personal guard. See Nöldeke, trans. 287 n. 1; Bury, History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 112; Goubert, Byzance avant l'Islam, I, 163–70; EIr, s.v. Byzantine-Iranian Relations. 1. Before the Islamic Conquest (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

739. This man appears in, e.g., al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 80, 83, and al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 193–94, with the further component to his name of Jarābzīn (with Jalābzīn also found in the sources, including al-Ṭabarī, I, 1030, p. 360–61 and n. 864 below), the Zalabzan of Byzantine Greek historians. See Nöldeke, trans. 289 n. 1.

of Khātūn, the king's wife, and win her over with those jewels and other things, until she engaged agents who secretly brought about Bahrām's death.[740] It is said that Khāqān grieved over his killing, and sent a message to Kurdiyah, Bahrām's sister and wife, informing her of the fate that had come upon Bahrām through his respon-

740. The story of Bahrām's murder through feminine wiles is narrated in considerable detail by al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 98–100, also in al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 193–94, at fair length, laconically in al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 222–23 = §§ 642–43, and Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 302–303. Bahrām's troops are said to have feared for their continued safety among the "Turks" after their commander's death and to have returned to the security of the fastnesses of Daylam in the Elburz mountains, where Sāsānid control was negligible, taking part later in the revolt of Bisṭām.

At-Ṭabarī records nothing of the fates of Khusraw Abarwēz's two great-uncles Bindūyah and Bisṭām (on whom see n. 711 above). Al-Dīnawarī, op. cit., 101–105, and al-Ya'qūbī, op. cit., I, 194–95, deal with them at length and in the same romantic guise as the legends around Bahrām Chūbīn's end, concluding with Bisṭām's revolt and eventual death through the craftiness of Kurdiyah, Bahrām's sister. Certain Greek and Armenian sources have more prosaic but much briefer references. Theophylactus states that Khusraw took vengeance on all those who had been involved in the deposition and blinding of his father Hormizd, and had Bindūyah thrown into the Tigris; the Armenian historian Sebeos says that Bisṭām fled to "Parthia" and was later treacherously killed by a "Kushan" ruler of the east. The Anonymus Guidi, tr. 8–9, also records their deaths. There was thus in Nöldeke's time little hard historical fact on the revolt, but in his trans. 478–87, Excursus 7, he extracted what he could out of the meager evidence. He concluded that Khusraw probably dealt with Bindūyah fairly quickly, but that Bisṭām, who had been appointed Marzbān of Khurāsān, did not rebel until 591 or early 592, and that he maintained himself virtually independent in northern Persia till the end of 595, since coins of his are extant, dated to what are called years 2–6 of his reign. We now know considerably more, above all through the information given by al-Dīnawarī (known to Nöldeke but still in manuscript and apparently not fully accessible to him) and from fresh numismatic evidence. It seems accordingly that Bisṭām held power ca. 590–96 over a considerable stretch of territory in the north, from Media/Jibāl and the Caspian provinces to Khurāsān as far as the Oxus, with the backing of many local magnates and troops from Bahrām Chūbīn's former army. He minted coins at Rayy, under the name PYLWCY WSTḤM, i.e., Pērōz Vistahm, with dates extending over seven regnal years. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 67, 386, Plate XX; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 53, Table XI, Plate 13; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 150–51; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 237. The coin sequence, and information in Christian sources, indicate that it was not till 596 that Khusraw Abarwēz managed through intrigue to procure Bisṭām's death and thus end his separatist movement; he also slew some sixty members of the families of Bindūyah and Bisṭām. These killings were to form one of the accusations laid at Khusraw's door when he himself was deposed and executed over thirty years later; see al-Ṭabarī, I, pp. 1046–47, 1051–52, 1053–54, pp. 382–84, 387–88, 390–91 below. See EIr, s.v. Besṭām o Bendōy (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

sibility and asking if he could marry her to his brother N.ṭrā (?). For this reason (i.e., his responsibility for the killing of Bahrām) he divorced Khātūn. It is said that Kurdiyah gave Khāqān a soft answer but refused N.ṭrā. She gathered round herself the warriors who had been with her brother, and set off with them from the land of the Turks toward the borders of the kingdom of Persia. N.ṭrā the Turk pursued her with twelve thousand warriors, but she killed him with her own hand. She proceeded onward and wrote to her brother Kurdī, who subsequently secured for her from Abarwīz a grant of safe conduct and security (amān). When she reached Abarwīz, he married her. He was highly taken with her, and thanked her for having (previously) reproached Bahrām.[741] Abarwīz showed himself grateful and acted in a kindly way toward Mawrīq.[742]

After Kisrā had reigned for fourteen years, the Byzantines deposed Mawrīq and killed him, also exterminating all his heirs, apart from one of his sons who fled to Kisrā, and they raised to the throne as their king a man named Fūqā (Phocas).[743] When Kisrā heard the news of the Byzantines' breaking their allegiance to Mawrīq and their killing him, he became violently aroused, regarded it with revulsion, and was gripped by anger.[744] He gave [1002]

741. There does not seem to be any firm historical information that Khusraw did marry Kurdiya, though it would not be unexpected. The story involving N.trā, a name which does not look possible as a Turkish one, must be pure legend.

742. See n. 738 above.

743. Text, Qūfā. On the revolution in Constantinople that led to the dethronement and murder in 602 of Maurice and his sons and his replacement as emperor by the Thracian centurion Phocas, see Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 86–94. In fact, Theodosius, Maurice's eldest son and intended heir over the Balkan, Anatolian, and Near Eastern lands of the empire, seems to have escaped death with the rest of his brothers only for a short while after their execution, although rumors were rife that he had escaped to Persia, as reported here by al-Ṭabarī and by certain Byzantine historians, including Theophylactus. It seems to have been enemies of Phocas who subsequently spread abroad these rumors that Theodosius had survived the bloodbath, made his way to Persia, and then ended his days in the wastes of Colchis (i.e., western Caucasia). But Khusraw Abarwēz might well have given shelter to some Byzantine claimant, whether genuine or not, as is implied by the Armenian historian Sebēos, in order to use him in as a pawn in any future Perso-Byzantine conflict, as surmised by Nöldeke, trans. 290 n. 2.

744. The killing of Maurice was, nevertheless, only a pretext for the beginning of hostilities, since there had been tension with Persia already in the latter years of asylum to Mawrīq's son, who had come to him as a refugee, crowned him, and set him up as king of the Byzantines, then sent him back with a mighty army headed by three of his commanders. The first one was called Rumiyūzān (?).[745] Kisrā sent him to Syria, which he then subdued and penetrated as far as Palestine.[746] He came to the city of Jerusalem (Bayt al-Maqdis) and took action against its bishop and all the priests in the city and the rest of the Christians over the Cross [of Jesus], which had been placed in a chest of gold and buried, with a vegetable garden planted on top of it. He pressed them hard until they showed him the spot. He then dug it out with his own hand and sent it to Kisrā in the twenty-fourth year of his reign.[747] The second commander was called Shāhīn and was the Fādhūsbān of the West. He proceeded onward until he captured Egypt and Alexandria and the land of Nubia, and sent back to Kisrā the keys of the city of Alexandria in the twenty-

---

Maurice's reign. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 198–99; Higgins, The Persian Wars of Emperor Maurice (582–602), passim.

745. Identified by Nöldeke, trans. 290 n. 3, with the Romīzān of Michael the Syrian and Barhebraeus and the Rhousmiazan of Theophanes. Nöldeke also thought it possible that Barhebraeus was correct in identifying him with the other Persian commander Shahrbarāz mentioned a few lines further on (see on the meaning of this name, n. 749 below), with Shahrbarāz being another component of Romīzān's name (but in that place, we have Shahrbarāz equated with Farru(k)hān). It was Shahrbarāz who was actually the Persian commander who conquered Jerusalem in 614, hence this would fit with what al-Ṭabarī goes on to say of Rumiyūzān's conquests in Syria and Palestine.

746. After appearing in Syria, the Persian army had occupied Damascus in 613 and had appeared in Palestine in spring 614 after defeating the Byzantine forces in the Ḥawrān between al-Darā'ah and Boṣrā (possibly the battle referred to in Sūrat al-Rūm, Qur'ān, XXX, 2–3, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1005, 1007, pp. 324, 327 and n. 761 below). See R. Schick, The Christian Communities of Palestine from Byzantine to Islamic Rule. A Historical and Archaeological Study, 20ff.

747. The capture of Jerusalem probably took place in June 614, when the city suffered a three days' sacking at the hands of the Sāsanīd troops. The "bishop" was the Patriarch Zacharias, installed at Jerusalem by Phocas's general Bonosus in 609 but now carried off into captivity in Persia; he remained titular Patriarch until his death in exile around the time of the Byzantines' final defeat of the Persian, i.e., ca. 627–28, with Modestus acting as his locum tenens in the years of the Persian occupation of Palestine and Syria. The True Cross was certainly carried off by the victors, not to be restored until 629, but the Sponge and the Spear were preserved and taken to Constantinople. See Nöldeke, trans. 291 n. 1; Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 214; 39, 46; Schick, The Christian Communities of Palestine from Byzantine to Islamic Rule, 33–39, 46.

eighth year of his reign.[748] The third commander was called Farruhān (i.e., Farrukhān), who had the rank of Shahrbarāz. He led an expedition to attack Constantinople, until he halted on the bank of the strait (i.e., the Bosphorus) just near the city, and made his encampment there.[749] Kisrā ordered him to devastate the land of the Byzantines, as an expression of his anger at the Byzantines' violence against Mawrīq and as an act of vengeance upon them for him. But none of the Byzantines acknowledged Mawrīq's son as their ruler or offered him any obedience. However, they killed Fūqā, the king whom they had raised to the throne as ruler over them, when his evil doing, his impiety toward God, and his reprehensible behavior became apparent to them. They raised to royal [1003] power over themselves a man called Hiraql (Heraclius).[750]

---

748. MP shāhēn, literally "falcon," see Justi, Namenbuch, 274–75. Shāhīn's army probably moved from Palestine against Egypt in autumn 616, so that the capture of Alexandria was probably in 617. See A. J. Butler, The Arab Conquest of Egypt and the Last Thirty Years of the Roman Dominion, 70–83.

749. Regarding the form Farruhān for the fairly common Persian name Farrukhān (an ancient patronymic from Farrukh, literally "fortunate, joyful"; see Justi, Namenbuch, 94–95, and Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, 82–83 nos. 352, 354), Nöldeke, trans. 292 n. 2, noted that the Pahlavi script does not distinguish between the letters h and kh. Shahrwarāz/Shahrbarāz is a name and not a rank (martabah), with the meaning of "boar (i.e., valiant warrior) of the land," occurring in Middle Persian onomastic, although the simple name Warāz/Barāz is more common, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 895, 960, pp. 152, 255, and nn. 393, 616 above. That Farrukhān could also have the name Shahrbarāz seemed to Nöldeke improbable, but he was not able to resolve the problem. In reality, it was Shāhīn who transferred his scene of operations to Anatolia, penetrating as far as Chalcedon on the shores of the Bosphorus (modern Kadiköy, near Üsküdar or Scutari), probably in 616, and according to certain tales meeting with the Emperor Heraclius for negotiations, an act for which he paid with his life when he returned to Khusraw's court. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 216–17. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 106, states that Shāhīn led an army of twenty-four thousand men to the shores of the "gulf of Constantinople" and encamped there; the confused account of al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 226–27 = § 647, has a romancelike account of Shahrbarāz's exploits from a base at Antioch involving his quarrel with Khusraw and in revenge leading the Byzantine emperor and his army into Persian Mesopotamia.

750. The usurper Phocas's misrule in Constantinople provoked an appeal to the Exarch of the West at Carthage, who had been appointed by Maurice and who had maintained a de facto independence during the eight years of Phocas's reign. The Exarch sent his son Heraclius with a fleet. In autumn 610 Phocas was overthrown and killed, and Heraclius was crowned emperor in his place; Phocas left behind him a reputation in the Byzantine chronicles of tyrannical behavior and ineptitude during a chaotic reign. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 203–206.

When Hiraql perceived the perilous state the land of the Byzantines was in, with the Persian armies devastating it, their killing of the Byzantine warriors, their carrying off into captivity of the Byzantines' women and children, their plundering of the Byzantines' wealth, and their violation of the inmost parts of their realm, he shed tears before God and made humble petition to Him, imploring Him to rescue him and the people of his kingdom from the Persian armies.[751] He saw in a dream a stout-bodied man, on a lofty throne and accoutred with fine weapons (i.e., the Persian king), set up some distance from his side. Another person came into their presence, threw down that man from his throne, and said to Hiraql, "I have delivered him into your hands." When Hiraql woke up, he told no one about his dream. The next night, Hiraql saw in a dream the man whom he had seen in his previous dream seated on a lofty throne, and the man who had come in upon the two of them now came to him with a long chain in his hand, which he threw round the neck of the man on the throne and held him in his power with it, saying to Hiraql, "Here, I've done it; I have handed Kisrā over to you completely. So march against him now, for victory will be yours, you will be given power over him and you will attain your desire in your campaign." When these dreams came to him successively, he at last recounted them to the great men of the Byzantines and to those of them with penetrating judgment. They told him that he would be given power over Kisrā, and advised him to lead an expedition against him.

751. The Persian invasion of Anatolia had left the Persian army stationed at Chalcedon on the eastern shore of the Bosphorus, permanently threatening the Byzantine capital. Syria and Palestine were under Persian occupation, and the Christians there suffered massacres and the loss of many religious buildings; the interlude between Heraclius's regaining these provinces and the appearance of the Muslim Arabs in the mid-630s was too brief to enable the Christian communities there to recover their lost position. The Copts and Greeks in Egypt likewise endured massacres and saw the destruction of many churches and monasteries; the Persian forces spread up the Nile valley as far as Syene/Aswan and westward along the Mediterranean coast to the Pentapolis (i.e., the modern Cyrenaica). Phocas's disastrous reign had witnessed the collapse of what remained of the Byzantine limes on the Sava and lower Danube, allowing the Avars (who had moved westward from Inner Asia before the expanding power of the first Türk empire there) and Slavs to overrun the Balkans and Greece, with the Avars reaching the suburbs of the capital itself in 617. The situation appeared so desperate that in 618 Heraclius contemplated abandoning Constantinople for Carthage, but was deterred by the Patriarch Sergius. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 214–18; Butler, The Arab Conquest of Egypt, 54–92; Schick, The Christian Communities of Palestine, 20–48.

Hiraql prepared for the campaign, and appointed one of his sons as his deputy over the city of Constantinople.[752] He took a different route from that of Shahrbarāz and proceeded onward until he penetrated deeply into Armenia and encamped at Niṣībīn after the space of a year.[753] Shāhīn, the Fādhūsbān of the West,

752. On his accession to power, Heraclius had found the empire in desperate straits. He had to quell the revolt in 610–11 at Ancyra of Phocas's brother Comentiolus, which caused a delay to his plans for rebuilding the Byzantine war machine, and he had to force the untrustworthy general of the army in Cappadocia, Priscus, a brother-in-law of Phocas, to relinquish his command and enter a monastery. Heraclius now endeavored to secure his position in the Balkans by making peace with the Khan of the Avars in 620, agreeing to pay him tribute (even if this relief from Avar attacks was only short-lived). He inaugurated extensive reforms and reorganization in both provincial and central administration. Details are sparse, but it seems that, once the Persians had been pushed out of Anatolia in 623 (see n. 753 below), Heraclius began the extensive settlement there of picked troops, epilekta, possibly the genesis of the military theme system which was to develop in the later seventh century as a response to Arab attacks along the Taurus mountains frontier. Naval forces were also built up; the Byzantine fleet was used to transport an army in spring 622 to Lazica so that it could campaign successfully in Armenia, and skillful use of sea power prevented any effective link-up of the Persians with their putative allies in the Balkans, the Avars, Slavs, and Bulghars. The emperor's campaign of revenge was to take on something of the character of a holy war; Byzantine religious feeling had been profoundly shocked by the Persians' carrying off from Jerusalem the True Cross, and the church contributed extensively of its gold and silver for the financing of Heraclius's efforts. Moreover, once Heraclius had achieved his victory, former Byzantine territory recovered, Greek captives returned from Persia and the True Cross restored to Jerusalem, he was to assume formally the title (hitherto used in an informal fashion only) of basileus, "emperor," with connotations of divine approval of the royal power; Irfan Shahîd has suggested that, in the assumption of this imperial title, Heraclius was influenced by the example of Christian monarchy in Armena and was also harking back to the Davidic monarchy over Israel. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 244–45; Shahîd, "The Iranian Factor in Byzantium during the Reign of Heraclius," 295–320.

The son of Heraclius appointed as his deputy in Constantinople was the ten-year-old Constantine, the ephemeral emperor Constantine III in the confused period just after Heraclius's death in February 641. See Bury, 210–26; W. Ensslin, in The Cambridge Medieval History. IV. The Byzantine Empire. Part II, Government, Church and Civilization, 36–37; W. E. Kaegi, "New Evidence on the Early Reign of Heraclius," 313–24; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 169.

753. Heraclius's initial campaign, the first of his six campaigns against the Persians, was aimed at Shahrbarāz, who was still encamped at Chalcedon. It start-was at Kisrā's court when Hiraql reached Niṣībīn, because Kisrā [1004] had become angry with him and had dismissed him from that frontier command (thaghr). Shāhbarāz, however, was firmly holding the place where he was stationed because of Kisrā's command to him to remain there and not leave it.[754] Kisrā received the news of Hiraql's descent on Niṣībīn with his army, and sent to combat Hiraql one of his commanders called Rāhzādh[755] with twelve thousand warriors, giving him orders to remain at Nīniwā (Nineveh) in the vicinity of the town of al-Mawṣil (Mosul), on the banks of the Tigris, and to prevent the Byzantines from crossing the river. Kisrā had been residing at Daskarat al-Malik[756] when the news about Hiraql reached him.

Rāhzādh put Kisrā's command into effect and encamped in the place he had instructed. Hiraql, however, crossed the Tigris at a different spot and marched toward the district where the Persian army lay. Rāhzādh sent out spies against Hiraql; they came back ed from Cilicia and was largely conducted in Pontus and Cappadocia; in a battle at the opening of 623, at a so far unidentified place, the emperor decisively defeated the Persian commander and thereby relieved the pressure on Constantinople. Further operations were conducted in Cilicia, Armenia, Caucasian Albania, and Azerbaijan during the period 623–26 (for Heraclius's operations in the latter region, see Minorsky, "Roman and Byzantine Campaigns in Atropatene," 91–94). The campaign of 627–28 into Upper Mesopotamia and Persia was actually his sixth one, launched in autumn 627 in the year after Heraclius had repelled a second Avar attack on Constantinople, while Shahrbarāz had again penetrated as far as Chalecedon. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire, II, 227–30, 239–41; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 169–70.

---

754. Khusraw's attempt to recall Shahrbarāz from Chalcedon in order to reinforce the Persian defenses in Upper Mesopotamia was foiled, so the story goes, by the Greeks' interception of his letter and the substitution for it of another letter telling Shahrbarāz to remain where he was. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empir from Arcadius to Irene, II, 242.

755. Text, Rāhzār. This man is the Razates (vars. Ryzates, Razastēs) and the Rōzbehān and Rōgwehān of the Syriac ones. See Nöldeke, trans. 294 n. 3; Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 241 n. 3.

756. This is the Arabic form of the Persian Dastgird (< MP dastgird "landed estate, including all buildings, beasts, persons, etc., within it"; see B. Geiger, "Mittelpersische Wörter und Sachen," 123–28), Syriac Dasqartā, which lay to the northeast of Ctesiphon on the route via Khāniqīn and Ḥulwān to Media/Jibāl, the site being marked today by the ruins of Eski Baghdād. Yāqūt distinguishes it from a Dastjird in Khurāsān by calling this one Dastjird al-Kisrawiyyah, "royal Dastjird." See his Buldān, II, 454, and II, 455, for Daskarat al-Malik; Nöldeke, trans. 295 n. 1; Le Strange, Lands, 62; Christensen, Sassanides, 454–55. The ruins of Khusraw's splendid palace there, sacked by the Byzantines when they entered the town, were admired four centuries later by the Arab traveler Abū Dulaf al-Khazrajī, see his Second Risālah, ed. and tr. Minorsky, text § 38, trans. 46, comm. 94.

and told him that Hiraql had ninety thousand warriors. Rāhzādh was now convinced that he and the troops at his disposal were inadequate for withstanding such a number of troops. He wrote several times to Kisrā that Hiraql was pressing heavily on him with forces so numerous and so well equipped that he and his troops could not withstand them. To all that, Kisrā kept on replying that, if he was too weak to withstand those Byzantines, he would not be too weak to get his troops to fight to the last and to lavish their blood in his service. When Rāhzādh had secured the same reply successively for his letter to Kisrā, he got his troops ready for action and attacked the Byzantines. The latter killed Rāhzādh and six thousand of his men. The rest were routed and fled precipitately. The news of the Byzantines' killing of Rāhzādh and the victory gained by Hiraql reached Kisrā. This catastrophe crushed his spirits, and he left Daskarat al-Malik for al-Madā'in and fortified himself within it because he was too weak to stand up to Hiraql in battle.[757] Hiraql advanced until he was near to al- [1005]
Madā'in. But when ever-fresh reports about him kept reaching Kisrā, and he prepared to fight Hiraql, the latter turned back to the Byzantine lands.[758]

Kisrā wrote to the three army commanders who had been defeated, instructing them to send him information about every one of their troops who had shown weakness in that battle or who had not stuck fast to their posts. They were to punish these men according to their degrees of guilt. Through this letter, he provoked them into rebelliousness against him and into seeking ways to preserve themselves safe from him. He also wrote to Shahrbarāz, ordering him to come to him as rapidly as possible and to describe for him what the Byzantines had done in his province.[759]

---

757. As Nöldeke noted, trans. 296 n. 1, Khusraw's flight from Daskarah/Dastgird was a great blow to his authority, and contributed to the loss of confidence in him which was to lead to his deposition and death. It had been his seat of government almost continuously since 604 because of a prediction that he would die at Ctesiphon. See Christensen, Sassanides, 454.

758. Not in fact to Anatolia but northeastward into Azerbaijan and its protective mountains, where he took up quarters in the region of Ganzak for the winter of 627–28. See Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire, II, 241–42; Minorsky, "Roman and Byzantine Campaigns in Atropatene," 91–94.

759. It was this letter that was reportedly intercepted by the Greeks, enabling them to spread disinformation which ensured that Shahrbarāz did not march eastward to shore up the Persian defenses in Iraq; see n. 754 above. The doubts and

It has been said that God's words, "Alif, lām, mīm. The Romans have been defeated in the nearer part of the land,[760] but after their defeat they will be victorious within a few years. The affair belongs to God, before and after, and on that day the believers will rejoice in God's succor; He succors whom He pleases, and He is the Mighty, the Compassionate One. The promise of God! God does not fall short in His promise, but most of the people do not know.", were only revealed regarding the affairs of Abarwīz, king of Persia, and Hiraql, king of the Byzantines, and what happened between them, which I have recounted in these stories.[761]

Mention of Those Who Say That

There related to me al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh—'Ikrimah,[762] who said: The Byzantines and the Persians fought together in the nearer part of the land. He related: The nearer part of the land [refers to] the Day of suspicions of Khusraw's generals were probably justified, and Shahrbarāz, in particular, must have suspected that the king's ire would be directed at him (cf. the information in the romanticized Arabic report on the authority of 'Ikrimah in al-Ṭabarī, I, 1007–09, pp. 326–30 below). But Khusraw's prestige had fallen so low and his freedom of action in Ctesiphon was so circumscribed that he fell victim to events there at the beginning of 628, while Heraclius was in Azerbaijan. He fell ill, tried to arrange the succession in favor of his son by Shīrīn, Mardānshāh, but was forestalled by his other son Kawād or Shērōy, imprisoned and executed at the end of February. For details of these events, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1043–45, pp. 379–81 below.

---

760. Fī adnā al-arḍ is usually interpreted as the part of northwestern Arabia adjacent to the Byzantine frontier. See further n. 761 below.

761. Sūrat al-Rūm, Qur'ān, XXX, 1–5. The text is usually read with the passive verb ghulibat al-Rūm and then the active one sa-yaghlibūna and is taken to refer to some battle during the Persian invasion of the Levant 613–14 (see n. 746 above). But a less authoritative, single reading has ghalabat al-Rūm, ". . . have been victorious," and sa-yughlabūna, "[but] . . . they will be defeated," dubiously taken to refer to the initial Byzantine success against the Arab raid on Mu'tah in 8/630 and the eventual triumph of Muslim arms in Palestine and Syria. See Bell, A Commentary on the Qur'ān, II, 69; Paret, Der Koran. Kommentar und Konkordanz, 388. Detailed studies on the sūrah and its historical background are E. Beck, "Die Sure ar-Rūm (30)," 335–55; M. Götz, "Zum historischen Hintergrund von Sure 30, 1–5," 111–20.

762. Abū 'Abdallāh 'Ikrimah (died probably in 105/723–24) was a noted Successor, a mawlā or client of Ibn 'Abbās, and an authority for many of his traditions. See Ibn Sa'd, Kitāb al-Ṭabaqāt al-kabīr, V, 212–16; al-Ṭabarī, III, 2483–85; EI², s.v. 'Ikrima (J. Schacht).

Adhri'āt, where the two armies met, and the Byzantines were defeated.[763] This came to the ears of the Prophet and his companions while they were [still] in Mecca (i.e., before the Hijrah) and caused them distress. The Prophet disliked the Zoroastrian gentiles (al-ummiyyūn min al-Majūs) gaining the upper hand over the [1006]
Byzantine possessors of written scriptures (ahl al-kitāb min al-Rūm). The unbelievers in Mecca, however, rejoiced and hurled abuse; they encountered the Prophet's companions and said, "You are possessors of a written scripture, and the Christians are possessors of a written scripture, while we are unbelievers. Now our brethren, the Persians, have been victorious over your brethren, the possessors of written scriptures, and if you attack us, we shall certainly be victorious over you."[764] At this point, God sent down the revelation "Alif, lām, mīm. The Romans have been defeated . . ." to "they are unheeding about the next life."

763. Adhri'at, in Biblical times the capital of Bashan, the Edrei of Num. xxi. 33, is the more recent al-Darā'ah or Deraa just north of the Syrian-Jordanian frontier at the southern edge of the Ḥawrān. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 130–31; Le Strange, Palestine, 383; A,-S. Marmardji, Textes géographiques arabes sur la Palestine, 3; *EI*², s.v. Adhri'āt (F. Buhl-N. Elisséeff); and n. 746 above. The Cairo text, II, 184, has "the nearest part of the land was, at that time (yawma'idhin, for the Leiden text's yawm) Adhri'āt," with this reading taken from al-Ṭabarī, Tafsīr on Sūrah XXX.

764. Kister has pointed out that the Persians may have tried in the sixth century to exercise some form of indirect control or influence over Ḥijāz, including over Mecca and Medina. The seventh/thirteenth-century, hence comparatively late, author Ibn Sa'īd mentions that, in the time of Qubādh, son of Fayrūz, Qubādh attempted, through the agency of the Kindī chief al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr (on whom see n. 362 above), to impose the doctrine of Mazdak that he had espoused, and some people in Mecca assented to this summons (tazandaqa). Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb actually lists the alleged zanādiqah (whoever these may be, however; see below) of Quraysh (Muḥabbar, 161). Hence the Meccan pagans might well have retained memories of the connection with Persia, enough to use this as a way of slighting Muḥammad when, at this stage in his mission, he would have had a natural sympathy toward the Christian Byzantines as fellow monotheists. See Kister, "Al-Ḥīra. Some Notes on Its Relations with Arabia," 144–45. On the other hand, earlier Arabic authors, such as Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, in his Muḥabbar, loc. cit., and Ibn Qutaybah, in his Ma'ārif, 621, state that Quraysh got their zandaqah from al-Ḥīrah. De Blois has accordingly suggested that, in early Islamic usage, zandaqah normally means "Manichaeism" and that Manichaeism was conveyed to Mecca by Qurashī traders who derived it from converts to Manichaeism from among the Christian population of al-Ḥīrah, i.e., from elements of the 'Ibād; Ibn Sa'īd's story would have arisen from a confusion and conflation of information in the earlier sources. See de Blois, "The 'Sabians' (Ṣābi'ūn) in Pre-Islamic Arabia," 48–50 and n. 38. See also Nöldeke, trans. 298 n. 1.

Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq went forth to the unbelievers (al-kuffār) and said, "Have you rejoiced at the victory of your brethren over our brethren? Don't rejoice! May God not give you refreshing solace! By God, the Byzantines will be victorious over the Persians; our Prophet has told us that." Ubayy b. Khalaf al-Jumaḥī came up to him and said, "You lie, O Abū Fuḍayl!"[765] Abū Bakr answered him, "You are a bigger liar, O enemy of God!" He added, "I wager you ten of my young she-camels against ten of yours. If within the next three years the Byzantines are victorious over the Persians, I get the stake; and if the Persians are victorious, you get it." Then Abū Bakr went to the Prophet and told him this. The Prophet said, "I didn't express myself thus: 'a few' (al-biḍ') means a number from three to nine, so raise the stake and extend the period of time with him." Abū Bakr accordingly went out and met Ubayy, and the latter commented, "Perhaps you have come to regret [your wager]?" He replied, "Not at all. Come on, I'll raise the stake with you and extend the period of time: make it a hundred young she-camels over a period up to nine years." Ubayy answered, "I agree."[766]

There related to us al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Abū Bakr—'Ikrimah, who said: There was in Persia a woman who gave birth only to kings and heroes. Kisrā summoned her and said, "I am [1007] planning to send an army against the Byzantines and to appoint one of your sons as its commander. Advise me, which of them should I nominate?" She replied, "The first one is so-and-so, who is craftier than a fox and more wary than a falcon; then there is Farrukhān, who is more incisive than a spear point; and then there is Shahrbarāz, who is more sagacious (aḥlam) than such-and-such.[767] So appoint whichever of them you please." He said, "I appoint the sagacious one," and he appointed Shahrbarāz. He pro-

765. Ubayy was a member of the clan of Jumaḥ, which ranged itself with the Makhzūm-'Abd Shams group within Mecca, largely hostile to Muḥammad; he fought in the army of Quraysh at the battle of Uḥud, and died of wounds received there. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 1407, 1409. "Abū Fuḍayl" was a kunyah or patronymic of Abū Bakr's, here used as a familiar form of address. The Cairo text, II, 184, has for this kunyah "Abū Faṣīl."

766. The same story in al-Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XX, 13.

767. As suggested in nn. 745, 749 above, the two components of Shahrbarāz Farrukhān's name—if this is indeed one person—have apparently been wrongly separated here and made into two different persons.

ceeded to [the land of] the Byzantines with the Persian army, defeated the Byzantines, slaughtered them, devastated their towns, and cut down their olive trees.

Abū Bakr says:[768] I related this narrative to 'Aṭā' al-Khurāsānī,[769] and he asked me, "Have you ever seen the land of Syria?" I said, "No," and he replied, "If you had ever been there you would have seen the towns that were laid waste and the olive trees that were cut down."[770] Later, I actually went to Syria and saw this." 'Aṭā' al-Khurāsānī related from Yaḥyā b. Ya'mar, who said: Qayṣar sent a man called Q.ṭ.mah [?][771] with a Byzantine army, and Kisrā sent Shahrbarāz. The two met up with each other at Adhri'āt and Buṣrā, which are the nearest parts of Syria to you [i.e., the Arabs]. The Persians encountered the Byzantines and defeated them. The unbelievers of Quraysh in Mecca rejoiced at this; whereas, the Meccans were chagrined. God then sent down the revelation "Alif, lām, mīm. The Romans have been defeated . . ." to the end of the section. Then he mentioned further another narrative, like 'Ikrimah's but with additional details. Shahrbarāz kept on relentlessly defeating them and laying waste their towns until he reached the Bosphorus [al-khalīj]. But then, Kisrā died. News of this reached them, and Shahrbarāz and his followers retreated precipitately. Fortune swung round to give the Byzantines power over the Persians at that point, and they pursued and killed them.

He related: 'Ikrimah said in his narrative: When the Persians were victorious over the Byzantines, Farrukhān was once sitting and drinking, and said to his companions, "I had a dream, and it 768. That is, the transmitter Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Abī Sabrah, died 162/778–79. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb al-Tahdhīb, XII, 27–28.

769. That is, the Syrian traditionist and Qur'ān commentator 'Aṭā' b. Abī Muslim Maysarah al-Khurāsānī, died 135/752–53. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII/2, 102; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb al-Tahdhīb, VII, 212–15; Sezgin, GAS, I, 33–34.

770. That is, he saw, after the lapse of more than a century, the effects of devastation, in 613–14, by the invading Persian army. See Nöldeke, trans. 399 n. 4.

771. This name is obscure. Nöldeke, trans. 300 n. 1, adduced as a possibility the Jafnid/Ghassānid al-Nu'mān b. al-Ḥārith b. Jabalah, to whom Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 103, gives the cognomen [laqab] Q.ṭām, but later, in his Die Ghassânischen Fürsten, 44, Nöldeke took this as a confusion with the name of the chief of Kindah, Ḥujr b. Umm Qaṭām mentioned in the Mu'allaqah of al-Ḥārith b. Ḥillizah, it being in any case difficult to take the name Qaṭām as anything but a female one.

was as if I saw myself on Kisrā's throne."[772] This came to Kisrā's ears, and he wrote to Shahrbarāz, "When this letter of mine reaches you, send to me Farrukhān's head." Shahrbarāz wrote back to him, however, "O king, you will never find anyone like Farrukhān who has inflicted so much damage on the enemy or has [1008] such a formidable reputation among them; so don't do this!" Kisrā answered him, "Among the men of Persia there is certainly someone who can serve as his replacement, so hasten and send me his head!" Shahrbarāz made further representations to him, which angered Kisrā, and he made no further answer but sent a courier of the postal and intelligence service (barīd)[773] to the people of Persia announcing, "I hereby remove Shahrbarāz from power over you and appoint Farrukhān over you in his stead." Then he handed over to the courier a small sheet and instructed him, "When Farrukhān assumes royal authority and his brother gives him obedience, then give him this."[774] When Shahrbarāz read the letter, he said, "I hear and obey!" He got down from his throne. Farrukhān sat down [in his place], and he handed over the paper. Farrukhān then said, "Bring Shahrbarāz before me," and pushed him forward so that his head could be cut off. Shahrbarāz, however, protested, "Don't be in such a hurry, let me write my last testament!" and Farrukhān agreed to this. Shahrbarāz called for a chest and gave him three sheets [of paper from out of it], telling him, "I sent these sheets to Kisrā pleading for you, and now you want to execute me on the pretext of a single letter." At this, Farrukhān gave the royal authority back to his brother.[775]

---

772. The dream predicts Shahrbarāz Farrukhān's later elevation to his forty days' reign in Ctesiphon, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1062–63, p. 401–403.

773. See on this institution n. 147 above.

774. As emerges a few lines below, the sheet contains an order for Shahrbarāz's execution. The motif of a letter containing a command to kill the unsuspecting bearer is an ancient one, and in Arabic lore is exemplified by the "letter of al-Mutalammis," given to the pre-Islamic poet al-Mutalammis by the Lakhmid 'Amr b. Hind (see on him n. 414 above) but which he was sharp enough to destroy, whereas his nephew, the poet Ṭarafah, duly delivered his letter and thereby brought about his own death. See *EI*², s.v. al-Mutalammis (Ch. Pellat). Cf. also the parallel use, in different circumstances, of a letter containing orders for an execution, that of Oroetes of Sardis at the behest of King Darius, in Herodotus, III.128.

775. The above story continues the separation of Shahrbarāz-Farrukhān into Shahrbarāz wrote to Qayṣar, the king of the Byzantines, "I have a request to make to you which couriers cannot carry and no documents can convey. Come and meet me, but with just fifty Byzantine troops, and I will bring just fifty Persian ones." Qayṣar, however, came with five hundred thousand Byzantine troops and began to place spies along the road before him, fearing that Shahrbarāz might be contemplating some act of trickery with him, until his spies returned to him with the information that Shahrbarāz had with him only fifty men. A carpet was spread out for them both, and they met in a brocade tent that had been erected for them. Each of them had a knife by his side. They summoned an interpreter for their negotiations, and Shahrbarāz said, "The ones who laid waste your towns were my brother and my-two different persons, as set forth in nn. 745, 749, 767 above. The second commander involved in the story is presumably in reality the Shāhīn mentioned by al-Ṭabarī at I, 1003, p. 321 above. For the apparently more historical episode of the letter of dismissal and death which Khusraw despatched to Shahrbarāz's second-in-command at the Persian camp in Chalcedon and which was intercepted by the Byzantines and its contents revealed to Shahrbarāz, see Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 244. The story became a romantic tale handed down among the Persians, and is listed as such by Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 364 (read Shahrbarāz for Shahrīzād), tr. II, 716.

---

The whole story of Shahrbarāz's defection from Khusraw's cause to the side of the Byzantines has recently been discussed, on a basis of the sources available, by Walter E. Kaegi and Paul M. Cobb. They distinguish the Eastern Christian ones from the early Islamic ones. Very similar, though with some variation of details, are the accounts of Theophanes, Michael the Syrian, and Agapius of Manbij; these would seem to go back to the lost Syriac historian Theophilus of Edessa, and in them, Shahrbarāz's defection is attributed to Khusraw's suspicious nature thereby driving his commander into Heraclius's arms. The account in the Short History of Nicephorus, however, simply makes Heraclius's triumph against the Persians the result of his excellent strategy and generalship, with no suggestion of internal stresses and suspicions within the Persian camp. At the side of these Christian accounts are the Islamic ones: the one given on the basis of reports from 'Ikrimah given here by al-Ṭabarī, and the much less-noticed one—because concealed within a history that ostensibly deals only with the conquest of Egypt—going back to the traditionist of the Umayyad period al-Zuhrī (see on him n. 789 below) and preserved within the Futūḥ Miṣr of Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam (said to have d. 171/787–88). Both Islamic accounts share similarities with the Christian accounts, and could represent a single, original tradition, although al-Zuhrī has the interesting additional feature of a plausible reason for Khusraw's anger with Shahrbarāz, i.e., the latter's procrastination, his failure to launch a decisive assault on Constantinople and thus destroy the Byzantine empire. See Kaegi and Cobb, "Heraclius, Shahrbarāz, and al-Ṭabarī," 121–43.

self, with our stratagems and our valor. But now Kisrā has come to envy us and wants me to kill my brother. When I refused to do this, he ordered my brother to kill me. Hence both of us have thrown off allegiance to him, and are ready to fight at your side against him." Qayṣar said, "You have made the right choice."
[1009] Then one of the two made a sign to his companion, [saying,] "The secret lies between two people; if it goes beyond two people, it will become public knowledge." The other said, "Yes, indeed." So they both fell upon the interpreter and killed him with their knives.[776] God brought about Kisrā's death, and the news of this reached the Messenger of God on the Day of Ḥudaybiyah, causing him and his companions to rejoice.[777]

I received information going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said that in the twentieth year of Kisrā Abarwīz's reign, God sent Muḥammad [as His prophet].[778] The latter remained thirteen years in Mecca, and he emigrated to Medina in the thirty-third year of Kisrā's reign.

---

776. Acording to Nöldeke, trans. 302 n. 1, these negotiations in fact refer to a meeting of Heraclius and Shahrbarāz at the Anatolian town of Arabissos (in Armenia Tertia, what was later Little Armenia, somewhere in the region of the mediaeval town of Elbistan; see Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century, I/1, 610–11) in June 629 after Khusraw Abarwēz had been deposed and killed and after Shahrbarāz had led a rebellion at Ctesiphon against his rival for the direction of state affairs under the youthful new king Kawād II Shērōy, had killed the latter after a reign of only eighteen months, and proclaimed himself ruler, though not of Sāsānid or Arsacid royal stock (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1061–63, p. 400–403 below, and cf. Christensen, Sassanides, 497–98; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 170–71; Kaegi and Cobb, "Heraclius, Shahrbarāz, and al-Ṭabarī," loc. cit., noting that an anonymous Syriac chronicle from 724 confirms the Arabic sources regarding the location of the meeting at Arabissos and records the construction of a church by Heraclius and Shahrbarāz, dedicated in the name of Eirēnē, "Peace," at their meeting point). Shahrbarāz's rapid rise to power and ephemeral rule—he was killed by a conspiracy at Ctesiphon led by rival military leaders and great men of state, who subsequently set up as nominal ruler there Khusraw's daughter Būrān (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1063–64, p. 403–405, below)—was aided by Heraclius's support, who had remained at Ganzak in Azerbaijan during the upheavals within the Persian state (see nn. 758–59).

777. The treaty of Ḥudaybiyah made between Muḥammad and the Meccans was concluded at that place on the edge of the Meccan Ḥaram in Dhū al-Qa'dah 6/March 628, hence in the month after Khusraw's death. See al-Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XX, 13–14; Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 286–90; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 46–52; EI[2], s.v. al-Ḥudaybiya (W. M. Watt).

778. That is, in A.D. 610.

Mention of the Account Concerning the Events That Happened When God Wished to Take Away from the People of Persia Rule over Persia, and the Arabs' Overrunning it by Means of God's Favoring Them with His Prophet Muḥammad, Involving the Prophethood, the Caliphate, the Royal Power, and the Dominion, in the Days of Kisrā Abarwīz[779]

This includes what has been related from Wahb b. Munabbih, which is what was related to us by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, who said: This account of Kisrā is what one of my colleagues related to me from Wahb b. Munabbih: That Kisrā constructed a dam on the "Blind Tigris" (Dijlah al-'Awrā')[780] and expended on it sums of such magnitude that no one knew their extent. Also, the throne room of his palace (ṭāq majlisihi) was built [with such splendor] as had never been seen before. He used to suspend his crown and sit on his throne when he was in public audience. He had 360 men who were prognosticators (ḥuzāt),[781] these being learned scholars ('ulamā'), including soothsayers, magicians, and astrologers. He related: Among these was a man from the Arabs called al-Sā'ib who used to draw omens from the flight of birds in the manner of the Arabs and who was seldom wrong. Bādhān had sent him to Kisrā from Yemen.[782] Whenever Kisrā was disturbed by some matter, he would order his [1010]

779. The following is an embellished account of the events leading up to Khusraw's deposition and death, concentrating on the prognostications and portents that pointed to and presaged these events.

780. al-'awrā' (fem.) means "the one-eyed." As applied to the Tigris, it is the estuary, extending nearly one hundred miles, of the combined Euphrates and Tigris before it debouches into the Persian Gulf at Ābādān, i.e., the modern Shaṭṭ al-'Arab. The appellation "one-eyed" may stem from the fact either of the island of 'Uways being close to the estuary's mouth or of the existence of the sand bar there. See Le Strange, Lands, 26, 43; *EI*², s.v. Shaṭṭ al-'Arab (Amatzia Baram). According to al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 292, Khusraw had attempted, at the end of his reign, to cope with excessive floods in Lower Iraq by repairing or constructing dams with sluices (musannayāt) and diversion channels from the river to feed the canals (buthūq) (for these terms, see Bosworth, "Some Remarks on the Terminology of Irrigation Practices and Hydraulic Constructions," 81–82), but without success.

781. The ḥāzī was essentially the kāhin or soothsayer in his rôle as prognosticator, the term being etymologically connected with the Biblical Hebrew ḥōzeh or seer. See Fahd, La divination arabe, 112–13.

782. Bādhān was the last Persian governor in Yemen. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 958, p. 252 and n. 609 above.

soothsayers, magicians, and astrologers to be gathered together and would tell them, "Look into this matter and see exactly what it is."

Now when God sent His prophet Muḥammad, Kisrā woke up one morning and found that the arched roof of his royal palace (ṭāq mulkihi) had collapsed in the middle without any weight having been put upon it; also, that the [dam on the] "Blind Tigris" had been breached. When he saw all that, he became filled with grief and said, "The arched roof of my royal palace has collapsed in the middle without any weight having been put upon it, and the [dam on the] 'Blind Tigris' has been breached: Shāh bishikast," meaning [in Arabic] "the king has been overthrown (literally, 'broken')." Then he summoned his soothsayers, magicians, and astrologers, and summoned al-Sā'ib with them, too. He told them "The arched roof of my royal palace has collapsed in the middle without any weight having been put upon it, and the [dam on the] 'Blind Tigris' has been breached: Shāh bishikast. Look into this matter and see exactly what it is."

They left his presence and looked into his affair, but all the quarters of the heavens became covered over for them and the earth became darkened; they exploited to the full the resources of their knowledge, but none of the magicians' magic or the soothsayers' ability to look into the future proved efficacious, nor was the astrologers' knowledge of the stars of any avail. Al-Sā'ib spent the whole of a dark, overcast night on a hillock, where he saw a lightning flash that arose from the direction of Ḥijāz, flew across the heavens, and reached as far as the East. The next morn-
[1011] ing, he looked at what was beneath his feet, and behold, there was a green meadow. He then made a pronouncement in his role as diviner: "If what I was seeing is true, there will arise from Ḥijāz a dominion (sulṭān) which will reach the East and from which the earth will grow green and fertile—much more so than from any previous kingdom."[783] When the soothsayers and astrologers spoke together confidentially [about what they had seen] and saw what had happened to themselves, and perceived that only Sā'ib had really seen anything, they said to each other, "You know, by

783. Referring, of course, to the rise of Muḥammad and the birth of the new faith in Mecca.

God, that it can only be something originated from the heavens that has prevented you from utilizing your specialist knowledge; that is because of a prophet who has been already sent [from God], or is just about to be sent, who will take away this present royal power and smash it. But if you announce to Kisrā the impending destruction of his royal power, he will surely kill you, so concoct among yourselves some explanation you can give him that will deflect [his wrath] from you for some length of time." So they went to Kisrā and told him. "We have looked into this matter and have found that your astrological calculators, to whom you entrusted the prognostications for building the roof of your royal palace and likewise for the construction of the dam across the 'Blind Tigris', based their calculations on inauspicious stars. When night and day successively worked on those constructions, the inauspicious stars assumed their most maleficient positions, so that everything based upon those nights and days was destroyed.[784] We can, however, make a calculation for you regarding when you should begin the work of reconstruction, and this will not be destroyed." Kisrā said, "Make the calculation, then." They did this for him and told him, "Now construct it!" So he did that, and was at work on the Tigris for eight months, expending on it an incalculable amount of money. When it was at last completed, Kisrā asked them, "Shall I sit down on top of the dam's wall?" They replied, "Yes." So he called for carpets and coverings and aromatic herbs to be placed on it. He ordered the marzbāns to be gathered together before him, as were also musicians and players (la"ābūn). Then he went forth and sat down on it. But when once he was installed there, the Tigris dashed the construction away from beneath him, and he was only extricated [from it] at his last gasp. When they had got him out, he gathered together his soothsayers, magicians, and astrologers, executed nearly a [1012] hundred of them and said, "I let you grow fat and let you come closer to my presence than other people, and I gave you living allowances, and then you trifle with me!" They responded, "O king, we were at fault, just as those before us were at fault, but we can make a [new] calculation for you, and you can be sure of it, and you can accordingly begin the task of reconstruction on the most reliably auspicious of days!" Kisrā said, "Take care what you say!" They replied, "We will indeed!" Kisrā further said, "Make the calculation, then." They did this for him and told him, "Now construct it!" He expended on it an incalculable amount of money, over a period of eight months from that point.

784. Belief in the favorable or unfavorable effects of the movements of the heavenly bodies went back to the Ancient Near Eastern civilizations and to the Greeks' division of the planets into beneficent ones, agathopoioi, and maleficent ones, kakopoioi, and was transmitted to the ancient Arabs. See Fahd, La divination arabe, 483ff.; *EI*², s.vv. Nudjūm, aḥkām al- (T. Fahd), Sa'd wa-naḥs (Fahd), al-Sa'dān¹ (P. Kunitzsch).

Then they told him, "We've completed it," and he said, "Shall I, accordingly, go forth and sit down on it?" They replied, "Yes." He was nevertheless reluctant to sit down on it, hence rode one of his steeds and started proceeding over the dam. But while he was traveling along it, the Tigris dashed the construction away, and he only reached safety at his last gasp. He gathered them together again, and said, "By God, I will pass you along [for execution], to the last man of you, and I will tear out your shoulder joints and will throw you beneath the feet of elephants, unless you tell me faithfully the truth about this matter concerning which you have elaborated such a story for me."

They replied, "We won't lie to you any longer, O king. You commanded us, when [the dam on] the Tigris was breached and the arched roof of your royal palace collapsed without any weight having been put on it, to use our specialist knowledge and look into the reason behind it. We did that, but the earth became darkened and all the quarters of the heavens became covered for us. Our specialist knowledge was of no avail (literally, "came back into our hands"), so that none of the magicians' magic nor the soothsayers' ability to look into the future nor the astrologers' knowledge of the stars proved efficacious. We realized that this matter originated in the heavens and that a prophet had already been sent, or was about to be sent, and because of that, something had prevented us from exercising our specialist knowledge. We [1013] were afraid that if we announced to you the destruction of your royal power, you would kill us. Like everybody else, we did not want to die, so we gave you an evasive answer in order to protect ourselves, as you saw." Kisrā said, "Woe upon you! Why didn't you provide me with the explanation of this matter so that I might have used my own judgment regarding what I should do?" They replied, "Our fear of you prevented us from doing that." Kisrā, therefore, let them go and gave up concerning himself with [the dam on] the Tigris when this last had got the better of him.

There related to us Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Faḍl b. ʿĪsā al-Raqāshī—al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī,[785] [who said] that the Messenger of God's Companions said, "O Messenger of God, how could God prevail over Kisrā by means of you?" The Prophet said, "God sent to him an angel, who put his hand out through the wall of the house where he was, shining with light. When Kisrā saw it, he was alarmed. The angel said, "Why are you so fearful, O Kisrā? God has sent a prophet and sent down upon him a book, so follow him, and you will be secure in this present life of yours and in the next one." Kisrā replied, "I'll think about it."[786]

There related to us Ibn Humayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr—al-Zuhrī—Abū Salamah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf, who said: God sent an angel to Kisrā, when he was in a room of his palace (aywānihi) where no one was allowed to come into his presence. Suddenly[787] there was, round about the time of midday at the time he was wont to take a siesta, a figure standing by his head with a staff in his hand. The figure said, "O Kisrā, are you going to submit yourself to God (a-tuslimu)? [If not,] I shall break this staff!" He replied, "Bihil, bihil" ("Leave, leave!"),[788] so the angelic visitant then left him. Kisrā summoned his guards and chamberlains, and became enraged at them, saying, "Who let this person come into my presence?" They replied, "No one has come into your presence, and we haven't seen this person at all." In the following year, the angel came to him at precisely the same hour as before and spoke the same words to him as

785. That is, the great popular preacher and ascetic of al-Baṣrah in Umayyad times, the Successor Abū Saʿīd [al-] Ḥasan b. Abī al-Ḥasan (died 110/728), subsequently regarded as the proto-Ṣūfī. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥasan al-Basrī (H. Ritter).

786. The following versions of the story of how Khusraw was warned by an angelic visitant are of the same type as the Biblical story of King Belshazzar of Chaldaea, who was warned of the imminent fall of his kingdom by the moving finger writing on the wall of his palace (Daniel, v. 5ff.).

787. Literally, "he was not mindful of it," lam yarʿihā, echoing the Qurʾānic phrase fa-mā raʿawhā, "they (i.e., the followers of Jesus) did not cherish/look after it," of LVII, 27.

788. Persian hishtan, hilīdan "to leave, depart."

before, saying, "Are you going to submit yourself to God? [If not,] I [1014] shall break this staff!" Kisrā replied three times, "Bihil, bihil, bihil," so the angelic visitant departed from him. Kisrā summoned his chamberlains, guards, and doorkeepers, and became enraged with them, saying to them what he had said to them on the first occasion. They replied, "We didn't see anyone coming into your presence." When the third year came round, the angel came to Kisrā at exactly the same hour as he had come to him previously, and spoke the same words to him as before, saying, "Are you going to submit yourself to God? [If not,] I shall break this staff!" Kisrā replied, "Bihil, bihil." He related: At that, the angel broke his staff and departed. Only a short time afterward, his royal power disintegrated, and his son and the Persian rose in rebellion and finally killed him.

'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr—al-Zuhrī,[789] [who said,]: I recounted this story to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz,[790] from Abū Salamah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, and he said: It has been mentioned to me that the angel came into Kisrā's presence with two glass bottles in his hands and then said to him, "Submit yourself [to God]!" and when he did not comply, he smashed one of the bottles against the other and broke them into smithereens. Then he departed. Kisrā's own destruction followed, as is well known.

There related to me Yaḥyā b. Ja'far—'Alī b. 'Āṣim—Khālid al-Ḥadhdhā', who said: I heard 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakrah say:[791] Kisrā, son of Hurmuz, was asleep one night in his palace (aywān), the palace of al-Madā'in, and the cavalrymen [of the guard] were 789. That is, Muḥammad b. Muslim al-Zuhrī, often referred to as Ibn Shihāb, from the Meccan clan of Zuhrah, one of the founders of the Islamic science of tradition (died 124/742). As a teacher of Ibn Isḥāq, he was a great contributor to the Sīrah of the Prophet and was much quoted by al-Ṭabarī for the history of the first three Rightly-Guided caliphs. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 136–36; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb al-Tahdhīb, IX, 445–51; EI[1], s.v. al-Zuhrī (J. Horovitz).

790. That is, the member of the Umayyad family, governor of Medina and then the caliph 'Umar II (r. 99–101/717–20).

791. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was the eldest son of the Companion Nufay' b. Masrūḥ, called Abū Bakrah, "the man of the pulley," and an Abyssinian mawlā of the Prophet. 'Abd al-Raḥmān managed his maternal uncle Ziyād b. Abīhi's property in al-Baṣrah for him, but submitted reluctantly to 'Alī after the Battle of the Camel (al-Ṭabarī, I, 3229, II, 22). See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII/1, 138; Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 288–89; EI[2], s.v. Abū Bakra (M. T. Houtsma-Ch. Pellat).

posted all around his castle. Suddenly, there appeared a man with a staff who walked up and stood at Kisrā's head and said, "O Kisrā, son of Hurmuz, I am God's messenger to you [with the message] that you should submit yourself [to Him]." He said this three times, while Kisrā lay prostrate, looking at him but returning no answer. Then the angel left him. He related: Kisrā sent for the commander of the guard and said to him, "Did you allow this man to enter my presence?" The commander of the guard replied, "No, I didn't, and no one has come in from our part."

He related: When it was the following year, Kisrā was fearful of that night and sent a message to the commander of the guard, [1015] "Post guards all round my castle and don't let anyone enter my presence." He related: The commander of the guard did that. But when it was that precise hour, behold, there was the angel with the staff standing at his head and saying to him, "O Kisrā, son of Hurmuz, I am God's messenger to you [with the message] that you should submit yourself [to Him]; so do this, and it will be best for you!" He related: Kisrā was looking at him without giving any answer. Then the angel left him. He related: Kisrā sent for the commander of the guard [and upbraided him], "Didn't I order you not to let anyone into my presence?" The commander of the guard replied, "O king, by God, no one has come into your presence from our part; search out whence he came into your presence."

He related: When the next year came round, it was as if he was fearful of that night, and he sent a message to the commander of the guard and the guard itself, "Stand guard all around me during this night, and don't allow any woman or man to enter my presence." They did that. When it was that precise hour, behold, there was the angel again standing by his head and saying, "Kisrā, son of Hurmuz, I am God's messenger to you [with the message that] you should submit yourself [to Him], so do this, and it will be best for you!" This he repeated three times, while Kisrā was looking at him but returning no answer. The angel said, "O Kisrā, you have rebuffed me! By God, God will certainly smash you just as I am smashing this staff of mine!" Then he broke it, and went away. Kisrā sent to his guard and said, "Didn't I order you not to let anyone into my presence this night, neither wife (ahl) nor child?" They replied, "No one has come into your presence from our part." He related: Very soon afterward, his son rose in rebellion against him and killed him.[792]

[The Encounter at Dhū Qār]

A further episode [in the story of the fall of the Sāsānid empire] is what happened concerning [the tribal group of] Rabī'ah[793] and the army Kisrā Abarwīz had dispatched for war against them and their subsequent encounter at Dhū Qār.

[1016] It is related from the Prophet that when the Prophet heard the news of Rabī'ah's rout of Kisrā's army, he exclaimed, "This [has been] the first military encounter (yawm) in which the Arabs have secured their just due from the Persians (intaṣafat al-'Arab min al-'Ajam), and it was through me that they were given the victory." The battle of Dhū Qār[794] is also called that of Qurāqir or

---

792. That is, Kawād (II) Shērōy, placed on the throne by the rebels against his father. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 1045–61, pp. 381–99 below.

793. Both Bakr and Taghlib, on opposite sides at Dhū Qār, were accounted parts of the great tribal group of Rabī'ah. See *EI*², s.v. Rabī'a and Muḍar (H. Kindermann).

794. The battle of Dhū Qār, if this is not too grandiose a word for the encounter, was to assume a position in subsequent Islamic lore greater than its military significance—which was probably just one of several similar clashes along the frontiers with Arabia—would warrant. The saying of the Prophet retailed here, oft-repeated in the sources, sets it up as the first stage in the upsurge of the Arabs against the Persians and their influence in eastern and southern Arabia. It could thus be regarded as a victory for proto-Islam over the Persian infidels, or at least as prefiguring that victory, and in later times a popular romance grew up round it, the Kitāb Ḥarb Banī Shaybān ma'a Kisrā Anūsharwān.

The ambiguous rôle in the Dhū Qār events of a Shaybānī leader like Qays b. Mas'ūd b. Qays b. Khālid b. Dhī al-Jaddayn (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1028, p. 356–57 below) tends to confirm the view put forward by F. McG. Donner in his "The Bakr b. Wā'il Tribes and Politics in Northeastern Arabia on the Eve of Islam," 27–33, that the anti-Sāsānid alignment of Shaybān and other Bakrī tribes at Dhū Qār does not represent a decisive turning point in relations between the Sāsānids and the Arab tribes of northeastern Arabia and the frontier region—whatever the views that grew up in Islamic times, outlined in the previous paragraph—but rather, a temporary fluctuation of allegiances, in which one group might move against the Persians and then return to its Persian allegiance later if circumstances so dictated. Donner notes that most of the powerful clans combating the Persians at Dhū Qār seem to have fought on the Sāsānid side against the Muslim Arabs during the 630s and 640s, and concludes that "The theory that the Bakr tribes were, since Dhū Qār, awaiting the opportunity to rise against the Persians is, then, if not positively erroneous, at least dangerously simplistic" (ibid., 33).

The sources (see below) offer no firm date for the Yawm Dhī Qār, but the

that of the bend (al-ḥinw), the bend of Dhū Qār or the bend of Qurāqir; that of al-Jubābāt; that of Dhū al-'Ujrum; that of al-Ghadhawān; and that of the depression (al-baṭḥā'), the depression of Dhū Qār. All of these are places around Dhū Qār.[795]

There was related to me a narrative going back to Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā[796]—Abū al-Mukhtār Firās b. Khindif[797] and a number of the scholars ('ulamā') of the Arabs, whom he specified by name: The battle of Dhū Qār was the consequence of al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir al-Lakhmī's killing of 'Adī b. Zayd al-'Ibādī. 'Adī was one of Kisrā Abarwīz, son of Hurmuz's, translators (tarājimah).[798] The reason for al-Nu'mān (III) b. al-Mundhir (IV)'s killing of 'Adī b. Zayd was what was mentioned to me in an account going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Isḥāq b. al-Jaṣṣāṣ,

---

Muslim traditions which place it just after the opening of the Hijrī era (e.g., a few months after the battle of Badr between the pagan Quraysh and the Muslims, hence in the later part of 624, according to Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XXIV, 76) are clearly too late. The range of years for Dhū Qār is probably between 604 and 611, i.e., before the beginning of Muḥammad's public ministry in Mecca but at a time when he could certainly have heard reports of the victory against the Persians and their allies.

Several Arabic sources treat of the last years of Lakhmid domination in al-Ḥīrah and the desert fringes of eastern Arabia, including al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 246, II, 47; Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, Muḥabbar, 360–61; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 227–28, III, 205–209 = §§ 648, 1065–70; idem, Tanbīh, 241–43, tr. 318–21; Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XXIV, 53–71; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 293–95; Abū al-Baqā', al-Manāqib al-mazyadiyyah, I, 373–426. Of modern studies, see Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 114–23; Donner, loc. cit.; Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 607–608; EI[2], s.v. Dhū Ḳār (L. Veccia Vaglieri); EIr, s.v Dū Qār (Ella Landau-Tasseron).

795. According to Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 293, it lay to the south of what soon afterward became the Arab miṣr of al-Kūfah, and cannot have been far from the Euphrates, hence in a region where the nomads' herds could have ready access to water. It seems impossible to pinpoint it more exactly, although there were presumably bituminous springs bubbling to the surface there (qār, qīr "pitch, tar").

796. Abū 'Ubaydah (d. 209 or 210/824–25), philologist and grammarian, was a mawlā of Mesopotamian origin who became the most learned authority of his time on the tribal history and lore of the early Arabs. He also achieved a later reputation, which does not in fact seem to be justified, as a zealous supporter of the claims of the Shu'ūbiyyah, those vaunting the cultural supremacy of the 'Ajam, in effect the Persians, over the Arabs. See EI[2], s.v. Abū 'Ubayda (H.A.R. Gibb); EIr, s.v. Abū 'Obayda Ma'mar (C. E. Bosworth).

797. Following what seems to be the correct emendation, following Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCIV, for this personal and tribal name (Khindif b. Muḍar: cf. Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 1, II, 2, 347, and also n. 430 above).

798. See on 'Adī, n. 116 above.

who took it from the book of Ḥammād [al-Rāwiyah],[799] and my father also mentioned part of the story to me. He said: Zayd b. Ḥammād b. Zayd b. Ayyūb b. Maḥrūf b. 'Āmir b. 'Uṣayyah b. Imri' al-Qays b. Zayd Manāt b. Tamīm[800] had three sons: the poet 'Adī, who was a handsome man, both poet and orator (khaṭīb), who had read the books of the Arabs and the Persians;[801] 'Ammār, who was also called Ubayy; and 'Amr, who was also called Sumayy. They had a uterine brother called 'Adī b. Ḥanẓalah, from the [tribe of] Ṭayyi'. 'Ammār used to stay at Kisrā's court. One of the two of them ardently desired the death of 'Adī b. Zayd; the other was a firm devotee of Christianity. They all belonged to a notable house whose members were close to the Kisrās, eating their food with them and staying at their side, and receiving from them land grants (qaṭā'i').

When al-Mundhir (IV) b. al-Mundhir (III) became king,[802] he entrusted his son al-Nu'mān to 'Adī's care; it was this family who fostered him (and reared him). Now al-Mundhir had another son called al-Aswad, whose mother was Māriyah bt. al-Ḥārith b. Julhum from the [tribe of] Taym al-Ribāb. There fostered[803] and 799. Ḥammād b. Maysarah, called Abū Laylā, al-Rāwiyah ("the great transmitter"), d. 155 or 156/772–73, of Persian mawlā stock, was famed as a collector of ancient Arabic poetry but also suspected of forging some of this. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 366–38; *EI*², s.v. Ḥammād al-Rāwiya (J. W. Fück).

---

800. Nöldeke, trans. 312 n. 5, noted that the appearance of the name Ayyūb in 'Adī's nasab, as the poet's great-great-grandfather, indicates the ancientness of Christianity within the family. He further noted that, for Ayyūb to have been born four generations back from 'Adī (who must himself have been born ca. 554, in J. Horovitz's view), he must have been in extreme old age if he is to be identified with the person mentioned (together with the comes Angeleios (?), son of Zeid) in the Martyrium Arethae as Iōb/Ayyūb, ethnarch of the Christian community in al-Ḥīrah, and as being a member of the entourage of the Lakhmid al-Mundhir III b. al-Nu'mān II. The "house of Ayyūb" was clearly important, through its literacy and its practical skills, in the secretarial and diplomatic service of both the Lakhmids and the Sāsānids. See further Horovitz, "'Adi ibn Zeyd, the Poet of Hira," 32–34 (also translates, 4off., the detailed account of Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī in *Aghānī*³, II, 95ff., much fuller than the account given here by al-Ṭabarī); Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century, I/1, 315–18.

801. Nöldeke trans. 313 n. 1, commented that there could hardly have been any books written in Arabic at this time, but only orally transmitted poetry and possibly tales, and that, when the Christian Arabs of a city like al-Ḥīrah did write, they would use Syriac.

802. That is, in ca. 575.

803. This passage in parentheses was supplied by Nöldeke in his text, n. d, from the parallel passage in *Aghānī*³, II, 105.

reared him a family from the people of al-Ḥīrah called the Banū Marīnā, who were considered a part of Lakhm and were of noble status (ashrāf).[804] As well as these two, al-Mundhir b. al-Mundhir had ten other sons. Because of their handsome appearance, the entire group of his sons were known as al-Ashāhib ("the Shining Ones"), as al-A'shā says: [1017]

The sons of al-Mundhir, the Shining Ones, go forth in the morning in al-Ḥīrah with their swords.[805]

Al-Nu'mān was red haired (or: had a reddish complexion, aḥmar), with a mottled skin, and was short of stature.[806] His mother was called Salmā (or Sulmā) bt. Wā'il b. 'Aṭiyyah al-Ṣā'igh ("the goldsmith"), from the people of Fadak; she was a slave girl of al-Ḥārith b. Ḥiṣn b. Ḍamḍam b. 'Adī b. Janāb's, from [the tribe of] Kalb.[807] Qābūs b. al-Mundhir the Elder, the paternal uncle of al-Nu'mān and his brothers, had sent 'Adī b. Zayd and his brothers to Kisrā, son of Hurmuz,[808] these being secretaries and translators of his.

When al-Mundhir b. al-Mundhir died,[809] leaving behind those thirteen sons of his, Iyās b. Qabīṣah al-Ṭā'ī was given charge of his 804. For this family, see Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 20, 110. It was of such prominence in the life of the city that the poet Imru' al-Qays speaks of al-Ḥīrah as diyār Banī Marīnā. See Dīwān, 200, no. 37 v. 3, and cf. Olinder, The Kings of Kinda, 67.

The situation thus evolved in al-Ḥīrah of al-Nu'mān being supported for the succession there by 'Adī b. Zayd and al-Aswad by the Banū Marīnā; 'Adī, however, had a distinct advantage through his honored status at the Sāsānid court. See Rothstein, ibid., 109–10.

805. Dīwān, 212, no. 63 v. 14.

806. Nöldeke, trans. 314 n. 1, noted that this description is confirmed, in another context, in Aghānī[3], XXXI, 2.

807. This maternal origin is confirmed in Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 95, and Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], 13, but al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, III, 202 = § 1061, says that Salmā was of the Kalb.

As Nöldeke, noted, trans. 314 n. 2, Fadak, a settlement in the Wādī al-Qurā of western Ḥijāz, had a significant Jewish element, famed as workers in precious metals. It is thus possible that Salmā came from this population group; the poet 'Amr b. Kulthūm al-Taghlibī satirized al-Nu'mān, that his mother's relatives were smiths and weavers, practicing despised crafts (Aghānī[3], XI, 58–59, and a satire attributed to al-Nābighah al-Dhubyānī by one of his enemies describes al-Nu'mān as wārith al-ṣā'igh "heir of the goldsmith" (ibid., XI, 13; cf. Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 108–109).

808. Following Nöldeke, trans. 314 n. 3, one should read here "Kisrā, son of Qubādh," i.e., Anūsharwān, and not "Kisrā [Abarwīz], son of Hurmuz."

809. That is, in 580.

governmental responsibilities,[810] but only held this office for a few months while Kisrā was searching for a man he could appoint as ruler over the Arabs. At that juncture, Kisrā, son of Hurmuz,[811] summoned ʿAdī b. Zayd and said to him, "Who now remains of al-Mundhir's sons?[812] What sort of persons are they, and is there any good amongst them?" ʿAdī replied, "There are still some of them left from the sons of the recently deceased al-Mundhir b. al-Mundhir; those are real men!" Kisrā said, "Send for them!" So he wrote to the various sons, and they came to Kisrā, who assigned them lodging with ʿAdī b. Zayd. ʿAdī gave preferential treatment in regard to lodging and hospitality to al-Nuʿmān's brothers over al-Nuʿmān himself, and he would let them see that he expected nothing from al-Nuʿmān. He spoke with them individually and privately, and said to each of them, "If the king asks you, 'Can you control the Arabs for me?' then tell him, 'Yes, we can control them all for you, except al-Nuʿmān.'" ʿAdī said to al-Nuʿmān, [1018] however, "If the king asks you about your brothers, tell him, 'If I can't cope with them, then I can't cope with anybody else!'"[813]

---

810. That is, Hormizd (see n. 811 below) appointed him as temporary governor of al-Ḥīrah. It was Iyās b. Qabīṣah who was, nearly a quarter of a century later, apppointed (this time by Khusraw II Abarwēz) governor or ruler in al-Ḥīrah after the Lakhmid al-Nuʿmān's deposition in 602. At some point, the Persian king awarded Iyās thirty villages along the Euphrates as a grant for life and made him administrator of the district of ʿAyn al-Tamr (see on this place n. 112 above). See EI[2] Suppl., s.v. Iyās b. Ḳabīṣa al-Ṭāʾī (Ch. Pellat). Nöldeke, 314 n. 5, opined that the Qabīṣah of Aghānī[1], II, 22, i.e., Iyās's father, fitted better chronologically for this appointment by Hormizd, but a period of twenty-two years during which Iyās was occupied with other charges along Persia's frontier with the north Arabian desert does not seem an excessive amount out of a man's official career, and in any case, the same passage in Aghānī[3], II, 106, has "Iyās b. Qabīṣah" for the interim governor in al-Ḥīrah before the choice of al-Nuʿmān was made.

811. Read here "Hurmuz, son of Kisrā."

812. That is, of the progeny of al-Nuʿmān's grandfather al-Mundhir III (r. 504–54).

813. That is, al-Nuʿmān is to stress to Hormizd his ability to cope with rivals and with other unruly elements along the desert fringes of the Persian realm. Nöldeke, trans. 315 n. 3, noted further that in the more detailed account of Aghānī[3], II, 107–108, ʿAdī gives al-Nuʿmān advice which will project himself to the Persian king as a tough and spartan son of the desert: that he should appear before Hormizd in travel-stained clothes, girt with his sword, and exhibiting a voracious appetite. At the same time, ʿAdī craftily instructs the other brothers to wear their most opulent clothes, to eat in an elegant and restrained manner, and generally to present themselves as refined, ineffective characters, useless for the envisaged task of guarding the frontiers.

There was a man from the Banū Marīnā called ʿAdī b. Aws b. Marīnā, a headstrong fellow who was also a poet and who used to say repeatedly to al-Aswad [b. al-Mundhir b. al-Mundhir], "You know that I expect some favor from you (or perhaps, "am well disposed toward you, am concerned for your welfare," annī laka rājin).[814] I beg and implore you not to follow ʿAdī b. Zayd's counsel, for by God, he never has your good interests at heart." But al-Aswad paid no attention to his words.

When Kisrā ordered ʿAdī b. Zayd to bring them into his presence, ʿAdī began to lead them in one by one, so that Kisrā might speak with each of them; he found that he was looking at a group of men whose like he had rarely seen. When he asked them, "Are you able to fulfill this office for me, as your family previously filled it?" They replied, "We can control the Arabs for you, except al-Nuʿmān."

When al-Nuʿmān went into Kisrā's presence, the latter perceived an ugly and ill-favored person. Nevertheless, when Kisrā addressed him and asked, "Can you control the Arabs for me?" he answered, "Yes!" Kisrā asked, "How will you deal with your brethren?" Al-Nuʿmān replied [mockingly], "If I can't cope with them, then I can't cope with anyone!" Kisrā thereupon appointed him ruler, gave him robes of honour and a crown valued at sixty thousand dirhams and set with pearls and gold.[815]

Al-Nuʿmān went forth, having been just appointed thus. [At this point,] ʿAdī b. Aws b. Marīnā said to al-Aswad, "Now you've done it! You have gone against the correct course of action!" Then ʿAdī b. Zayd prepared a feast in a church, and sent a message to Ibn Marīnā, "Come along to me, and bring whomever you like, for I need to say something [to you]." Hence Ibn Marīnā went to him with a group of people. They all feasted and drank at a morning meal in the church. ʿAdī [b. Zayd] said to ʿAdī b. Marīnā, "O ʿAdī, "People like you know how best to recognize good conduct and then to avoid blaming [anyone] for it. I realize that you would have preferred your candidate al-Aswad b. al-Mundhir to have been appointed rather than my candidate al-Nuʿmān, but don't blame me for something which you yourself would have done [if you had been able]. I would not like you to hate me for a course of action which you yourself would have followed had you been able. I would further like you to treat me with the same consideration as [1019] I show to you, for my share in the royal power is no more extensive than your own share."

814. Nöldeke follows the first of these interpretations in his trans., 316.

815. ʿAdī's scheming has thus secured the authority in al-Ḥīrah for al-Nuʿmān (cf. Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 111), but at the price of making powerful enemies in the city.

ʿAdī b. Zayd then arose and went to the church and took an oath that he would not satirize ʿAdī b. Marīnā in his poetry, would never intend any wicked act against him, and would never keep back from him anything good.[816] But when ʿAdī b. Zayd had finished saying this, ʿAdī b. Marīnā stood up and swore a similar oath that he would never cease satirizing ʿAdī b. Zayd and never cease intending evil against him as long as he lived. Al-Nuʿmān now went forth and took up his residence at al-Ḥīrah.

ʿAdī b. Aws b. Marīnā recited these verses regarding ʿAdī b. Zayd:

Ho there, announce to ʿAdī from ʿAdī, and do not grieve, even though your physical power has become worn out.
You are despoiling our places of worship when you have no need for such gains, merely in order that you may be praised or your gain may be more complete.[817]
If you are now successful, you will not be successful in a praiseworthy manner; and if you perish, we shall wish someone else, and not you, to be not far from us [in death].[818]

---

816. The Cairo text, II, 196, has here khabar, "any piece of information," for khayr, "anything good," the latter being the reading, however, in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, *Aghānī*³, II, 108.

817. Following the emendations in the text, I, 1019 n. a and in Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCIV for the first hemistich of this verse. The reference here to "despoiling our hayākil" seems to refer, as Nöldeke noted, trans. 315 n. 3, to ʿAdī's obtaining a loan of eighty thousand dirhams from the bishop of al-Ḥīrah, Jābir b. Shamʿūn, on al-Nuʿmān's behalf so that the latter could inflate and strengthen his position in the Persian king's eyes. See *Aghānī*³, II, 115; Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 111 n. 2.

818. Literally, "may someone else, not you, not be far from us [in death]!" fa-lā yabʿad siwāka, a motif familiar in ancient Arabian elegiac poetry, in which the spirit of a dead man, a companion, or kinsman, is enjoined lā tabʿad, "do not go far away in death!" See Goldziher, Muhammedanische Studien, I, 255–56, Eng. tr. C.

You will feel regret like the man of Kusa' when your two eyes see what your hands have wrought.[819]

'Adī b. Marīnā likewise said to al-Aswad, "Although you have not been successful, do not be so weak as to forgo seeking vengeance on this man of Ma'add, who has treated you in this fashion.[820] I have kept on telling you that the crafty wiles of Ma'add are never at rest, and I enjoined you not to follow his ways; but you acted against my advice." He replied, "What do you want, then?" Ibn Marīnā said, "I want you to hand over to me all the income from your sources of wealth and land," and al-Aswad did that. Ibn Marīnā was [already] very rich and well endowed with estates. No day now ever passed without a present arriving at al-Nu'mān's portal from Ibn Marīnā, so that the latter became the most honored of men in al-Nu'mān's eyes, and he did not decide any matter of state without 'Adī b. Marīnā's instructions. Whenever 'Adī b. Zayd's name was mentioned in Ibn Marīnā's presence, he would heap praises on him and recount his merits, yet he would add, [1020]
"The make-up of a man of Ma'add is not complete without there being an element of craft and treachery in it."

When the persons in al-Nu'mān's court circle perceived the high status of Ibn Marīnā in the king's sight, they attached themselves to him and followed him. He began to tell his most trusted followers, "When you see me mentioning 'Adī b. Zayd with approbation to the king, say, 'Indeed, he is just like you say, but he doesn't leave anybody alone but keeps on saying that the king—he meant al-Nu'mān—is merely his governor and that he secured al-

---

R. Barber and S. M. Stern, Muslim Studies, I, 231–32; idem, "Beiträge zur arabischen Trauerpoesie," 311–12; *EI*², s.v. Marthiya. 1. (Ch. Pellat), at VI, 603b.

819. The "regret of the man of Kusa'" was proverbial for someone who committed an irrevocable action and then repented of it. Kusa' is variously described as a clan or subgroup of archers of Qays 'Aylān, Yemen, or Ḥimyar, but no such tribal division is registered by Ibn al-Kalbī in his Jamharat al-nasab; clearly, the lexicographers had no real idea of the origin of the saying. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-'arab, X, 186–87; al-Zabīdī, Tāj al-'arūs, V, 494–95.

820. 'Adī's genealogy, set forth by al-Ṭabarī at I, 1016, p. 340 above, went back to the Zayd Manāt b. Imri' al-Qays, one of the two main branches of the great North Arab tribe of Tamīm (see Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 59, II, 8, 544; *EI*², s.v. Tamīm b. Murr (M. Lecker)), whereas most of the Arabs in al-Ḥīrah, from the ruling Lakhmid family downward, stemmed from tribes accounted Yemeni in nasab.

Nu'mān's appointment to the office which he now holds.'" They kept on thus repeatedly until they caused the king to be full of hatred toward 'Adī b. Zayd. Also, they wrote a letter in 'Adī's name to one of his stewards (qahramān) and then laid a plot against him to seize the letter, which they then brought to al-Nu'mān. The latter read it, and it filled him with rage. He sent a message to 'Adī b. Zayd in these terms: "I beseech you, why haven't you visited me? I have been longing to see you." 'Adī was at this juncture at Kisrā's court; he asked Kisrā for permission to leave, and the latter gave this. But when 'Adī came to al-Nu'mān, he had hardly set eyes on al-Nu'mān before he was thrown into a prison, where no one came to visit him.[821] 'Adī b. Zayd set about composing verses while he was in prison. The first of the verses which he composed there was:

Would that I knew something from the great hero (i.e., the king)! Then would a tenderly persuasive enquiry bring you authentic news [of him]![822]

He further recited many other pieces of poetry.[823]

---

821. In the second of Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī's accounts of the estrangement between al-Nu'mān and 'Adī, in Aghānī[3], II, 115–16, that stemming from al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad al-Ḍabbī, to the reasons for this estrangement set forth in the first account from Ibn al-Kalbī, essentially that given above by al-Ṭabarī, al-Mufaḍḍal adds another cause, also involving 'Adī's enemy Ibn Marīnā. According to this, 'Adī grew angry with al-Nu'mān because he had prepared for al-Nu'mān and his entourage a splendid feast, but en route for this, al-Nu'mān was intercepted by Ibn Marīnā who invited him on the spot to a feast of his own so that, when al-Nu'mān eventually arrived at 'Adī's feast, he was satiated and oculd not touch any of it. 'Adī was naturally piqued, displayed his anger, reproached al-Nu'mān in verse and broke off relations with him. In retailiation, al-Nu'mān consigned 'Adī to prison.

822. Dīwān, 56, no. 7 v. 2, a verse from a long poem, more of which is cited in other sources such as Aghānī[3], II, 110.

823. When Nöldeke made his translation, he stated, 319 n. 2, that the verses of 'Adī had to be recovered from scattered citations in later sources. A formal dīwān of 'Adī's collected poetry is mentioned in several mediaeval Islamic sources, e.g., Ibn al-Nadīm and Abū al-'Alā' al-Ma'arrī, as being in existence at that time, with various copies circulating in Baghdad. However, the Dīwān of 'Adī has now been published by Muḥammad Jabbār al-Mu'aybid on the basis of a unique manuscript, preserved at al-Baṣrah, of the work of Jāhilī poets and called Kitāb jamharat shu'arā' al-'Arab min al-Jāhiliyyah; see al-Mu'aybid's Introduction, 20–25.

As Nöldeke commented, loc. cit., the poetry of 'Adī, the product of an urban, Christanised environment, is perceptibly easier to understand than the verses of contemporary Bedouin poets, products of the ruder, harsher desert.

Whenever 'Adī composed some poetry, this came to al-Nu'mān's notice and hearing, and he felt regret for having imprisoned him. He began to send messages to 'Adī, making him various promises and arousing his hopes [of being freed], but shrank from releasing him lest 'Adī should then intend some evil against him. 'Adī thereupon uttered the verse:

I lay awake in a thick, dark cloud in which lightning flashes continually rose up on the gray mountain peaks.[824]

and also,

That night was long for us and intensely dark.[825] [1021]

And also,

Ho there, the nights and the days are long![826]

When he became wearied of addressing entreaties to al-Nu'mān, he recited poetry in which he reminded him of death and informed him of those kings before him who had perished, saying,

Has farewell been said to him when he was setting out in the morning or at even?[827]

and many other poems.

He related: Al-Nu'mān once set out for al-Baḥrayn, and [in his absence] a man from Ghassān appeared and wrought whatever violence he willed in al-Ḥīrah. It is said that the person who attacked al-Ḥīrah and then put it to flames was Jafnah b. al-Nu'mān al-Jafnī.[828] 'Adī recited:

---

824. Dīwān, 37, no. 3 v. 1.
825. ibid., 59, no. 8 v. 1.
826. ibid., 132, no. 60 v. 1.
827. ibid., 84, no. 16 v. 1.
828. This refers to a major, surprise attack on the Lakhmid capital involving an operation mounted across the Syrian Desert by the Jafnid/Ghassānid prince, who plundered al-Ḥīrah and pitched his praetorium or military headquarters there for five days, while the Lakhmid ruler was absent, as 'Adī's scornful verse stresses. The Jafnid/Ghassānid prince would be al-Mundhir b. al-Ḥārith or Arethas (r. 569–82). Nöldeke, Die Ghassânischen Fürsten, 27–28, placed the attack in 580–81, commenting that it could not in any case have happened after 591 when the emperor Maurice and Khusraw Abarwēz made peace, since the Byzantine ruler would not have allowed his Syrian vassal to breach the agreement thus; see also

A falcon soared high, and then set both sides of it (i.e., the town of al-Ḥīrah) in flames, while you were completely occupied with camels, some of which are sent out to travel by night while others are left to pasture freely.[829]

When ʿAdī's imprisonment became protracted, he wrote the following verses to his brother Ubayy, who was at Kisrā's court,

Convey the news to Ubayy, however far away he is—is what a man has come to know any use to him?—
—That your brother, the dear one of your heart, for whom you were intensely concerned while ever he was safe and sound,
Is shackled with iron fetters in the power of a king, whether justly or unjustly.
So let me not find you acting like a woman with a child (dhāt al-ghulāmi) if she does not find a suckler of her breast, seeking for such an one.
So take care to remain in your own land, for if you come to us you will sleep a dreamless slumber (i.e., will find death)![830]

His brother wrote back to him,

If Fate has betrayed you, then you are no weakling (literally, "weak of outstretched arms"), nor an inactive person, nor a feeble [1022] one.

---

trans. 320 n. 3. This seems a reasonable argument, and the attack must in any case have happened well before al-Nuʿmān's imprisonment of ʿAdī toward the year 600. Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 104 n. 2, 105, 112, however, placed the attack earlier than Nöldeke. More recently, Irfan Shahîd has dated the attack to 575, at the end of the three years' period when al-Mundhir b. al-Ḥārith had withdrawn from Byzantine service and was keen to retaliate on the Lakhmids for their raids on the Syrian frontiers during that period. The Lakhmid ruler at that time would thus be al-Mundhir IV b. al-Mundhir III rather than the energetic al-Nuʿmān III, ruling by ca. 580. The mention of the Jafnid/Ghassānid attacker as being "Jafnah b. al-Nuʿmān al-Jafnī" in the account transmitted by Abū ʿUbaydah is thus both vague and inaccurate.

829. Dīwān, 114, no. 25 v. 1.

830. ibid., 164, no. 111 vv. 1–5. The message of the last two verses is that Ubayy should not assume a task, that of avenging his brother ʿAdī, which is no part of his business—at least, not by immediately coming to the Lakhmid court seeking vengeance and instead finding there his own certain death. Nöldeke, trans. 321 n. 1, was uncertain about the rendering of v. 4, but the enlightning emendations in Addenda et emendanda, p. DCXIV, and Glossarium, p. CCCCLIX, make it clear that the proverbial saying given in Lane, Lexicon, 2025a, is being alluded to here.

By God's oath, even if a darkly massed,[831] mighty, crushing force, with gleaming swords,
With a distant roaring sound, advancing across country with an overwhelming host bringing death, with robes of battle intact and enfolding them,[832]
Had I been in the thick of its throng, I would have hastened to you; so know that I would have responded when you asked for succor!
Or if I had been asked for money for you, neither inherited wealth nor wealth which had been earned for some specific purpose would have been held back.
Or [if you had been] in a land and I could have come to you there, neither its distance away nor any fearsome danger would have affrighted me.
Since you are far away from me, the glory of this age and the authority to command are with the enemy.
If, by God, I am bereft of you, an old companion whose loss brings pain, there is no one who can replace you, while ever the autumn rains pour forth.
Indeed, by my life, if I grieve over you, it is as an afflicted, sad one.
Indeed, by my life, if I manage to regain control and find consolation, nevertheless there will be few like you in the lands through which I range.[833]

They assert that, when Ubayy read 'Adī's letter, he went along to Kisrā and spoke with him [about the affair]. Kisrā thereupon wrote a letter and sent an envoy with it. Al-Nu'mān's deputy in the exercise of government (khalīfah) wrote to al-Nu'mān that Kisrā had sent a letter to him. At that, 'Adī's enemies from the [1023]
Banū Buqaylah of Ghassān[834] went along to al-Nu'mān and said,

831. That is, because of the dark color of the massed warriors in their mailed coats.

832. Reading thus, with Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[1], II, 27, malfūfu, as suggested in n. a; but Aghānī[3], II, 119, chooses the reading of Nöldeke's text, makfūfu "with the hems of their robes of battle trimmed short." Both renderings are equally possible in the context.

833. This poem also figures in Aghānī[3], II, 119–20. As Nöldeke remarked, 321 n. 3, the poem reads more like an elegy composed after 'Adī's death than one addressed to him during it.

834. See n. 670 above.

"Kill him immediately!" but he refused. The envoy arrived, having been first accosted by 'Adī's brother, who gave him money as a bribe and told him to visit 'Adī first. The envoy went to 'Adī, the latter being incarcerated in [the fortress of] Ṣinnīn.[835] 'Adī's brother said, "Go into his presence and see what instructions he gives you." The envoy went into 'Adī's presence and said, "I have brought the order for your release; what have you got [for me]?" 'Adī said, "Something you will like very much," and gave him promises, adding, however, "Don't leave me, but give me the letter so that I may convey it to him (i.e., al-Nu'mān), for by God, if you leave me, then I shall undoubtedly be killed." The envoy replied, "I can't do anything except go to the king and deliver the letter to him personally."

Meanwhile, someone went along to al-Nu'mān to let him know what was happening. This person came to al-Nu'mān and told him, "Kisrā's envoy has been to visit 'Adī, and is going to bring 'Adī with him. If he does that, he will not spare any of us, neither yourself nor anyone else." Al-Nu'mān thereupon sent 'Adī's enemies to him, and they smothered him till he died, and then buried him. The envoy came into al-Nu'mān's presence with the letter. Al-Nu'mān hailed him with the words, "Good fortune and welcome!" and sent him four thousand mithqāls[836] (i.e., in silver dirhams) and a slave girl, saying to him, "When you go along to 'Adī next morning, go in to him and bring him back personally." But when the envoy rode out to there next morning and entered the prison, the guards told him, "He has already been dead for several days; we didn't, however, dare to tell the king out of fear of him, since we knew that he did not desire 'Adī's death." The envoy returned to al-Nu'mān and said, "I went into his presence 835. This was a fortress of the district of al-Ḥīrah, mentioned in the account of Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ's attack on al-Ḥīrah in 14/635 (al-Ṭabarī, I, 2233). According to Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 90, it was built by the Greek architect Sinnimār, the luckless constructor of al-Khawarnaq (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 851–52, pp. 75–78 above). See Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 431; Nöldeke, trans. 322 n. 3 (on the most probable Aramaic etymology of the toponym); Musil, The Middle Euphrates, 117–18 (mentioning what he identified as the ruins of Ṣinnīn and its castle); Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 152.

836. For this measure for precious metals and monetary unit, based on the weight of the Byzantine gold, solidus, see Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 1–8; *EI*², s.v. Makāyil and Mawāzin (E. Ashtor).

[yesterday] and he was still alive!" Al-Nu'mān told him, "The king sends you to me, and you go to 'Adī before me? You're lying, and you're only seeking bribe money and stirring up mischief!" He threatened him but then gave him increased largesse and marks of favor, and extracted a promise from him that he would merely tell Kisrā that 'Adī had died before he could go to him. So the envoy [1024] returned to Kisrā and informed him that 'Adī had died before he could get access to him. Al-Nu'mān was filled with remorse at 'Adī's death, but 'Adī's enemies behaved menacingly toward him, and he was violently afraid of them.

Al-Nu'mān went out hunting one day and met one of 'Adī's sons called Zayd. When he saw him, he recognized his resemblance to 'Adī and asked him, "Who are you?" The son replied, "I am Zayd b. 'Adī b. Zayd," Al-Nu'mān spoke with him and found him to be a finely formed young man, and he rejoiced at this (or, "in him") greatly. He introduced him into his court circle, gave him gifts, made excuses to him over the matter of his father,[837] and fitted him out handsomely with a traveling kit. Then he wrote to Kisrā in these terms: "'Adī was, because of his wise counsel and his intelligence, one of those persons who are the supports of kings; but the inevitable fate came upon him, his life span was fulfilled and his sustenance was cut off; no one was more deeply afflicted by his death than myself. Yet a king does not lose one of his men without God sending along a replacement for him, since God has made the king's royal power and exalted status so mighty. Now one of 'Adī's sons, not inferior to him in qualities, has just reached maturity. Hence I have sent him along to the king; if he sees fit to appoint him in his father's stead, he may do so."

When the young man came to Kisrā, he appointed him to his father's old office and transfered his paternal uncle (i.e., Ubayy) to another post. So it was Zayd who took charge of correspondence dispatched to the land of the Arabs—in particular, [that of] the king. The Arabs gave him a specific, annual payment for filling this office, namely, two chestnut-colored colts, fresh truffles in their season and dried ones, dried and compacted cheese, hides (or, "seasonings," al-udum), and other products traded by the Arabs.

837. That is, over his being imprisoned and not, of course, over his killing. See Nöldeke, trans. 324 n. 1.

Zayd b. ʿAdī b. Zayd was thus in charge of all this—that is, those functions ʿAdī b. Zayd had exercised. When Zayd had attained such a position in Kisrā's eyes, the latter asked him about al-Nuʿmān; Zayd praised him profusely.

[1025] Zayd accordingly remained for several years filling the same role his father had filled. Kisrā was highly pleased with him, and Zayd used frequently to go into his presence. The Persian kings possessed the description of a [perfect] woman, written down and kept by them, and they used to send that description out to all those lands (i.e., to obtain for themselves such ideal wives and concubines), except that they never had any dealings with the land of the Arabs regarding this and would never seek it. At one point, the king again took steps for seeking out women, and sent out that written description. Then Zayd went into Kisrā's presence and spoke to him about the course of action the king had embarked upon, and said, "I see that the king has sent out letters concerning women who are to be sought out for him [as partners]. I have read the description. I know the house of al-Mundhir very well. Your servant al-Nuʿmān has many daughters and paternal nieces and other members of his family, totaling more than twenty women, who correspond to this description." Kisrā said, "In that case, you should write off concerning them." Zayd replied, "O king, the worst characteristic of the Arabs, and of al-Nuʿmān [in particular], is that they regard themselves as superior in nobility, as they conceive themselves, to the Persians. I am afraid that he will conceal these women. But if I personally go to him with this mission, he will not be able to place them in concealment. So send me, together with a man from your own guard who is a skilled Arabic speaker." Hence Kisrā sent with him a sturdy man. Zayd set off with the latter. He began to treat that man in a noble and friendly fashion until he reached al-Ḥīrah. He went into al-Nuʿmān's presence and extolled the monarch, then went on to say that "He (Kisrā) requires women [as attendants] for his wives and children, and desires to show you honor, hence has sent this mission to you."[838] Al-Nuʿmān asked, "What kind of women are

838. Such a tribute of maidens was regarded by Nöldeke, trans. 325 n. 1, as quite credible, especially as Barhebraeus mentions a "Fast of the Maidens" of the Nestorian Christians commemorating the frustration of Khusraw Abarwēz's atthese [who are required]?" Zayd answered, "This is the description of them."

The description stemmed from al-Mundhir the Elder's[839] forwarding as a present for Anūsharwān a slave girl whom he had acquired as plunder when he had raided al-Ḥārith the Elder al-Ghassānī, son of Abū Shamir,[840] and whose description he had sent in a letter to Anūsharwān:

"[She is] of medium height, with a clear skin color and fine [1026] teeth, white, gleaming like the moon, pronounced eyebrows, dark and wide eyed, with a high, aquiline nose, slender eyelashs over fine eyes, smooth cheeks, with a delectable body, plentiful hair, a good-sized skull so that ear-drops hang far apart, with a high neck, a wide bosom, and well-rounded breasts. [She has] stout shoulder and upper arm bones, fine wrists, delicate hands with long and straight fingers; a pulled-in abdomen, neat waist, slender at the girdle, ample hips, a well-rounded rear and strong thighs, a fine posterior and fleshy buttocks, good-sized knees, filled-out calves so that her ornamental anklets fit snugly, but with delicate ankle bones and feet. [She] walks with slow steps, is somnolent and remains inside in the fierce light of day and has a tender skin where this is exposed. [She is] obedient to her lord and master, not flat-nosed or with a tanned skin, humble and submissive although of noble birth and not brought up in penurious circumstances, modest, sedate, mild in character, and steady minded. [She has] noble maternal relatives[841] and she is satisfied with her paternal lineage, without reference to her clan, and with her clan without reference to her tribe. Experience of life has made her of fine conduct and attainments (adab). Her ways of thought are those of

---

tempt to carry off all the maidens from al-Ḥīrah, and as al-Bīrūnī, al-Āthār al-bāqiyah, 314, states that the ṣawm al-'adhārā marked the relief of the Arabs at being relieved of the tribute of virgins levied by the kings of al-Ḥīrah or else the victory of Dhū Qār, which spared the Arabs from the Persian demand for their maidens.

839. That is, the Lakhmid al-Mundhir III (r. 504–54, interrupted by the Kindī occupation of al-Ḥīrah in the mid-520s).

840. That is, the Jafnid/Ghassānid al-Ḥārith (Arethas) (r. 529–69), son of Abū Shamir Jabalah (d. 528). See Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Sixth Century, I/1, 69.

841. Following the emendation al-khāl of Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCIV, for the text's al-ḥāl.

noble people, but her actions those of the poor and needy. [She is] skillful with her hands, restrained with her tongue, has a gentle voice; she is an adornment to the house, and puts the enemy to shame. If you wish for [sexual contact with] her, she shows eagerness for it; if you prefer to leave her alone, she is content to abstain. She becomes wide eyed [with sexual longing], her cheeks blush red, her lips tremble, and she hastens toward you before you can fall upon her."[842]

Kisrā accepted this description and ordered it to be set down in permanent form in his chancery registers. [The Persian rulers] kept on handing it down to each other until it finally reached Kisrā, son of Hurmuz.

Zayd read out the description to al-Nu'mān, but the latter found the topic distasteful, and said to Zayd, with the envoy listening at the same time, "Aren't all the wide-eyed ones ('īn) of the Sawād [1027] and Persia enough to fulfill your needs?" The envoy said to Zayd, "What are the 'wide-eyed ones' ?"[843] He replied, "Wild cows (al-baqar)."[844] Zayd said to al-Nu'mān, "Kisrā only desires to show you honor; if he had known that this [demand] was distressing for you, he would not have written to you in these terms." Al-Nu'mān gave them both hospitality for two days and then wrote to Kisrā, "That which the king seeks I do not possess," and he told Zayd, "Make my excuses to the king."

When Zayd went back to Kisrā, he told the envoy who had come with him, "Tell the king everything you heard from al-Nu'mān, for I shall give him the same account as you and not contradict you at all regarding it." When the two of them went into Kisrā's presence, Zayd said, "This is his letter," and he read it out to him. Kisrā retorted, "Where, then is what you [previously] told me

842. This bravura piece of rhetorical prose, with its balanced phrases and rhymes, appears also in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], II, 29–30, with various divergencies of wording. On the theme of descriptions of female beauty in Iranian and Persian literatures, from the Avesta onward, see EIr s.v. Erotic Literature (Djalal Khaleghi-Motlagh).

843. a'yan, f. 'aynā', pl. 'īn, "wide-eyed, dark-eyed," is a favorite attribute of the wild cow or oryx, and thence, of women, in early Arabic poetry, appearing in the Qur'ān as a description of the houris of the Paradise intended for the justified believers, e.g., in XXXVII, 47/49, XLIV, 54, LII, 20, LVI, 20.

844. The account in al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, III, 205–206 = §§ 1065–66, uses the synonym for wild cow, mahāt.

about?" Zayd said, "I told you about their (i.e., the Arabs') tenaciousness in keeping their women from others, and that this arises from their miserable way of life; they prefer starvation and nakedness to satiety and fine clothes, and the fiery and tempestuous winds to the ease and pleasantness of this land of yours, to the point that they call it a prison.[845] Now just ask this envoy who accompanied me about what he (i.e., al-Nu'mān) said, for I have too great a regard for the king's exalted position to be able to repeat what he said and the answer that he gave the king." Kisrā thereupon asked the envoy, "What did he say?" The envoy replied, "He said, O king, 'Hasn't he got enough from the wild cows of the Sawād without seeking after what we ourselves have?'" Signs of anger became apparent in Kisrā's face and he felt violently moved in his heart, but he merely remarked, "Many a wretch has had worse things than this in mind, yet his intentions have come to naught in the end!" These words became generally circulated and reached the ears of al-Nu'mān.

Kisrā then remained silent regarding this topic for several months. Al-Nu'mān, meanwhile, was preparing for whatever might befall and was expecting [the worst], when Kisrā's letter reached him [containing the command]: "Come here, for the king has business with you!" He set off [precipitately] when the king's letter reached him, taking with him his weapons and whatever else he was able [to carry]. He arrived at the two mountains of Ṭayyi',[846] accompanied by [his wife] Far'ah bt. Sa'd b. Ḥārithah b. [1028] Lām, who had borne him both a male and a female child, and also [his wife] Zaynab. bt. Aws b. Ḥārithah [b. Lām]. Al-Nu'mān made for the land of the Ṭayyi', hoping that they would take him in among themselves and protect him, but they refused to do this, saying, "Were it not for the marriage bonds between us, we would

845. Contrasting the harshness and misery of the desert existence of the Bedouins with the ease of life in the ḥaḍar or settled lands such as al-Ḥīrah and the Persian lands in Mesopotamia.

846. The "two mountains of Ṭayyi'," Aja' and Salmā, were in what is now the Jabal Shammar of northern Najd, to the south and southeast of modern Ḥā'il, and are often mentioned in old poetry. See al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, I, 109–10, III, 750; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 94–99, III, 238–39; Musil, Northern Neǧd, a Topographical Itinerary, New York 1928, 76–77, 88–89; Thilo, Die Ortsnamen in der altarabischen Poesie, 26, 90.

attack you, for we do not want to be drawn into emnity with Kisrā."[847] Al-Nuʿmān went onward, but no one would receive him except for the Banū Rawāḥah b. Saʿd from the Banū ʿAbs, who said, "We will fight at your side, if you wish," because of an act of favor al-Nuʿmān had shown to them over the matter of Marwān al-Qaraẓ. However, he replied, "I don't want to bring about your destruction, for you don't have the strength to prevail over Kisrā."[848] So he traveled onward until he encamped secretly at Dhū Qār amongst the Banū Shaybān. Here he met Hāniʾ b. Masʿūd b. ʿĀmir b. ʿAmr b. Abī Rabīʿah b. Dhuhl b. Shaybān, who was a mighty chief. At that time, the sheikhly rule in Rabīʿah was among the house of Dhū al-Jaddayn, held by Qays b. Masʿūd b. Qays b. Khālid b. Dhī al-Jaddayn.[849] Kisrā had made a grant to

847. The tribe of Ṭayyiʾ, whose ancient pasture grounds were in northern Najd, as the connection of their name with the two mountains there shows (see n. 846 above), were accounted Yemeni in genealogy. Al-Nuʿmān's marriage with two Ṭāʾī wives suggests that the tribe had links with the Lakhmids, but these were not strong enough to offset the need to keep up good relations with the Sāsānids, and it was a man of Ṭayyiʾ, Iyās b. Qabīṣah, whom Khusraw appointed after al-Nuʿmān's death as the first, and last, non-Lakhmid governor in al-Ḥīrah and the former Lakhmid lands and who commanded the forces of the Persians and their Arab allies at Dhū Qār (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1017, p. 341 above). Christianity seems to have acquired some hold among the Ṭayyiʾ in pre-Islamic times, presumably among those of the tribe who frequented the fringes of Iraq, and Iyās was a Christian. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 176, 249–57, II, 57–61, 176; *EI*², s.v. Ṭayyiʾ (Irfan Shahîd). As Nöldeke noted, trans. 329 n. 2, al-Nuʿmān's own adoption of Christianity—the first of his line to do so—was nominal enough for him to remain polygamous and to take at least two wives.

848. The ʿAbs were a component of the great North Arab group of Ghaṭafān, part of Qays ʿAylān, with the Banū Rawāḥah coming in the tribal silsilat al-nasab five generations after ʿAbs himself. Their pasture grounds lay between the Jabal Shammar and northern Ḥijāz, hence just beyond those of Ṭayyiʾ. The "matter of Marwān al-Qaraẓ" involved al-Nuʿmān's securing this man's release from al-Nuʿmān's uncle and the previous ruler in al-Ḥīrah ʿAmr b. al-Mundhir or b. Hind, and the affair is referred to in the poetry of Zuhayr b. Abī Sulmā (who was born and reared among the Banū ʿAbdallāh of Ghaṭafān), as is the magnanimous reception of the fugitive Lakhmid by the Banū Rawāḥah b. Saʿd. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 92, 132–33, 136, II, 20–21, 135–36; *EI*², s.v. Ghaṭafān (J. W. Fück); and on al-Nuʿmān's flight and attempts to secure jiwār or tribal protection, see Rothstein, Lahmiden, 117–18.

849. Dhū al-Jaddayn were one of the leading families of Bakr (see Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 144, II, 24), from the Hammām b. Murrah, a dominant branch of the Shaybān. Equally influential with Qays was his son, the poet and warrior Bisṭām. See *EI*², s.v. Bisṭām b. Ḳays (M. J. Kister).

Qays b. Mas'ūd of al-Ubullah,[850] hence al-Nu'mān was fearful of entrusting his family and dependents to him because of that fact; whereas, he knew that Hāni' would protect him as he would his own life.

Al-Nu'mān then (i.e., after leaving his family and dependents with Hāni') proceeded toward Kisrā's court. On the stone bridge of Sābāṭ[851] he met Zayd b. 'Adī, who said to him, "Save yourself, [if you can,] O Little Nu'mān (Nu'aym)!" Al-Nu'mān replied, "You have done this, O Zayd, but by God, if I manage to survive, I shall do with you what I did with your father!" Zayd told him, "Go on, Little Nu'mān, for by God, I have prepared for you at Kisrā's court bonds to hobble your feet which even a high-spirited colt couldn't break!"[852] When the news of his arrival at court reached Kisrā, the latter sent guards to him who put him in fetters, and he consigned him to Khāniqīn.[853] There he remained in gaol until an outbreak

---

850. Al-Ubullah (< Greek Apologos) lay on the right bank of the Euphrates-Tigris estuary, at the mouth of a canal of the same name, the Nahr al-Ubullah. The town existed in Sāsānid times and possibly earlier, and in the later Sāsānid period, at least, came normally within the dominions of the Lakhmids. With the advent of Islam, al-Ubullah was to some extent eclipsed by the miṣr of al-Baṣrah, founded further inland, but it continued to be a port of major significance for trade with the Arabian Sea and Indian Ocean shores all through mediaeval Islamic times until the Mongol invasions. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 76–78; Le Strange, Lands, 47–48; Wilson, The Persian Gulf, 62–64; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 161–62; EI[2], s.v. al-Ubullah (J. H. Kramers). According to Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XXIII, 54, Khusraw made the grant to Qays b. Mas'ūd so that the latter would ward off the tribesmen of Bakr b. Wā'il from the Sawād. See Donner, "The Bakr b. Wā'il Tribes and Politics in Northeastern Arabia on the Eve of Islam," 27–28.

851. See for this, n. 327 above.

852. As Nöldeke noted, trans. 331 n. 2, another brother of Zayd's, 'Amr (not 'Ammār) b. 'Adī b. Zayd, acted as adviser on Arab affairs and translator for Khusraw Abarwēz, and fought at Dhū Qār on the Persian side, where he was killed. See Aghānī[3], XXIV, 61–62, 73–74. The family of 'Adī b. Zayd continued to be of significance in al-Ḥīrah until well into 'Abbāsid times, when al-Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 309, tr. 141, describes them in his own time (late third/ninth century) as among the upper social strata there ('ilyat ahl al-Ḥīrah) and still firmly attached to their Christian faith.

853. This town lay to the northeast of Ctesiphon and the later Baghdad on the highway through Jibāl to al-Rayy and Khurāsān; at the present day, it comes just within the borders of Iraq. The early Islamic geographers praise a fine, brick-built bridge there, spanning the Ḥulwān river, an affluent of the Diyālā, and this apparently dated back to the town's pre-Islamic existence. The fact that al-Nu'mān was imprisoned there suggests the presence there of a Sāsānid fortress also. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 340–41; Le Strange, Lands, 62–63; Schwarz, Iran, 687–89; Barthold, of plague occurred and he died in prison. People think that he died at Sābāṭ on account of a verse by al-Aʿshā,

It happened thus, and he was not able to save his master (i.e., al-Nuʿmān, the master of the noble steed addressed in the preceding verses) from death at Sābāṭ, dying while he was [1029] incarcerated.[854]

In fact, he died at Khāniqīn, just a short while before the coming of Islam. Soon afterward, God sent His prophet; al-Nuʿmān's fate was the cause of the battle of Dhū Qār.[855]

There was related to me a narrative going back to Abū ʿUbaydah Maʿmar b. al-Muthannā—Abū al-Mukhtār Firās b. Khindif and a number of the learned scholars of the Arabs whom Abū ʿUbaydah expressly named, as follows:[856] When al-Nuʿmān killed ʿAdī, the latter's brother and son hatched a plot against al-Nuʿmān at Kisrā's court, and falsified a letter sent by al-Nuʿmān to Kisrā exculpating himself with expressions that roused Kisrā's anger. Hence he ordered al-Nuʿmān to be killed. When al-Nuʿmān had become fearful of Kisrā, he had deposited his coat of mail, his valuables, and other arms with Hāniʾ b. Masʿūd b. ʿĀmir al-Khaṣīb b. ʿAmr al-Muzdalif b. Abī Rabīʿah b. Dhuhl b. Shaybān b. Thaʿlabah; this was because al-Nuʿmān had given him two of his daughters in marriage. Abū ʿUbaydah added, however, that "Other Historical Geography, 199, 202; *EI*², s.v. Khāniḳīn (P. Schwarz). In his Iran im Mittelalter, 688 n. 1, Schwarz details the information of the Arabic sources on al-Nuʿmān's mode of death: either from plague or through being trampled by elephants.

---

854. Dīwān, 147, no. 33 v.18. Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 331 n.4.

855. This could be considered as true in an indirect way, in that the end of the Lakhmids does seem to have facilitated increased depredations by Bedouin tribes like the Bakr on the now less strongly defended desert fringes of Iraq. Whether Khusraw had any serious reason for thinking that al-Nuʿmān was aiming at a policy more independent of his Persian overlord is impossible now to determine. See Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 607–608.

Other accounts in the Arabic sources of al-Nuʿmān's fall from favor and his consequent fate are given in al-Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, I, 245–46; al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, III, 205–10 = §§ 1065–70; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Taʾrīkh, 94–95 (al-Dīnawarī, on the other hand, takes very little account of the Lakhmids). See also Nöldeke, trans. 332 n. 1.

856. This is now the continuation of the riwāyah from Abū ʿUbaydah begun by al-Ṭabarī at I, 1016, p. 339 above.

authorities state that Hāni' b. Mas'ūd was no longer alive at the time of this happening; the person in question was Hāni' b. Qabīṣah b. Hāni' b. Mas'ūd, and I consider this to be correct."[857]

After Kisrā had had al-Nu'mān killed, he appointed Iyās b. Qabīṣah al-Ṭā'ī as governor over al-Ḥīrah and the other former territories of al-Nu'mān.[858] Abū 'Ubaydah related: When Kisrā had fled from Bahrām [Chūbīn], he passed by Iyās b. Qabīṣah, and the latter gave him a horse and slaughtered a camel for him; in this way, Kisrā showed his gratitude.[859] Kisrā sent a message to Iyās enquiring where al-Nu'mān's deposited possessions were. Iyās replied that al-Nu'mān had found a safe refuge for them among the Bakr b. Wā'il. So Kisrā ordered Iyās to get possession of what al-Nu'mān had left behind and to forward that to him. Iyās sent a message to Hāni', "Send to me the coats of mail and other items [1030] al-Nu'mān entrusted to you" (the lowest estimate of these mailed coats was four hundred, and the highest was eight hundred). But Hāni' refused to hand over what he had engaged to protect.[860]

He related: When Hāni' withheld these, Kisrā was filled with anger and gave out that he would extirpate the Bakr b. Wā'il. At that moment, he had at his court al-Nu'mān b. Zur'ah al-Taghlibī,

---

857. Hāni' b. Qabīṣah b. Mas'ūd al-Shaybānī and Iyās b. Qabīṣah al-Ṭā'ī, or his son Farwah b. Iyās—Iyās being at this point the Persian ruler's viceroy in al-Ḥīrah—are mentioned in al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 243, as yielding up the city in 12/633 to Khālid b. al-Walīd's forces on the basis of a peace treaty, with the provision that the Ḥīran leaders were now to act as spies for the Arabs against the Persians.

858. Iyās, noted above as involved (unless his son Farwah is meant) in the surrender of al-Ḥīrah to the Arabs, was the son of Khusraw's adviser Qabīṣah, the tribe of Ṭayyi' having links with the Sāsānid ruling house (see n. 847 above). He was thus an appropriate person to appoint as governor in al-Ḥīrah. However, at his side Khusraw placed his commander Nakhīrjān (on this name, see n. 377 above), who was later to play an eminent role in the defense of al-Madā'in against the Arabs (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 2419–22, etc., below), as financial controller and tribute collector. Iyās was to govern in al-Ḥīrah from 600 to 611. See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 110, 116, 120 and n. 1.

859. As Nöldeke, trans. 333 n. 2, commented, this gratitude was rather belated. Al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 216–17, has different details on the fugitive Khusraw's desperate search for a mount, including the detail that al-Nu'mān refused to give the king his own celebrated horse al-Yaḥmūm.

860. This refusal to hand over valuable war material is confirmed by some verses of al-A'shā in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XXIV, 79.

who was eager for the destruction of the Bakr b. Wā'il.[861] Al-Nu'mān said to Kisrā, "O best of rulers, shall I show you how Bakr might be attacked unawares?" Kisrā replied, "Yes!" Al-Nu'mān said, "Leave them alone, so that they can go to their summer encampments, for if they do take up these summer quarters they will alight at one of their watering places called Dhū Qār just as a moth falls into a fire, and then you can fall upon them exactly as you wish. I myself can take charge of this and get rid of them for you." Al-Nu'mān's phrase "they will alight just like a moth falling into a fire" was translated for Kisrā, and he accordingly left them alone for the time being.

But then when the Bakr b. Wā'il migrated to their summer quarters, they went along and encamped at the bend of Dhū Qār, one night's journey away from Dhū Qār itself. Kisrā sent al-Nu'mān b. Zur'ah to them with the message that they were to chose one of three courses of action (literally, "aims, targets"). Al-Nu'mān encamped at Hāni''s and told him, "I am the king's envoy to you. I offer you three courses of action. Either you submit yourselves, and the king will make a decision concerning you however he pleases; or you remove yourselves from the land; or be apprised of the imminence of war."[862] They took counsel together, and left the decision to Ḥanẓalah b. Tha'labah b. Sayyār al-'Ijlī, whose advice they regarded as auspicious.[863] Ḥanẓalah told them, "I can't see any other course but fighting, for if you place yourself in his hands, you will be killed and your children enslaved. If you flee, you will die of thirst, and the Tamīm will come upon you and put you to death. So apprise the king of imminent war."

The king sent messages to Iyās, to al-Hārmarz al-Tustarī, whose fortress was at al-Quṭquṭānah, and to Jalābzīn,[864] who held the 861. The two tribes of Bakr and Taghlib, although forming the major part of Rabī'ah, were at odds with each other for much of the sixth century. See *EI*², s.v. Bakr b. Wā'il (W. Caskel).

---

862. Echoing Qur'ān, II, 279, fa-'dhanū bi-ḥarb^{in} min Allāh wa-rasūlihi.

863. The 'Ijl b. Lujaym were a component of Bakr; see *EI*², s.v. 'Idjl (W.M. Watt). The sayyid Ḥanẓalah b. Tha'labah is described in *Aghānī*³, XXIV, 67, as bald headed, large bellied and with a reddish-brown skin, which Nöldeke, trans. 334 n. 3, regarded as probably an authentic description, since it deviates radically from the usual ideal of the spare desert warrior with long locks of hair.

864. This rendering of the Persian commander's name approaches more closely to the Zalabzan of the Byzantine Greek historians (see n. 739 above) than the fortress at Bāriq. Kisrā further wrote to [the above-mentioned] Qays b. Mas'ūd b. Qays b. Khālid b. Dhī al-Jaddayn, whom Kisrā [1031] had appointed over the frontier zone (al-ṭaff) of Safawān, with instructions to meet up with Iyās, and when they were all assembled, Iyās was to be their leader.[865] The Persians brought along troops and elephants on which were mounted cavalrymen. At this time, the Prophet had already begun his mission and the authority of the Persians had become weak. The Prophet said, "Today the Arabs have received satisfaction from the Persians." Note was taken of that day, and behold, it was the day of the battle.

When the armies of the Persians and their allies drew near, Qays b. Mas'ūd slipped away by night and went to Hāni'. He told him, "Give your troops al-Nu'mān [b. al-Mundhir]'s weapons in order thereby to increase the troops' strength. If they should perish, they will merely share the fate of those who bore them [originally], and you will have acted with all prudence and resolution; and if they are victorious, they will give them back to you."[866] Hāni' did that, and divided out the mailed coats and weapons among the strongest and stoutest of his troops. When the [Persian] army drew near to the Bakr, Hāni' shouted to the latter, "O men of the Bakr tribe! You won't be able to withstand Kisrā's troops and their Arab allies, so gallop back to the desert!" The tribesmen rushed headlong to do that, but Ḥanẓalah b. Tha'labah b. Sayyār sprang up and said to Hāni', "You admittedly want us to flee to safety, but you are thereby increasing the likelihood of your consigning us to destruction!" Thus he persuaded the tribesmen to go back, and he cut through the leather straps of the litters [on the camels] so that the Khunābizīn of the Naqā'iḍ Jarīr wa-al-Farazdaq, II, 640, 643, 644; see Addenda et emendanda, p. CXCV.

---

865. The three places mentioned here were points along the zone of frontier posts and fortresses to the west of the middle and lower Euphrates. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 319–20, III, 225, IV, 374 (al-Quṭquṭānah as the place of al-Nu'mān's imprisonment, but this is less likely than the fortress at Khāniqīn mentioned by al-Ṭabarī at I, 1028, p. 357 above); Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 151, 153.

866. As noted by Nöldeke, trans. 336 n. 1, Qays b. Mas'ūd was subsequently imprisoned by Khusraw in Sābāṭ on the grounds that he had not prevented Bedouin incursions across the fronier zone of al-Ṭaff, confirmed by poetry allegedly composed by Qays himself in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XXIV, 57–59, Abū 'Ubaydah's information here does confirm that Qays may have had a secret understanding with his fellow members of Bakr. However, in al-Ṭabarī, I, 1035, p. 367 below, al-A'shā satirizes Qays for cowardice and flight in battle.

Bakr would not be able to take their womenfolk with them if they were to flee. He therefore acquired the name of "the one who cuts the thongs" (muqaṭṭiʿ al-wuḍun), wuḍun being the straps securing the saddles and litters, or else "the one who cuts the belly girths" (muqaṭṭiʿ al-buṭn), buṭn being the straps securing the load-bearing frameworks on draught camels (al-aqtāb).[867] Ḥanẓalah also erected a tent for himself in the depression of Dhū Qār and took an oath that he would not flee unless the tent itself fled. Some of them (i.e., the Bakr) went forward, but the greater part of them went back and spent half a month at a watering place getting water for themselves [and their herds].

The Persians came upon them and fought with them at the bend [of Dhū Qār]. The Persians suffered from thirst, hence they fled, without making a stand and being hard pressed, back to al-Jubābāt,[868] with the Bakr and the ʿIjl, the foremost of the Bakr, [1032] pursuing them. The ʿIjl were in the forefront and fought in an exemplary fashion on that day. The Persian troops came together [at first] in a compact mass, so that people said, "The ʿIjl are finished!" Then [the rest of] the Bakr rallied to the attack and found the ʿIjl standing fast and fighting back. One of their women recited:

If the uncircumcised ones (al-ghuzal) gain the victory, they will ravish us (literally, "place [their penises] inside us");
onwards, may your lives be ransoms for yourselves, O Banū ʿIjl!

She also said, urging on the combattants:

If you put the enemy to flight, we shall embrace [you] and spread out soft rugs [for you].
But if you flee, we shall avoid [you], showing no tender affection![869]

---

867. This incident appears also in Aghānī[3], XXIV, 68–71.

868. Al-Jubābah (thus sing.) is merely noted by Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 98, as a place near Dhū Qār, and a watering place of the Abū Bakr b. Kilāb.

869. These three verses of the ʿIjlī woman figure in the account of Dhū Qār in the Naqāʾiḍ Jarīr wa-al-Farazdaq, II, 641, while the second and third verses, with a slight variant, are attributed in Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-nabī, ed,. Wüstenfeld, 562 = ed. al-Saqqā et al., III, 72, tr. 374, to Hind bt. ʿUtbah when she urged on Quraysh against the Muslims at the battle of Uḥud, in the year 3/625.

They fought with the Persians at al-Jubābāt for a whole day. Then the Persians suffered thirst and made toward the depression of Dhū Qār. The [tribe of] Iyād, who were auxiliary troops against the Bakr with Iyās b. Qabīṣah,[870] secretly sent a message to the Bakr: "Which is more attractive to you, that we should arise and steal away under cover of night, or stay here and take to flight when you encounter the enemy?" They replied, "Nay, stand fast, and then, when the enemy engage in battle, take to flight with them." He related: Bakr b. Wā'il fell upon the enemy next morning, with their womenfolk (al-ẓu'un, literally, "those mounted on camels in litters") standing nearby, inciting the men to fight. Yazīd b. Ḥimār al-Sakūnī, a confederate of the Banū Shaybān, said, "O Banū Shaybān, follow my leadership and let me make an ambush against the enemy." They did that, and made Yazīd b. Ḥimār their leader. Then they concealed themselves in an ambush at a place near Dhū Qār called al-Jubb,[871] and showed themselves stout warriors there. Commanding Iyās b. Qabīṣah's right wing was al-Hāmarz, and over his left wing was al-Jalābzīn; commanding the right wing of Hāni' b. Qabīṣah, the leader of the Bakr, was Yazīd b. Mus'hir al-Shaybānī, and over his left was Ḥanẓalah b. Tha'labah b. Sayyār al-'Ijlī. The people began to urge on their fellows and to compose rajaz verses [to encourage them]. Ḥanẓalah [1033]
b. Tha'labah recited:

Your hosts have already become a compact mass, so fight fiercely! What excuse shall I have, since I am strongly armed and robust?[872]
The bow has a thick string, like the foreleg of a young camel or stronger.

---

870. The Iyād were a North Arab tribe, whose eponymous forebear was said by the genealogists to be a son of Nizār b. Ma'add and a brother of Rabī'ah and Muḍar. Some Iyād settled at al-Ḥīrah and became Christians; others remained nomadic, and at the end of the sixth century and beginning of the seventh century were among the tribes in the service of the Sāsānids as frontier auxiliaries until their defection from the Persian side as narrated below. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 174–75, II, 29–30, 359–60; *EI*², s.v. Iyād (J. W. Fück). For Iyās b. Qabīṣah, see above nn. 810, 858.

871. Literally, "depression, hollow."

872. Following the mud'in of the Leiden and Cairo texts and of the Naqā'iḍ. Nöldeke's translation, 338, "da ich . . . sterben muss" would require mūd'in < awdā, "he perished."

The celebrated deeds of my people have become clear. Indeed, there is no escape from death.
Here is 'Umayr, whose tribe[873] rushes impetuously forward in battle,[874] with none able to repel it,
Until his reddish-colored horse becomes like a dark-brown one (i.e., with the blood of battle); they have cleared the way, O Banū Shaybān, and stood firm on their own![875]
Myself, my father and my grandfather I give as your ransom!

Ḥanẓalah further recited,

O my people, rejoice in yourselves at fighting! [This is] the most suitable of days for putting the Persians to flight![876]

Yazīd b. al-Mukassir b. Ḥanẓalah b. Tha'labah b. Sayyār recited:

The one of you who flees abandons his wives and the alien under his protection, and flees also from his boon companion.
I am the son of Sayyār, with his toughness and endurance (literally, "hanging on to his bit"); indeed, the sandal thongs have been cut from his own hide.
All men grow in the way of their forefathers, whether nurtured from defective blood or of pure stock.[877]

Firās related: Then they handed over the command, after Hāni',[878] to Ḥanẓalah. He went along to his daughter Māriyah, who was the mother of ten sons, one of these being Jābir b. Abjar,[879] and cut through the leather straps of her litter so that she 873. The Cairo text, II, 209, has the reading taḥtahu for ḥayyuhu, followed in the text of the Naqā'iḍ Jarīr wa-al-Farazdaq.

874. Following the emendation in Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCV, taqdumat^{an}.

875. Following, with the text of the Naqā'iḍ, the probable emendations to the second hemistich given in Addenda et emendanda, loc. cit., with statements (khallaw . . . wa-stabaddū) rather than imperative verbs and commands.

876. These verses of Ḥanẓalah figure in the Naqā'iḍ, II, 642.

877. These verses are in the Naqā'iḍ, II, 643, with the poet's name as Yazīd al-Mukassir b. Ḥanẓalah, i.e., the son, not the grandson, of the previously cited poet.

878. That is, because, as recorded by al-Ṭabarī at I, 1031, p. 361 above, Hāni' had left the field.

879. Nöldeke noted, trans. 339 n. 3, that the Ḥajjār b. Abjar b. Jābir b. Bujayr al-'Ijlī mentioned in the historical sources was probably Jābir's brother. This Ḥajjār fell to the ground, and he did the same with the straps of the other women so that they all fell to the ground. The daughter of al-Qarīn, the woman of Shaybān, cried out when the women fell to the ground,

Woe to you, O Banū Shaybān, rank upon rank! If you are put to flight, the uncircumcised ones (al-qulaq) will ravish us (literally, "will plunge into us")! [1034]

Seven hundred of the Banū Shaybān cut the arms of the sleeves of their garments from the shoulder pieces so that their arms would be freer for wielding their sword, and then they engaged the enemy fiercely in battle. He related: Al-Hāmarz cried out [in Persian], "Man to man!" (mard u mard). Burd b. Ḥārithah al-Yashkurī[880] exclaimed, "What is he saying?" They told him, "He is issuing a summonse to single combat, man to man." He replied, "By your father! He has spoken justly!" Burd advanced against him and slew him. Surayd b. Abī Kāhil recited:[881]

Little Burd (Burayd)[882] is one of us, [who proved himself in battle] when he went out against your hordes, when you did not want to let him draw near to the Marzbān with the bracelets on his arm.[883] was prominent in fighting the Muslims during the Riddah wars in al-Baḥrayn during Abū Bakr's caliphate, but apparently became a Muslim under 'Umar, especially as Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 161 (but not, e.g., Ibn al-Athīr, Usd al-ghābah), devotes a notice to him since, after conversion, he could technically be considered as a Companion of the Prophet; cf. also Donner, "The Bakr b. Wā'il Tribes and Politics in Northeastern Arabia on the Eve of Islam," 31–32. His father Abjar seems, however, to have remained Christian until his death toward the end of 'Alī's reign. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 3460, and Hawting, The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation, XVII, The First Civil War, 217 and n. 858. Nöldeke further noted the antiquity of the name Abjar/Abgar among the Arabs, going back to the kings of Edessa, among whom some ten of that name are known. See Segal, Edessa, 'The Blessed City,' index s.vv. Abgar I, etc.

---

880. The Banū Yashkur were a tribe of Bakr, with much of the tribe living as sedentaries in al-Yamāmah. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 141, 162, II, 26, 592.

881. Surayd b. Abī Kāhil Shabīb al-Yashkurī was a poet of the mukhaḍram. See Sezgin, GAS, II, 165–66.

882. The parallel verse in the Naqā'iḍ, II, 643, has for this name "Yazīd," but the text shortly afterward mentions Burayd as a variant for Yazīd.

883. Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XXIV, 71, mentions that the Persian cavalrymen of al-Hāmarz rode out against the Bakr wearing arm bracelets (musaw-

That is, you did not consider him [as an outstanding warrior].

Ḥanẓalah b. Tha'labah b. Sayyār called out, "O my people, don't just stand there facing them, or they will overwhelm you with arrows! The left wing of the Bakr, led by Ḥanẓalah, attacked the [Persian] army's right wing (whose commander, al-Hāmarz, Burd had just killed), and the right wing of the Bakr, led by Yazīd b. Mus'hir, attacked the [Persian] army's left wing (commanded by Jalābzīn). The concealed force under Yazīd b. Ḥimār came up behind them from al-Jubb of Dhū Qār, and launched an attack on the enemy's center, where Iyās b. Qabīṣah was. The Iyād turned round and fled, just as they had undertaken to do, and the Persians also fled.

Salīṭ said: The [Arab] captives whom we took, who were on that day in the Persian forces, related to us thus, saying: When the two sides clashed, Bakr took to flight, so we said, 'They are making for the watering place." But when they crossed the wadi and emerged from the bed of its stream onto the other side, we said, 'This is flight." This happened in the midday heat[884] of a day in the midst [1035] of summer. A detachment of the 'Ijl approached, tightly packed like a bundle of reeds, with no gaps in between; they did not offer impediment to any fugitives (i.e., from the other branches of the Bakr) and they did not mingle with others of the enemy. Then they urged each other on to the attack, advanced in a mass and hurled themselves frontally at the enemy. There was nothing more to be done; they had made the enemy yield, and these last turned and fled. They slew the Persians and those with them from the depression of Dhū Qār as far as al-Rāḥiḍah.[885] Firās related: I was further informed that they pursued the Persians closely, not looking for plunder or anything else, unti they met up with each other at Adam,[886] a place near Dhū Qār. There were found to be thirty riders from the Banū 'Ijl and sixty from the rest of the Bakr. They killed Jalābzīn, slain by the hand of Ḥanẓalah b. Tha'labah. May-war) and with pearls in each ear. Variants for the last word of this verse, al-Ṭabarī's al-musawwarā, are given in both the Naqā'iḍ and the Aghānī, and from the latter (where two verses are quoted), the correct rhyme emerges as -ru and not -rā.

---

884. Naqā'iḍ, II, 644, has ḥadd, "intensity, acute part of something," for al-Ṭabarī's ḥarr.

885. Unidentified.

886. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 162, knows this only as a place associated with the events of Dhū Qār.

mūn b. Qays (i.e., al-A'shā) recited the poem, praising the Banū Shaybān in particular:

I would give as a ransom for the Banū Dhuhl b. Shaybān my she-camel and its rider (i.e., myself) on the day of the encounter, but this would be too little.[887]
They combatted fiercely the vanguard of al-Hāmarz at the bend, the bend of Qurāqir, until he turned and fled.
Qays [b. Mas'ūd] escaped from our group, and I commented, "Perhaps, if he were wearing sandals there, he threw them off" (i.e., in order to escape more easily).

This shows that Qays was in fact present at Dhū Qār.

Bukayr, the deaf one (al-aṣamm) of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. 'Ubād,[888] eulogised the Banū Shaybān thus:

[O serving girl,] if you pour out wine for those who are wont to enjoy it (or, "deserve it"), then pour it out as an act of honor for the sons of Hammām, [1036]
And for all of the Abū Rabī'ah and the Muḥallim,[889] who attained the foremost place on the most noble of battle days.
They attacked the Free Ones (Banū al-Aḥrār)[890] on the day when they encountered them in battle, with Mashrafī swords[891] on the place where the skull rests firmly.
Arabs numbering three thousand and a force of two thousand Persians, from those who wear cloths over their mouths (banī al-faddām).[892]

---

887. Following the reading wa-qallati of al-A'shā, Dīwān, 179, no. 40 v. 1; Naqā'iḍ, II, 644; Aghānī[3], XXIV, 78; and Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCV, I do not see how Nöldeke, trans. 342, got his rendering "[geb' ich . . .] und meinen Renner" from wa-fullati.

888. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Ubād b. Ḍubay'ah were a clan of the important Tha'labah branch of Bakr. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 155, II, 25, 314.

889. Muḥallim b. Dhuhl were a clan of Shaybān. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 142, II, 421, 890. See for these, n. 604 above.

891. Clearly a superior kind of sword. The lexica give various explanations for the term, including one connecting it with the mashārif al-Shām, "the highlands of Syria," possibly the Ḥawrān massif, which would be near the place of origin of the later, famed swords of Damascus. See Lane, Lexicon, 1539a.

892. Nöldeke, trans. 343 n. 2, noted the reference here to the pandām,

The son of Qays made a charge, and the fame of it for him has traveled as far as the peoples of Iraq and Syria,
[That is,] 'Amr, and 'Amr is not decrepit with age or weak minded among them (i.e., his people of Qays), nor inexperienced and a mere youth.[893]

Since al-A'shā and al-Aṣamm praised the Banū Shaybān specifically, the Lahāzim[894] grew angry, and Abū Kalbah, one of the Banū Qays,[895] reproached those two poets strongly for this:

May you be mutilated, O two poets of a people of exalted fame! May your noses be cut off with a saw!
I mean the deaf one (al-aṣamm) and our weak-sighted one (a'shānā) who, when they both come together, do not find help for [defective] hearing from seeing.
If it had not been for the riders of the Lahāzim, who are not feeble and defenseless, they would not have been able to spend the summer [any longer] at Dhū Qār.
We came upon them from their left side, just as those going to water [their beasts] become intermingled with those returning from the water (i.e troops traveling in opposite directions, with the enemy fleeing and ourselves wheeling [1037] round and returning to the battle field).[896]

---

paitidāna, of the Zoroastrians (cf. Bartholomae, Altiranisches Wörterbuch, cols. 830–31), MP padām, NP pandāmah, worn across the mouth in order to avoid contamination with the breath of sacred objects.

893. These verses also in Naqā'iḍ, II, 644–45; Aghāni, XXIV, 77–78.

894 The Lahāzim were a grouping of Bakrī tribes, defined in the Umayyad al-Baṣrah of some eighty years later than this time as the Qays b. Tha'labah and their confederates; the 'Anazah; and the Taymallāt b. Tha'labah and their confederates, the 'Ijl. See al-Ṭabarī, II, 448, tr. Hawting, The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation, XX, The Collapse of Sufyānid Authority and the Coming of the Marwānids, 25–26; cf. Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, II, 27. The term lahāzim is said by the lexicographers to be the plural of lihzimah, "mastoid bone, hinge of the jawbone with the skull," the idea of hardness being transfered to the solidity of the tribal alliance. See Glossarium, p. CDLXXIII; Ullmann, WbKAS, II, Letter lām, Pt. 2, 1516–19; EI[1], s.v. Taimallāt b. Tha'laba (G. Levi Della Vida).

895. Attached by Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 355, to the clan of 'Ukābah b. Qays, part of Murrah of Shaybān. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 141, II, 566.

896. Naqā'iḍ, II, 645, in part quoted, but with additional verses,in Aghānī[3], XXIV, 77.

Abū 'Amr b. al-'Alā' said: When Abū Kalbah's words reached al-A'shā, he commented, "He has spoken truly," and recited verses in extenuation of himself, some of which are:

When a deaf person is linked through a connection with a weak-sighted one, they both wander around distractedly, lost and in distress.
For I am not able to see what he can see, while he is never able to hear my reply.[897]

Al-A'shā recited concerning the day of battle,

There came to us from the Free Ones (Banū al-Aḥrār) a word that was not conformable.
They wanted to hack down the tree of our nobility, but we were defending ourselves against serious events.[898]

He also recited to Qays b. Mas'ūd,

O Qays b. Mas'ūd b. Qays b. Khālid, you are a man in whose youthful vigor the whole of Wā'il[899] places its hopes!
Are you combining in a single year both raiding and journeying abroad? Would that the midwives had drowned Qays [at his birth]![900]

Al-A'shā of the Banū Rabī'ah said,[901]

We stood our ground firmly on the morning of Dhū Qār, when [the enemy] tribes were present there in swarms, having come together to give aid.
They had brought on that occasion a dark-colored [army], an intimidatory host, with closely compacted squadrons of riders, a crushing force,

---

897. al-A'shā, Dīwān, 206, no. 57 vv. 1–2; Naqā'iḍ, II, 645.

898. Dīwān, 204, no. 56, vv. 5–6; Naqā'iḍ, II, 645, with al-ḥakamā for al-khuṭamā at the end of the second verse.

899. That is, Wā'il b. Jadīlah b. Asad b. Rabī'ah, from whom sprang the two great tribes of Bakr and Taghlib. See *EI*², s.v. Rabī'a and Muḍar (H. Kindermann).

900. Dīwān, 128, no. 26 vv. 1–2; Naqā'iḍ, II, 645–46.

901. That is, A'shā Banī Abī Rabī'ah or A'shā Shaybān, 'Abdallāh b. Khārijah, another of the many poets with this sobriquet, numbered at seventeen by the Arabic literary biographers. This al-A'shā was a poet of al-Kūfah and a staunch adherent of the Marwānids, dying ca. 100/718–19. See Nöldeke, trans. 344 n. 6; *EI*², s.v. al-A'shā (ed.).

For a hateful day of battle, until the moment when the shades of its blackness fell away from us, revealing us as warriors with unsheathed swords.
They thereupon turned their backs on us totally,[902] and we only had to ward off Nuʿmān b. Zurʿah.[903]
And we drove away the threatening rain-cloud (ʿāriḍ) of the free ones as if going to water, just as the sand grouse (qaṭā) alight for water at a desert pool with exiguous water.[904]

Mention of Those Vassal Rulers Set over the Desert Frontier of the Arabs at al-Ḥīrah as Appointees of the Monarchs of Persia, after ʿAmr b. Hind

We have already mentioned previously those members of the house of Naṣr b. Rabīʿah who held this power as vassal rulers on [1038] behalf of the monarchs of Persia up to the time of ʿAmr b. Hind's death, and the durations of their respective periods of office as vassal rulers. after ʿAmr b. Hind up to the time when al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir held power.[905]

The person who exercised this office after ʿAmr b. Hind was his [full] brother Qābūs b. al-Mundhir,[906] whose mother was likewise Hind bt. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAmr; he held power for four years, of which eight months fell in the reign of Anūsharwān and three years and four months in the reign of the latter's son Hurmuz.[907] After

902. akta'īnā, also translatable "as if they were completely mutilated," as by Nöldeke, trans. 345.

903. That is, the Taghlibī chief and enemy of the Bakr, who at Khusraw's court advised the course of action that led to the Yawm Dhī Qār; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1030, pp. 359–60 above. According to Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XXIV, 72–73, he escaped from the field of Dhū Qār.

904. Dīwān, 281 no. 16 vv. 1–5.

905. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 833–34, 845–46, 850–54, 858ff., 899–900. 946, 981, 1016–30, pp. 44, 67, 74–82, 87ff., 161–63, 237, 286, 339–59 above.

906. The appearance of this purely Persian name, an Arabized form of Kāwūs (< Avestan Kawi-Usan, see Nöldeke, 345 n. 4; Justi, Namenbuch, 334–46; Mayrhofer, Die altiranischen Namen, nos. 208, 210, 323), among the Lakhmids, is an indication of the strength of Persian cultural influence within the dynasty. See further on this, Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 609ff.

907. On this count, Qābūs would have reigned from 578 or 579 to 582 or 583, since Khusraw Anūsharwān died in 579, but we know that he was ruling a decade or so before then, since he was defeated by the Jafnid/Ghassānid al-Mundhir b. al-

Qābūs b. al-Mundhir there came to power al-Suhrab,[908] then after him the father of al-Nu'mān, al-Mundhir b. al-Mundhir, who held power for four years;[909] then after him, al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir, Abū Qābūs, for twenty-two years, of which seven years and eight months fell in the reign of Hurmuz, son of Anūsharwān, and fourteen years and four months in the reign of Kisrā Abarwīz, son of Hurmuz.[910] Then there held power Iyās b. Qabīṣah al-Ṭā'ī, together with al-Nakhīrajān, for nine years in the reign of Kisrā, son

---

Ḥārith on Ascension Day 570. His four years' reign must have been from 569 or 570 to 573 or 574, i.e., entirely within Anūsharwān's reign, as confirmed by Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 94. See Nöldeke, trans. 345 n. 1; Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 72, 102–106. Rothstein, op. cit., 102, pointed out that what we know of Qābūs's military activities does not confirm Ḥamzah's allegation that he was a weak and ineffectual ruler, and he believed that the contemptuous nickname given to Qābūs of Qaynat al-'Urus (read thus for Ḥamzah's Fitnat al-'Urus), "slavegirl who looks after the bride's dwelling and wedding outfit," stemmed from some satirical poetry aimed at him.

908. As Nöldeke said, trans. 340 n. 1, this man with so typical a Persian name can hardly have been a Lakhmid (despite what has been said in n. 906 above about Persian cultural influence within the Lakhmid house, the name of Suhrab is totally unattested among them) but must have been a Persian official sent out by Anūsharwān during an interregnum between Qābūs's death and the eventual accession of al-Mundhir IV b. al-Mundhir III. According to Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 94, this official (whose name is corruptly written here as F.y.sh.h.r.t) administered al-Ḥīrah for one year only. See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 106–107.

909. Al-Mundhir IV b. al-Mundhir III (also a full brother of 'Amr and Qābūs, since according to Nöldeke, trans. 346 n. 2, a poet cited in the Ḥamāsah of Abū Tammām addresses him as ". . . b. Hind") must in fact have reigned rather more than four years, from ca. 574 to 580. Nöldeke mentioned, 346 n. 1, the apparent reluctance of the Christian 'Ibād of al-Ḥīrah to accept the pagan al-Mundhir as ruler, but Rothstein pointed out that all the Lakhmid rulers with the exception of the last one were pagans, and the fact that al-Mundhir was unable immediately to succeed his brother Qābūs must have had other causes. In the process of al-Mundhir's eventual succession to the throne in al-Ḥīrah, 'Adī's father Zayd b. (?) Ḥammād, Anūsharwān's adviser on Arab affairs, may have played a significant rôle. Al-Mundhir had at one point been involved in fighting with the Jafnids/Ghassānids, but we have no exact details of the circumstances of his death. See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 107.

910. Al-Nu'mān III, who is also found with the kunyah of Abū al-Mundhir and whose mother was the slavegirl Salmā or Sulmā (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1017, p. 341 above), reigned 580–602 as the last of the Lakhmid kings in al-Ḥīrah. See Nöldeke, trans. 347 n. 1; Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 107–19, 142–43. Al-Nu'mān figures frequently in the lives of the poets who frequented his court in the final florescence of Arabic culture at al-Ḥīrah; he was the first and last of his line to become a Nestorian Christian, however nominally, doubtless under the influence of his upbringing in the family circle of 'Adī b. Zayd. See *EI*², s.v. al-Nu'mān (III) b. al-Mundhir (Irfan Shahîd).

of Hurmuz.[911] According to what Hishām b. Muḥammad has asserted, one year and eight months from the beginning of Iyās b. Qabīṣah's tenure of power, the Prophet was sent [by God] on his mission.[912] His successor Āzādhbih, son of [Ādhur] Māhān (?), son of Mihrbundādh, from Hamadhān, held power for seventeen years, of which fourteen years and eight months fell within the time of Kisrā, son of Hurmuz; eight months in the time of Shīrūyah, son of [1039] Kisrā; one year and seven months in the time of Ardashīr, son of Shīrūyah; and one month in the time of Būrān-dukht, daughter of Kisrā.[913] Al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir then held power. He is the one whom the Arabs called al-Gharūr ("the one who deludes, deceives") and who was killed in al-Baḥrayn at the battle of Juwāthā; he held power for eight months until Khālid b. al-Walīd marched on al-Ḥīrah and was the last survivor of the house of Naṣr b. Rabī'ah. Their power crumbled with the collapse of the royal power in Persia.[914]

---

911. Iyās's nine years' of governorship was from 602–11, and this was in partnership with the Persian commander Nakhīrjān (on whom, see n. 377 above). Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 119–20, suggested that this arrangement could have been the prelude to the incorporation of the Lakhmid territories into the Persian empire as one of its provinces.

912. This is almost certainly too early; the Prophet's mab'ath or mission is more probably to be placed in 610 (the call to prophethood, nubuwwah, and his nonpublic ministry), and then with ca. 613 as the date for the risālah or beginning of his public ministry in Mecca. See Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 59.

913. This means a governorship for Āzādhbih of nineteen years if he held the post till the reign of Būrān or Būrān-dukht (r. 630–31). The reading for his father's name is very uncertain. Marquart suggested [Ādhur] Māhān for a completely undotted consonant skeleton, which would correspond with the name in the Byzantine Greeks historians of Adormaanēs, but this was regarded by the editor Nöldeke as not very probable; the text could be Bān.y.ān or numerous other possibilities. See Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCV.

914. This later Lakhmid never reigned in al-Ḥīrah but was raised up by the rebels of al-Baḥrayn during the Riddah wars as one of their leaders, doubtless from the prestige of his ancient name and lineage. He is called in the Muslim sources al-Gharūr, "the treacherous, deceitful one," but is said to have ruefully called himself, when captured by the Muslims, al-Maghrūr, "the deceived one." The accounts of his fate vary: that he was killed at the siege of Juwāthā, the fortress of the 'Abd al-Qays in al-Khaṭṭ (i.e., in al-Baḥrayn); that he was subsequently killed fighting for Musaylimah in al-Yamāmah; and (less probably) that he became a Muslim. See al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 84; al-Ṭabarī, I, 1737, tr. Ismail K. Poonawala, The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation, IX, The Last Years of the Prophet, 95, and I, 1959–61, tr. F. M. Donner, ibid., X, The Conquest of Arabia, 136–38; Nöldeke, trans. 348 n. 1, with other information on the ultimate fate of the Lakhmid line, including that in al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, III, 209–12 = §§ 1071–72, cf.

According to what Hishām [b. Muḥammad] has asserted, the total of the rulers of the house of Naṣr plus their deputies from the 'Ibād and the Persians, was twenty rulers. He related: The total number of years during which they held power was 522 years and eight months.[915]

The Story Returns to the Mention of al-Marūzān, Who Governed Yemen on Behalf of Hurmuz and His Son Abarwīz, and His Successors[916]

There was related to me a narrative going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said: Hurmuz, son of Kisrā, dismissed W.y.n (?)[917] from Yemen and appointed in his stead al-Marūzān. The latter remained in Yemen long enough to have children born to him there and for these to grow to puberty.[918] But then the people

---

Pellat's index, VI, 268, on the encounter of al-Nu'mān's daughter Ḥurqah/Ḥarīqah/Ḥurayqah with Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ after the Arab victory at al-Qādisiyyah.

Al-Shābushtī, Kitāb al-diyārāt, 244–46, mentions the Dayr Hind al-Ṣughrā at al-Ḥīrah, which Hind, the daughter of al-Nu'mān, is said to have built and to have stayed there herself as a nun (mutarahhibah) until her death; cf. also the editor Gūrgīs 'Awwād's dhayl, 388–90, with information from other sources on the convent and on Hind, and Fiey, L'Assyrie chrétienne, III, 215–17. According to the Anonymus Guidi, tr. 9, the Catholicos Īshō'yabh II was buried there by Hind when he died. According to the later geographer al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, II, 604–607, Hind and Ḥurqah/Ḥarīqah/Ḥurayqah were the same person (Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 95, makes them two separate persons and mentions a third daughter, '.n.f.q.y.r [?]), and al-Bakrī quotes Abū al-Faraj [al-Iṣfahānī] that the tribes of both Hind and her father al-Nu'mān were visible, side by side, in the Dayr Hind al-Awwal (= al-Ṣughrā) during the time of Hārūn al-Rashīd (i.e., ca. A.D. 800). Fiey, op. cit., III, 216 n. 4, suggested that Ḥurqah, etc., was this princess's pagan name before the adoption of Christianity by her father and herself. Concerning Khālid's march on al-Ḥīrah, see Musil, The Middle Euphrates, 283–92.

915. Nöldeke, trans. 349 n. 1, basing himself on the figures for each reign in the corrected text of Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī's Ta'rīkh, found this a remarkably accurate computation.

916. From this point onward, there resumes the story from Ibn al-Kalbī on events in Yemen under Persian rule broken off by al-Ṭabarī at I, 988, p. 294 above, and then on the end of Khusraw Abarwēz's reign and the rule of his successors.

917. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 988, p. 294 above.

918. Such children, born of Persian fathers who were soldiers or officials during the half-century or so of Persian dominance in Yemen, and local Arab mothers, came to form the so-called Abnā' or "Sons." The virtual collapse of the Sāsānid empire in 628 left these Abnā' and other surviving representatives of Persian power in Yemen remote and isolated from their homeland with virtually no hope of human replenishments or material help from Persia. Hence when Muḥammad was extending his power into the more distant parts of the Arabian peninsula, the of one of the mountains of Yemen called al-Maṣāni'[919] rebelled against him and refused to hand over to him the land tax. Al-Maṣāni' is a long mountain, difficult of access, with another mountain adjacent to it with a plain that is not very wide lying between them; moreover, no one can possibly conceive in his mind the idea of climbing up to it. Al-Marūzān proceeded to al-Maṣāni', and when he arrived there he perceived that there was no way up to the mountain except via a single way of access which a [1040] man could defend single handed.

When al-Marūzān saw that there was no way for him to reach it, he climbed up the mountain which faced the people of al-Maṣāni''s fortress, and looked for the narrowest gap between it and the mountain he himself was on, with nothing but empty space stretching down below him. He realized that the only way of takng the fortress was from that point. So he ordered his troops to form themselves into two ranks and then all to shout out to him with one great shout. He spurred on his horse, it galloped on with all its force and then he hurled it forward and it jumped across the chasm, and lo and behold, he was on the top of the fortress. When the Ḥimyarites saw him and what he had done, they exclaimed, "This man is a '.y.m!"—'.y.m meaning in Ḥimyarite "devil."[920] Then he herded them together roughly, spoke to them in Persian and ordered them to place each other in shackles. He brought

---

Abnā' were inclined to come to terms with the Prophet, with their leader, the governor Bādhān or Bādham (see n. 609 above) recorded as submitting and becoming a Muslim in 10/631. See EIr, s.v. Abnā' (C. E. Bosworth); *EI*² Suppl. s.v. Bādhām, Bādhān (Bosworth).

919. Literally, "the constructions," in this case, fortifications. According to Nöldeke, trans. 350 n. 1, the Paris ms. of this part of al-Ṭabarī's text has a remark identifying al-Maṣāni' with the mountain al-D.l.' and the town of Kawkabān. The plateau and mountain area of al-Maṣāni' and the Jabal Dila' (this last often mentioned by al-Hamdānī, Ṣifat jazīrat al-'Arab, 223, 231, 234, etc.) are in fact still known as such and lie to the west-northwest of Ṣan'ā', with the ancient town, now a provincial capital, of Kawkabān located there. See *EI*² s.v. Kawkabān. 4 (A. Grohmann).

920. This mysterious word is not so far attested in South Arabian. Nöldeke, trans. 350 n. 2, cited the lexicographers al-Jawharī and Nashwān al-Ḥimyarī that it meant "a variety of serpent" and adduced Hebr. 'ēmāh, "something terrifying, frightful." He further suggested that there might be a connection of the word with the 'Emīm, the mythical giants of the land of Moab mentioned in Gen. xiv. 5 and Deut. ii. 10–11; but this is pure speculation, based on what is probably chance resemblance of words.

them all down from their fortress, killing one part of them and enslaving others. He wrote to Kisrā, son of Hurmuz, telling him what he had done. The king marveled at his achievement and wrote back: "Appoint as your deputy whomever you will, and come to me!"

He related: Now al-Marūzān had two sons, one of whom, called Khurrakhusrah, was very fond of Arabic and could recite poetry in it,[921] while the other was a cavalryman who spoke Persian and lived in the fashion of a dihqān. Al-Marūzān now appointed his son Khurrakhusrah—Khurrakhusrah being the dearest to him of his sons—as his deputy over Yemen, and traveled onward until, when he was in some region of the Arab lands, he died. He was then placed in a sarcophagus and this was carried along until it was finally brought to Kisrā. The latter ordered that sarcophagus to be placed in his treasury and caused to be inscribed on it "In this sarcophagus lies so-and-so, who did such-and-such," giving the story of what he did at the two mountains.[922] News of Khurrakhusrah's adoption of Arab ways (ta'arrub), his relating of Arabic poetry, and his entirely Arab education reached Kisrā, so he dismissed him and appointed as governor Bādhān, who was in fact the last of the Persian governors to be sent out to Yemen.[923] [1041]

Kisrā became puffed up with vainglory because of the vast amount of wealth and all kinds of jewels, utensils, equipment, and horses he had accumulated. He had conquered so many of the lands of his enemies. Events all came together to aid him, and he was granted good fortune in his ventures. However, he was filled with conceit and boastfulness, and was horribly avaricious; he grudged and envied people for their wealth and possessions.[924] He appointed a certain man from the local people ('ilj,[925] i.e., one of

921. An example of the assimilation of the Abnā' to their local environment if, as is possible, Khurrakhusrah had an Arab mother.

922. The story of al-Marūzān's successful attack on al-Maṣāni' and his eventual death and burial is given in Ibn Qutaybah, 'Uyūn al-akhbār, I, 178–79, on the basis of the author's readings in the "books of the Persians."

923. The date of Bādhān's appointment is unknown, but as noted in n. 918 above, he remained in Yemen till his conversion to Islam in 10/631.

924. Nöldeke, trans. 351 n. 1, gives a balanced assessment of Abarwēz's character and achievements, concluding that "In sum, Khusraw II is to be considered much more a weak than a bad man."

925. See for this term, n. 210 above.

the Nabataean population of Iraq) called Farrukhzādh, son of Sumayy,[926] from a a village called Khandaq[927] in the ṭassūj of Bih-Ardashīr (text, Bahurasīr), to take charge of collecting the arrears of taxation (al-baqāyā).[928] This latter person imposed on the people all sorts of evil afflictions, ill-treated them and tyrannized them, confiscating their wealth unlawfully on the plea of extracting the arrears of land tax. He thereby rendered them disaffected, their means of life became straitened, and Kisrā and his rule became hateful to them.

There was related to me a narrative going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said: This Kisrā Abarwīz had accumulated more wealth than any other monarch. His riders reached as far as Constantinople and Ifrīqiyah.[929] He spent the winter in al-Madā'in and the summer in the region between al-Madā'in and Hamadhān.[930] It was said that he had twelve thousand women and slave-girls, 999 elephants, and fifty thousand riding beasts comprising finely bred horses, horses of lesser breed, and mules. He was the most avaricious of mankind regarding jewels, vessels, and the like. Another source, not Hishām, has stated that he had in his palace three thousand women with whom he had sexual relations and thousands of slave girls employed as servants, for 926. Nöldeke, trans. 352 n. 1, implied—as seems reasonable in regard to an Aramaic-speaking "Nabataean" of Iraq—that Sumayy was a Semitic name, adducing the name of the Jewish prophet S.m.y who met Zoroaster at Balkh, according to al-Ṭabarī, I, 681, tr. M. Perlmann. The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation, IV, The Ancient Kingdoms, 76–77.

927. Literally, "trench, ditch," a place that cannot be identified exactly but which, if it was in the vicinity of Bih-Ardashīr or Seleucia, lay to the west of al-Madā'in (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 819, p. 15 and the references in n. 58 above).

928. On this fiscal and administrative term, see n. 253 above.

929. In early Islamic geographical usage, this region (< Latin Africa, perhaps from the Afri, an indigenous people of the region, or the later Punic-Cartaginian ethnic mixture there, see *EI*², s.v. Ifrīḳiya (M. Talbi), corresponded to modern Tunisia, but is doubtless used in this context in a looser, wider sense of "North Africa" in general. These far-flung raids of Khusraw's are, in any case, pure legend.

930. That is, in that part of the Zagros chain which now forms southern Kurdistan. As Nöldeke noted, trans 353 n. 1, it was ancient practice for rulers, from Achaemenid times onward, to spend the winter on the Mesopotamian plain but to move up to the drier, less torrid Iranian plateau for the summer. It was actually Hamadhān which, some four or five centuries later, the Seljuq sultans preferred as their usual capital, only visiting Baghdad occasionally and normally leaving a shiḥnah, a military governor, there.

music making and singing, and such. He also had three thousand male servants at his hand, eighty-five hundred riding beasts on which he could travel, 760 elephants, and twelve thousand mules for conveying his baggage.[931] He gave orders for the building of fire temples and appointed for them twelve thousand hērbadhs for [1042] chanting the Zoroastrian religious formulae (li-al-zamzamah).[932]

In the eighteenth year of his reign,[933] Kisrā ordered the sums collected as land tax from his territories and its associated taxes (tawābi') and other sources of income, to be counted up. It was reported back to him that the amount of silver coinage (al-wariq)[934] collected from the land tax and other sources of income in that year was 420 million mithqāls [in weight], which, on the basis of seven mithqāls [in weight equaling ten dirhams], is the amount corresponding to six hundred million dirhams (i.e., silver coins). He ordered all this to be transfered to a treasury he had built at the city of Ctesiphon and had called Bahār ḥ.f.r.d (?) Khusraw, together with other sums of money he possessed, comprising coinage of Fayrūz, son of Yazdajird, and Qubādh, son of Fayrūz, amounting to twelve thousand purses (badrah), each purse containing four thousand mithqāls in coinage,[935] the whole

---

931. Substantially the same figures in Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 53, but with an increased figure of six thousand guards (ḥaras).

932. zamzamah, "humming, mumbling," was the term applied by the Arabs to the liturgical chanting of the Zoroastrian priests and religious scholars or hērbeds. Nöldeke, trans. 353 n. 3, gave the MP and Syriac terms for this chanting, wāz and reṭnā respectively, and noted such still-surviving memorials of Khusraw Abarwēz's palace building as the Ṭāq/Aywān-i Kisrā (see n. 666 above). More precisely, so Mr F .C. de Blois points out, wāz, and perhaps zamzamah, refers to the Zoroastrian practice of speaking in a subdued voice while eating.

On the Zoroastrian clergy in general, see Nöldeke, trans. 450–52, Excursus 3, and on the hērbed specifically—hērbed being the oldest religious title attested from the Sāsānid period, as being that of Kerdēr, see n. 122 above—see Chaumont, "Recherches sur le clergé zoroastrien. Le Hērbad," 55–80.

933. This would be the year 607–608.

934. Nöldeke, trans. 354 n. 2, detailed and discussed the information in al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 464, from Ibn al-Muqaffa' on the collecting of sources of revenue in the Persian empire and adduces the continuity of practice as shown, e.g., in the travel narrative of the Huguenot Sir John Chardin in seventeenth-century Ṣafawid Persia.

935. Conventionally, a badrah in early Islamic times contained ten thousand dirhams; but on the equivalence of seven mithqāls in weight equaling ten dirhams, these Sāsānid purses contained 5,720 dirhams. See for the mithqāl, n. 836 above, and for wariq = "silver coinage," *EI*² s.v. Wariḳ (M.L. Bates) of this totaling forty-eight million mithqāls, the equivalent according to the proportion seven [to ten] of 68,571,42[8] plus a half and a third of an eighth of a dirham. In addition, there were various kinds of jewels, garments, and the like, whose grand total God alone could enumerate.

Kisrā treated people with contempt and regarded them with [1043] scorn in a manner no righteous and discerning monarch should adopt. His insolent pride and lack of respect for God reached the point that he gave orders to the man in charge of his personal guard at court, called Zādhān Farrūkh,[936] that he should kill every person held captive in any of his prisons; these persons were counted up, and their number reached thirty-six thousand. However, Zādhān Farrūkh did not take any steps to kill them but gave instructions for a delay in implementing Kisrā's command regarding them, adducing various reasons, which he enumerated to Kisrā. Kisrā incurred for himself the hatred of the subjects of his kingdom for various reasons. First, his contemptuous treatment of them and his belittling of the great men of state. Second, his giving the barbarian (al-ʿilj) Farrukhānzādh, son of Sumayy, power over them. Third, his command that all the prisoners should be slain. Fourth, his intention to put to death the troops returning from their defeat at the hands of Hiraql (Heraclius) and the Byzantines. Hence a group of the great men of state went to ʿAqr Bābil,[937] where were Shīrūyah (text, "Shīrī"), son of Abarwīz, and his brothers, and where the king had appointed tutors to educate them. [He had also appointed] cavalry guards (asāwirah) to prevent them leaving that place. They now brought out Shīrūyah and

936. A Persian financial official, Zādhān-farrukh, with the nickname of "the one-eyed one," later figures in the Islamic historians' accounts of the naql al-dīwān in Iraq, i.e., the change from Persian to Arabic as the administrative language of the finance department, effected by the caliph ʿAbd al-Malik's governor of Iraq and the East, al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf al-Thaqafī. See, e.g., al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 300–301; al-Jahshiyārī, Kitāb al-wuzarā' wa-al-kuttāb, 38–39; M. Sprengling, "From Persian to Arabic," 185–90, 194–97. Of course, this Zādhān-farrukh lived some three generations after Khusraw's commander of the guard, and it is unknown whether there was any family connection between the two men. On the name Zādhān-farrukh "the fortunate one," see Justi, Namenbuch, 377.

937. The ruins of "the palace" (ʿaqr) of Babel lay just to the north of the later Islamic town of al-Ḥillah and slightly to the east of the Sūrā canal. See Le Strange, Lands, 72; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 150.

entered the town of Bih Ardashīr (text, "Bahurasīr") by night. They released all those in the prisons there, and these freed captives were joined by the fugitive troops whom Kisrā had intended to put to death. They all shouted, "Qubādh (i.e., Shīrūyah) for supreme ruler (shāhanshāh)!" The next morning they proceeded to the open space before Kisrā['s palace]. His palace guards took to their heels, and Kisrā himself fled, in great terror, unaccompanied by anyone, to one of the gardens adjacent to his palace called the Bāgh al-Hinduwān. But he was sought out and then apprehended on the day Ādhar of the month Ādhar,[938] and imprisoned in the palace of government (dār al-mamlakah). Shīrūyah entered that [1044] palace, and the leading figures gathered round him and proclaimed him king. He sent a message to his father bitterly upbraiding him for his conduct.[939]

There was related to me a narrative going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad, who said: Kisrā Abarwīz had eighteen sons, the eldest of whom was Shahriyār, whom Shīrīn had adopted as a son. The astrologers told Kisrā, "One of your sons will himself have a son, at whose hands this throne will come to ruin and this kingdom be destroyed. The distinguishing sign of this son will be a defect in a certain part of his body." For that reason, Kisrā thereupon kept his sons separated from all women, and they remained for a long time with no access to a woman. At last, Shahriyār complained to Shīrīn about this, sending to her a message in which he complained about his lust for women and asked her to provide him with a woman. If he could have no woman, he would kill himself. She sent a message back to him: "I can't manage to get women into your presence, except a woman of no consequence who wouldn't be suitable for you to touch." He replied, "I don't care who she is, as long as she is a woman!" So she sent to him a 938. Nöldeke, trans. 357 n. 3, noted that in Khusraw's rejoinder to Shērōy's's charges against him, the previous day, Day [ba Ādhar], is named, and that this date would correspond to 25 February 628. He further noted, ibid., 357 n. 2, cf. 381 n. 3, that Armenian historians, among others, mention that it had been prophesied to Khusraw that he would die in India, and this duly occurred in the "house of the Indians."

939. The Christian Greek, Syriac, and Armenian sources on the palace revolution that overthrew Khusraw and brought Shīruyah to power are discussed at length in Nöldeke, trans. 357 n. 4, to which can now be added the Anonymus Guidi, tr. 29–30.

maiden whom she was wont to employ for being cupped. According to what is asserted, this maiden was the daughter of one of the Persian nobles, but Shīrīn had become angry with her for some reason or another and had consigned her to the ranks of the cuppers.[940] When Shīrīn introduced the maiden into Shahriyār's presence, he immediately leapt on her, and she became pregnant with Yazdajird. Shīrīn gave orders regarding her, and she was kept carefully confined until she gave birth. The fact of the child's birth was kept secret for five years.

At that point, Shīrīn noticed that Kisrā had acquired a tenderness toward young children, at this time when he was growing old, so she said to him, "O king, would it gladden your heart to see a child of one of your own sons, even though this might entail something untoward?" He replied, "[Yes,] I don't care [what might happen]." She gave commands for Yazdajird to be perfumed and decked out with fine clothes, and she had him brought into Kisrā's presence, saying, "This is Yazdajird, son of Shahriyār!" Kisrā sum-[1045] moned him, clasped him to his breast, kissed him, yearned toward him, and displayed great affection for him; and from then onward he kept Yazdajird close to him. One day, the boy was playing in his presence when he remembered what had been foretold, so he summoned him, had his clothes taken off, inspected him from the front and the back, and perceived clearly the defect (or, "the defect was clearly apparent," istabāna al-naqṣ) in one of his hips. He was now filled with anger and distress, and dragged the boy off in order to dash him to the ground. But Shīrīn clung to him and besought Kisrā by God not to kill him, telling Kisrā, "If this is something that is going to befall this state, then there is no possibility of changing it." He replied. "This boy is the agent of ill-fortune about whom I was informed (i.e., by the astrologers), so get rid of him. I don't want ever to see him again!" Shīrīn therefore gave orders for the boy to be sent to Sijistān; but others say that, on the contrary, he was in the Sawād with his guardians at a village called Khumāniyah.[941]

940. On Shīrīn, see n. 729 above. In Islamic times at least, phlebotomy, the function of the cupper, was regarded as particularly menial and degrading, doubtless from the fact that such bodily services were usually performed by slaves. See *EI*² Suppl., s.v. Faṣṣād, Ḥadjdjām (M. A. J. Beg).

941. The story of Yazdagird's birth and upbringing is doubtless a popular tale

The Persians rose up against Kisrā and killed him, aided by his son Shīrūyah, son of Maryam, the Byzantine woman [al-Rūmiyyah].[942] The duration of his [i.e., Kisrā's] power was thirty-eight years.[943] After the elapsing of thirty-two years, five months, and fifteen days of his rule, there took place the Prophet's migration from Mecca to Medina.[944]

[Qubādh II Shīrūyah]

After him there succeeded to the royal power Shīrūyah,[945] whose [regnal] name was Qubādh [II].

He was the son of [Kisrā II] Abarwīz, son of Hurmuz [IV], son of Kisrā [I] Anūsharwān. It has been mentioned that the great men of state from the Persians came into Shīrūyah's presence when he had become king and after he had imprisoned his father, and said to him, "It is not fitting that we should have two kings: either you kill Kisrā, and we will be your faithful and obedient servants, or we shall depose you and give our obedience to him just as we [1046] that endeavored to account for the eventual disaster that overtook Yazdagird III, the last of his line to rule in Persia, and the Sāsānid dynasty as a whole.

---

Khumāniyah must be the Humāniyyah or Humayniyyah on the west bank of the Tigris below al-Madā'in and just below the confluence of that river and the Kūthā canal, a place which later became of some importance in early 'Abbāsid times. See Nöldeke, "Zur orientalischen Geographie," 94 n. 1; Le Strange, Lands, 37.

942. See on the question of Maryam al-Rūmiyyah and the historicity or otherwise of her marriage with Khusraw Abarwēz, al-Ṭabarī, I, 999, p. 312 and n. 729 above.

943. From the beginning of his first reign, Khusraw II Abarwēz ruled for thirty-eight years, 590–628. His name appears on his coins as ḤWSRW. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 67–68, 386–90, 484–91, Plates XX–XXI, Tables XXVIII–XXX; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 53–54, Table XII, Plate 13; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 152–58; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 237–38.

The Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 665; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 190–96; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 84–107; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 214–32 = §§ 634–53; idem, Tanbīh, 39, 102, 155–56, tr. 62–63, 146, 213–16; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 53; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 472–81, 492–94. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 274–301, 304–309, 325–32. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 448–96; Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 234–35, 239; idem, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 164–70, 178.

944. This is very accurate, given that the Hijrah took place in Rabī' I of the year 1/September 622.

945. Properly Shēröy < shēr "lion," with a hypocoristic ending of a type familiar in MP and NP and Arabized as -awayh(i). See on this ending Nöldeke, "Persische Studien. I. Persische Koseformen," 388–423. On the name Shēröy/Shīrūyah in general, see Nöldeke, trans. 361 n. 2; Justi, Namenbuch, 297.

always did before you secured the royal power." These words struck fear into Shīrūyah's heart and crushed him. He ordered Kisrā to be transported from the palace of government to the house of a man called Mārasfand.[946] Kisrā was set on a common nag, with his head covered, and conveyed to that house escorted by a detachment of troops. On the way, they brought him past a shoemaker who was sitting in a booth that led out on to the road. When the shoemaker saw the detachment of cavalry troops escorting a single rider with a muffled head, he realized that the covered-up figure was Kisrā and he struck at him with a shoemaker's last. One of the troops escorting Kisrā turned on the shoemaker, unsheathed his sword, cut off the shoemaker's head, and then rejoined his comrades.[947]

When Kisrā was installed in Mārasfand's house, Shīrūyah assembled together all the great men of state and the members of leading families who were at court and addressed them: "We have thought fit, in the first place to send an envoy to our father the king setting forth all his evil actions in his government and drawing his attention to various aspects of these." Then he sent for a man from Ardashīr Khurrah, who was called Asfādh Jushnas and who, because of his position as head of the [royal] secretaries,[948] was in charge of governing the kingdom. Shīrūyah said to him, "Off you go to our father the king and tell him in our name that we have not been the cause of the unhappy state into which he has fallen, nor is any member of the subject population responsible, but God has condemned you to His divine retribution in return for your evil conduct. [First,] your crime against your father Hurmuz, your violence toward him, depriving him of the royal power, blinding his eyes, killing him in a most horrible fashion, and all the great burden of guilt you have brought upon yourself by injur-

946. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 107, has for this name H.r.s.f.t.h.

947. Nöldeke, trans. 362 n. 2, noted that, in Firdawsī, the shoemaker often serves as the outspoken representative of the masses, sometimes with comic touches; even so, he is not allowed here to mock and slight the fallen monarch.

948. Correcting the text's ra'īs al-katībah [which would mean something like "head of the cavalry of the military host"; katībah = "detachment of cavalry"] in the light of the parallel passage in al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 107, who has ra'īs kuttāb al-rasā'il "head of the secretaries responsible for official correspondence." Cf. also Nöldeke, trans. 362 n. 3.

ing him. [Second,] your bad treatment of us, your sons, by keeping us from all access to and participation in good things, and from everything which would have brought us ease of life, enjoyment, and happiness. [Third,] your bad treatment of those whom you condemned to perpetual imprisonment, to the point that they [1047] suffered hardship from extreme deprivation, wretched living conditions and food, and separation from their homelands, wives, and children. [Fourth,] your lack of consideration for the women whom you appropriated for yourself; your failure to show them any love or affection and to send them back to live with those men by whom they already had children and progeny; and your keeping them confined in your palace against their wills.[949] [Fifth,] what you have inflicted on your subjects generally in levying the land tax and in treating them with harshness and violence. [Sixth,] your amassing a great amount of wealth, which you exacted from the people with great brutality so that you drove them to consider your rule hateful and thereby brought them into affliction and deprivation. [Seventh,] your stationing the troops for long periods along the frontiers with the Byzantines and on other frontiers, thereby separating them from their families.[950] [Eighth,] your treacherous behavior toward Mawrīq (Maurice), the king of the Byzantines and your ingratitude for his praiseworthy actions on your behalf, in that he sought refuge with you, exerted himself laudably for you, protected you from the malevolence of your enemies, and increased the fame of your name by giving to you in marriage the noblest and most precious in his sight of his daughters. Moreover, you regarded your rightful obligations to him lightly and refused to grant his request of you regarding the return of the wooden [True] Cross, to which neither you nor any of your fellow countrymen had any entitlement or need.[951] You know

949. Nöldeke, trans. 364 n. 2, noted that this complaint about the seizure of married women for the ruler's harem has the ring of authenticity.

950. For this complaint, in early Islamic times technically known as tajmīr, see n. 151 above.

951. When Shērōy brought the lengthy war with Heraclius to an end, the return of the True Cross to Jerusalem was one of the provisions of the peace treaty. The Byzantine emperor brought it back to the Holy City personally, but the date of his visit is notoriously difficult to ascertain and has been much discussed. The restoration of the Cross was subsequently celebrated on 14 September 629, but the city this well [now]. If you have explanations or exculpations to adduce to us and to the subjects, then bring them forward; if you don't have any, then show your contrition swiftly to God and return to Him, until we announce our intentions concerning you."[952]

Asfādh Jushnas committed to his mind this message to Kisrā from Shīrūyah and set off from Shīrūyah's court in order to convey it to him. When he reached the place where Kisrā was imprisoned, he found a man called Jīlinūs (Jālīnūs), the commander of the guard who had been entrusted with keeping ward over Kisrā, [1048] seated there.[953] He held conversation with Jīlinūs for a while, and then Asfādh Jushnas asked him for permission to go into Kisrā in order to deliver a message from Shīrūyah. Jīlinūs went back and drew the curtain that veiled access to Kisrā, went into his presence, and said to him, "May God grant you long life![954] Asfādh Jushnas is at the gate, has recounted that the king Shīrūyah has sent him to you with a message, and now seeks an audience with you. So decide according to your will what you wish to do." Kisrā was, according to some authorities, recaptured in a March, probably March 630. See Nöldeke, trans. 365 n. 2, 392 n. 1; Bury, A History of the Later Roman Empire from Arcadius to Irene, II, 244–45; N. H. Baynes, "The Restoration of the Cross at Jerusalem," 287–99; Schick, The Christian Communities of Palestine from Byzantine to Islamic Rule, 50.

---

952. Nöldeke, trans. 363 n. 1, regarded this denunciation and Khusraw's rejoinder, with their fullest extant texts given here by al-Ṭabarī, as artistic renderings of an exchange of complaints and justifications composed by someone close to the actual events yet writing after the deaths of Khusraw, Shērōy, and the latter's son Ardashīr during the reign of Khusraw's grandson Yazdagird III, when the Sāsānid house was still reigning in Persia. Al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 196, has only a brief reference to Shērōy's risālah ghalīẓah, "harsh letter," but al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 107–10, has quite a lengthy version.

953. Jālīnūs or Jālinūs (whose name looks Greek rather than Persian; possibly he was a Christian and had adopted a Christian name in addition to an unknown, purely Persian one) is described by al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 107, as ra'īs al-jund al-mustamītah, "commander of the troops who seek death," the ruler's personal guard (in Middle Persian, the gyān-abespārān, "those who sacrifice their lives"). He was later to be a leading general of the Persian troops combating the Arab invaders of Iraq and fell at al-Qādisiyyah. See al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 258, 260; al-Ṭabarī, I, 2169–72, 2174, etc., tr. Khalid Yahya Blankenship, The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation, XI, The Challenge to the Empires, 183–86, 188, etc., and I, 2357, tr. Yohanan Friedmann, ibid., XII, The Battle of al-Qādisiyyah and the Conquest of Syria and Palestine, 141; Nöldeke, trans. 365 n. 2.

954. As Nöldeke noted, trans. 366 n. 2, the imprisoned Khusraw Abarwēz is treated throughout as a monarch, with the correct etiquette of address observed, so that Jālīnūs adresses him with the formula anōšag buwād! "may he be immortal!"

smiled and said in a joking manner, "O Jīlinūs, son of Asfādh (Jīlinūs Asfādhān), what you say is contrary to what intelligent persons say. For if it is the case that the message you have mentioned is from the king Shīrūyah, then, in the face of his royal power, it is not for us to grant permission to enter. If we do have authority for granting permission to enter or to exclude, then Shīrūyah is not king. But the relevant aphorism here is what is said, 'God wills a thing, and it is; the king commands a thing, and it is put into execution.'[955] So let Asfādh Jushnas enter and deliver the message he bears."

When Jīlinūs heard this speech, he went out from Kisrā's presence, took Asfādh Jushnas's hand, and said to him, "Arise, and come into Kisrā's presence, in a correct manner." Asfādh Jushnas accordingly stood up, called for one of the attendants accompanying him, and handed him the robe he [ordinarily] wore, pulled out a clean, white cloth from his sleeve and used it to wipe his face.[956] Then he went into Kisrā's presence. When he came face to face with him, he fell down before him in prostration. Kisrā ordered him to get up. Hence he arose and did obeisance before Kisrā. Kisrā was seated on three Khusrawānī rugs woven with gold, which had been laid on a silken carpet, and he was lolling back on three cushions likewise woven with gold. In his hand he had a yellow, well-rounded quince. When he noticed Asfādh Jushnas, he sat up in a cross-legged position and placed the quince on the place [1049] where he had been sitting. Because it was perfectly round and because of the smoothness of the cushion on the seat, plumped out with its stuffing, it rolled down from the topmost of the three cushions on to the upper one of the three rugs, then from the rug to the carpet, finally rolling off the carpet to the ground, where it rolled some distance, becoming covered with dirt. Asfādh Jushnas

955. Echoing frequent Qur'ānic phraseology, e.g., in XXXVI, 82; XL, 70/68.

956. The text has shushtaqah for this cloth. The Glossarium, p. CCCXI, has shustaqah and adduces the commentary to Abū Dulaf al-Khazrajī's Qaṣīdah sāsāniyyah as given in al-Tha'ālibī's Yatīmat al-dahr; but the word here should be read as suftajahu "his financial draft." See Bosworth, The Mediaeval Islamic Underworld, The Banū Sāsān in Arabic Society and Literature, II, The Arabic Jargon Texts, Arabic text 7, comm. v. 34, tr. 193. In any case, it seems that the action here is not that of wiping the face clean but of placing the pandāmah over the mouth to prevent pollution of a sacred object, in this case, the king's person. See Nöldeke, trans. 367 n. 1, and n. 892 above.

picked it up and rubbed it with his sleeve, moving forward to present it to Kisrā. But the latter gestured to Asfādh Jushnas to keep it away from him, and told him, "Take it away from me!" So Asfādh Jushnas laid it on the ground at the carpet's edge, fell back, stood in his old place, and did obeisance before Kisrā by putting his hand on his breast. Kisrā lowered his head and then uttered the aphorism appropriate to the incident: "When one encounters adversity, there is no means or device (ḥīlah) for making things go forward again, and when things do go well, there is no means or device which is able to reverse them. These two things happen in turn, but means and devices are lacking in both cases." Then he said to Asfādh Jushnas, "Thus this quince has rolled down and fallen where it did, and become smeared with dirt. It is for us an announcement, as it were, of the message you have been charged with bringing, what you are going to do with it, and its results. For indeed, the quince, which denotes what is good, fell from the heights to the depths; it did not stay on the coverings of our seat but speedily fell to the ground, ending up far away and covered in dirt.[957] All this happening indicates a bad omen, that the glory of the monarchs has passed into the hands of the common masses, that we have been deprived of royal power, and that it will not remain long in the hands of our successors before it passes to persons who are not of royal stock (min ahl al-mamlakah). Now get on with it, and speak about the message you have been charged with delivering and the words with which you have been pro-[1050] vided!" Asfādh Jushnas then began to retail the message Shīrūyah had charged him to deliver, not leaving out a single word and getting the sequence of its phrases exactly right.

Kisrā made the following answer to that message: Convey back to Shīrūyah, the short-lived one,[958] [the message] from me that it is not fitting for an intelligent person that he should spread around about anyone [tales of] venial sins and minor misdeeds without having thoroughly convinced himself of their truth and being completely certain in his own mind about them, let alone the gross sins and crimes that you have spread around and published abroad, and that you have imputed to us and laid at our door. Moreover, the person who can best repel with contumely a sinner and condemn the perpetrator of a crime is the one who has kept himself free from all sins and crimes. O man who will be short reigned, O man of little understanding, even if we were guilty of what you have imputed to us, it is unfitting that you should spread it abroad and upbraid us. For if you do not recognize the defects you yourself possess, since you have spread them around concerning us as you have done, you should be fully aware of your own defects. So cut short your blaming us and finding fault with us, since your ill-chosen speech only increases the public awareness of your own ignorance and lack of judgment.

957. It appears from this that the quince was regarded by the Persians as an emblem of good fortune (perhaps not uninfluenced by the closeness in form of bih, "good," and bihī, "quince" = the Arabic safarjalah used here in al-Ṭabarī's text); cf. Glossarium, p. CCXCII. The significance of the quince subsequently became the focus of a minor academic controversy among German orientalists; see the details in Muth, Die Annalen von aṭ-Ṭabarī im Spiegel der europäischen Bearbeitungen, 58–59.

958. Prophetic of Shērōy's brief period of power and his early death through epidemic disease or, according to one report, by poisoning, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1061, p. 399, and n. 984 below.

O one devoid of reason, deficient in knowledge! If there is any real basis for your efforts in showing us up publicly as guilty of sins which deserve death for us and you have some real proof for it, then [you should remember that] the judges among your own religious community (i.e., the Zoroastrian one) prevent the son of a man who has merited death from assuming his father's position and keep him from contact with the best people, from sitting with them and from mingling with them, except in a small number of places, much less making him king. Furthermore, we have [1051] attained—praise be to God and [thanks for] His beneficence!—through our upright behavior and intentions and in our relationship with God, with the adherents of our religious community and faith, and with the whole group of our sons, a position in which we have in no way fallen short nor deserved any proof of guilt or any reproach. We shall explain the situation regarding the sins you have imputed to us and the crimes you have laid at our door, without any attempt on our part to diminish anything in the arguments we have put forward and the proofs we have adduced, if only so that you might acquire fuller knowledge of your own lack of judgment, absence of reason and the evil nature of your actions.

[First,] regarding what you have mentioned in regard to our father Hurmuz, our rejoinder here is that evil and malevolent persons had incited him against us, to the point that he grew suspicious of us and was carried away by hatred and rancor against us. We perceived his revulsion from us and his bad opinion of us, and we accordingly became fearful of remaining in his proximity, so removed ourself from his court out of fear from him and made our way to Azerbaijan. By that time, the royal power had become dissolved and split apart, as is well known. As soon as we received news of what had happened to him, we set out from Azerbaijan for his court. But the false-hearted (munāfiq) Bahrām [Chūbīn] assailed us with a great army of rebels, whose conduct merited death, threw off his obedience, and drove us out of the kingdom. We sought asylum in the land of the Byzantines, and came back from there with troops and war materials, and made war on him. As a result, he fled before us and ended up in the land of the Turks, with destruction and perdition, as has been generally known among people.

Finally, when we had achieved firm control of the realm and our authority was made firm and, with the help of God, we had dispeled for our subjects all the afflictions and calamities, on the brink of which they had been, we then said [to ourselves], "One of the best courses of action with which we can inaugurate our ruling policy and begin our royal power is to take vengeance for our [1052] father, to secure requital for him and to kill all those involved in [shedding] his blood." Then, when we had firmly accomplished all our intentions regarding that and had attained what we were aiming at, we turned our attention to other aspects of the governance of the kingdom. So we put to death everyone who had a share in [shedding] his blood or who had schemed and plotted against him.

[Second,] regarding what you have mentioned concerning our sons, our rebuttal here is that all the sons whom we brought into the world, with the exception of those whom God chose to take back unto Himself, were perfectly sound in the limbs of their bodies. But we appointed for you guards and restrained you from getting mixed up in things that did not concern you, out of a desire to prevent you from doing harm to the land and the subjects. So we established for you ample means for your living expenses, such as for your clothing, for your riding mounts, and for everything you needed, as you well know. In respect to you (i.e., Shīrūyah) in particular, the story is that the astrologers had decreed from your horoscope (kitāb mawlidika) that you would bring evil upon us, or that evil would happen through your agency. Nevertheless, we did not order you to be put to death but put a seal on the document indicating your horoscope and handed it over to our consort Shīrīn's keeping. In confirmation of the fact that we placed full credence in that document with the indication [of the horoscope], it happened that Furumīshā, king of India, wrote to us in the thirty-sixth year of our reign, having sent a delegation of his subjects to us.[959] He wrote about all sorts of things and sent to us and to you, the ensemble of our sons, presents, together with a letter to each one of you. His presents to you—you will recall them!—comprised an elephant, a sword, a white falcon, and a brocade coat woven with gold. When we looked at the presents he had sent you, we found that he had written on his letter to you, in the Indian language, "Keep the contents of this secret." We then gave orders that all the presents or letters he had sent to each of you should be [1053] passed on to you all, and we [merely] kept back his letter to you because of its superscription. We sent for an Indian scribe and ordered the letter's seal to be broken and its contents to be read out. There was written there, 'Rejoice, be refreshed in spirit and be happy in mind, for you will be crowned on the day Day ba-Ādhar in the month of Ādhar of the thirty-eighth year of Kisrā's reign[960] and be hailed as holder of his royal power and ruler of his lands.' We were convinced that you would only attain to royal power through our own destruction and perdition, yet despite being certain about this, we did not make any reduction in the living allowances, subsidies, presents, and such, previously assigned to you, let alone order you to be put to death. We resealed

959. As correctly conjectured by Nöldeke, trans. 371 n. 1, this name reflects that of a leading king of the early mediaeval northern Deccan, but to be rendered as Pulakesin II (r. ca. 609–42), from the Chālukya dynasty. It would thus have been perfectly possible for Khusraw Abarwēz to have received a delegation from this ruler in the thirty-sixth year of his reign, i.e., 626. See A. L. Basham, The Wonder That Was India. A Survey of the Culture of the Indian Sub-Continent before the Coming of the Muslims, 74–75; R. C. Majumdar (ed.), The History and Culture of the Indian People, III, The Classical Age, 234–41. An alternative interpretation of this name was suggested, however, by von Gutschmid, "Bemerkungen zu Tabari's Sasanidengeschichte," 746: that it represents the common Indian royal title Paramēśa "supreme lord."

960. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 1043, p. 379 and n. 938 above.

Furumīshā's letter with our own seal and entrusted it to our consort Shīrīn, who is still alive and sound in mind and body. If you wish to retrieve from her the indications of your horoscope and Furumīshā's letter to you and read them both in order to bring home to you your contrition and loss, then do it!

[Third,] in regard to what you have mentioned concerning the condition of those condemned to perpetual imprisonment, we say in justification that the ancient kings, from the time of Jayūmart (Kayūmarth) till the reign of Bishtāsb,[961] used to conduct their royal power by means of justice, and then continuously from the time of Bishtāsb till we ourselves assumed power, they conducted it by means of justice combined with religious piety. Now, since you are so devoid of reason, knowledge, and education, ask the authorities (ḥamalah) in religion, the basic supports (literally, "tent pegs," awtād) of this religious community, about the position of those who rebel against and disobey the kings, who break their oaths, and those who have merited death for their sins, and they will tell you that they do not deserve to be shown mercy or forgiveness. Know that, despite all this, we have only condemned to perpetual imprisonment in our gaols those who, if an equitable [1054] judgment were to be made, have merited being killed or blinded or having a hand or leg or some other limb cut off. How often have those appointed to guard them, or various of our ministers, mentioned the well-deserved fate of those who merit execution and have said, "Kill them speedily, before they find ways and means of killing you!" Yet, because of our wish to spare lives and our dislike of shedding blood, we acted slowly and deliberately with them and left them to God, and we used not to go further in punishing them beyond the imprisonment to which we limited ourselves in inflicting, beyond depriving them of eating meat, drinking wine, and enjoying the fragrance of aromatic herbs. In none of these things that were withheld were we going beyond what is in the precepts of the religious community in regard to keeping those who have merited death from enjoying the pleasures of life and easy circumstances. [On the contrary,] we used to allot for them the food, drink, and other necessities for keeping them in good health, and we used not to keep them from access to their womenfolk and from the possibility of contact for siring children and producing progeny while they were imprisoned. Now the news has reached us that you have decided to set free these evil doers and evil wishers who merit execution and to give orders for demolishing their gaol. If you do release them, you will sin against God your Lord, bring down harm upon yourself, and inflict injury on your own faith and the injunctions and legal prescriptions contained in it, which deny mercy and forgiveness for those who deserve execution. In addition to this, [there is the fact] that the enemies of kings never love kingly power, and those who rebel against kings never furnish them obedience. The wise men have given the warning, "Don't hold back from punishing those who have merited punishment, for such hesitation entails an impairment of justice and harmful effects on the governance of the kingdom." Although it may give you a certain feeling of joy when you set free those evil doers, evil wishers, and rebels who deserve execution, you will certainly experience the [baleful] result of that in your conduct of government and the introduction of the severest harm and [1055] calamitousness for the people of your religious community.

961. That is, from the time of Gayōmard (thus the MP form), the first man, to that of Gushtāsp (Avestan Wištāspa-, MP Wishtāsp), son of Luhrāsp, in whose reign Zoroaster is supposed to have arisen. See Yarshater, "Iranian Common Beliefs and World View," 352–53; idem, "Iranian National History," 376–77, 466–69.

[Fifth,][962] regarding your allegations that we have only acquired, gathered together, and laid up in our treasuries wealth, equipment and utensils, grain, and so forth, from the lands of our kingdom by means of the harshest methods of tax gathering, the most pressing demands on our subjects, and the most violent tyranny, rather than from the lands of the enemy by making war on them and forcible seizure by ourselves of their possessions, our reply is as follows. The best answer to any statement uttered with gross ignorance and stupidity is not to give any answer at all, but we have not wished to leave this aside, since not giving an answer is tantamount to affirming the truth [of the original statement]. Our rejoinder to the accusations laid against us is a vigorous rebuttal of them, and our clear exculpation is an exposition of what you have sought from us regarding it.

962. As Nöldeke, trans. 374 n. 1, noted, this fifth section of Khusraw's response covers both Shērōy's fifth and sixth accusations without clearly distinguishing the two. Shērōy's seventh and eighth accusations are not addressed by his father, as least in the words that have come down to us.

Know, O ignorant one, that, after God, it is only wealth and troops that can uphold the royal authority of monarchs, this being especially the case with the kingdom of Persia, whose lands are surrounded by enemies with gaping mouths ready to gulp down what the kingdom possesses. The only thing that can keep them from it and fend them off from those lands they avidly desire to seize for themselves, is numerous troops and copious quantities of weapons and war material. Now numerous troops and everything necessary for these can only be acquired by having a great deal of wealth and ample quantities of it; and wealth can only be amassed and gathered together, for any contingency which may arise, by strenuous efforts and dedication in levying this land tax. We are not the first ones to have gathered together wealth; on the contrary, we have merely imitated here our forefathers and our predecessors in past times. They collected wealth just as we have, and amassed great quantities of it, so that it might constitute a firm backing for them in strengthening their armies, in upholding their authority, and in [making possible] other things for which wealth must inevitably be amassed. But then the false-hearted one Bahrām, with a gang of people like himself and with desperadoes who merited being put to death, attacked that wealth and those [1056] jewels in our treasuries. They scattered and dispersed them and went off with a great deal of them, and they left behind in our storehouses of wealth and treasuries only a few of our weapons which they were unable to scatter to the winds or remove or else had no desire for them. When, God be praised, we recovered our kingly power and our authority was firmly reestablished, when the subjects submitted to us and gave obedience, and we removed the calamities which had befallen them, we dispatched to the outlying parts of our land Iṣbabadhs, we appointed below them in those regions Fādhūsbāns, and we nominated over the frontier zones Marzbāns and courageous, energetic, and tough executive officials. All those whom we appointed we provided with a strong backing of numerous troops, and these officials led vigorous campaigns against the hostile kings and the enemies into the lands facing their own territories. From the thirteenth year of our reign onward,[963] their raids against the enemies, the slaughter they wrought, and the captives they took, [reached to such an extent] that none of those hostile rulers could dare to raise his head even in the heart of his own kingdom except under a protective cover, with fearfulness, or under a grant of protection from us, let alone to mount a raid into any part of our land or to engage in anything unacceptable to us. Hence during all this period of years, there came into our storehouses of wealth and our treasuries what had been seized as plunder from the lands of our enemies, comprising gold, silver, all sorts of jewels, copper, steel, silk, silk brocades (istabraq),[964] brocade coats, horses, weapons, captured women and children and male prisoners, whose enormous extent cannot be concealed and whose value is known to everyone.

When at the end of the thirteenth year of our reign we gave instructions for the engraving of new dies for coins (naqsh sikak ḥadīthah), so that we might give our orders for beginning the minting of new silver coinage with their aid, there was found at the end of the minting process in our storehouses of wealth, according to what was reported back to us by the persons charged with counting the silver which was left there, apart from the [1057] sums of money which we had instructed should be set aside for paying the salaries of our troops, two hundred thousand purses of silver coinage, containing eight hundred million mithqāls [in weight].[965]

When we perceived that we had made our frontiers secure, had repulsed the enemy from them and from our subjects, had put a muzzle on their mouths, which had been gaping open to swallow up what they had acquired, had extended over them (i.e., the subjects) security, and had preserved the inhabitants of the four outlying quarters of our land from calamities and raids, we gave orders

963. That is, the year 602, when the Byzantine emperor Maurice was overthrown and murdered (see n. 743 above), after which Khusraw could claim to be avenging the death of the usurper Phocas.

964. This is itself a loanword in Arabic (and in Syriac), and an early one, since it is used in the Qur'ān of the silk brocade garments of the saved in Paradise (XVIII, 30/31; XLIV, 53; etc.). See Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 8 n. 2, 13; Jeffery, The Foreign Vocabulary of the Qur'ān, 58–60.

965. Here, as Nöldeke pointed out, trans. 376 n. 2, not meaning a weight in gold.

for the collection of the arrears of taxation remaining from previous years and for the restoration to their original place of all the gold and silver that had been carried off from our storehouses of wealth and all the jewels and copperware that had come from our treasuries.[966] Hence at the end of the thirtieth year of our reign we gave orders for the engraving of new dies for coins, from which silver coins could be struck, and there was found in our storehouses of wealth, apart from what we had ordered to be set aside for paying the salaries of our troops and apart from the sums of money already counted up for us previously, four hundred thousand purses of silver coinage, containing one billion, six hundred million mithqāls [in weight]. All this in addition to what God added for us to those sums of money from what He presented to us as booty and of His liberality and lavishness upon us, out of the wealth of the rulers of Byzantium which the wind brought us in ships and which we called "plunder of the winds (fay' al-riyāḥ)."[967]

From the thirtieth year of our reign to the thirty-eighth, which is the present year, our stores of weath have not ceased growing in extent and richness, our lands in florescence, our subjects in security and tranquility, and our frontiers and peripheral regions in impregnability and strength of defenses. We have now heard that you intend, because of the abysmally low level of your manly virtues, to scatter abroad and destroy all this wealth, acting on the advice of evil doers who merit being put to death.[968] We are now telling you, however, that those treasures and wealth were only

966. These activities, as Nöldeke noted, trans. 377 n. 1, could hardly have been carried out without using violence, with resultant great hardship for the populace, and in the case of the recovery of wealth allegedly filched from the central treasury, the innocent would doubtless suffer equally with the guilty.

967. This may conceivably relate distantly to an actual happening. Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 665, says that a fleet of the king of Constantinople bearing treasure was cast up on the Mediterranean shores at Alexandria (the khazā'in al-rīḥ), and, slightly more circumstantially, al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 227–8 = § 647, says that a fleet of treasure ships of Phocas was thrown up on the Syrian coast at Antioch, where Khusraw's general Shahrbarāz was able to seize the wealth and forward it to his master. Nöldeke, trans. 378 n. 1, cited an authority who suggested that the incident might relate to some treasure that Heraclius despatched to North Africa, before he became involved in the Persian wars, and which was lost at sea.

968. According to Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 665, Shērōy lightened taxes and did not collect the kharāj.

gathered together through exposing one's life to danger and after intense exertion and effort in order to repel by means of them the [1058] enemies who were surrounding the lands of this kingdom and who were pursuing courses aimed at getting full control of what they had acquired. Enemies like these can only be driven off, in all periods and times, and after receiving help from God, by wealth and troops; troops can only be kept strong by wealth; and wealth is only of use when it is available in large and extensive amounts. So don't contemplate dividing out this wealth and don't rush rashly into doing it, for wealth is a protection for your royal power and your land, and a source of strength for you against your enemies.

Asfādh Jushnas then went back to Shīrūyah and related to him what Kisrā had said to him, not leaving out a single word. The great men of state among the Persians came back and told Shīrūyah, "It is not fitting that we should have two kings. Either you give orders for Kisrā to be put to death, and we shall be your servants, furnishing obedience to you, or else we shall depose you and give him obedience [once more]." These words struck fear into Shīrūyah's heart and crushed him. He ordered Kisrā to be executed. Several men who had duties incumbent upon them of vengeance against Kisrā responded to the call to kill him. But every time one of them came to Kisrā, he heaped insults on the man and repelled him strongly. No one would undertake the task of killing Kisrā until finally, a youth named Mihr Hurmuz, son of Mardānshāh, went along to kill him. Mardānshāh was Kisrā's Fādhūsbān over the province of Nīmrūz[969] and one of Kisrā's most obedient and trusty retainers.

Now some two years before his deposition, Kisrā had asked his astrologers and diviners[970] what his end would be, and they had 969. That is, the region of the south, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 894, p. 149, and n. 385 above. The geography ascribed to Moses Khorenac'i defines the K'usti Nemroy as extending from Lower Iraq and Hajar, from Iṣfahān, Fārs, and Khūzistān, to Kirmān, Sīstān, Makrān, and Tūrān (both in the later Baluchistan), Zābulistān (in what is now eastern Afghanistan), and Daybul on the coast of Sind. See Marquart, Ērānšahr, 25–47.

970. 'āfah, pl. of 'ā'if, was the diviner who took auguries from the flight or cries of birds, the practice of 'iyāfah, ornithomancy. Among the early Arabs, this was essentially that practiced by the Greek and Roman augurs. See Fahd, La divination arabe, 371, 432–34.

told him that his fated death (maniyyatahu)[971] would come from the direction of Nīmrūz. He accordingly grew suspicious of Mardānshāh and fearful of his proximity, on account of Mardānshāh's great prestige and because there was no one in that region who [1059] could equal him in strength and power. Kisrā had written to him instructing him to travel quickly to him, until by the time Mardānshāh had reached him, he had turned over in his mind how he might seek a pretext to kill him. But he had not found any fault in Mardānshāh. Kisrā accordingly recoiled from killing him because of his knowledge about Mardānshāh's faithful obedience to him, his good counsel to him and his eagerness to please the king. So he resolved to spare his life but to order his right hand to be cut off, and to compensate him for its loss by a grant of a large sum of money, lavishing wealth on him for this. Hence he sought for a pretext that would enable him to have Mardānshāh's right hand cut off.[972]

Hands and feet and heads used to be cut off in the open space before the royal palace (raḥbat al-mulk).[973] On the day when he had ordered Mardānshāh's hand to be cut off, Kisrā sent along a scout and observer ('ayn), who was to come back to him and inform him of what he had heard Mardānshāh and the onlookers who were present saying. When Mardānshāh's right hand was cut off, he took it up with his left hand, kissed it, and placed it in his bosom, and he began to lament over it with his tears streaming down, saying, "Alas for a mild and forbearing [hand], one which used to shoot, and write, and deal blows, and engage in sport, and dispensed largesse!" The man whom Kisrā had sent along as a scout and observer over Mardānshāh went back to Kisrā and told

971. maniyyah, pls. manāyā and perhaps manūn, is literally "the determination, decreeing, of a man's fate," hence a synonym for death and a term much used in early Arabic poetry. See Caskel, Das Schicksal in der altarabischen Poesie, 22–42; H. Ringgren, Studies in Arabian Fatalism, 14–23; Mohamed Abdesselem, Le thème de la mort dans la poésie arabe des origines à la fin du III^e/IX^e siècle, 57, cf. 71.

972. The story of the mutilation of the courtier by the ruler because of the prognostication that the courtier's son would bring about Khusraw's death, is given very briefly in al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 196, with the tale cut short because of a lacuna in the manuscript used by the editor Houtsma.

973. Nöldeke noted, trans. 380 n. 1, the predilection of Persian kings, from Achaemenid up to Qājār times, for public executions and mutilations.

him what he had seen and heard Mardānshāh doing and saying. At this, Kisrā became full of tenderness and sympathy for him, and regretted his impetuosity regarding Mardānshāh. He sent a message to him via one of the great men of state expressing his regret for what he had done to Mardānshāh and telling him that he would fulfill, so far as was in his power, any request to him which Mardānshāh might make and would facilitate this for him. Mardānshāh sent back a message to Kisrā by that same envoy, invoking blessings on the king and saying, "O king, I have always recognized your beneficence to me, and I thank you for it; I have become fully convinced that what you have inflicted on me was done unwillingly. It was merely a stroke of fate that caused this. But I have one request to make of you: give me oaths that you will fulfill it, so that my mind may be set at rest. Also, send to me, on your solemn undertaking to fulfill the oath, a pious man of God, and then I will reveal and communicate [my request] to you." Kisrā's envoy returned to his master with this message, and Kisrā hastened to put into effect Mardānshāh's request, and swore mighty oaths that he would without fail accede to his request so [1060] long as this last did not entail anything which would weaken the fabric of his royal power. Kisrā dispatched this message to Mardānshāh via the Chief [Zoroastrian] Priest (literally, "head of the murmurers," ra'īs al-muzamzimīn). Mardānshāh sent back a message to Kisrā asking him to order his (Mardānshāh's) execution, in order that the dishonor which [now] attached to him might be thereby effaced.[974] Kisrā gave the requisite order for Mardānshāh's head to be cut off, unwilling, as he asserted, to break his oath.

When Mihr Hurmuz, Mardānshāh's son, came into Kisrā's presence, the latter asked Mihr Hurmuz his name and that of his father and his position in the state. He told him that he was Mihr Hurmuz, son of Mardānshāh, the Fādhūsbān of Nīmrūz. Kisrā said, "You are the son of a a noble, highly sufficient, and competent man whom we requited for his faithfulness and good counsel to us, and for his sufficiency and competence with us, in an undeserving manner; so set to, and get on with what you have been ordered to do!" So Mihr Hurmuz struck, with an axe that he held 974. That is, the dishonor of continuing to live as a mutilated person, hence unable to fill any office in the state or in the Zoroastrian church.

in his hand, several blows at the sinews of Kisrā's neck running down to his shoulder, but these had no effect on Kisrā. The latter was searched, and it was discovered that a jewel in the form of an amulet[975] had been tied on his upper arm (or, "he had tied an amulet on his upper arm"). The amulet protected its wearer from the effects of a sword. The amulet was accordingly taken off Kisrā, and then after that Mihr Hurmuz delivered a single blow which killed him.[976]

The news was brought to Shīrūyah, who tore the front part of the neck of his robe and wept copiously; he gave orders for Kisrā's corpse to be borne to the place of sepulture. This was done. All the great men of state and the people of the classes just below them [afnā' al-nās][977] accompanied his corpse [to the place of burial]. He ordered Mihr Hurmuz executed. Kisrā's tenure of royal power lasted thirty-eight years. He was killed on the day of Māh in the month of Ādhar.[978] Shīrūyah killed seventeen of his brothers, men of good education, bravery, and the manly virtues,[979] on the advice of his minister Fayrūz[980] and at the urging of one of the sons of Yazdīn, who was the official in charge of the [collection of the] land tax (literally, "tithes," 'ushūr) from the entire lands for [1061] Kisrā and who was called Shamṭā,[981] that he should put them to death.

---

975. Apparently the reading here is kharazah rather than ḥirzah. See Addenda et emendanda, p. DXCVI, and Glossarium, pp. CCXVII–CCXVIII.

976. Nöldeke, trans. 382 n. 1, discussed the information of other sources, including Christian ones, on the exact mode of Khusraw's execution, but concluded that there was no firm evidence concerning this mode.

977. Arabic afnā', sing. finw, is defined in the lexica as "people from mixed groups." Here the meaning clearly relates to people high in the Persian social hierarchy who alone would accompany the catafalque of a king. Nöldeke, trans. 382, has "die Ausgesehnsten der Leute," i.e., the most outstanding, prominent people.

978. Nöldeke, trans. 382 n. 2, gives the equivalent of this date as 29 February 628.

979. The Arabic sources, and also the Christian ones, have various totals for these brothers usually around sixteen to eighteen; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 54, actually names eighteen of them. See the discussion in Nöldeke, 383 n. 1.

980. Bal'amī's Persian rendering of al-Ṭabarī's History, tr. II, 346, makes Shērōy's chief minister Barmak, son of Fīrūz, ancestor of the Barmakī family so prominent in the caliphate during early 'Abbāsid times. Nöldeke, trans. 313 n. 2, thought that this was a later touch inserted by an enemy of the Islamic Barmakīs.

981. The very defective rendering of this name in the text was read thus by the editor Nöldeke, who identified Shamṭā's father Yazdīn from the Christian sources, Shīrūyah was now afflicted by illness and never enjoyed any of the pleasures of this present world. He died at Daskarat al-Malik. He was an inauspicious figure for the house of Sāsān.[982] When he killed his brothers, he showed violent grief. It is said that, on the day after he had killed them, his two sisters Būrān and Āzarmīdukht[983] came into his presence and reviled and upbraided him harshly, saying, "Greed for a royal power which is still not yet firmly established has driven you to kill your father and all your brothers, and you have committed acts of dishonor." When he heard those words, he wept bitterly and tore the crown from off his head. All his days he was overwhelmed with cares and afflicted by sickness. It is said that he extirpated every member of his house on whom he could get his hands, and that plague spread during his time until most of the Persians perished.[984] His tenure of royal power lasted eight months.[985] principally the Syriac historians and hagiographers and the conciliar acts of the Nestorian Church, as Khusraw's treasurer Yazdīn (see n. 737 above). One Nestorian author, Thomas of Margā, describes Shamṭā as the real driving force behind the conspiracy to dethrone Khusraw. See Nöldeke, trans. 357 n. 4, 383 n. 3. However, according to the Anonymus Guidi, tr. 30–31, Shamṭā soon showed himself overly ambitious for power, was accused of conspiring to seize the throne, arrested, his right hand cut off and consigned to prison by Shērōy.

---

On the name Yazdīn, see Justi, Namenbuch, 147–48. Whether this Yazdīn was the same person as the governor of Armenia for Khusraw Abarwēz, the Yazdēn of the Armenian historian Sebēos (see ibid.), is unclear.

982. And called by the Persians, according to al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 232 = § 653, the equivalent of Arabic al-ghashūm, "the tyrannical one." On the other hand, the Anonymus Guidi, tr. 30, states that Shērōy's reign was one of peace and security for the Christians of the realm.

983. That is, Shērōy's eventual, ephemeral successors on the Persian throne, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1063–64, 1064–65, pp. 403–405, 406–407, below.

984. This plague is mentioned in other sources (e.g., Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 665; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 232 = § 653; and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 497) as having devastated Iraq, with, according to Ibn Qutaybah and Ibn al-Athīr, the king himself dying from the disease. Less probably, the Byzantine historian Theophanes states that Shērōy was poisoned by his hostile stepmother Shīrīn; see Christensen, Sassanides, 497 n. 1.

985. Kawād II Shērōy reigned for six or eight months in 628. His name appears on his coins as PYRWCY KWT. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 68, 390–92, 492, Plate XXII, Table XXX; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 54–55, Table XIII, Plate 14; Selwood, Whitting and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 159–60; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 238.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 665; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 196; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 110; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj,

[Ardashīr III]

After him there succeeded to the royal power Ardashīr. [He was] the son of [Qubādh II] Shīrūyah, son of [Khusraw II] Abarwīz, son of Hurmuz (IV), son of [Khusraw I] Anūsharwān, and was only a small child. It is said that he was only seven years old, since there was no grown-up person of judgment and experience left of the royal house; hence the great men of the Persian state made him king.[986] A man called Mih Ādhar Jushnas, who held the office of high steward of the table (ri'āsat aṣḥāb al-mā'idah),[987] was in charge of his upbringing. He carried on the administration of the kingdom in an excellent fashion, and his firm conduct of it reached a point where no one would have been aware of Ardashīr's youthfulness.

Shahrbarāz was at the frontier with Byzantium with troops whom Kisrā had given him and had named "the fortunate ones" (al-su'adā').[988] Kisrā and Shīrūyah had continuously written to him regarding important matters in which they were involved, and had sought his advice concerning these. But now, since the great men of state of the Persians had not consulted him about [1062] raising Ardashīr to the throne, he took that as a pretext for making accusations of criminal behavior and demands on them, and went as far as shedding blood, and made it an occasion for endeavoring to seize the royal power and to rise by means of that from the lowly status of serving people to the heights of royal power. Shahrbarāz treated Ardashīr with contempt because of his youth

---

II, 233–34 = § 653; idem, Tanbīh, 102, tr. 146; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 54; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 494–97. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. II, 332–47. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 493–97; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 170, 178.

986. From this point onward, all the remaining Persian kings and queens, with the exception of the capable, non-Sāsānid Shahrbarāz, who seized power for himself, were set on the throne as puppets of the nobility and great men of state and church.

987. In Persian, khwān-sālār, which Nöldeke noted, trans. 386 n. 2, was the term used by Bal'amī in his rendering of al-Ṭabarī's History.

988. Shahrbarāz made peace with Heraclius in July 629 at Arabissos in eastern Anatolia (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1008–1009, pp. 329–30 and n. 776 above), and was thus free to turn his attention to Mesopotamia and take advantage of the unsettled conditions there. Quite possibly he claimed to be the avenger of the murdered Khusraw Abarwēz, since al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 111, says that, when Shahrbarāz entered al-Madā'in, he put to death all those who had conspired to depose and kill Khusraw; cf. also Nöldeke, trans. 387 n. 1.

and acted arrogantly toward the great men of state. He decided to summon together the ruling classes of the people (al-nās) for a consultation over the matter of the royal power. He then advanced with his troops.

Meanwhile, Mih Ādhar Jushnas had embarked on fortifying and strengthening the walls and gates of the city of Ctesiphon, and he transfered Ardashīr and the remaining members of the royal house, their womenfolk, the contents of Ardashīr's treasury—that is, money and his treasure chests—and his horses, into the city of Ctesiphon. Shahrbarāz's troops, with whom he now approached, numbered six thousand men from the Persian army on the Byzantine frontiers.[989] He took up a position near the city of Ctesiphon, besieged its inhabitants and fought with them, setting up ballistas against the city, but did not manage to enter it. When he realized that he was not strong enough to take it by force, he sought it by means of craft. He kept on inciting a man named Nīw Khusraw, who was the commander of Ardashīr's guard, and Nāmdār Jushnas, son of Ādhar Jushnas, the Iṣbabadh of Nīmrūz, to treachery, until the two of them opened the gates of the city to Shahbarāz. Thus he entered it, seized a number of the leading men, and killed them, appropriating their wealth for himself and ravishing their womenfolk. At Shahbarāz's behest, a group of men killed Ardashīr, son of Shīrūyah, in the second year of his reign, in the month of Bahman, on the night of the day Abān, in the palace of Khusraw Shāh Qubādh. He had held the royal power for one year and six months.[990]

---

989. As Nöldeke remarked, trans. 387 n. 2, it was indicative of the chaos and weakness into which the Persian state had fallen that such a modest force was able to take over the capital and secure power for Shahrbarāz himself.

990. Nöldeke noted, trans. 388 n. 4, 432–33, that this date in Bahman, the tenth day of the eleventh month, corresponds to 27 April 630, and that Ardashīr's reign had, on the basis of his coins, two years, the first identical with the seven months making up the last year of his father Kawād II Shērōy and the second one of independent rule beginning on 17 June 629. His reign would thus total one year and slightly under six months. Ardashīr's name appears on his coins as 'RTḤŠTR. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 68–69, 391–92, 491–92, Plate XXII, Table XXXI; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 54–55, Table 13, Plate 14; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 161–63; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 238; EIr, s.v. Ardašīr III (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 665; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 196; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 110–11 (wrongly named

[Shahrbarāz]

After him, there succeeded to the royal power Shahrbarāz, that is, Farrukhān, for the month of Isfandār(madh); he was not of the [1063] royal house of the kingdom. He proclaimed himself king, but when he sat down on the royal throne, his belly began to gripe, and this affected him so violently that he had no time to get to a latrine, hence he [swiftly] called for a bowl (ṭast), had it set down before the throne, and relieved himself in it.[991]

A man from the people of Iṣṭakhr called Fus Farrūkh, son of Mā(h) Khurshidhān,[992] and two of his brothers were roused to great anger at Shahrbarāz's killing of Ardashīr and his seizure of the royal power. They felt an intense revulsion from that, and came together and swore mutually that they would kill him. All three of them belonged to the king's personal guard. It was [at that time] the custom that, when the king rode out, his personal guard stood in two lines, with their mailed coats, helmets, shields, and swords, and with spears in their hands; then, when the king came up level with one of them, each of them laid his shield on the wooden forepart (qarabūs, i.e., pommel) of the king's saddle[993] and placed his forehead on it, as if he were prostrating himself on as Shīrzād); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 233 = § 653; idem, Tanbīh, 102, tr. 146; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 54; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 498. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabari-Bal'amī, trans. II, 347–48. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 497–98; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 170–71, 178; EIr, art. cit.

---

991. This story is meant to heighten the enormity of Shahrbarāz's temerity and his sacrilege by sitting down on the royal throne when he was not from the royal houses of the Arsacids or the Sāsānids. The ensuing account of the ignominious treatment of his corpse after he had been assassinated likewise highlights this apparent strong sense of legitimacy among the Persian ruling classes. However, as Nöldeke, trans. 388 n. 7, noted, the corollary of this feeling that the direction of the state should never pass into the hands of those outside the ancient ruling dynasties meant that, in an age of epigoni, hopes of an infusion of fresh vigor and military initiative could never be realized, and the Persian realm sank into total collapse, together with the feeble remnants of the Sāsānid royal house.

992. The first component of the name Fus Farrukh must be the MP pus, "son," the whole name meaning "fortunate son," see Justi, Namenbuch, 256, while Māh-Khwarshēd-ān would presumably be the patronym "son of Māh-Khwarshēd," see ibid., 187.

993. The qarabūs was actually made up of two curved pieces of wood, the front one forming the forepart or pommel of the saddle and the rear one forming the troussequin. See Lane, Lexicon, 2509b.

the ground. Shahrbarāz rode forth a few days after he had become king. Fus Farrūkh and his two brothers stood close to each other, and when Shahrbarāz drew level with them, Fus Farrūkh struck him with his spear, followed by his two brothers, This took place in the month of Isfandārmadh on the day of Daybadīn.[994] He fell down dead from his horse. They tied a rope round his leg and dragged him to and fro. A man from among the great men of state called Zādhān Farrūkh, son of Shahrdārān, a man called Māhyāy (?), who was the instructor of the cavalrymen (mu'addib al-asāwirah), and a large number of the great men of state and members of leading families assisted Fus Farrūkh and his brothers in killing Shahrbarāz. They also aided them in killing the various men who had assassinated Ardashīr, son of Shīrūyah, and they killed various members from the class of the great men of state. They then raised to the throne Būrān, daughter of Kisrā. Shahrbarāz had held the royal power for forty days.[995]

[Būrān]

Then there succeeded to the royal power Būrān, daughter of [1064]
Kisrā (II) Abarwīz, son of Hurmuz (IV), son of Kisrā (I) Anūshar-

994. The twenty-third day of the twelfth month, i.e., 9 June 630, according to Nöldeke, trans. 389 n. 2.

995. Nöldeke, trans. 390 n. 1, 432–33, pointed out that we actually have a period of forty-two days from Ardashīr III's death on 27 April 630, but that Shahrbarāz's proclamation of himself as ruler days later, hence making a reign of forty days, with Shahrbarāz killed on 9 June. Shahrbarāz did not apparently have time enough as king to mint his own coins. The other Arabic sources on his reign include al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 196–97; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 111; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 233 = § 654; idem, Tanbīh, 102, tr. 146; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 499. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. II, 348. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 497–98; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 170–71, 178.

Some sources add at this point in their list of Sāsānid rulers, between Shahrbarāz and Būrān, Khusraw (III), son of Kawād (II) Shērōy, son of Khusraw (II) Abarwēz (or according to others—and this seems genealogically more likely—son of Khusraw Abarwēz, and not his grandson). See Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 666; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, loc. cit.; idem, Tanbīh, loc. cit.; al-Khwārazmī, Mafātīḥ al-'ulūm, 104, who attributes to him the nickname of Kūtāh/al-Qaṣīr "the short one." These sources state that he had grown up in "the land of the Turks," had heard of the dissensions within Persia and had decided to try his own luck there; but after a "reign" of only three months, apparently in some part of Khurāsān, he was killed by the governor there. See Nöldeke, trans. 433; Christensen, op. cit. 498; Frye, op. cit., 171.

wān.[996] It has been mentioned that she proclaimed on the day when she was hailed as queen, "I will pursue righteousness and ordain justice," and she entrusted Shahrbarāz's office to Fus Farrūkh and invested him with the office of her chief minister. She behaved kindly toward her subjects and spread justice among them. She gave orders for silver coins to be minted, and she repaired masonry bridges (al-qanāṭir) and bridges of boats (al-jusūr).[997] She remitted for the people the arrears of land tax (baqāyā) due, and she wrote to them in general open letters concerning the policies of benevolence toward them that she intended to follow, and she mentioned the topic of the members of the royal house [of the Sāsānids] who had perished. At the same time, she expressed the hope that God would show them, through solicitude for their welfare and firm policies deriving from her elevated position, what would let them realize that lands were not subdued through the strength and energy of men, that military camps were not laid open to plunder through their martial valor, and that victory was not gained through men's stratagems and hatreds extinguished, but all that comes from God, He is exalted and magnified. She further exhorted them to be obedient and urged them to be faithful. Her letters brought together everything that was necessary (i.e., for the subjects' guidance and welfare). She restored the wood of the [True] Cross to the ruler of Byzantium through the

996. Also named as Būrān-dukht and, according to Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 54, a sister of Shērōy and the daughter of Khusraw Abarwēz's Byzantine princess wife, Maryam, daughter of Heraclius. Her descent on both sides would thus make her a very acceptable queen. The Anonymus Guidi, tr. 32–33, describes Būrān as not only Shērōy's sister but also his wife, this being quite possible in Nöldeke's view, ibid. 32 n. 5. For the name Būrān/Bōrān, see Justi, Namenbuch, 70; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides en Moyen-Perse épigraphique, no. 209, cf. no. 208, considered by him as a hypocoristic from * baurāspa-, "having bay horses."

Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 111, mentions as ruling before Būrān the child Juwānshīr, son of Khusraw and Kurdiyah, the sister and wife of Bahrām Chūbīn (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 998, 1001, pp. 309, 316–17 above), whom Abarwēz had married after Bahrām's death; if this piece of information were true, presumably Juwānshīr would have escaped Shērōy's massacre of his brothers, but in any case, must have died after a year. There is no trace of him in Sāsānid coinage.

997. Nöldeke noted, trans. 391 n. 3, that Būrān also built a fire temple at Istīniyā (a village near the later al-Kūfah, according to Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 176, pace Nöldeke that it was near Baghdad), according to al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, IV, 86 = § 1412, cf. Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 283.

intermediacy of the Catholicos called Īshūʿhab.[998] Her tenure of royal power lasted one year and four months.[999]

[Jushnas Dih]

Then there succeeded to the royal power after her a man called Jushnas Dih,[1000] from the remote offspring of Abarwīz's paternal uncle. His tenure of royal power was less than a month.

---

998. Restoration of the True Cross had been a prominent point in the peace negotiations begun by Heraclius with Shērōy and dragging on into the times of Shahrbarāz or Būrān, but the Cross was actually restored by Shērōy and was back in Jerusalem in late summer 629 or spring 630; see on the problem of exact dating here, n. 951 above. The Catholicos in question was Īshōʿyahb II of Gadāla, formerly bishop of Balad in northern Mesopotamia and in office 628–46; hence he was head of the Nestorian Church when the Arabs arrived in Iraq. See Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 341, 343–44. Īshōʿyahb and several other Nestorian bishops of the Persian empire went on a mission to Heraclius in northern Syria as part of the peace negotiations. See Nöldeke, trans. 392 n. 1; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 243–45.

999. In Nöldeke's surmise, trans. 433, there was a short interregnum of intrigues and anarchy in the capital Ctesiphon after Shahrbarāz's assassination on 9 June 630. Būrān's coins, extending over three regnal years, began with the regnal year 1, which would have ended on 16 June 630. Her reign must have extended over a year and four or six months, hence into autumn 631. The Anonymus Guidi, tr. 33, and the Nestorian Chronicle of Seʿert state that she was strangled, according to the latter source, by the general Fīrūz. Būrān's name appears on her coins as BWL'N. See on her coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 69, 392–93, Plate XXII; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 54–55, Table XIII, Plate 15; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 166–68; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 238; Jenny Rose, "Three Queens, Two Wives, and a Goddess. The Roles and Images of Women in Sasanian Iran," 43–45.

The other Arabic sources for her reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Maʿārif, 666; al-Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, I, 197; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 111; al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 233 = § 654; idem, Tanbīh, 102, tr. 147; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Taʾrīkh, 54; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 499. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. II, 349–50. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 498; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 171, 178; EIr, s.v. Bōrān (Marie Louise Chaumont).

1000. The form of this ephemeral ruler's name is uncertain, especially in regard to the second element after Jushnas/Gushnasp. variably writen in those sources that mention him, i.e., Ibn Qutaybah, Maʿārif, 666, "one of Kisrā's paternal uncle's progeny"; al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 233–34 = § 654, Fīrūz J.sh.n.dah, a descendant of Shābūr, son of Yazdajird [I] the Sinner"; idem, Tanbīh, tr. 147, Fīrūz J.sh.n.t.dah; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 499–500 (al-Dīnawarī's section on the Persian rulers ends essentially with Būrān, and merges into his account of the Arab conquests in Iraq and Persia). The resemblance of the names given by al-Masʿūdī and Ibn al-Athīr to that of the Fayrūz, son of Mihrān Jushnas who is listed by al-Ṭabarī, I, 1066, p. 408 below, leads one to think that the two persons are really one and the same.

[Āzarmīdukht]

Then there succeeded to the royal power Āzarmīdukht,[1001] daughter of Kisrā (II) Abarwīz, son of Hurmuz (IV), son of Kisrā (I) [1065] Anūsharwān. It is said that she was one of the most beautiful of the women of the Persians and that she proclaimed, when she assumed the royal power, "Our way of conduct will be that of our father Kisrā, the victorious one,[1002] and if anyone rebels against us, we will shed his blood." It is said that the outstanding great man of Persia was at that time Farrukh Hurmuz, Iṣbahbadh of Khurāsān. He sent a message to her asking her to give herself in marriage to him. She wrote back, "Marriage to a queen is not permissible. I realize full well that your intention in what you are proposing is to satisfy your own [sexual] needs and lust with me; so come to me on such-and-such night." Āzarmīdukht ordered the commander of her guard to lie in wait for him on the night they had agreed to meet together and then kill him. The commander of her guard carried out her orders regarding Farrukh Hurmuz; and at her command, the latter's corpse was dragged out by the feet and thrown down in the open space before the palace of government. Next morning, they found Farrukh Hurmuz slain, and she gave orders for his corpse to be taken away and concealed from sight. It was generally recognized that he could only have been killed for some momentous deed. Rustam, son of Farrukh Hurmuz, the man whom Yazdajird (III) was later to send to combat the Arabs,[1003] was acting as his father's deputy in Khurāsān. When he received the news (i.e., of his father's murder), he came with a mighty

---

1001. This is the Arabic form, virtually identical with that of the Syriac sources, Āzarmīdūkht, of the MP name Āzarmīgdukht. Nöldeke, trans. 393 n. 2, saw its etymology as being most probably "modest (āzarmīg) noble maiden"; Justi, Namenbuch, 54, gave no opinon. However., Gignoux, in his Noms propres sassanides en Moyen-Perse épigraphique, no. 167, cf. no. 166, and in EIr, s.v. Āzarmīgduxt, renders it as "daughter of the honored, respected one," i.e., of her father Khusraw Abarwēz; both "honored maiden" and "daughter of the honored one" are possible translations.

1002. Arabic al-manṣūr = MP abarwēz. According to Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 55, Āzarmīgdukht was jalīdah qasīmah, "vigorous and beautiful," and he records that she built a fire temple at a village called al-Q.r.ṭ.mān (?) in the region of Abkhāz (i.e., in western Transcaucasia).

1003. That is, the Persian general vanquished some five years later at al-Qādisiyyah by the Arabs. See EI^{2}, s.v. Rustam b. Farrukh Hurmuzd (ed.).

army, encamped at al-Madā'in, blinded Āzarmīdukht, and then killed her. According to other authorities, however, she was poisoned. Her tenure of royal power was six months.[1004]

[Kisrā III]

There was then brought forward a man from the stock of Ardashīr (I), son of Bābak, who was living in al-Ahwāz, called Kisrā. [He was] the son of Mihr Jushnas. The great men of state raised him to the throne. He assumed the crown and sat down upon the royal throne, but was killed a few days after his accession.[1005]

[Khurrazādh Khusraw]

It is also said that the one who reigned after Āzarmīdukht was Khurrazādh Khusraw, from the progeny of [Khusraw II] Abarwīz.[1006] It is said that he was found in a fortress near Nişībīn called al-Ḥijārah (the "Stone Fortress").[1007] When he reached al- [1066]
Madā'in, he remained there a few days only before [the people there] rebelled and rose against him in opposition.

1004. Hence Āzarmīgdukht's reign was even shorter than that of her sister Būrān, and would fall at the end of 631 and opening of 632; see Nöldeke, trans. 434. Coins issued by her, one from the mint of Shīrāz, with the effigy of her father Khusraw Abarwēz and with the legend of her own name, have been discovered and identified by M. I. Mochiri. See Selwood, Whitting and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 169–70; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 238–39.

The other Arabic sources on her reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 666; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 197–98; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 233 = § 654; idem, Tanbīh, 102–103, tr. 147; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 54–55; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 500. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. II, 350–52. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 499; EIr, s.v. Āzarmīgduxt (Ph. Gignoux).

1005. The only other Arabic sources clearly mentioning him are al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 198, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 500.

1006. There seems to be a confusion here of Khurrahzādh and the Farrukhzādh mentioned below as coming after Fīrūz (II). Al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 198, does not mention Khurrazādh (nor do any other sources) but places Farrukhzādh after Fīrūz.

1007. A town of what is now southeastern Anatolia, in the medieval Islamic province of Diyār Bakr, situated on the upper course of the Tigris about halfway between Āmid/Diyarbekir and Jazīrat Ibn 'Umar, the mediaeval Islamic Ḥiṣn Kayfā. The second part of the name would appear to reflect Syriac kīpā, "rock," hence "rock or stone fortress." See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 265; Le Strange, Lands, 113; Canard, H'amdanides, 84; EI², s.v. Ḥiṣn Kayfā (S. Ory).

[Fayrūz II]

Those authorities who say that Kisrā (III), son of Mihr Jushnas, succeeded to the royal power after Āzarmīdukht [further relate that,] when Kisrā, son of Mihr Jushnas, was killed, the great men of state in Persia sought for someone from the royal house whom they could raise to the throne. They looked for someone who had in his veins an element of [the blood of] the members of that house, even though it was through maternal relationship. They brought forward a man who was resident in Maysān, called Fayrūz, son of Mihrān Jushnas, who was also called Jushnas Dih.[1008] He was the son of Ṣahārbukht,[1009] daughter of Yazdāndādh (text, "Yazdāndār"), son of Kisrā (I) Anūsharwān. They raised him to the throne against his own will. He was a man with a large head, and when he was crowned he exclaimed, "How tight this crown is!" The great men of state drew a bad omen from his beginning his reign by speaking of tightness and narrowness, hence killed him after he had reigned for [only] a few days. Some people assert that he was killed the moment he uttered those words.[1010]

[Farrukhzādh Khusraw]

The authorities who say this last go on to say that a man from among the great men of state, called Zādhī,[1011] who had the func-

---

1008. As noted in n. 1000 above, this Fayrūz may well be identical with the Jushnas Dih mentioned in al-Ṭabarī, I, 1064, p. 405 above; at least, there is some confusion in the sources which seem to mention Fayrūz, i.e., al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 198; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 233–34 = § 654 (?); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 500.

1009. Written thus here and in Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit., but reflecting the common rendering in Arabic of Persian ch by ṣ, cf. Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 72, hence probably the name Chahār Bukht, "saved by the four," i.e., the four spirits of water, earth, plants, and beasts, or the four elements, cf. the common Sāsānid name Si Bukht, "saved by the three." See Nöldeke, trans. 396 n. 1; Justi, Namenbuch, 151; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 833. Fayrūz's relationship to the main stem of the Sāsānid royal house was clearly tenuous.

1010. In addition to the exiguous Arabic sources on Fayrūz mentioned in n. 1008 above, see the Persian one of Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. II, 352–53. See also Nöldeke, trans. 396 n. 1. No coins of his seem to be extant.

1011. Thus written in the text, but taken by Nöldeke, trans. 396 and n. 2, as Zādhūyah, which seems likely. Nöldeke also noted that the Marzbān of Sarakhs who made peace with 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir in 31/651–52 when the Arabs arrived in tion of "Chief of the Servants" (ra'īs al-khawal),[1012] proceeded to a place in the western section [of the Persian kingdom], near to Nişībīn, called Ḥiṣn al-Ḥijārah ("the Stone Fortress"). He brought back a son of Kisrā (II)'s who had escaped to that fortress when Shīrūyah killed all the sons of Kisrā, and who was called Farrukhzādh Khusraw, to the city of Ctesiphon. The people gave him obedience for a short time, but then rebelled and rose in opposition against him. Some sources state that they killed him. His period of royal power was six months.[1013] [1067]

[Yazdajird III]

Some authorities say that the people of Iṣṭakhr got hold of Yazdajird, son of Shahriyār, son of Kisrā (II), at Iṣṭakhr, whither people had fled with him when Shīrūyah killed his brothers.[1014]

Khurāsān was called Zādhūyah (al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 405) and that Zādhūyah is a possible reading for the rather cryptic name Wārī in al-Ṭabarī, I, 893 and n. a, p. 147 above.

1012. Presumably an office at the Sāsānid court, something like a major-domo or steward, what would in Islamic times be called a qahramān, cf. the use of the word by al-Ṭabarī, I, 1020, p. 346 above.

1013. On the possible confusion of this Farrukhzādh with Khurrahzādh Khusraw, see n. 1006 above. The other Arabic sources on him include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 666–67; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 198; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 234 = § 655; idem, Tanbīh, 103, tr.147; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 55; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 501. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 353. He is briefly mentioned by Christensen, Sassanides, 499. No coins of his are extant.

Also mentioned as fleetingly holding power between the years 630 and 632, but probably with recognition in certain parts of the realm only, are Hormizd (V), who nevertheless minted some coins as 'WḤRMZDY (see concerning him, n. 1016 below), and Khusraw (IV) (assuming that this person is not the same as Farrukhzādh Khusraw), who minted some coins as ḤWSRWB. See Christensen, Sassanides, 499, and for their coins, Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 69–70, 393–94, 493–94, Plates XXII–XXIII, Table XXXI; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 54–55. Table XIII, Plate 15; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 171–74; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 239.

1014. The eight-year-old boy Yazdagird (this age being more probable than the fifteen or sixteen years of certain Christian and later Islamic sources, since Yazdagird's coins show him as beardless until the tenth year of his reign and he is described by al-Ṭabarī, I, 1067, p. 410 below, as being twenty-eight years old when he was killed at Marw in 651) was thus raised to power in Fārs and crowned in the temple of Anāhīd at Iṣṭakhr by a faction opposed to the one in Ctesiphon that had made Farrukhzādh king there. Hostility toward the new king is reflected in the statement of al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 198, that Yazdagird was regarded as ill-omened

When the great men of state among the people of Iṣṭakhr received the news that the people of al-Madā'in had rebelled against Farrukhzādh, they brought Yazdajird to a fire temple called "Ardashīr's fire temple,"[1015] crowned him there and hailed him as king. He was, however, only a young boy. Then they brought him to al-Madā'in and killed Farrukhzādh Khusraw by means of treachery after he had reigned for one year. In this fashion, the way was open for Yazdajird to assume the royal power, except that, compared with the power of his forefathers, his power was like a phantom of the imagination and a vision in a dream (al-khayāl wa-al-ḥulm).[1016] The great men of state and the ministers exercised his royal authority because of his youth. The most illustrious and the shrewdest of his ministers was the Chief of the Servants. The power of the Persian kingdom grew weak, and its enemies attacked it boldly from all sides, made incursions into Yazdajird's lands, and devastated parts of them. The Arabs attacked his lands when two years had elapsed of his reign or, it is said alternatively, after four years. His whole life span, until he was killed, was twenty-eight years.[1017] from the start because his mother had been a mere cupper (ḥajjāmah) in Khusraw Abarwēz's service, but was brought out from obscurity from sheer necessity; cf. al-Ṭabarī's information, I, 1044, p. 380 above, on Yazdagird's mother). Nöldeke, trans. 397 n. 3, 434, that Yazdagird's accession must have fallen within the Persian year 16 June 632–16 June 633, since the Zoroastrians begin their era in this year of Yazdagird III's accession.

---

1015. That is, the fire temple at Jūr/Fīrūzābād whose building by Ardashīr I is recorded in al-Ṭabarī, I, 817, p. 11 above.

1016. Nöldeke, trans. 397 n. 5, noted that Yazdagird had considerable trouble in establishing his authority throughout all the Persian lands, with important provinces like Azerbaijan, Mesopotamia, and Khurāsān at first reluctant to acknowledge him. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 119, speaks of his struggles when raised to the throne (but anachronistically, it would appear, with Āzarmīgdukht). It seems that Rustam threw his weight behind the new king in the short period before he became embroiled with the invading Arabs. Numismatic evidence (see n. 1013 above) shows the existence of a rival for the throne, Hormizd (V), who challenged Yazdagird's position and whose center of power Armenian sources place in Niṣībīn in Upper Mesopotamia.

1017. Yazdagird III ruled from the end of 632 or the beginning of 633 till his death at Marw in 31/651 (al-Ṭabarī, I, 2872–84, tr. R. S. Humphreys, The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation, XV, The Crisis of the Caliphate. The Reign of 'Uthmān, 78–90). The Arabs began their probes into Iraq by the end of the second year of his reign, i.e., in 634 or 635, with the major battle for the province coming a year or two later. Yazdagird's name appears on coins as YZDKRTY. See

There are various further historical reports about this ruler Yazdajird and his sons, which I will mention later, if God wills, in their appropriate place, including the conquests by the Muslims of the land of the Persians, and what was the ultimate fate of Yazdajird and his sons.[1018]

---

on his coins, Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 70, 394–96, 494–95, Plate XXIII, Table XXXI; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 54–55, Table XIII, Plate 15; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 175–78; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 240.

The other Arabic sources on Yazdagird's accession and first few years include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 666–67; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 198; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 119; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 234 = § 655; idem, Tanbīh, 103, trans. 147; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 53; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 501. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 353, who merely quotes the fact of Yazdagird's accession and that he reigned for four years, i.e., this source regards his reign as closing with the Arabs' capture of the capital al-Madā'in in March 637 and Yazdagird's subsequent gradual retreat eastward across Persia from Ḥulwān and Iṣfahān to Iṣṭakhr (thus according to such Arabic sources as al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 315; al-Ṭabarī, I, 2439–40, tr. The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation. XIII. The Conquest of Iraq, Southwestern Persia and Egypt. The Middle Years of 'Umar's Caliphate, 20; the Anonymus Guidi, tr. 33, has Yazdagird flee via Khūzistān) to Kirmān and then his being killed in Khurāsān. Of modern studies, see Nöldeke, trans. 397 nn. 3–5, 431; Frye, The Golden Age of Persia. The Arabs in the East, London 1975, 57–67; 'Abd al-Ḥusain Zarrīnkūb, "The Arab Conquest of Iran and Its Aftermath," 4, 12–25.

1018. One of Yazdagird's sons, Fīrūz (III), spent the rest of his life after his father's death on the far northeastern fringes of the Islamic lands. He seems to have received aid from the Hephthalite or Turkish local ruler of Bactria/Ṭukhāristān, and may, in the surmise of J. Harmatta, have held power in Sistan for a short period ca. 660. He became a Chinese vassal and hoped to make a comeback with Chinese help; but he was driven out of the upper Oxus region by the Arabs, subsequently made his way to the imperial capital Ch'ang-an and died in China. Fīrūz's son, whose name is known only from Chinese sources as Ni-nieh-shih (presumably Narseh) continued to hover round the regions of Sogdia and Ṭukhāristān, stirring up trouble against the Arabs, but China was too distant to give these Sāsānid claimants any effective military support; he had to fall back into China and died there soon after 707. The presence of Sāsānid descendants in the Chinese capital Ch'ang-an seems nevertheless to be attested, according to Chinese sources, into the ninth century. See Marquart, Ērānšahr, 68, 133–34; J. Harmatta, "The Middle Persian-Chinese Bilingual Inscription from Hsian and the Chinese-Sāsānian Relations," 373–76; Frye, "The Political History," 176; W. Watson, "Iran and China," 547.

[The Chronology of the World]

The whole of the period of years that elapsed from Adam's being sent down to earth (i.e., his expulsion from the Garden of Eden) up to the time of the Prophet's Hijrah, according to what the Jews [1068] among the People of the Book say and according to what they allege is in the all-embracing text of the Torah (al-Tawrāt al-ṣūrah) setting forth the lives of the prophets and kings, is 4,642 years and a few months.[1019]

According to what the Christians say and assert in their Torah in the Greek language (i.e., the Septuagint), that extent of time was 5,992 years and a few months.

With regard to the whole of that, according to what the Persian Zoroastrians say, it was 4,182 years, ten months, and nineteen days, with the proviso that included in that span is the period of time between the Hijrah and the killing of Yazdajird—that is, thirty years, two months and fifteen days—and the further proviso that this system of reckoning of theirs and the beginning of their era (ta'rīkh) runs from the time of Jayūmart, Jayūmart being Ādam (Adam), the progenitor of all mankind, to whom every human being can be traced back, as I have clearly set forth in this book.

Concerning the learned scholars of Islam, I have mentioned previously what certain of them have said regarding it, and I shall now mention some of those whose fame has not come down to the present day. These persons say that from the time of Ādam to that of Nūḥ (Noah) was ten centuries (a century, qarn, being a hundred years), between Nūḥ and Ibrāhīm (Abraham), ten centuries (a century being a hundred years again) and between Ibrāhīm and Mūsā, son of 'Imrān (Moses, son of Amram), ten centuries (a century being a hundred years yet again).

---

1019. In n. a to his text, Nöldeke cited the origin of this phrase as Syriac ṣūrat kətāb "the complete text of the sacred books."

Mention of Those Who Say That

There related to us Ibn Bashshār—Abū Dāwūd—Hammām b. Qatādah— 'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās, who said: Between Ādam and Nūḥ there were ten centuries, and all of them (i.e., the people of this period) followed a path of divine truth (sharī'ah min al-ḥaqq). [1069]

There related to us al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar b. Wāqid al-Aslamī,[1020] from several of the learned scholars, who all said: Between Ādam and Nūḥ were ten centuries (a century being a hundred years), between Nūḥ and Ibrāhīm, ten centuries (a century being a hundred years again), and between Ibrāhīm and Mūsā, son of 'Imrān, ten centuries (a century being a hundred years yet again).

It was transmitted from 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī—Abū 'Awānah—'Āṣim al-Aḥwal—Abū 'Uthmān—Salmān, who said: The interval (al-fatrah) between Muhammad and 'Īsā (Jesus), peace be upon them both, was six hundred years.[1021]

It was transmitted from Fuḍayl b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb—Ja'far b. Sulaymān—'Awf, who said: Between 'Īsā and Mūsā was 600 years.

1020. That is, the historian al-Wāqidī (130–207/747–823), who derived this nisbah from his grandfather's name and that of al-Aslamī from being a mawlā of a member of the Medinan clan of Aslam. Of his many works on the pre-Islamic history of Mecca and Medina and on early Islamic history, only the Kitāb al-maghāzī and possibly a Kitāb al-riddah survive, but his work was much used by slightly later authors such as Ibn Sa'd. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 294–97; *EI*², s.v. al-Wāḳidī (S. Leder).

1021. The literal meaning of fatrah is "relaxation, weakening," thence "elapsing, period of time," and the term is especially applied in early Islamic usage to the interval between any two of the numerous prophetic messengers (rusul) who preceded the advent of Muḥammad. Al-Jāḥiẓ explained that these intervals were called fatrahs because there was a "slackening" of observance, with a reinvigoration of religion when a new rasūl came along. It became particularly used, as here, for the lengthy period without any prophets between Jesus and Muḥammad. See *EI*², s.v. Fatra (Ch. Pellat), and n. 1025 below.

There related to me Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Ibn 'Ulayyah—Sa'īd b. Abī Ṣadaqah—Muḥammad b. Sīrīn, who said: I was informed that Ka'b said that God's words, "O sister of Hārūn (Aaron)" do not refer to Hārūn the brother of Mūsā.[1022] He related: 'Ā'ishah said to him, "You are wrong!" He replied, "O Mother of the Faithful! If the Prophet said it, then he is the most knowledgeable and the best one,[1023] but if not, I find a space of six hundred years between them." He related: She was thereupon silent.

There related to me al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās, who said: Between Mūsā, son of 'Imrān, and 'Īsā, son of Maryam (Mary), was nineteen hundred years, but there was no interval (fatrah) between them, because during this period, God sent a thousand prophets from the Banū Isrā'īl (Children of Israel), apart from those whom He sent to other [1070] nations. Between the birth of 'Īsā and the Prophet was 569 years, in the first part of which He sent three prophets, as in His words, "When We sent to them two persons, and they branded them as liars, We strengthened them with a third person";[1024] the person whom He sent as a strengthener was Sham'ūn (Simon), one of the Apostles. The interval during which God did not send any prophets was 434 years.[1025] When Jesus was raised up (i.e., in his

---

1022. Qur'ān, XIX, 29/28, there being an apparent confusion here of Maryam, the Virgin Mary, with Maryam, the sister of Moses and Aaron. However, J. M. Rodwell in his The Koran Translated from the Arabic, 385 n. 2, admitted that Muḥammad seems here to be guilty of an anachronism, but further pointed out that the anachronism might be only apparent, since even if Aaron, the brother of Moses, is meant, Maryam, the Virgin Mary, could be called his sister because she was of Levitical stock. Ka'b (i.e., Ka'b al-Aḥbār, on whom see n. 371 above) is in this tradition implying that the Hārūn/Aaron here is another person. See the extensive discussion in R. Paret, Der Koran. Kommentar und Konkordanz, 65.

1023. For the Leiden text's khayr, the Cairo text, II, 236, has, following al-Ṭabarī's Tafsīr, the reading akhbar "giving more faithful reports."

1024. Qur'ān, XXXVI, 13/14. The words occur at the opening of the parable, or rather, story, of the unbelieving town, Antioch being the city commonly identified with this. K. Ahrens referred to a story of St. Peter at Antioch given in Ps.-Clement of Alexandria, see Bell, A Commentary on the Qur'ān, II, 138–39. Muslim tradition came to connect the story of the unbelieving town with the legendary character Ḥabīb the Carpenter who urged the town's inhabitants not to reject the three messengers who had been sent to them by God. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥabīb al-Nadjdjār (G. Vajda).

1025. We thus have an attempt to fill up part at least of the fatrah between Jesus Ascension to Heaven), he was thirty-two years and six months old, and his period of prophethood was thirty months. God raised him [to Heaven] corporeally, and he is still alive at this moment.

There related to me Muḥammad b. Sahl b. ʿAskar—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil, who heard Wahb [b. Munabbih] say that fifty-six hundred years have elapsed of this present world.

There related to me Ibrāhīm b. Saʿīd al-Jawharī—Yaḥyā b. Ṣāliḥ—al-Ḥasan b. Ayyūb al-Ḥaḍramī—ʿAbd Allāh b. Busr, who said: The Messenger of God said to me: "You will certainly live for a century (qarn)!" And he did [in fact] live for a hundred years.

This is what was transmitted from the learned scholars of Islam concerning this, and in what they say there is a very wide variation. This is seen in the fact that al-Wāqidī told the story, on the authority of a group of learned scholars, that they said what I have mentioned as his transmission from them. On the basis of what he said, one must take the whole span of years of this present world up to the birth of our Prophet as being forty-six years, but on the basis of what Ibn ʿAbbās said, as transmitted by Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās, one must take [1071] the figure up to the birth of the Prophet as fifty-five hundred years. As for Wahb b. Munabbih, he mentioned what he had to say in one bloc, without breaking it down into details, that is, up to his own time [is a span of] fifty-six hundred years. The entire extent in time of this present world is, according to Wahb, six thousand years, of which there had elapsed up to his own time, in his view, fifty-six hundred years. Wahb b. Munabbih died in the year 114 of the Hijrah [/A.D. 732].[1026] Thus the remainder of the extent of this present world, from the time we are actually in now, is, according and Muḥammad; other Muslim scholars endeavored to find also within it persons who had at least rejected the worship of idols and had followed an ascetic way of life, such as the ḥanīfs in pre-Islamic Mecca and the poet-ascetic of al-Ṭāʾif, Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt (on whom see n. 603 above), called collectively the ahl al-fatrah. See *EI*², s.v. Fatra (Ch. Pellat).

---

1026. This is one of the two dates given in the sources for Wahb's death, the other being 110/728–29. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 305; *EI*², s.v. Wahb b. Munabbih (R. G. Khoury).

to Wahb's words, 215 years.[1027] This is what Wahb b. Munabbih says, conformable to what Abū Ṣāliḥ transmited from Ibn 'Abbās.

Some authorities state that from the time of the descent [to earth] of Ādam to the mission of our Prophet is 6,113 years, [this span comprising,] in their view, from Ādam's descent to the earth up to the Flood, 2,256 years; from the Flood to the birth of Ibrāhīm, the Friend of the Merciful One,[1028] 1,079 years; from the birth of Ibrāhīm to Mūsā's exodus with the Banū Isrā'īl from Egypt, 565 years; from Mūsā's exodus with the Banū Isrā'īl from Egypt to the building of the Sacred Temple (al-Bayt al-Maqdis)—this being four years after the accession to royal power of Sulaymān, son of Dāwūd (Solomon, son of David)—636 years; from the building of the Temple to al-Iskandar's (Alexander the Great's) accession to royal power, 717 years; from al-Iskandar's accession to the birth of [1072] 'Īsā, son of Maryam, 369 years; from the birth of 'Īsā to Muḥammad's mission, 551 years; and from Muḥammad's mission to his Hijrah from Mecca to Medina, thirteen years.

Some authorities have related from Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās, who said that from Ādam to Nūḥ was twenty-two hundred years; from Nūḥ to Ibrāhīm, 1,143 years; from Ibrāhīm to Mūsā, 575 years; from Mūsā to Dāwūd, 179 years; from Dāwūd to 'Īsā, 1,053 years; and from 'Īsā to Muḥammad, 600 years.

Al-Haytham b. 'Adī[1029] has related from certain members of the People of the Book, saying that from Ādam to the Flood was 2,256 years; from the Flood to the death of Ibrāhīm, 1,020 years; from Ibrāhīm's death to the Banū Isrā'īl's entry into Egypt, seventy-five years; from Ya'qūb's (Jacob's) entry into Egypt to Moses' exodus from it, 430 years; from the building of the Sacred Temple to the accession to royal power of Bukht-Naṣṣar (Nebuchadnezzar) and 1027. That is, the period of time between Wahb's death and the date when al-Ṭabarī was writing his History, which would bring the latter date up to 319 [/931].

---

1028. Ibrāhīm/Abraham being called in Muslim lore Khalīl Allāh, the "Friend of God," this being based on Qur'ān, IV, 124/125 "and God took Abraham as a friend," echoing Isa. xli. 8.

1029. That is, the Kūfan akhbārī or historian (d. 204, 207 or 209/819–24), a source for al-Ya'qūbī, al-Ṭabarī, al-Mas'ūdī, and other historians. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 272; *EI*², s.v. al-Haytham b. 'Adī (Ch. Pellat).

the destruction of the Sacred Temple,[1030] 446 years; from the accession of Bukht-Naṣṣar to the accession to royal power of al-Iskandar,[1031] 436 years; and from al-Iskandar's accession to the year 206 of the Hijrah [/A.D. 821–822], 1,245 years.

1030. The Old Testament Nebuchadnezzar (nbwkdn'ṣr, a scribal error in the masoretic text for nbwkdr'ṣr), Babylonian Nabû-kudurri-uṣur, "the god Nabu has guarded the estate [succession]," came to power in 605 B.C.; various dates, including 588, 587, and 586 B.C. are given for his sack of Jerusalem and destruction of the Temple there. The extents of time between the events delineated here, going up to Alexander's accession (see below) are, of course, fanciful.

1031. That is, Alexander the Great (365–323 B.C.), whose accession to the throne of Macedon took place in 336 B.C. on his father Philip II's assassination. Al-Ṭabarī's computation of 1,245 years is thus an exaggeration, even if hijrī lunar years and not solar ones are used.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME VI

Muḥammad at Mecca

TRANSLATED AND ANNOTATED BY
W. MONTGOMERY WATT AND M. V. McDONALD

The Lineage of the Messenger of God [I073]

ʿAbdallāh (His Father)

The name of the Messenger of God was Muḥammad, and he was the son of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib. ʿAbdallāh, the father of the Messenger of God, was his father's youngest son. ʿAbdallāh, al-Zubayr, and ʿAbd Manāf, who is Abū Tālib, were sons of ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib by the same mother, Fāṭimah bt. ʿAmr b. ʿĀʾidh b. ʿImrān b. Makhzūm. This information was given to us by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Ibn Ishāq.

Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father: ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, the father of the Messenger of God, Abū Ṭālib, whose name was ʿAbd Manāf, al-Zubayr, ʿAbd al-Kaʿbah, ʿĀtikah, Barrah and Umaymah, the children of ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, were full brothers and sisters, their mother being Fāṭimah bt. ʿAmr b. ʿĀʾidh b. ʿImrān b. Makhzūm b. Yaqaẓah.

Yūnus b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Ibn Wahb—Yūnus b. Yazīd—Ibn Shihāb—Qubayṣah b. Dhuʾayb: A woman had sworn to sacrifice her son at the Kaʿbah if she achieved a certain matter; she did (in fact) achieve it and then she came to al-Madīnah to seek a legal opinion on her oath.[1] She went to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar, who said, "I do not know that God has given any command concerning oaths other other than that one should be faithful to them." "Am I to sacrifice

1. This incident probably occurred a few years after A.D. 661 when the seat of the caliphate had been moved to Damascus. Among the religious authorities remaining in al-Madinah were ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar, son of the caliph ʿUmar, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās, son of Muḥammad's uncle al-ʿAbbās.

my son, then?" she asked. 'Abdallāh replied, "God has forbidden you to kill one another," and said no more to her than that. Then she went to 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās and asked his opinion. He replied, "God has commanded you to be faithful to your oaths and has for-[1074] bidden you to kill one another. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim vowed that if ten of his sons grew to manhood he would sacrifice one of them. He cast lots among them, and the lot fell on 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, whom he loved more than any other. Then he said, 'O God, shall I sacrifice him or a hundred camels?' He cast lots between him and the camels, and the lot fell on the hundred camels." Then Ibn 'Abbās said to the woman, "My opinion is that you should sacrifice a hundred camels in place of your son."

Finally the matter came to the attention of Marwān,[2] who was governor of al-Madīnah at that time, and he said, "I do not think that either Ibn 'Umar or Ibn 'Abbās has given a correct opinion; no vow which contravenes God's commands can be binding. Ask God's forgiveness, repent, give alms, and perform such charitable actions as you are able. As for sacrificing your son, God has forbidden you to do that." The people were delighted and lost in admiration at this verdict, and concluded that Marwān's opinion was the correct one; from that time on they adopted the opinion that no vow which contravenes God's commands can be binding.

Ibn Isḥāq gives a fuller account of this matter of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib's vow than one given above.[3] Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib b. Ḥāshim, so it is said—and God knows best—had vowed, when Quraysh made difficulties for him about the digging of Zamzam, that if ten sons were born to him and reached maturity so that they could protect him, he would sacrifice one of them to God at the Ka'bah.[4] When he had ten sons grown to maturity and he knew that they

2. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, of the clan of Umayyah, became Caliph in 684 and died in 685. The story puts the Umayyads in a favorable light.

3. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 97-101.

4. The name Allāh has throughout been translated as "God." It should be kept in mind, however, that in the pre-Islamic period it does not necessarily mean "God" in a monotheistic sense. It is known from the Qur'ān (29:61-5; 39:38; etc.) that many pre-Islamic Arabs believed in Allāh as a high or supreme god superior to the other gods whom they also recognized. See: Watt, "Belief in a 'high god' in pre-Islamic Mecca," Journal of Semitic Studies, xvi (1971):35-40; "The Qurān and Belief in a 'High God,'" Der Islam, lvi (1979),: 205-11. This explains how it was possible for 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib to stand beside Hubal while praying to Allāh, as would protect him, he brought them together, told them of his vow, and called on them to keep faith with God in this matter. They expressed their obedience, and asked what they should do. [1075] He replied, "Let every one of you take an arrow, write his name on it, and bring it to me." They did this, and he went into the presence of Hubal in the interior of the Ka'bah. Hubal was the greatest of the idols of Quraysh in Mecca, and stood by a well inside the Ka'bah in which were gathered the offerings made to the Ka'bah.

Beside Hubal there were seven arrows, on each of which there was writing. On one was written, "the blood money"; when a dispute arose as to which of them was responsible for paying blood money, they cast lots with the seven arrows to settle the matter. On another arrow was written "yes"; when they were considering some course of action, they cast lots, and if the "yes" arrow came out they acted on it. Another arrow had "no," and if that came out they did not proceed with their course of action. On the other arrows was written "of you", "attached",[5] "not of you," and "Water." When they wanted to dig for water they cast lots with the arrows, including this last one, and wherever it fell they started digging. Whenever they wanted to circumcise a boy, arrange a marriage, or bury someone who had died, or when they were in doubt as to the descent of one of them, they took him to Hubal together with a hundred dirhams and a slaughtering-camel which they would give to the custodian who used to cast lots with the arrows. Then they would bring forward the person about whom they wished to consult the oracle and would say, "O god of ours, this is so-and-so the son of so-and-so, about whom we wish to know such-and-such; so reveal the truth concerning him." Then they would say to the custodian of the arrows, "Cast!" The latter would cast them, and if "of you" fell to the person in question, that meant that he was a fellow tribesman; if it was "not of you," he was a confederate; and if it was "attached," he remained as he was, linked to them neither by descent nor alliance. In matters [1076] other than these, when "yes" came out they acted accordingly, and when "no" came out they deferred the matter until the following year , when they brought it up again. This recourse to the way the arrows fell was their ultimate method of deciding their affairs.

described below.

5. Ar. mulṣaq; according to Ibn Manẓūr this means one who lives among a tribe but is not of them. See Lisān s.v. L-Ṣ-Q.

Accordingly, ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib said to the custodian of the arrows, "Cast my sons' arrows to determine their fate," and told him of the vow which he had made. Each of them gave the custodian his arrow with name written on it. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was his father's youngest son and, it is claimed, the one he loved most, and ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib thought that if the arrow missed (this son) he himself would be able to endure the outcome. ʿAbdallāh was the father of the Messenger of God. When the custodian of the arrows took the arrows to cast them, ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib stood beside Hubal in the interior of the Kaʿbah, calling upon God. The custodian of the arrows cast, and the lot fell against ʿAbdallāh. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib took him by the hand, took a large knife, and went up to Isāf and Nāʿilah, two idols of Quraysh at which they used to slaughter their sacrifices, to sacrifice him. However, the Quraysh rose from their assemblies and came to him, saying, "What do you intend to do, ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib?" He replied "To sacrifice him," but the Quraysh and ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib's other sons said, "By God! You shall never sacrifice him but must get an excuse for not doing so. If you act thus men will never stop bringing their sons to sacrifice them, and how will the people survive in this way?" Then al-Mughīrah b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. Makhzūm, from whose tribe ʿAbdallāh's mother was, said, "By God! You shall never sacrifice him, but must get an excuse for not doing so. If it takes all we possess to ransom him, we shall do so."

The Quraysh and the other sons of ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib then said, "Do not do this, but take him to the Ḥijāz. There is a sorceress there who has a familiar spirit; ask her, and you will know what [1077] to do. If she commands you to sacrifice him, you will sacrifice him, and if she commands you to do something which offers relief to you and to him, you can accept it." They went to al-Madīnah where, it is claimed, they found that she was in Khaybar. They rode until they reached her and consulted her. ʿAbd Al-Muṭṭalib told her the story about himself and his son, what he had intended to do to him, and the vow which he had made, and she said to them, "Retire from me for today, until my familiar visits me and I can ask him."

They retired from her, and when they had left her presence

ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib stood and prayed to God. On the following day they went back to her and she said, "Yes, news has come to me. How much is the blood-money among you?" They replied, "Ten camels," which it was. "Go back to your country, then," she said, "and bring forward the young man and ten camels, and cast the arrows. If they fall against the young man, add to the camels until your Lord is satisfied. If they fall against the camels, sacrifice them, and your Lord will be satisfied and the young man will be saved."

They left and returned to Mecca, and when they had all agreed on the matter, ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib stood and prayed to God. Then they brought forward ʿAbdallāh and ten camels, while ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was in the interior of the Kaʿbah beside Hubal praying to God. The arrow fell against ʿAbdallāh, so they added ten camels, making twenty, while ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib stood where he was praying to God. Then they cast again, and the arrow fell against ʿAbdallāh, so they added another ten camels, making thirty. They went on in this way, casting the arrows and adding ten camels every time the arrow fell against him, until they had cast ten times and the number of camels had reached a hundred, while ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib continued to pray. Then they cast again, and the arrows fell against the camels. Then the Quraysh and those others present said, "Your Lord is satisfied at last, ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib." They claim that he said, "No, by God, not until I cast the arrows against them three times." So they cast the arrows between the camels and ʿAbdallāh while ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib prayed, and they fell against the camels; then they did it again, a second and a third time, with the same result. Then the camels were slaughtered and left there, and no man or wild beast was turned back from eating them. [1078]

ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib left, taking his son ʿAbdallāh by the hand. It is alleged that he passed by a woman of the Banū Asad called Umm Qattāl bt. Nawfal b. Asad b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā, the sister of Waraqah b. Nawfal b. Asad; she was by the Kaʿbah. When she looked at his face she said, "Where are you going, ʿAbdallāh?" "With my father," he said. She said, "I have for you as many camels as were slaughtered for you, so sleep with me now." "My father is with me," he replied, "and I cannot oppose his wishes or leave him." ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib took him away and brought him to Wahb b. ʿAbd Manāf b. Zuhrah, who was the leading man of the Banū Zuhrah in age and eminence at that time, and the latter married him to (his daughter) Āminah bt. Wahb, who was then the most excellent woman in Quraysh as regards genealogy and status. Her mother was Barrah bt. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā b. ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Dār b. Qusayy, Barrah's mother was Umm Ḥabīb bt. Asad b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā b. Qusayy, and Umm Ḥabīb's mother was Barrah bt. ʿAwf b. ʿAbīd b. ʿAwīj b. ʿAdī b. Kaʿb b. Luʾayy.

It is alleged that he consummated his marriage to her there as soon as he married her, that he lay with her and that she conceived Muḥammad; then he left her presence and came to the woman who had propositioned him, and said to her, "Why do you not [1079] make the same proposition to me today which you made to me yesterday?" She replied, "The light which was with you yesterday has left you, and I have no need of you today." She had heard (about this) from her brother Waraqah b. Nawfal, who was a Christian and had studied the scriptures; he had discovered that a prophet from the descendants of Ismāʿīl was to be (sent) to this people; this had been one of the purposes of his study.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muhammad b. Isḥāq—his father, Isḥāq b. Yasār: ʿAbdallāh paid a visit to a wife whom he had in addition to Āminah bt. Wahb b. ʿAbd Manāf b. Zuhrah. He had been working in clay[6] and traces of the clay were still on him, and when he invited her to lie with him she made him wait because of this. He went out, performed his ablutions, washed off the clay which was on him, and went to Āminah's quarters. He went in and lay with her, and she conceived Muḥammad. Then he passed by this other woman and said, "Do you wish to lie with me?" "No," she replied. "When you passed by me before you had a white blaze between your eyes. You invited me to lie with you and I refused, so you went to Āminah and she has taken it away."

They allege that this wife of his used to relate that when he passed by her he had between his eyes something like the white blaze on a horse's forehead, that she invited him in the hope that he would lie with her, but that he refused and went in to Āminah bt. Wahb and lay with her, as a result of which she conceived the Messenger of God.

6. R.B. Serjeant in his comments on Alfred Guillaume's translation of the Sīrah (Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, xxi[1958]:1-14 says this means a cultivated plot or field. There was, however, little cultivable land near Mecca.

ʿAlī b. Ḥarb al-Mawṣilī—Muhammad b. ʿUmārah al-Qurashī—al-Zanjī b. Khālid—Ibn Jurayj—ʿAtāʾ—Ibn ʿAbbās: When ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was taking ʿAbdallāh to marry him to Āminah, they passed by a female soothsayer from the tribe of Khathʿam called Fāṭimah bt. Murr, a convert to Judaism from the people of Tabālah, who had read the scriptures and who saw light in his face. "Young man," she said, "would you like to lie with me now, and I will give you a hundred camels?" He replied,

As for unlawful relations, I would sooner die, [1080] and as for lawful marriage, there can be none, as I clearly recognize.
So how can that be which you desire?

Then he said, "I am with my father and I cannot leave him." His father took him and married him to Āminah bt. Wahb b. ʿAbd Manaf b. Zuhrah, and he stayed with her for three days. Then he left her, and when he passed by the Khathʿamī woman he felt a desire to accept the proposition which she had made, and he asked her, "Would you like what you wanted before?" "Young man," she said, "I am not, by God, a woman of questionable morals. I saw light in your face and wished it to be within me, but God willed that He should place it where He wished. What did you do after you left me?" He said, "My father married me to Āminah bt. Wahb and I stayed with her for three days." Then Fāṭimah bt. Murr recited the following verses:

I saw a sign which shone and gleamed in the black rainclouds.
I comprehended it as light which illuminated what was around it like the full moon.
I hoped to have it as a source of pride which I might take back with me,
but not everyone who strikes a flint produces fire.
By God, no other Zuhrī woman has plundered your person of that which Āminah has, and yet she is unaware of it.

She also said:
Banū Hāshim, Āminah has left (bearing something) [1081]

from your brother,
while there is a dispute over marriage,
Just as wicks leave the lamp behind when it goes out,
having absorbed its oil.
Not all the fortune which the young man inherits comes from resolve, nor does that which escapes him come from remissness.
So if you desire something behave with restraint, for two grandfathers combined will ensure it for you.
Either a hand with fingers clenched or else a hand with fingers outstretched will ensure it for you.
When Āminah conceived that which she conceived from him, she conceived an incomparable glory.

Al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Ma'mar and others—al-Zuhrī: 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib was the handsomest of the men of Quraysh. They told Āminah bt. Wahb of his handsomeness and his appearance and asked if she would like to marry him, so she married him. He consummated his marriage to her, and she conceived the Messenger of God. 'Abdallāh's father sent him to al-Madiñah for provisions, where he died. When he was late in returning, 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib sent his son al-Ḥārith to look for him, but al-Hārith found that he had died.

Al-Wāqidī: This is an error. In our view the consensus of opinion concerning the marriage of 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib is that which is related to us by 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far al-Zuhrī—Umm Bakr bt. al-Miswar who said: 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib came with his son 'Abdallāh, seeking a wife for himself and one for his son; they were married at the same time. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib married Hālah bt. Uhayb b. 'Abd Manāf b. Zuhrah, and 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib married Āminah bt. Wahb b. 'Abd Manāf b. Zuhrah.[7]

[1082] Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—al-Wāqidī: In our opinion, the most trustworthy version about which there is no dispute among our fellow scholars, is that 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib came from Syria in a caravan belonging to Quraysh, stopped at al-Madīnah owing to illness, and remained there until he died. He was buried in the house of al-Nābighah (or, some say, of al-Tābi'ah) in the small room on your left as you enter. There is no dispute about this among our fellow scholars.

7. Ibn Sa'd, Tabaqāt, 1:58, 3-17; the previous paragraph has not been found in Ibn Sa'd, but the following is in Ibn Sa'd, Tabaqāt, 1:61.

'Abd al Muṭṭalib (His Grandfather)

'Abdallāh was the son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, whose name was Shaybah. I was told on the authority of Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father—that he was given this name because his hair was white, (shaybah means white hair).

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq; and Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father; and al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar: Some of them narrate a version which overlaps that of others and some of them add to the versions of others: He was known as 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib for the following reason. His father Hāshim had set off for Syria on a commercial expedition taking the Madīnan route, and when he reached al-Madīnah he stayed with 'Amr b. Zayd b. Labīd al-Khazrajī. There he saw Salmā bt. 'Amr (Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥaq: Salmā bt. Zayd b. 'Amr)[8] b. Labīd b. Ḥarām b. Khiddash b. Jundub b. 'Adī b. al-Najjār, admired her, and asked her father 'Amr for her hand in marriage. The latter married her to him, stipulating that if she gave birth to any children it should be among her own family. Hāshim went on his way without consummating the marriage, consummating it instead on his way back from Syria while staying with [1083] her family in Yathrib. She became pregnant, and he left for Mecca taking her with him. When she became heavy with child he took her back to her family, while he himself went on to Syria, and died there in Gaza. Salmā gave birth to his son 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, who remained in Yathrib for seven or eight years. Then a man from the Banū al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd Manāt passed through Yathrib and saw some boys competing at archery. When Shaybah hit the mark he would say, "I am the son of Hāshim, I am the son of the Lord of the Valley?"[9] The Ḥārithī said, "Who are you?" and he replied, "I

8. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 88 has Salmā bt. Amr; see Ibn Sa'd, Tabaqāt, Ṭabarī is not following either source exactly.

9. The word baṭḥā' (plural biṭāḥ), here translated "valley," is properly the bed of a torrent. The central part of Mecca round the Ka'bah was known as al-Biṭāḥ, in am Shaybah b. Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf." When the Ḥārithī arrived back in Mecca he said to al-Muṭṭalib (brother of Hāshim), who was sitting in the Ḥijr (a part of the Ka'bah), "Abū al-Ḥārith, do you know that in Yathrib I found some boys competing at archery and among them was a boy who, when he hit the mark, would say, 'I am the son of Hāshim, I am the son of the Lord of the Valley?' " Al-Muṭṭalib said, "By God, I shall not return to my family until I bring him here!" "My she-camel is here in the courtyard," said the Ḥārithī, "ride her!"

Al-Muṭṭalib mounted the camel, (eventually) arriving in Yathrib in the early evening. He went to the Banū 'Adī b. al-Najjār, and there he saw some boys playing football in the midst of an assembly. He recognized his brother's son and said to the people, "Is this Hāshim's son?" "Yes," they said, "this is your brother's son, and if you want to take him, do so now, before his mother finds out. If she does find out, she will not let him go, and we shall have to prevent you from taking him." So he called to him and said, "Nephew, I am you uncle, and I want to take you to your people." He made his camel kneel, and without hesitation the boy sat on its rear-quarters. Then he set off with him, and his mother did not find out about it until nightfall, when she was standing bewailing her son; then they told her that his uncle had taken him away.

Al-Muṭṭalib brought him into Mecca during the morning while the men were sitting in their assemblies. They began to say, "Who [1084] is that sitting behind you?" and he replied, "My slave." Finally he brought him home and took him to his wife Khadījah bt. Sa'īd b. Sahm, who said, "Who is this?" "My slave," he replied. He then went out to al-Ḥazwarah and bought a robe with which he clothed Shaybah. In the evening he took him out to the assembly of the Banū 'Abd Manāf, and after that he led him round the streets of Mecca wearing the robe. People said, "This is al-Muṭṭalib's slave ('abd al-Muṭṭalib)," for when his people had asked him he had said, "This is my slave." Al-Muṭṭalib said:

I recognized Shaybah as the sons of al-Najjār were around him competing at archery.

---

contrast to al-Ẓawāhir or outskirts, and the main clans of the Quraysh were called Quraysh al-Biṭāḥ. The Ḥijr (below) was a section of the courtyard immediately surrounding the Ka'bah; see *EI*², s.v. Ka'ba.

ʿAlī b. Ḥarb al-Mawṣilī—Abū Maʿn ʿĪsā, a descendant of Kaʿb b. Mālik[10] —Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr al-Anṣārī—the shaykhs of the Anṣār: Hāshim b. ʿAbd Manāf married a noblewoman from the Banū ʿAdī b. al-Najjār, accepting the condition imposed upon whoever sought her hand in marriage that she should remain in her family's settlement. She married Hāshim and bore him the praiseworthy Shaybah. He grew up among his maternal uncles, treated with respect. While he was competing with the boys of the Anṣār at archery, he hit the target and said, "I am the son of Hāshim!" A man who was passing through heard him, and when he came to Mecca he said to the boy's uncle al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbd Manāf, "I was passing by the settlement of the Banū Qaylah[11] and saw a boy of such-and-such a description competing with their boys at archery. He claimed to be your brother's son, and you should not leave such a fine boy to live among strangers."

Al-Muṭṭalib rode to al-Madīnah, and persuaded the boy to travel to Mecca. Then he spoke to the boy's mother, and did not leave her in peace until she gave him permission to take him. He mounted the boy behind him and took him to Mecca. Whenever people met him and said, "Who is this, Muṭṭalib?" he would say, "My slave." This is why he was called ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib. When he arrived in Mecca, al-Muṭṭalib told the boy what his father's property consisted of and made it over to him. (Some time later) Nawfal b. ʿAbd Manāf opposed al-Muṭṭalib in respect of a courtyard which belonged to the latter and unlawfully seized it from him. ʿAbd [1085] al-Muṭṭalib then went to the men of his tribe and asked them to assist him against his uncle, but they said to him, "We cannot intervene between you and your uncle."[12] When he saw what their

10. Kaʿb b. Mālik of the clan of Salimah in al-Madīnah was one of the poets supporting Muḥammad; see. EI, s.v. Kaʿb b. Mālik.

11. The Banū Qaylah are all the Arabs of al-Madīnah, also known in Islamic times as the Anṣār. Qaylah was the mother of al-Aws and al-Khazraj, the ancestors of the two main tribes.

12. It is made clear later that this affair took place after the death of al-Muṭṭalib, when Nawfal was the only surviving son of ʿAbd Manāf. Since other descendants of ʿAbd Manāf would be much younger than Nawfal, they would not have felt able to oppose him. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib then appealed to a wider circle of the men of Quraysh, but it would have been against normal custom for them to interfere in a matter concerning only a single family. They could probably, however, had they so desired, have brought some moral pressure to bear on Nawfal; but many of the merchants of Mecca seem to have been unscrupulous in such matters. An attitude was, he wrote to his maternal uncles telling them about the attitude of Nawfal. Included in his letter were the following lines:

Tell the Banū al-Najjār if you come to them that I am one of them, their son and their close associate.[13]
I think that they are a people who, if I come to them, love to meet me and to hear my voice.
My uncle Nawfal persists in an action from which even a base man would avert his eyes in disgust.

Abū Sa'd b. 'Udas al-Najjārī then led eighty riders to the valley,[14] and when 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib heard of this he went to meet him and said, "Come to my home, uncle!" "Not until I have met Nawfal," he replied. "I left him sitting in the Ḥijr among the shaykhs of Quraysh," said 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. Then his uncle went and stood next to Nawfal, unsheathed his sword, and said, "By the Lord of this edifice, either you return his courtyard to my sister's son, or my sword will drink its fill of your blood!" "By the Lord of this edifice," said Nawfal, "I shall return his courtyard, and I call upon those present to witness this." Then Abū Sa'd said, "Let us go to your house, nephew." He stayed there for three days and performed the lesser pilgrimage ('umrah). On this occasion, 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib recited the following lines:

Māzin, the Banū 'Adī and Dīnār
b. Taym al-Lāt refused to accept that I should be wronged,
As did the lords of Mālik;[15] and after this Nawfal withdrew his pretensions to my property idea of the "wheeling and dealing" which was going on may be obtained from Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 5-7. This story is also of interest as illustrating how matrilineal kinship was still strong in al-Madīnah, whereas in Mecca men were thinking mainly in terms of patrilineal kinship, even though some matrilineal usages continued there. This matter is a complex one. There is a collection of relevant material in Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 373-88. In a sense, 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib was here invoking the matrilineal system against unjust behavior by the patrilineal system.

13. The meaning of wa-l-khamīs is somewhat obscure.

14. Al-abṭaḥ, a variant of baṭḥā', is the central district of Mecca; see n. 8 above.

15. According to the genealogists, Māzin, 'Adī, Dīnār, and Mālik were the four sons of al-Najjār and gave their names to the main subdivisions of the clan, which

Through them God returned my courtyard to me though they were not as closely related to me as my own tribe.

With regard to this matter, Samurah b. ʿUmayr Abū ʿAmr al-Kinānī said:

By my life, Shaybah's maternal uncles, despite being less closely related, are more dutiful and mindful of bloodties than his closely related paternal uncles.
They responded to their newphew's appeal though they were far away, and were not deflected when Nawfal overstepped his rights.
May God requite with good a band of Khazrajīs [1086] who called upon one another to respect family duty;
he who does so is more virtuous.

Faced with this, Nawfal formed a confederacy with the whole of the Banū ʿAbd Shams against the Banū Hāshim.

Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr: I related this story to Mūsā b. ʿĪsā and he said to me, "Ibn Abī Bakr, this is something which the Anṣār relate in order to court our favor, since God has placed sovereignty in our hands.[16] ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was held too dear by his own people to need the Banū al-Najjār to ride to his aid from al-Madīnah." "May God make the amīr prosper," I said, "one who was better than ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib needed their assistance." He had been reclining, but he sat up straight in anger and said, "Who is better than ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib?" "Muḥammad, the Messenger of God," I replied. "You are right," he said and returned to his previous posture. Then he said to his sons, "Write down this anecdote from Ibn Abī Bakr."

The following anecdote concerning ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib and his uncle Nawfal was related to me by Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father—Ziyād b. ʿIlāqah al-Taghlibī, who was born in the

was a large one. Al-Najjār was also known as Taym Allāt, which was later changed to Taym Allāh.

16. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā appears to be an ʿAbbāsid governor. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr al-Anṣārī was a scholar, (d. 132/749); see Ibn Ḥajar Tahdhīb, ix:80

Jāhiliyyah: It was the confederacy between the Banū Hāshim and Khuzā'ah, which led to the Messenger of God conquering Mecca and to saying "Let this cloud empty its rain in aid of the Banū Ka'b."[17] The reason for the beginning of this confederacy was that Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf, who was the last surviving son of 'Abd Manāf, wrongfully deprived 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf of certain courtyards. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib's mother was Salmā bt. 'Amr al-Najjāriyyah of (the tribe of) al- Khazraj. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib asked for justice from his paternal uncle, but he did not treat him justly; so he wrote to his maternal uncles:

My night is made long by my sorrows and cares;
[1087] will anyone take a message to al-Najjār, my uncles,[18]
To inform 'Adī, Dīnār and Māzin and Mālik, the protectors of their clients, of my circumstances?
When I was among you I did not fear any oppressor, and I was respected, inviolable, and carefree.
But when I travelled to my own tribe, urged to travel and leave that situation by my uncle al-Muṭṭalib, Even though I lived a life of ease and joy when he was alive, walking with a proud gait and trailing the hems of my garments, Yet he was swallowed up by a gloomy grave and Nawfal arose to deal unjustly with my property.
Was it because he saw a man bereft of paternal and maternal uncles and without a protector,
That he attacked him and ignored the ties of blood?
When a man is among his paternal and maternal uncles, how immune to attack he is!
Call your men together for war, and defend your nephew against oppression;
do not abandon him, for you are not men to abandon others.
There is no clan like you among the sons of Qaḥtān to come to the aid of a client or to bestow favors.
You are mild to those who behave mildly to you

17. Banū Ka'b b. 'Amr was an important subdivision of the tribe of Khuzā'ah.
18. See n. 15.

and live at peace with you, and are poison[19] to the haughty and overbearing.

Eighty of their riders came to him and made their camels [1088] kneel in the courtyard of the Ka'bah. When Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf saw them he said, "Good morning," but they replied, "No good morning to you, man! Give our nephew redress from the injustice which you have inflicted upon him!" "I will do it," he said, "for the love and respect which I feel for you." Then he gave the courtyards back to his nephew and treated him justly, and they went back to their own country.

These events prompted 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib to form a confederation, and accordingly he summoned Busr b. 'Amr, Warqā b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā[20] and some of the leading men of Khuzā'ah, who entered the Ka'bah with him and drew up a contract of confederation.

After the death of his uncle al-Muṭṭalib b. 'Abd Manāf, 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib held the privilege of providing food and drink to the pilgrims which the sons of 'Abd Manāf had held before him. He was honored among his people and was a man of great importance among them, for not one of them was his equal. He it was who discovered Zamzam, the well of Ishmael, the son of Abraham, and brought out what was buried there, namely, two golden gazelles which Jurhum are said to have buried when they were evicted from Mecca, and Qal'ī[21] swords and coats of mail. He made the swords into a door for the Ka'bah and covered the door with the gazelles in the form of gold plate. This, it is said, is the first gold with which the Ka'bah was ornamented.

'Abd al-Muṭṭalib's patronymic (kunyah)[22] was Abū al-Ḥārith; he was so called because his eldest son was named al-Ḥarith; his own name was Shaybah.

---

19. Vocalized as samām in the Leiden edition, though simām, a pural of samm (poison), would also be possible. "Poison" is almost certainly the meaning here, though it is not given for samām in the dictionaries.

20. Following the correction in the Leiden edition.

21. A well-known type of sword, possibly of Indian origin, and apparently made of or incorporating tin of high quality; see EI^{2}, s.v. Ḳal'ī.

22. The kunyah was a patronymic or name of the form Abū N or Umm N (father or mother of N). N was normally the eldest son; but a kunyah could be given even to childless persons such as Muḥammad's wife 'Ā'ishah.

Hāshim

ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was the son of Hāshim, whose name was ʿAmr; he was called Hāshim because he used to break up (hashama) bread for tharīd[23] for his people in Mecca and feed them with it. Matrūd b. Kaʿb al-Khuzāʿī—or Ibn al-Zibaʿrā, according to Ibn al-Kalbī—says of him:

[1089] ʿAmr who broke up bread for tharīd for his people when the men of Mecca were drought-stricken and lean.

It is said that his people, Quraysh, were stricken by dearth and drought and that he travelled to Palestine and bought flour there. Then he returned to Mecca, gave orders for it to be baked into bread, slaughtered a camel, and made tharīd with the bread. It is also said that he was the first to institute the two yearly caravans, those of winter and summer, for Quraysh.[24]

Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father: ʿAbd Manāf's sons were Hāshim, ʿAbd Shams, the eldest, al-Muṭṭalib, the youngest, the mother of these being ʿĀtikah bt. Murrah al-Sulamiyyah, and Nawfal, whose mother was Wāqidah. They succeeded jointly to their father's authority, and were called "those who make mighty" (al-mujabbirūn). Of them it was said:

O man who is unfastening his saddle,
Why do yo not lodge with the sons of ʿAbd Manāf?

They were the first to obtain for Quraysh guarantees of immunity which allowed them to travel far and wide from the sacred precints of Mecca (Haram). Hāshim obtained for them a treaty with the Greek rulers of Syria and with Ghassān, ʿAbd Shams obtained for them a treaty with the Great Negus as a result of which they travelled regularly to Abyssinia, Nawfal obtained for them a treaty with the Persian emperors as a result of which they travelled regularly to Iraq and Persia, and al-Muṭṭalib obtained for them a treaty with the kings of Ḥimyar as a result of which they travelled regularly to the Yemen. By means of them God made

23. A kind of broth into which bread was crumbled.

24. The winter and summer caravans are referred to in Qurʾān 106:2. The winter caravan is said to have gone to the Yemen and Abyssinia, and the summer one to Syria. Ghassān was an Arab tribe on the southern border of the Byzantine empire in alliance with it; see EI^{2}, s.v.

Quraysh mighty, and they were called "those who make mighty" (al-mujabbirūn).

It is said that Hāshim and ʿAbd Shams were twins and that one was born before the other with one of his fingers stuck to his twin's forehead; when his finger was separated blood flowed; people regarded this as an omen and said, "There will be blood between them."

After his father's death Hāshim succeeded to the office of providing food and drink.

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Saʿd—Hishām[25] b. Muḥammad— [1090]
Maʿrūf b. al-Kharrabūdh al-Makkī—a man of the Āl ʿAdī b. al-Khiyār b. ʿAdī b. Nawfal b. ʿAbd Manāf—his father: Wahb b. ʿAbd Qusayy spoke the following lines on Hāshim's feeding his people with tharīd:

Hāshim took upon himself the responsibility which no other mortal was able to undertake.
He brought them sacks from Syria full of winnowed wheat
And gave the people of Mecca their fill of broken bread, mixing the bread with fresh meat.
The people were surrounded by wooden bowls piled high whose contents were overflowing.

Umayyah b. ʿAbd Shams b. ʿAbd Manāf, who was a man of wealth, was envious of Hāshim and unwillingly attempted to emulate him; but he could not do it, and some of the men of Quraysh gloated over his discomfiture. He was angry and maligned Hāshim, and challenged him to a contest before an arbiter as to which of them was nobler *(manāfarah).*Hāshim did not wish to accept this because of his age and standing, but the Quraysh would not allow him to refuse, and they finally irritated him so much that he said, "I accept this challenge, on condition that the loser slaughters fifty black-eyed camels in the valley of Mecca and leaves Mecca for ten years." Umayyah accepted this, and they chose a Khuzāʿī soothsayer to judge between them. The soothsayer awarded the victory to Hāshim, who took the camels, slaughtered them, and fed those present (at the event). Umayyah 25. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I:43,24-44,11.

then left for Syria and stayed there for ten years. This was the first occasion on which enmity broke out between the families of Hāshim and Umayyah.[26]

[1091] Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—a man of the Banū Kinānah called Ibn Abī Ṣāliḥ and a man from Raqqah, a mawlā of the Banū Asad who was a scholar: 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim and Ḥarb b. Umayyah asked the Negus of Abyssinia to judge which of them was the nobler, but he refused. So they asked Nufayl b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. Riyāḥ b. 'Abdallāh b. Qurṭ b. Rizāḥ b. 'Adī b. Ka'b to judge between them. He said to Ḥarb, "Abū 'Amr, do you challenge a man who is greater than you in height, larger than you in the size of his head, more beautiful of face, more highly born, who has more sons than you, gives more abundant gifts, and is a more influential speaker?" Then he gave the victory to 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib and Ḥarb said, "It is a sign of the degeneration of the times that we made you an arbiter!"

The first of the sons of 'Abd Manāf to die was Hāshim, who died in Gaza in Syria. He was followed by 'Abd Shams, who died in Mecca and was buried in Ajyād. Then Nawfal died at Salmān on the road to Iraq, and finally al-Muṭṭalib died at Radmān in the Yemen.[27] After Hāshim's death the office of feeding and watering the pilgrims passed to his brother al-Muṭṭalib.

'Abd Manāf

Hāshim was the son of 'Abd Manāf, whose name was al-Mughīrah; he was (also) called "al-Qamar" (the moon) on account of his beauty. They claim that Quṣayy used to say, "I have four sons; I named two of them after my idols, one after my settlement and one after myself." These were, respectively, 'Abd Manāf, 'Abd al-'Uzzā, who was the father of Asad, 'Abd al-Dār, and 'Abd Quṣayy, who died childless. All of these, together with his daughter Barrah, were by Ḥubbā bt. Ḥulayl b. Ḥubshiyah b.Salūl b. Ka'b b. 'Amr b. Khuzā'ah.

26. Umayyah is the ancestor of the Umayyad dynasty, as Hāshim is of the 'Abbāsids. The following paragraph appears to be another version of the same story placed a generation later; see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I:5212-20.

27. According to what was said on pp. 1086, and 1087, Nawfal survived al-Muṭṭalib and, after the latter's death, seized property belonging to 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib; see n. 12.

Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father: ʿAbd Manāf was called "al-Qamar," but his name was al-Mughīrah, and he was generally known as ʿAbd Manāf because his mother Ḥubbā offered him to Manāf, the greatest of the idols of Mecca, to show her devotion to it. Of ʿAbd Manāf it was said: [1092]

Quraysh was an egg, and it split open;
the choicest part belongs to ʿAbd Manāf alone.

Quṣayy

ʿAbd Manāf was the son of Quṣayy, whose name was Zayd. He was called Quṣayy for the following reason. His father Kilāb b. Murrah married his mother Fāṭimah bt. Saʿd b. Sayal (whose name was Khayr) b. Ḥamālah b. ʿAwf b. Ghanm b. ʿĀmir al-Jādir b. ʿAmr b. Juʿthumah b. Yashkur of the Azd Shanūʾah; they lived as confederates among the Banū al-Dīl.[28] Fāṭimah bore Zuhrah and Zayd to Kilāb, who died while Zayd was still a child. Zuhrah had grown up and had reached adulthood. Rabīʿah b. Ḥarām b. Ḍinnah b. ʿAbd b. Kabīr b. ʿUdhrah b. Saʿd b. Zayd, one of the Quḍāʿah, then came to Mecca and married Fāṭimah, the mother of Zuhrah and Quṣayy, according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq. This tradition is also related by Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father. Zuhrah had grown up and was a man, while Quṣayy had not long been weaned, so when Rabīʿah took Fāṭimah to the territory of the Banū ʿUdhrah in the Syrian highlands she took Quṣayy with her because he was so young, whereas Zuhrah stayed among his own tribe. After this Fatimah bore Rizāḥ b. Rabīʿah to Rabīʿah, so that Rizāḥ was Quṣayy's half-brother on his mother's side. Rabīʿah had three other sons by another wife, Ḥunn, Maḥmūd, and Julhumah. Zayd [1093] grew up under Rabīʿah's guardianship, and was called Quṣayy (the little distant one) because he lived so far from his tribe. Zuhrah continued to live in Mecca, but while Quṣayy b. Kilāb was in the territory of Quḍāʿah, it is asserted, he regarded himself as being a full member of Rabīʿah b. Ḥarām's family. One day, when Quṣayy had grown up and was a young man, there was some kind of dispute between him and a man of Quḍā'ah. The Quḍā'ī reproached him for being a stranger, and said, "Do not swear by your tribe and your descent, for you are not one of us." Quṣayy went back to his mother, pained at what the man had said, and asked her about it. "By God," she answered, "you are nobler than he and have a nobler father, my son. You are the son of Kilāb b. Murrah b. Ka'b b. Lu'ayy b. Ghālib b. Fihr b. Mālik b. al-Naḍr b. Kinānah al-Qurashī. Your tribe live in Mecca by the Ka'bah and in its neighborhood."

28. Also called Banū al-Duʾil, which is perhaps the original form; see al-Qalqashandī, Nihāyat al-Arab fī Ansāb al-ʿArab, Cairo 1959, p.54. Most of the material about Quṣayy is not in Ibn Hishām, Sīrah; see 75f., 79-81.

Quṣayy decided to go to his people and to join them, for he hated being a stranger in the territory of the Quḍā'ah. His mother said to him, "My son, do not be in too much of a hurry. Wait for the sacred month and go with the pilgrimage, for I am afraid that some misfortune may befall you." Quṣayy waited until the sacred month arrived and the pilgrims from the Quḍā'ah set out, and went with them. When he reached Mecca and had completed the pilgrimage, he remained there. He was a strong man of good lineage, and when he asked Ḥulayl b. Ḥubshiyyah al-Khuzā'ī for the hand of his daughter Ḥubbā, Ḥulayl, recognising his lineage and regarding him as a desirable match, gave his consent and married her to him. At that time, it is claimed, Ḥulayl was in charge of the Ka'bah and ruled in Mecca.

Ibn Isḥāq: Quṣayy stayed with him (i.e. Ḥulayl) and Ḥubbā bore him 'Abd al-Dār, 'Abd Manāf, 'Abd al'Uzzā and 'Abd. His progeny [1094] increased, his wealth multiplied and he became greatly honoured, and when Ḥulayl b. Ḥubshiyyah died Quṣayy thought that he had a better right to the Ka'bah and to rule over Mecca than the Khuzā'ah and the Banū Bakr, since the Quraysh were the noblest and purest of the descendants of Ishmael, son of Abraham. He spoke to some men of the Quraysh and the Banū Kinānah and called upon them to expel the Khuzā'ah and the Banū Bakr from Mecca. They accepted his proposal and swore an oath of allegiance to him to do this. Then he wrote to his half-brother Rizāḥ b. Rabī'ah b. Ḥarām, who was in his tribal lands, asking him to come to his assistance and fight along with him. Rizāḥ b. Rabī'ah stood up among the Quḍā'ah and called upon them to come to the assistance of his brother and to march with him, and they answered his call.

Hishām: Quṣayy went to his brother Zuhrah and his people, and before long became their chief. The Khuzā'ah were more numerous than the descendants of al-Naḍr[29] in Mecca, so Quṣayy asked his brother Rizāḥ for assistance. Rizāḥ had three brothers on his father's side by a different wife, and he came with them and those clans of the Quḍā'ah who answered his summons. Quṣayy had with him his tribe, the Banū al-Naḍr, and together they expelled Khuzā'ah.

Quṣayy had married Ḥubbā bt. Ḥulayl b. Ḥubshiyyah, a Khuzā'ī woman, and she had borne him four sons. Ḥulayl was the last (member of Khuzā'ah) to be the custodian of the Ka'bah, and when he became too old for the task he handed it over to his daughter Ḥubbā. She said, "You know that I am not strong enough to open and shut the door," so he said, "I will give the task of opening and shutting the door to a man who will do it for you." He gave the task to Abū Ghubshān, whose name was Sulaym b. 'Amr b. Buwayy b. Milkān b. Afṣā, and Quṣayy purchased the custodianship of the Ka'bah from him for a skin full of wine and a lute. When the Khuzā'ah saw this, they gathered against him, so he asked his brother for assistance and fought the Khuzā'ah.

I have heard, and God knows best, that the Khuzā'ah were seized by an outbreak of pustules which was likely to wipe them out and that, seeing this, they abandoned Mecca. Some of them gave their houses away, some sold them, and some leased them. Quṣayy [1095] took charge of the House (the Ka'bah) and the lordship of Mecca.[30] He gathered together the clans of Quraysh and settled them in the valley of Mecca, while some remained in the ravines and hilltops.[31] To each (clan) he allotted their settlements. (Because he thus gathered together and settled the Quraysh) he was called "gatherer" (mujammi'). Of him Maṭrūd—some say Ḥudhāfah b. Ghānim—said:

29. The Banū al-Naḍr (a section of the tribe of Kinānah) were the effective clan (or tribe) to which Quṣayy belonged. They included more than the group known as Quraysh, since these were usually reckoned to be the descendants of Fihr, the grandson of al-Naḍr.

30. The Arabic here is somewhat vague: wallā Quṣayy al-bayt wa-amr Makkah wa-l-ḥukm bi-hā; amr may mean either "rule" or "affairs," while ḥukm may refer to the giving of decisions in accordance with custom. It is not clear how much is involved in the kingship or supreme rule attributed to him in what follows, but he was certainly the man in Mecca with supreme authority.

31. This is the distinction mentioned in notes 8 and 14. Those in the "valley" (here abṭaḥ) are Quraysh al-Biṭāḥ, and the others Quraysh al-Ẓawāhir.

Your father Quṣayy was called mujammi';
through him God gathered the clans of Fihr.

The tribe made him their king over them.

Ibn Isḥāq: Rizāḥ answered Quṣayy's call to come to his aid and went with his three brothers and those men of the Quḍā'ah who followed him to Mecca on the pilgrimage, determined to come to Quṣayy's aid and to fight on his side. Khuzā'ah claim that Ḥulayl b. Ḥubshiyyah made his position over to Quṣayy and commanded him to accept it when the latter's sons by (Ḥulayl's) daughter increased, saying, "You are more worthy of the Ka'bah and its custodianship, and of ruling Mecca, than the Khuzā'ah." Thereupon Quṣayy made his request for assistance. The pilgrims gathered in Mecca, went out to the mawqif[32] completed the pilgrimage and went to Minā. Quṣayy and his followers from his own tribe of the Quraysh and the Banū Kinānah, together with those Quḍā'ah who supported him, had decided upon their course of action; nothing now remained of the ritual of the pilgrimage but the dispersal from Minā.

The Ṣūfah[33] used to drive the people away from 'Arafah and give them permission to depart when they dispersed from Minā. On the day of dispersal they went to stone the jimār,[34] and a man of the Ṣūfah used to throw stones for the pilgrims, none throwing until he had thrown. Those who had urgent matters to attend to would come to him and say, "Get up and throw, so that we can throw with you," but he would say, "No, by God, not until the [1096] sun begins to set." Then those who had matters to attend to and wanted to hasten the proceedings would throw stones at him in an attempt to hurry him up, and say, "Get up and throw, for heaven's sake!" But he would refuse until the sun began to set; then he would throw and the pilgrims would throw with him.

32. The mawqif or "place of standing" is the plain of 'Arafāt, about 24 km east of Mecca. The "standing" here between midday and sunset on the appointed day is one of the most important rites of the ḥajj or pilgrimage. This was followed by the ifāḍah or "dispersal" (with a suggestion of haste) to Minā, rather more than half way back to Mecca. Ṭabarī uses nafr for "dispersal" instead of the more usual ifāḍah, and also has the singular 'Arafah instead of the plural. See EI [2], s.v. Ḥadjdj, sect. 1.

33. Ṣūfah was a small clan or group of kinsmen; see Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 76f.; also Ibn Ḥabīb, K. al-Munammaq, 14.

34. The jimār were three erections or heaps of stones, at which stones or pebbles were thrown. In Islam, they were held to represent the devil. See EI [2], s.v. Djamra.

Ibn Humayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yahyā b. ʿAbbād b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ẓubayr—his father ʿAbbād: When they had finished stoning the jimār and wanted to disperse from Minā, the Ṣūfah would occupy both sides of the pass of al-ʿAqabah and detain the pilgrims. The pilgrims would say, "Give the permission to depart, Ṣūfah!" Nobody left until the Ṣūfah passed through; when they had dispersed and left, the other pilgrims were free to go, and set out after them.

This year the Ṣūfah acted as usual. The Arabs recognized their right to do this, since they regarded it as a religious duty during the rule of the Jurhum and the Khuzāʿah. Quṣayy b. Kilāb, accompanied by his followers from his own tribe of Quraysh, from the Kinānah and from Quḍāʿah, came to the Ṣūfah at al-ʿAqabah and said, "We have a better right to this than you." At that they opposed one another and began to fight. A fierce battle broke out, as a result of which the Ṣūfah were put to flight, and Quṣayy wrested from them the privileges which had been in their hands, thus denying them.

When this happened the Khuzāʿah and the Banū Bakr drew back from Quṣayy b. Kilāb, knowing he would impose prohibitions upon them as he had on the Ṣūfah, and that he would exclude them from the Kaʿbah and control of Mecca. When they drew back from him, Quṣayy revealed his enmity to them openly and resolved to do battle with them. His brother Rizāḥ b. Rabīʿah with his fellow-tribesmen from the Quḍāʿah stood firm beside him while the Khuzāʿah and the Banū Bakr took the field against them and prepared for battle. The forces met and a fierce battle took place. There were many dead and wounded on both sides. Finally, both sides called for peace and for the appointment of one of the Arabs to arbitrate between them on their differences. [1097] They appointed Yaʿmar b. ʿAwf b. Kaʿb b. Layth b. Bakr b. ʿAbd Manāt b. Kinānah, whose verdict was that Quṣayy had a better right to the Kaʿbah and to rule Mecca than the Khuzāʿah, that all injuries inflicted by Quṣayy upon the Khuzāʿah and the Banū Bakr were remitted and trampled beneath his feet, while all injuries inflicted by the Khuzāʿah and the Banū Bakr upon the Quraysh, the Banū Kinānah, and Quḍāʿah should be compensated for by blood money. He added that Quṣayy b. Kilāb should be allowed to control the Ka'bah and Mecca. On that day Ya'mar b. 'Awf was given the name al-Shaddākh, because of the blood money which he remitted and trampled underfoot (shadakha). Quṣayy took control of the Ka'bah and rule over Mecca, and gathered together his tribe from their dwellings and settled them there. He assumed rule over his tribe and the people of Mecca, and they accepted him as their king. Quṣayy was the first of the descendants of Ka'b b. Lu'ayy to attain rule acknowledged by his tribe. He held the privileges of being doorkeeper of the Ka'bah, providing the pilgrims with food and drink, presiding over the assembly, and appointing standard bearers, thus taking all the honors of Mecca for himself. He also divided Mecca into quarters for his tribe, settling every clan of the Quraysh in the dwelling places assigned to them in Mecca.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: People allege that the Quraysh were afraid to cut down the trees of the Ḥaram in their settlements, and that Quṣayy thus cut them down with his own hands, and that they then helped him. The Arabs called him "Gatherer" (mujammi') because of his gathering them, and they regarded his rule as a good omen. No woman or man of Quraysh was married anywhere but in the house of Quṣayy b. Kilāb, nor did Quraysh consult together about any matter affecting them anywhere but in his house. When they were about to fight another tribe, banners were tied only in his house, where one of his own sons would hand the banner over. Whenever a girl of Quraysh came of age to put on her shift, she would do so only in his house; there her shift would be split over her, and she would put it on and be taken to her family. His authority among his tribe of Quraysh, [1098] in his lifetime and after his death, was like a religion which people followed; they always acted in accordance with it, regarding it as filled with good omens and recognizing his superiority and nobility. He took for himself the assembly house and made the door which (later) led from it to the mosque of the Ka'bah, The Quraysh used to decide their affairs in that house.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abd al-Malik b. Rāshid—his father—al-Sā'ib b. Khabbāb, the author of al-Maqṣūrah: I heard a man telling 'Umar b. al-Khattāb, when he was Caliph, this story of Quṣayy b. Kilāb, that is, how he gathered his own tribe together, expelled the Khuzā'ah and the Banū Bakr from Mecca, and gained control of the Ka'bah and rule over Mecca; 'Umar did not reject it or disavow it.

Quṣayy remained in Mecca, held in honor and high esteem by his tribe, and not opposed in his rule of Mecca in any way. As regards the pilgrimage, he confirmed the rights of the Arabs to continue their previous customs. This is because he considered these to be a religious duty which he should not change. The Ṣūfah thus continued as they had before, (and did so) until they died out, their rights then passing by inheritance to the family of Ṣafwān b. al-Ḥārith b. Shijnah; the 'Adwān also continued as they had, and likewise the intercalators from the Banū Mālik b. Kinānah and Murrah b. 'Awf. No changes occurred until Islam, and God thereby did away with all these functions. Quṣayy had a house built in Mecca, which was the house of assembly, in which the Quraysh used to decide their affairs.

At last Quṣayy grew old and feeble; 'Abd al-Dār, his first-born and his eldest son, was, it is claimed, a weakling, while 'Abd Manāf was held in honor during his father's lifetime, and managed everything with his brothers 'Abd al-'Uzzā and 'Abd. It is claimed that Quṣayy said to 'Abd al-Dār, 'By God, I shall make you the equal of the others, even though they have been raised in dignity [1099] over you. No man of them shall enter the Ka'bah until you have opened it, no banner shall be tied for the Quraysh to go to battle except by your hand, no man shall drink water in Mecca except that which you have provided, no man shall eat food in the pilgrimage season other than your food, and the Quraysh shall not decide their affairs anywhere but in your house.' Then he gave him his own house, the assembly house, in which Quraysh always made their decisions, and gave him the offices of being doorkeeper, tying the banners, presiding over the assembly, and the rifādah. The rifādah was a tax which was levied in every pilgrimage season by the Quraysh according to their wealth and handed over to Quṣayy b. Kilāb. He used it to prepare food to be eaten by those pilgrims attending the pilgrimage who had neither means nor provisions. It was imposed on the Quraysh by Quṣayy, who said to them when he commanded them to pay it, "Quraysh, you are neighbors of God, people of his Ka'bah and people of the sacred precincts (Ḥaram). the pilgrims are guests of God and visitors to his House, and are the most deserving of all guests of honorable treatment. Give them food and drink during the days of the pilgrimage, until they depart from you." They did so, and every year they levied a tax on their property and paid it to him, and he would use it to prepare food for the pilgrims during the days of Minā. This institution of his became current among the Quraysh during the whole of the Jāhiliyyah up to the appearance of Islam, and then became current in Islam, continuing to this day. This is the food which the government supplies to the pilgrims every year at Minā until the pilgrimage is completed.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah: This story of Quṣayy b. Kilāb and what he said to ʿAbd al-Dār concerning the offices which he handed over to him was told to me by Ibn Isḥāq b. Yasār—his father—al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭalib. Yasār said, "I heard al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad saying this to a man of the Banū ʿAbd al-Dār called Nubayh b. Wahb b. ʿAmir b. Ikrimah b. Hāshim b. ʿAbd Manāf b. ʿAbd al-Dār. He said, 'Quṣayy made over to him all the authority which he had over his tribe. Quṣayy's commands [1100] were never disobeyed and nothing he did was ever opposed. Then Quṣayy died and his sons assumed his authority over his tribe.'"

Kilāb

Quṣayy was the son of Kilāb. It is said that Kilāb's mother was Hind bt. Surayr b. Thaʿlabah b. al-Ḥārith b. Fihr b. Mālik b. al-Naḍr b. Kinānah. He had two half brothers by a different mother, Taym and Yaqaẓah, whose mother, according to Hishām b. al-Kalbī, was Asmāʾ bt. ʿAdī b. Ḥārithah b. ʿAmr b. ʿĀmir b. Bāriq. As for Ibn Isḥāq, he says that their mother was Hind bt. Ḥārithah al-Bāriqiyyah.[35] Some people say that Yaqaẓah's mother was Hind bt. Surayr, Kilāb's mother.

Murrah

Kilāb was the son of Murrah, whose mother was Waḥshiyyah bt. Shaybān b. Muḥārib b. Fihr b. Mālik b. al-Naḍr b. Kinānah. Murrah's two full brothers were ʿAdī and Huṣayṣ. Some say that the mother of these three was Makhshiyyah, others say that the mother of Murrah and Huṣayṣ was Makhshiyyah bt. Shaybān b.

35. The standard text of Ibn Isḥāq (Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 67) has Hind bt. Surayr.

Muḥārib b. Fihr, and that ʿAdī's mother was Raqāsh bt. Rukbah b. Nāʾilah b. Kaʿb b. Ḥarb b. Taym b. Saʿd b. Fahm b. ʿAmr b. Qays b. ʿAylān.

Kaʿb

Murrah was the son of Kaʿb, whose mother, according to Ibn Isḥāq and Ibn al-Kalbī, was Māwiyyah bt. Kaʿb b. al-Qayn b. Jasr b. Shayʿ Allāh b. Asad b. Wabrah b. Taghlib b. Ḥulwān b. ʿImrān b. al-Ḥāf b. Quḍāʿah. He had two full brothers, ʿĀmir and Sāmah; the three of them were known as the Banū Nājiyah.[36] They also had a paternal half brother whose descendants regarded themselves as belonging to Ghaṭafān and became a part of them. He was called ʿAwf, and his mother was al-Bāridah bt. ʿAwf b. Ghanm b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Ghaṭafān. It is said that when Luʾayy b. Ghālib died she went back with her son to her own people and married Saʿd b. Dhubyān b. Baghīḍ, who adopted ʿAwf; of him Fazārah b. Dhubyān is reported to have said: [1101]

Son of Luʾayy, turn your camel aside to me; your own people have abandoned you, and you have no dwelling place.

Kaʿb had also two other paternal half brothers. One of these was Khuzaymah, who was known as ʿĀʾidhat Quraysh after his mother, ʿĀʾidhah bt. al-Khims b. Quḥāfah b. Khathʿam, and the other was Saʿd. The descendants of Saʿd are known as Bunānah, Bunānah being Saʿd's mother. Their nomadic kinsmen are now said to be part of the Banū Asʿad b. Hammām, a branch of the Banū Shaybān b. Thaʿlabah, while their settled section trace their descent back to Quraysh.

Luʾayy

Kaʿb was the son of Luʾayy, whose mother, according to Hishām was ʿĀtikah bt. Yakhlud b. al-Naḍr b. Kinānah. She was the first of the ʿĀtikahs of the tribe of Quraysh who were female ancestors of the Messenger of God. Luʾayy had two full brothers; one of them was called Taym, and was known as Taym al-Adram. The name of al-Adram is derived from the word daram, which means "a deficiency in the chin"; it is said that he had a receding chin. The other was Qays; it is said that there are no living descendants of Qays the brother of Lu'ayy, and that the last of them was a man who died in the time of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī[37] and that his estate remained unclaimed, as nobody knew who had a right to [1102] it. It is also said that the mother of Lu'ayy and his brothers was Salmā bt. 'Amr b. Rabī'ah. Rabī'ah's name was Luhayy b. Ḥārithah b. 'Amr Musayqiyā' b. 'Āmir Mā' al-Samā' b. Khuzā'ah.

36. Nājiyah appears to be a scribal error for Māwiyyah.

Ghālib

Lu'ayy was the son of Ghālib, whose mother was Laylā bt. al-Ḥārith b. Tamīm b. Sa'd b. Hudhayl b. Mudrikah, and his full brothers were al-Ḥārith, Muḥārib, Asad, 'Awf, Jawn and Dhi'b. Muḥārib and al-Ḥārith belonged to the Quraysh al-Ẓawāhir, but al-Ḥārith came to live in the valley.[38]

Fihr

Ghālib was the son of Fihr. Hishām b. Muḥammad: He was the gatherer (jammā') of Quraysh. His mother was Jandalah bt. 'Āmir b. al-Ḥārith b. Muḍāḍ al-Jurhumī.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: His mother was Jandalah bt. al-Ḥārith b. Muḍāḍ b. 'Amr al-Jurhumī.

Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā is reported to have said that his mother was Salmā bt. Udd b. Ṭābikhah b. Ilyās b. Muḍar. It is also said that his mother was Jamīlah bt. 'Adwān of Bāriq of Azd. In his time, Fihr was the chief of the Meccans, according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq,[39] in their war against Ḥassān b. 'Abd Kalāl b. Mathūb Dhū Ḥurath al-Ḥimyarī. It is said that Ḥassān advanced from the Yemen with Ḥimyar and a great many other Yemenite tribes. His intention was to transport the stones of 37. Umayyad governor of Iraq from about 724 to 738; see EI [2], s.v. Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḳasrī.

38. See n. 8 above.

39. This paragraph is not found in Ibn Hishām's recension of Ibn Isḥāq (IH, 61); see Guillaume's translation, p.41.

the Ka'bah from Mecca to the Yemen, and so to divert the pilgrimage associated with the Ka'bah to his own country. He advanced as far as Nakhlah, raided the Meccan herds, and blocked the road, but was afraid to enter Mecca. When Quraysh, the tribes of Kinānah, Khuzaymah, Asad, and Judhām, and fragmentary groups belong to Muḍar who were with them, saw this, they went out to meet Ḥassān in battle, under the leadership of Fihr b. Mālik. A fierce [1103] battle ensued, the Ḥimyar were put to flight, and Ḥassan b. 'Abd Kalāl, the king of the Ḥimyar, was taken captive by al-Ḥārith b. Fihr. Among those who were killed in the battle was Fihr's grandson, Qays b. Ghālib b. Fihr. Ḥassān was held captive in Mecca for three years, but finally ransomed himself from them. He was taken back to Yemen from Mecca but died on the way.

Mālik

Fihr was the son of Mālik, whose mother was 'Ikrishah bt. 'Adwān. 'Adwān was al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr b. 'Aylān, according to Hishām.

Ibn Isḥāq: His mother was 'Ātikah bt. 'Adwān b. 'Amr b. Qays b. 'Aylān.[40] It is said that 'Ikrishah was her nickname and that her real name was 'Ātikah. It is also said that his mother was Hind bt. Fahm b. 'Amr b. Qays b. 'Aylān. Mālik had two brothers; one was called Yakhlud, and his descendants became part of the Banū 'Amr b. al-Ḥārith b. Mālik b. Kinānah and ceased to belong to the Quraysh; the other was called al-Ṣalt, but none of his descendants survive. It is said that the Quraysh were so called after Quraysh b. Badr b. Yakhlud b. al-Ḥārith b. Yakhlud b. al-Naḍr b. Kinānah. This is because when the caravan of the Banū al-Naḍr arrived the Arabs used to say, "The Caravan of Quraysh has arrived". They say that this Quraysh was the guide of the Banū al-Naḍr in their travels and was responsible for provisioning them. He had a son named Badr who dug the well at Badr, and the well called Badr is named after him.

Ibn al-Kalbī: Quraysh is a collective name, and cannot be traced back to a father or mother, or to a male or female guardian.

Others say that the descendants of al-Naḍr b. Kinānah were

40. Only this sentence is found in the standard text of Ibn Isḥāq (Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 61).

[1104] called Quraysh because al-Naḍr b. Kinānah came out one day to his tribal assembly and they said to one another, "Look at al-Naḍr! he is like a quraysh [41] camel!" Others say that Quraysh were so called after a creature which lives in the sea and eats other sea creatures, namely, the shark (qirsh). The descendants of al-Naḍr b. Kinānah were named after the qirsh because it is the most powerful of sea creatures. Another account is that al-Naḍr b. Kinānah used to inquire after qarrasha) the needs of his people and to satisfy them with his wealth; the word qarsh, it is alleged, means "inquiry": his sons used to inquire after the needs of the pilgrims and to satisfy them fully. The following verse is quoted as evidence that the word taqriīsh means "inquiry";

You who are speaking and inquiring (muqarrish) about us from ʿAmr, will they ever desist?[42]

Some say that al-Naḍr b. Kinānah was himself called Quraysh, while others deny this and maintain that al-Naḍr's descendants continued to be called the Banū al-Naḍr until Quṣayy b. Kilāb gathered them together; they were then called Quraysh because they had been gathered together, which is the meaning of the verb taqarrasha. The Arabs used to say, "taqarrasha Banū al-Naḍr" which means that they were gathered together. Yet another account is that they were called Quraysh because they made a profit (taqarrasha) from raiding.

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar (al-Wāqidī)—Abū Bakr b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī Sabrah—Saʿīd b. Muḥammad b. Jubayr b. Muṭʿim: ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān[43] asked Muḥammad b. Jubayr when the Quraysh were first called Quraysh. He replied "When they were gathered into the sacred precincts (Ḥaram) from their dispersion. This gathering together is taqarrush." ʿAbd al-Malik said, "I have not heard this, but I have heard that Quṣayy was called al-Qurashī and that the name

41. None of the works we have consulted gives a reasonable meaning for quraysh in this context.

42. This verse is from the Muʿallaqah of al-Ḥārith b. Ḥillizah, line 64 in al-Tibrīzī's recension, but the form there is different and does not include the word muqarrish. Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, quotes the verse in a form closer to that of Ṭabarī, but explains muqarrish as "slandering and instigating" (s.v. q-r-sh).

43. Umayyad caliph who ruled from 685 to 705. This and the following paragraphs are found in Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I:40.17-28; 41.10-15.

Quraysh was not used before him."

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Sabrah—'Abd al-Majīd b. Suhayl b. 'Abd al-Raḥman b. 'Awf—Abū Salamah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf: When Quṣayy settled in the sacred precincts and became master of them, he performed fine deeds and was called al-Qurashī; he was the first to be called this. [1105]

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Abū Bakr b. Abī Sabrah—Abū Bakr b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Jahm: Al-Naḍr b. Kinānah was called al-Qurashī.

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar: Quṣayy instituted the lighting of the fire at al-Muzdalifah when the wuqūf (standing) took place there,[44] so that those being driven away from 'Arafah could see it. This fire continued to be lit in this place throughout the Jāhiliyyah.

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar and Kathīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Muzanī—Nāfi'—('Abdallāh) Ibn 'Umar: This fire was lit in the time of the Messenger of God, and of Abū Bakr, 'Umar and 'Uthmān.

Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī): It is lit to this day.

Al-Naḍr

Mālik was the son of al-Naḍr, whose name was Qays and whose mother was Barrah bt. Murr b. Udd b. Ṭābikhah. His full brothers were Nuḍayr, Mālik, Milkān, 'Āmir, al-Ḥārith, 'Amr, Sa'd, 'Awf, Ghanm, Makhramah, Jarwal, Ghazwān, and Ḥudāl. Their paternal half brother was 'Abd Manāt, whose mother was Fukayhah—according to others, Fakhah—whose name was al-Dhafrā' bt. Hanī b. Balī b. 'Amr b. al-Ḥāf b. Quḍā'ah. 'Abd Manāt had a maternal half brother called 'Alī b. Mas'ūd b. Māzin b. Dhī'b b. 'Adī b. 'Amr b. Māzin al-Ghassānī. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah married Hind bt. Bakr b. Wā'il, who bore him children. Then he died, and his maternal half brother 'Alī b. Mas'ūd married her, and she had children by him. He became the guardian of his brother's children, and they regarded themselves as being descended from him, so that the Banū 'Abd Manāt were called the Banū 'Alī. It is to them [1106] that the poet refers when he says:

44. Al-Muzdalifah is between 'Arafāt and Minā; "standing" here was one of the pilgrimage rites.

How excellent are the Banū ʿAlī
the celibate and the married.

Kaʿb b. Zuhayr also refers to them when he says:

They clashed with ʿAlī on the day of Badr and after that ʿAlī were subject to Nizār.[45]

Afterwards Mālik b. Kinānah fell upon ʿAlī b. Masʿūd and killed him, and Asad b. Khuzaymah paid his blood money.

Kinānah

Al-Naḍr was the son of Kinānah, whose mother was ʿAwānah bt. Saʿd b. Qays b. ʿAylān. It is also said that his mother was Hind bt. ʿAmr b. Qays. His paternal half brothers were Asad, Asadah—some say that he was Abū Judhām—and al-Hūn; their mother was Barrah bt. Murr b. Udd b. Ṭābikhah. She was also the mother of al-Ḍnadr b. Kinānah, as Kinānah married her after his father died.

Khuzaymah

Kinānah was the son of Khuzaymah, whose mother was Salmā bt. Aslum b. al-Ḥāf b. Quḍāʿah. His full brother was Hudhayl, and their maternal half brother was Taghlib b. Ḥulwān b. ʿImrān b. al-[1107] Ḥāf b. Quḍāʿah. It is also said that the mother of Khuzaymah and Hudhayl was Salmā bt. Asad b. Rabīʿah.

Mudrikah

Khuzaymah was the son of Mudrikah, whose name was ʿAmr and whose mother was Khindif. Her real name was Laylā bt. Ḥulwān b. ʿImrān b. al-Ḥāf b. Quḍāʿah; her mother was Ḍariyyah bt. Rabīʿah b. Nizār, after whom, it is said, the Ḥimā Ḍariyyah was named. Mudrikah's full brothers were ʿĀmir, who was Ṭābikhah, 45. According to the genealogists, Nizār is the father of Muḍar, and the name includes a large number of "northern" tribes; see p. 1111 below. Banū ʿAlī had become assimilated to the tribe of ʿAlī b. Masʿūd which was Ghassān and was reckoned as "southern" or Yemenite.

and ʿUmayr, who was Qamaʿah, and is said to be the father of Khuzāʿah.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: The mother of the sons of Ilyās was Khindif, who was a woman from the Yemen. Her name prevailed in her sons' genealogy, and they were known as the Banū Khindif. Mudrikah's name was ʿĀmir, and Ṭābikhah's name was ʿAmr. They claim that while the two of them were among camels which they were herding they caught some game. As they were sitting down cooking it a hostile raiding party attacked their camels, and ʿĀmir said to ʿAmr, "Will you catch up with the camels or cook this game?" ʿAmr said, "I will cook the game." So ʿĀmir caught up with the camels and brought them back. When they returned to their father and told him what had happened, he said to ʿĀmir, "You are the overtaker (mudrikah)" and he said to ʿAmr "You are the cook (ṭābikhah)."

Hishām b. Muḥammad: It is said that Ilyās took his herds out to look for pasture, and his camels ran away from a hare. ʿAmr went after them and overtook them, and so was called Mudrikah. ʿĀmir took the hare and cooked it, and so was called Ṭābikhah. ʿUmayr slunk inqamaʿa into the tents and did not come out, and so was called Qamaʿah. Their mother came walking out, and Ilyās said to her, "Where are you hurrying to (tukhandifīn)?" So she was called Khindif. The word khandafah means a certain kind of walking.

Qusayy b. Kilāb said:

My mother is Khindif and Ilyās is my father.

Ilyās said to his son ʿAmr: [1108]

What you sought you have overtaken (adrakta)

and to ʿĀmir:

What you cooked (ṭabakhta) you have done to a turn and to ʿUmayr:

You have done badly and have slunk away.

Ilyās

Mudrikah was the son of Ilyās, whose mother was al-Rabāb bt.

Ḥaydah b. Ma'add and whose full brother was al-Nās, who was 'Aylān. He is said to have been called 'Aylān because people used to remonstrate with him over his generosity, and say, "You will be overcome by destitution ('aylah), 'Aylān." So this name stuck to him. Others say that he was called this because he was born on a mountain called 'Aylān, while yet others say that he was called this because he was raised by a slave of Muḍar called 'Aylān.

Muḍar

Ilyās was the son of Muḍar, whose mother was Sawdah bt. 'Akk and whose full brother was Iyād. They had two paternal half brothers, Rabī'ah and Anmār, whose mother was Jaddālah bt. Wa'lān b. Jawsham b. Julhumah b. 'Amr of Jurhum. Some say that when Nizār b. Ma'add was on the point of death he made his will and divided his wealth among his sons. He said, "This leather tent—it was a tent of red leather—and that of my wealth which resembles it go to Muḍar [as a result, Muḍar was called al-Ḥamrā', the red]; this black hair tent and that of my wealth which resembles [1109] it go to Rabī'ah. [He left black horses, and Rabī'ah was called al-Faras, the horse.] This female servant and that of my wealth which resembles her go to Iyād. [She was grey-haired, so he took the piebald horses and the small sheep and goats]; and this purse full of dirhams and this place of assembly go to Anmār so that he can sit in it [and Anmār took what he had been given]. If you have any problems about this and you differ about the division, then betake yourselves to al-Af'ā al-Jurhumī."

They did differ about the division, so they set off for al-Af'ā. While they were on their way, Muḍar saw pasturage which had been grazed over, and said, "The camel which has been grazing this pasturage is one-eyed." Rabī'ah said, "It is crooked." Iyad said, "It is dock-tailed," and Anmār said, "It is a stray." They had not gone much farther before they were met by a man whose riding camel was carrying him along at a gentle pace. He asked them about the camel, and Muḍar said, "Is it one-eyed?" The man said, "Yes." Then Rabī'ah said, "Is it crooked?" The man said, "Yes." Then Iyād said, "Is it dock-tailed?" The man said, "Yes." Finally Anmār said, "Is it a stray?" The man said, "Yes." Then he said, "This is the description of my camel. Show me where it is." They swore to him that they had never seen it, but he clung to them and said, "How can I believe you, when you have described my camel just as it is?" So they all went on together, and finally reached Najrān. They halted at the dwelling of al-Afʿā al-Jurhumī, and the owner of the camel cried out, "These people have my camel. They described it to me just as it is, and then said, 'We have never seen it.'" The Jurhumī said, "How could you describe it when you have never seen it?" Muḍar said, "I saw that it had grazed on one side and left the other side alone, so I knew that it was one-eyed." Rabīʿah said "I saw that one of its feet had left a firm imprint while the other had left a weak one, so I knew that this was because it leaned heavily to one side owing to its crookedness." Iyād said, "I knew that it was dock-tailed because of the compactness of its dung. If it had had a long tail, it would have hit the dung with it." Anmār said, "I knew that it was a stray, because it had grazed an area with dense vegetation and had then left it for another area with thinner and poorer vegetation." Then the Jurhumī said, "They do not have your camel. Go and look for it." [1110]

Then he asked them who they were. They told him, and he welcomed them, saying, "Do you need me, when you are as perspicacious as I see you to be?" He called for food for them, and they and he ate and drank. Muḍar said, "I have never seen more excellent wine than this which we are drinking today, unless it has grown on a grave." Rabīʿah said, "I have never eaten meat more delicious, unless it has been fed on dog's milk." Iyād said, "I have never seen a man more generous than I have today, unless he be born of a father other than the one he claims." Anmār said, "I have never heard speech more profitable for our needs." The Jurhumī heard these words and marvelled at what they said. He went to his mother and questioned her, and she told him that she had been married to a king who could beget no children, and that, being unwilling that the kingship should depart, she had given a man who was staying with her the freedom to do with her as he would; so he lay with her, and she became pregnant by him. Next, he questioned his steward about the wine, and he said, "It comes from a trellised vine which I planted on your father's grave." Lastly, he went to his shepherd and asked him about the meat, and he said, "It is a sheep which I fed on the milk of a bitch, since no other sheep had been born in the flock."

He asked Muḍar, "How did you know that the wine had grown on a grave?" He replied, "Because I felt a severe thirst when I drank it." Then he asked Rabīʿah, "How did you recognize it?" and he told him. Then the Jurhumī came to them and said, "Describe to me the situation in which you find yourselves." So they told him the story of their father's will, and he awarded the red leather tent, the (gold) dinars, and the camels, which were red, to Muḍar, the black hair tent and the black horses to Rabīʿah, the female servant, who was grey-haired, and the piebald horses to Iyād and the (silver) dirhams to Anmār.

Nizār

[IIII] Muḍar was the son of Nizār. It is said that Nizār had the patronymic (kunyah) Abū Iyād, and it is also said that on the contrary he was called Abū Rabīʿah. His mother was Muʿānah bt. Jawsham b. Julhumah b. ʿAmr, and his full brothers were Qunuṣ, Qunāṣah, Sinām,[46] Ḥaydān, Ḥaydah, Hayādah, Junayd, Junādah, al-Qaḥm, ʿUbayd al-Rammaḥ, al-ʿUrf, ʿAwf, Shakk, and Quḍāʿah. Maʿadd was called Abū Nizār after Nizār. The lines of many of these brothers have died out.

Maʿadd

Nizār was the son of Maʿadd. It is claimed by Hishām that Maʿadd's mother was Mahdad bt. al-Lihamm—according to others, al-Lahm—b. Jalḥab b. Jadīs or b. Ṭasm, or b. al-Ṭawsam, one of the descendants of Yaqshān the son of Abraham, the friend of the Compassionate.[47]

Al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. Saʿd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-ʿAjlānī: His full brothers were al-Dīth—it is said that al-Dīth was ʿAkk, and it is also said that ʿAkk was the son of al-Dīth b. ʿAdnān—ʿAdan b. ʿAdnān, of whom some genealogists claim that he was the Lord of 46. Vocalization unclear.

47. Abraham is often referred to in Arabic as the Friend of God, following Qurʾān 4:125, where it is said that "God took Abraham as a friend" (khalīl). The town of Hebron, which is associated with Abraham, is known in Arabic as al-Khalīl. Abraham is also called "friend of God" in the Bible: Isaiah 41:8; James 2:23.

Aden, which is named after him, and that its inhabitants were his descendants, but that they became extinct; Abyan, of whom they claim that he was Lord of Abyan, that it was named after him, and that its inhabitants were his descendants, but that they became extinct; al-Ḍaḥḥāk; and al-ʿAkk. The mother of all of them was Maʿadd's mother. Some genealogists say that ʿAkk departed for Samrān, in the Yemen, leaving his brother Maʿadd. This is because when the people of Ḥaḍūr killed Shuʿayb b. Dhī Mahdam al-Ḥaḍūrī God sent Nebuchadnezzar against them as a punishment. Armiyā and Barkhiyā went away taking Maʿadd with them, and when the warfare had died down they took him back to Mecca. Maʿadd then found that his brothers and uncles who were descended from ʿAdnān had joined the peoples of the Yemen and had intermarried with them; the Yemenites were sympathetic to them because they were descendants of Jurhum. They quote the following verses in proof of the above story: [1112] on their way to Samrān, and they departed quickly.

We left our brothers, al-Dīth and ʿAkk
They were of the Banū ʿAdnān, but they lost this descent irrevocably among themselves.

ʿAdnān[48]

Maʿadd was the son of ʿAdnān. ʿAdnān had two paternal half brothers, one called Nabt and the other ʿAmr. The genealogists do not differ concerning the descent of our Prophet Muḥammad as far as Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān, which is as I have expounded it.

Yūnus b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Lahīʿah—Abū al-Aswad and others: The lineage of the Messenger of God is as follows; Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim b. ʿAbd Manāf b. Quṣayy b. Kilāb b. Murrah b. Kaʿb b. Luʾayy b. Ghālib b. Fihr b. Mālik b. al-Nadr b.Kinānah b. Khuzaymah b. Mudrikah b. Ilyās b. Muḍar b. Nizār b. Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān b. Udad; they differ concerning what comes after that. [1113]

48. According to the standard genealogical system, ʿAdnān is the ancestor of all the so-called northern Arabs. In the list of his sons above, ʿAyy of the text has been corrected to ʿAkk.

'Adnān's Descent from Ishmael, Abraham, and Adam[49]

Al-Zubayr b. Bakkār—Yaḥyā b. al-Miqdād al-Zam'ī—his paternal uncle Mūsā b. Ya'qūb b. 'Abdallāh b. Wahb b. Zam'ah—his maternal aunt Umm Salamah, the wife of the Prophet: I heard the Messenger of God say, "Ma'add b. 'Adnān b. Udad b. Zand b. Yarā b. A'rāq al-Tharā." Umm Salamah: Zand is al-Hamaysa', Yarā is Nabt and A'rāq al-Tharā is Ishmael, son of Abraham.

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Rahmān al-'Ajlānī—Mūsā b. Ya'qūb al-Zam'ī—his paternal aunt—her grandmother Bint al-Miqdād b. al-Aswad al-Bahrānī: The Messenger of God said, "Ma'add b. 'Adnān b. Udad b. Yarā b. A'rāq al-Tharā."[50]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Ibn Isḥāq: 'Adnān, as some genealogists assert, was the son of Udad b. Muqawwam b. Nāhūr [1114] b. Tayraḥ b. Ya'rub b. Yashjub b. Nābit b. Ismā'īl (Ishmael) b. Ibrāhīm (Abraham), while others say: 'Adnān b. Udad b. Aytahab b. Ayyūb b. Qaydhar b. Ismā'īl (Ishmael) b. Ibrāhīm (Abraham). Quṣayy b. Kilāb traces his descent back to Qaydhar in his poetry. Yet other genealogists say: 'Adnān b. Mayda' b. Māni' b. Udad b. Ka'b b. Yashjub b. Ya'rub b. al-Hamaysa' b. Qaydhar b. Ismā'īl (Ishmael) b. Ibrāhīm (Abraham). These differences arise because it is an old science, taken from the people of the first Book (the Old Testament).

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Hishām (al-Kalbī): Someone told me on the authority of my father, Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib al-Kalbī, although I did not hear this from him myself, that he traced the descent as follows; Ma'add b. 'Adnān b. Udad b. al-Hamaysa' b. Salāmān b. 'Awṣ b. Būz b. Qamwāl b. Ubayy b. al-'Awwām b.

---

49. It is obvious to modern scholars that the lists of names between 'Adnān and Adam have somehow or other been derived from those in the Bible. Most early Muslim scholars, however, were unwilling to admit to a Biblical source, and they often mentioned only their immediate source (as did Ibn Isḥāq in the standard text). In the material given by Ṭabarī we find both acknowledgement of the Biblical source and an attempt to provide an Arab source.

50. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I:28.6-9; later passages are from I:28.20-29.19. There is no certainty about the vocalization of many of the names in the following lists. We have usually followed those given in the Leiden edition, which are partly based on the Hebrew parallels. It is also to be remembered that in some cases the names may be derived from a Syriac translation of the Hebrew. We have not called special attention to the Biblical parallels. In some names the diacritical points, and, therefore, the consonants, are uncertain.

Nāshid b. Ḥazā b. Bildās b. Yidlāf b. Ṭābakh b. Jāḥam b. Ṭāḥash b. Mākhā b. ʿAyfā b. ʿAbqar b. ʿUbayd b. al-Daʿā b. Ḥamdān b. Sanbar [1115] b. Yathribī b. Yaḥzan b. Yalḥan b. Arʿawā b. ʿAyfā b. Dayshān b. ʿIsar b. Aqnād b. Ayhām b. Muqṣir b. Nāḥath b. Rizāḥ b. Shammā b. Mizzā b. ʿAwṣ b. ʿArrām b. Qaydhar b. Ismāʿīl (Ishmael) b. Ibrāhīm (Abraham).

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Saʿd—Hishām b. Muḥammad (al-Kalbī): There was a man from Tadmur whose patronymic (kunyah) was Abū Yaʿqūb. He was one of the children of Israel who had become a Muslim, who had read in their books and become deeply learned. He said that Barūkh b. Nāriyyā,[51] a scribe from Urmiyā, had established the lineage of Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān with him and had set it down in his writings. It was well known among the learned men of the People of the Book and set down in their books. It was close to the names given above, and perhaps the difference between them was owing to the language, since these names had been transliterated from the Hebrew. [1116]

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Saʿd: Hishām (al-Kalbī) recited to me the following line of verse, which was related to him by his father:

I belong to no tribe which brought me up but that in which the descendants of Qaydhar and al-Nabīt took root.

By al-Nabīt, he meant Nabt b. Ismāʿīl (Ishmael).

Al-Zubayr b. Bakkār—ʿUmar b. Abī Bakr al-Muʿammalī—Zakariyyāʾ b. ʿĪsā—Ibn Shihāb: Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān b. Udad b. al-Hamaysaʿ b. Asḥub b. Nabt b. Qaydhar b. Ismāʿīl (Ishmael).

Others relate: Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān b. Udad b. Umayn b. Shājab b. Thaʿlabah b. ʿAtr b. Yarbaḥ b. Muḥallam b. al-ʿAwwām b. Muḥtamil b. Rāʿimah b. al-ʿAyqān b. ʿAllah b. al-Shaḥdūd b. al- [1117] Ẓarīb b. ʿAbqar b. Ibrāhīm (Abraham) b. Ismāʿīl b. Yazan b. Aʿwaj b. al-Muṭʿim b. al-Ṭamḥ b. al-Qasūr b. ʿAnūd b. Daʿdaʿ b. Maḥmūd b. al-Zāʿid b. Nadwān b. Atāmah b. Daws b. Ḥiṣn b. al-Nizāl b. al-Qumayr b. al-Mushajjir b. Muʿdamir b. Ṣayfī b. Nabt b. Qaydhār b. Ismāʿīl (Ishmael) b. Ibrāhīm (Abraham), the Friend of the Compassionate.

Still others: Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān b. Udad b. Zayd b. Yaqdir b.

51. Baruch son of Neraiah was the secretary of Jeremiah.

Yaqdum b. Hamaysaʿ b. Nabt b. Qaydhar b. Ismāʿīl (Ishmael) b. Ibrāhīm (Abraham).

Others: Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān b. Udad b. al-Hamaysaʿ b. Nabt b. Salmān, who is Salāmān, b. Ḥamal b. Nabt b. Qaydhar b. Ismāʿīl (Ishmael) b. Ibrāhīm (Abraham).

Others: Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān b. Udad b. al-Muqawwam b. Nāḥūr b. Mishraḥ b. Yashjub b. Malik b. Ayman b. al-Nabīt b. Qaydhar [1118] b. Ismāʿīl (Ishmael) b. Ibrāhīm (Abraham).

Others: Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān b. Udd b. Udad b. al-Hamaysaʿ b. Asḥub b. Saʿd b. Yarbaḥ b. Nadīr b. Ḥumayl b. Munaḥḥim b. Lāfath b. al-Ṣābūḥ b. Kinānah b. al-ʿAwwām b. Nabt b. Qaydar b. Ismāʿīl (Ishmael).

A certain genealogist told me that he had found that some Arab scholars had memorized forty ancestors of Maʿadd as far as Ismāʿīl (Ishmael) in Arabic, quoting Arabic verses as evidence for this, and that he had collated the names they gave with what the People of the Book say and had found that the number agreed but that the actual names differed. He dictated these names to me and I wrote them down. They are as follows; Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān b. Udad b. Hamaysaʿ (Hamaysaʿ is Salmān, who is Umayn) b. Hamaytaʿ (who is Hamaydaʿ, who is al-Shājab) b. Salāmān (who is Munjir Nabīt, so called, he claimed, because he fed the Arabs on milk and flour anjara, as the people lived well in his time. He quoted as evidence for this, the verse of Qaʿnab b. ʿAttāb al-Riyāḥī:

[1119] Ṭayy calls upon me, but Ṭayy is distant, and reminds me of the bālūdh [52] of the times of Nabīt.)

Nabīt b. ʿAwṣ (he is Thaʿlabah, to whom the Thaʿlabīs' descent is traced back) b. Būrā (who is Būz, who is ʿAtr al-ʿAtāʿir, the first person to institute the custom of the ʿatīrah [53] for the Arabs) b. Shūḥā (who is Saʿd Rajab, the first person to institute the custom of the rajabiyyah for the Arabs) b. Yaʿmānā (who is Qamwāl, who is Yarbaḥ al-Nāṣib, who lived in the time of Sulaymān b. Dāwūd

52. A sweetmeat, possibly a kind of blancmange, prepared from starch or flour, water, and honey, more usually falūdh or falūdhaj in Arabic. The word is originally Persian, pālūda.

53. A sacrificial lamb; the rajabiyyah mentioned below was a sheep or goat sacrificed by the Arabs in the month of Rajab in the Jāhiliyyah. The practice was forbidden in Islamic times. See Lane, p. 1034.

the prophet) b. Kasdānā (who is Muḥallam Dhū al-ʿAyn) b. Ḥazānā (who is al-ʿAwwām) b. Bildāsā (who is al-Muḥtamil) b. Badlānā (who is Yidlāf, who is Rāʿimah) b. Taḥbā (who is Ṭahab who is al-ʿAyqān) b. Jahmā (who is Jāḥam, who is ʿAllah) b. Maḥshā (who is Tāḥash. who is al-Shaḥdūd) b. Maʿjālā (who is Mākhā, who is al-Ẓarīb Khāṭim al-Nār b. ʿAqārā (who is ʿĀfā, who is ʿAbqar, the father of the Jinn, to whom the garden of Abqar is ascribed) b. ʿAqārā (who is ʿĀqir, who is Ibrāhīm Jāmiʿ al-Shaml. He was called Jāmiʿ al-Shaml (settler of affairs) because every fearful person felt safe in his reign; he returned every outcast, and he attempted to make peace between all men) b. Bandāʿā (who is al-Daʿā, who is Ismāʿīl Dhū al-Maṭābikh (master of the kitchens), who was so called because during his reign he established a house for guests in every town of the Arabs) b. Abdāʿī (who is ʿUbayd, who is Yazan al-Ṭaʿʿān, the first man to fight with lances, which are ascribed to him) b. Hamādā (who is Ḥamdān, who is Ismāʿīl Dhū al-Aʿwaj; al-Aʿwaj was his horse, and the Aʿwajī breed of horses is ascribed to him) b. Bashmānī (who is Yashbīn, who is al-Muṭʿim fī al-Mahl) b. Bathrānī (who is Bathram, who is al-Ṭamḥ) b. Baḥrānī (who is Yaḥzan, who is al-Qasūr) b. Yalḥānī (who is Yalḥan, who is al-ʿAnūd) b. Raʿwānī (who is Raʿwā, who is al-Daʿdaʿ) b. ʿĀqārā (who is ʿĀqir) b. Dāsān, (who is al-Zāʿid) b. ʿĀṣār (who is ʿĀṣir, who is al-Naydawān Dhū al-Andiyah; in his reign the sons of al-Qādhūr (who is al-Qādūr) were dispersed and the kingship departed from the descendants of al-Nabīt b. al-Qādūr and passed to the sons of Jāwān b. al-Qādūr, and then returned to them again) b. Qanādī (who is Qanār, who is Ayyāmah) b. Thāmār (who is Bahāmī, who is Daws al-ʿItq, Daws who, he asserts, was the most beautiful of mankind in his time. There is an Arab proverb, aʿtaq min Daws, which has two significations, either referring to his beauty (ʿitq) or to his antiquity (also ʿitq), that is, either "more beautiful than Daws" or "more ancient than Daws." In his reign Jurhum b. Fālij and Qatūrā were exterminated. This is because they acted wrongfully in the sacred precincts (Ḥaram), and Daws killed them. Tiny ants followed in the tracks of those of them who survived, penetrated into their ears, and destroyed them.) b. Muqṣir (who is Maqāṣirī, who is Ḥiṣn; he is also called Nāḥath, who is al-Nizāl) b. Zāriḥ (who is Qumayr) b. Sammī who is Sammā, who is al-Mujashshir, who was, he asserted, the most just king to succeed to power and the best in managing his affairs; speaking of him, Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt[54] said to Heraclius, the King of the Greeks:

[1120]

[1121]

[1122] Be like al-Mujashshir, of whom his subjects said
"al-Mujashshir was the most faithful of us in fulfilling what he undertook."]

b. Marzā—or, some say, Marhar—b. Ṣanfa [who is al-Samr, who is al-Ṣafī, the most generous king to be seen on the face of the earth; of him Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt said:

al-Ṣafī b. Nabīt, when he was king, was loftier and more generous than Heraclius and Caesar.]

b. Ja'tham [who is 'Urām, who is al-Nabīt, who is Qaydhar; the interpretation of Qaydhar, he said, is "ruler", for he was the first of the descendants of Ismā'īl to be king] b. Ismā'īl [Ishmael], who was faithful to his promise, b. Ibrāhīm [Abraham], the Friend of the Compassionate, b. Tāriḥ [who is Āzar] b. Nāḥūr b. Sārū' b. Arghawā b. Bāligh [the interpretation of Bāligh is "the divider" as in Syriac; this is because it was he who divided the lands between the descendants of Adam, and he is Fālij] b. 'Ābar b. Shālikh b. Arfakhshad b. Sām [Shem] b. Nūḥ [Noah] b. Lamk b. Mattūshalakh b. Akhnūkh [he is the prophet Idrīs][55] b. Yard [he is Yārid, in whose time idols were made] b. Mahlā'īl b. Qaynān b. Anūsh b. Shiththa [who is Hibatallah] b. Ādam. Shiththa [Seth] was the successor of his father after Hābīl [Abel] was killed; his father said, "A gift of God (Hibatallāh) in exchange for Hābil," and his name was de-[1123] rived from this.

We have mentioned earlier in this work in a concise and abridged form a part of what we have been able to discover of the accounts of Ismā'īl [Ishmael] b. Ibrāhīm [Abraham] and his ancestors, male and female, back to Adam, and of the events of every age during this period of time, and we shall not repeat them here. Hishām b. Muḥammad: The Arabs used to say, "The flea has bit-

54. For Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt, a poet from al-Ṭā'if, roughly contemporary with Muḥammad, see EI [1], s.v. and GAL S, I:55f. Heraclius is the well-known Byzantine emperor.

55. A prophet mentioned in the Qur'ān as "raised to high station" by God (19:56f.; see 21:85). He is usually identified with the Biblical Enoch (Akhnūkh) who "walked with God, and he was not, for God took Him" (Genesis 5:24). For other identifications see EI [2], s.v. Idrīs.

ten since our father Anūsh was born, and sin has been forbidden since our father Shiththh was born." The Syriac name for Shiththh is Shīth.

The Account of the Messenger of God and His Life

The Messenger of God Is Recognized by the Monk Baḥīrā

Ibn Humayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥaq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr.[56] 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib died eight years after the Year of the Elephant. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib had entrusted the Messenger of God to the care of his paternal uncle Abū Ṭālib, because Abū Ṭālib and 'Abdallāh, the father of the Messenger of God, had had the same mother. Abū Ṭālib assumed responsibility for the Messenger of God after the death of his grandfather and kept him with him. Once Abū Ṭālib was going on a trading expedition to Syria with a party of Quraysh, but when he had made his preparations and was ready to set out, the Messenger of God, as they allege, could not bear to be separated from him. Abū Ṭālib took pity on him and [1124] said, "By God, I will take him with me, and we shall never part from one another," or words to that effect; and took him with him.

The caravan halted at Buṣra[57] in Syria, where there was a learned Christian monk named Baḥīrā in his cell. There had always been a monk in that cell, and their knowledge was passed on, it is alleged, by means of a book which was handed down from generation to generation. When the caravan halted at Baḥīrā's cell this year, he prepared a copious meal for them, because while he was in his cell he had seen the Messenger of God shaded by a cloud which marked him out from among the company. Then they had come near, and, when they halted in the shade of a tree close to him, he observed the cloud covering the tree and bending down its branches over the Messenger of God until he was in the shade beneath it. When Baḥīrā saw this, he descended from his cell and sent the caravan a message inviting them all. When he saw the Messenger of God, he observed him very intently, noting features of his person whose description he had found in his book. After the company had finished the meal and dispersed, he asked the Messenger of God about certain matters which had taken place both when he was awake and when he was asleep. The Messenger of God told him, and he found that these things corresponded to the description which he had found in his book. Finally he looked at Muḥammad's back, and saw the seal of prophethood between his shoulders.

56. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 115–17; Ṭabarī omits some details given by Ibn Isḥāq. For Baḥīrā see EI ^{2}, s.v. Baḥīrā.

57. Bostra.

After this Baḥīrā asked Muḥammad's uncle, Abū Ṭālib, "What relation is this boy to you?" "My son," he replied. "He is not your son," said Baḥīrā. "This boy's father cannot be living." "He is my brother's son," said Abū Ṭālib. "What happened to his father?" he asked. "He died while the boy's mother was pregnant with him," he replied. "You have spoken the truth," said Baḥīrā. "Take him back to your country, and be on your guard against the Jews, for, by God, if they see him and recognize what I have recognized in him, they will seek to do him harm. Great things lie ahead of him, [1125] so take him back quickly to his country." His uncle then took him quickly back to Mecca.

Hishām b. Muḥammad: Abū Ṭālib took the Messenger of God to Buṣra in Syria when he was nine years old.

Al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad—Abū Nūh—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq—Abū Bakr b. Abī Mūsā—Abū Mūsā: Abū Ṭālib set off for Syria accompanied by the Messenger of God and a number of shaykhs of Quraysh. When they were above the monk's cell they went down and unloaded their camels. The monk came out to meet them, even though when they had passed by him previously he had not done so nor paid any attention to them. As they were encamped among their baggage he went among them, finally coming up and taking hold of the hand of the Messenger of God. Then he said, "This is the Chief of the Worlds; this is the Messenger of the Lord of the Worlds: this person has been sent by God as a mercy to the Worlds." The shaykhs of the Quraysh said to him, "What is it that you know?" He replied, "I know that when you appeared at the top of the pass there was not a tree or a stone which did not prostrate itself in worship; and they only prostrate themselves to a prophet. I also recognize him by the seal of prophethood which is below the cartilage of his shoulders and which is like an apple." Then he returned and prepared a meal for them. When he brought it to them, the Messenger of God was tending the camels, so he said, "Send for him." He came with a cloud above him, and Baḥīrā said, "Look at him! There is a cloud above him which is shading him." When he approached the company he found that they had already occupied the shade of the tree; but when he sat down, the shade of the tree moved to cover him. Then Baḥīrā said, "Look at the shade of the tree! It has moved to cover him."

[1126] While he was standing by them beseeching them not to take the Messenger of God to the land of the Byzantines, since if these saw him they would recognize him by his description and would kill him, he turned around and suddenly beheld seven men advancing from the land of the Byzantines. He went up to meet them and said, "What brings you here?" They replied, "We have come because this prophet is appearing in this month. Men have been sent to every road, and we have been chosen as the best of men and sent to your road." "Have you left anyone behind you who is better than you?" he asked. "No," they said, "We have been chosen as the best of men for your road." He asked them, "Do you believe that something which God wishes to bring about can be prevented by any man?" "No," they said, and they followed him and remained with him. Then he went up to the members of the caravan and said to them, "I ask you in God's name, which of you is his guardian?" "Abū Ṭālib," they said. He did not cease to beseech Abū Ṭālib until he sent the Messenger of God back. Abū Bakr sent Bilāl to accompany him, and the monk supplied him with provisions of cakes and oil.

The Messenger of God Is Protected by God from Participating in Pagan Practices

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b.

ʿAbdallāh b. Qays b. Makhramah—al-Hasan b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭalib—his father, Muḥammad b. ʿAlī—his grandfather, ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib: I heard the Messenger of God saying, "I was only tempted to take part in heathen practices on two occasions, and both times God prevented me from doing what I wanted. After that I was never tempted to evil, right up to the time when God honored me by making me his Messenger. One night I said to a lad from the Quraysh who was guarding flocks with me in the high ground of Mecca, ' Would you watch my flock for me so that I can go into Mecca and spend an evening there like other young men?' He agreed, so I set off with this object in mind. When I came to the first settlement in Mecca I heard the sound of tambourines and pipes, and I asked what was happening. They said that a wedding [1127] was taking place, so I sat down to watch them. But God prevented me from hearing, and I went to sleep and did not wake up until I felt the touch of the sun. Then I went back to my companion, who asked me what I had done. 'I did not do anything,' I replied, and then told him what had happened. Another night I made the same request, and he agreed, so I set out. When I reached Mecca I heard the same sound which I had heard on that earlier night, and I sat down to watch. Once again God prevented me from hearing and, by God, I only woke up when I felt the touch of the sun. I went back to my companion and told him what had happened. After that I was not tempted to evil, right up to the time when God honoured me by making me his Messenger."

The Prophet's Marriage to Khadījah[58]

Hishām b. Muḥammad: The Messenger of God married Khadījah when he was twenty-five years old. At that time, Khadījah was forty years of age.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid b. Asad b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā b. Quṣayy was a wealthy and respected merchant. She used to employ men to engage in trade with her prop-

58. Ibn Hishām, Sīrāh, 119–21; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I:35.5-10. It is not clear how it was possible for Khadījah to trade on her own account, but the sources speak of at least one other Meccan woman who did so. Khadījah had previously been twice married, and the husbands were presumably now dead, so this may have had something to do with her special position.

erty and gave them a share in the profits, for Quraysh were a trading people. When she heard of the Messenger of God's truthfulness, reliability, and nobility of character, she sent for him and proposed to him that he should go to Syria and engage in trade with her property; she would give him more than she gave other men who traded for her and also a slave of hers called Maysarah. The Messenger of God accepted, and set out to trade with her property accompanied by her slave Maysarah. When he reached Syria he halted in the shade of a tree near a monk's cell. The monk [1128] went up to Maysarah and said, "Who is this man who has halted beneath this tree?" Maysarah replied, "He is a man of Quraysh, one of the people of the sacred precinct (Ḥaram)." "No one has ever halted beneath this tree but a prophet," said the monk.

The Messenger of God sold the goods which he had brought with him, bought what he wanted to buy, and then set off back to Mecca accompanied by Maysarah. They assert that whenever the noonday heat grew intense Maysarah saw two angels shading him from the sun as he rode his camel. When he arrived in Mecca, he brought Khadījah her property, which she sold for twice the price or nearly so. Then Maysarah informed her of what the monk had said and how he himself had seen the two angels shading him. Khadījah was a resolute, intelligent and noble woman, and in addition to this God wished to ennoble her, so when Maysarah told her these things she sent for the Messenger of God and, it is reported, said to him, "Cousin, your kinship to me,[59] your standing among your people, your reliability, your good character and your truthfulness make you a desirable match." Then she offered herself to him in marriage. Khadījah was then the most distinguished of the women of Quraysh in lineage, the most highly honored, and the wealthiest, and all the men of her tribe would have been eager to accept this proposal had it been made to them. When she made this offer to the Messenger of God he told his uncles about it, and Ḥamzah b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib went with him to Khuwaylid b. Asad and asked for (his daughter) Khadījah's hand on Muḥammad's behalf. Khuwaylid married Khadījah to the Messenger of God, and she bore all his children except for Ibrāhīm. They were Zaynab, Ruqayyah, Umm Kulthūm, Fātimah, al-Qāsim—from whom he received his kunyah of Abū al-Qāsim—al-Tāhir, and al-Ṭayyib.[60] Al-Qāsim, al-Ṭāhir, and al-Ṭayyib died during the Jāhiliyyah, while all of his daughters lived until Islam, became [1129] Muslims, and emigrated with him to al-Madīnah.

59. They were not closely related, but both were descendants of Quṣayy.

Al-Ḥarith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Ma'mar and others—Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī: a similar report was given by other local scholars:[61] Khadījah hired only the Messenger of God and another man from Quraysh to go to the market of Ḥubāshah in Tihāmah. It was her father Khuwaylid who married her to Muḥammad, and the person who acted as an intermediary was a half-breed freedwoman from Mecca.

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—al-Wāqidī: All of this is an error.

Al-Wāqidī: They also say that Khadījah sent a message to the Messenger of God inviting him to take her, meaning that they should marry. She was a highly respected woman, and the whole of Quraysh would have been eager to marry her and would have spent much money to that end had they aspired to it. She called her father to her house, plied him with wine until he was drunk, slaughtered a cow, anointed him with perfume and clothed him in a striped robe; then she sent for the Messenger of God and his uncles and, when they came in, her father married him to her. When her father recovered from his intoxication, he said, "What is this meat, this perfume, and this garment?" She replied, "You have married me to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh." "I have not done so," he said. "Would I do this, when the greatest men of Mecca have asked for you and I have not agreed?"

Al-Wāqidī: This is also an error. In our opinion the trustworthy version is what is preserved in the account of Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Muslim—his father—Muḥammad b. Jubayr b. Muṭ'im; and in the account of Ibn Abī al-Zinād—Hishām b. Urwah—his father—'Ā'ishah; and in the account of Ibn Abī Ḥabībah—Dāūd b. al-Ḥuṣayn—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: Her uncle 'Amr b. Asad married her to the Messenger of God. Her father died before the Sac- [1130]

60. Al-Ṭāhir is also said to have been called 'Abdallāh. Some critics have suggested that al-Ṭayyib is also an epithet applied to 'Abdallāh. None of the sources see anything unusual (or miraculous) in Khadījah having had seven children after the age of forty.

61. Literally, "the same was said by others than he of the people of the town," perhaps al-Madīnah or Damascus.

rilegious War (al-fijār).[62]

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): Khadījah's house at that time was the house which is still known today and called Khadījah's House. It is related that Mu'āwiyah[63] bought it and turned it into a mosque in which people could pray. He rebuilt it in the form in which it exists today without alteration. The stone which is at the door of the house to the left as you go in is the stone beneath which the Messenger of God used to sit to shelter himself when people threw stones at him from the houses of Abū Lahab[64] and 'Adī b. Ḥamrā' al-Thaqafī, behind the house of Ibn 'Alqamah. The stone measures a cubit (dhirā') and a span (shibr) one way, and a cubit the other way.

62. This was a war in which Quraysh supported by Kinānah fought against the tribe of Qays 'Aylān during the sacred month. It is said to have occurred when Muḥammad was twenty, that is, in A.D. 590; and he did not marry Khadījah until five years later. See EI [2], s.v. Fidjār.

63. Umayyad caliph who reigned from A.D. 661 to 680. Abū Lahab (below) was the uncle of Muḥammad who succeeded Abū Ṭālib as chief of Hāshim and turned against Muḥammad.

64. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 122–26.

Events of the Life of the Messenger of God

The Rebuilding of the Ka'bah[65]

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: We have mentioned previously the circumtances of the Prophet's marriage to Khadījah, the various conflicting reports about it, and the date of its occurence. Ten years after the marriage of the Messenger of God to Khadījah, Quraysh demolished the Ka'bah and then rebuilt it. According to Ibn Isḥāq, this was in the Messenger of God's thirty-fifth year.

Ibn Ḥumayad—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: The reason for their demolition of the Ka'bah was that at this time it consisted of loose stones rising to somewhat above a man's height, and they wished to make it higher and roof it over, since some men, Qurashites and others, had stolen the treasure of the Ka'bah, which was kept in a well in its interior.

History of the Ka'bah

Hisham b. Muḥammad—his father: The story of the two gazelles of the Ka'bah is as follows. The Ka'bah had been destroyed when the people of Noah were drowned, and God commanded his friend Abraham and Abraham's son Ishmael to rebuild it on its original [1131] foundations. This they did, as is stated in the Qur'ān:[66] And when Abraham and Ishmael were raising the foundations of the House

65. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, [vol]:122–26. There is nothing in the Qur'ān to connect Noah with the Ka'bah, so this must be a deduction by later Muslim scholars from the statement that the whole world was destroyed by the flood in the time of Noah.

66. 2:127.

(Abraham prayed): Our Lord! Accept from us (this duty). Only You are the Hearer, the Knower.

It had not had any custodians since its destruction in the time of Noah. Then God commanded Abraham to settle his son by the Ka'bah, wishing thereby to show a mark of esteem to one whom he later ennobled by means of his Prophet Muḥammad. Abraham, the Friend of the Compassionate, and his son Ishmael were custodians of the Ka'bah after the time of Noah. At that time, Mecca was uninhabited, and the surrounding country was inhabited by the Jurhum and 'Amāliqah.[67] Ishmael married a woman of the Jurhum. On this subject, 'Amr b. al-Ḥārith b. Muḍāḍ said:

We allied ourselves by marriage to a man with the noblest of fathers;
his sons are of us, and we are his brothers-in-law.

After Abraham, Ishmael became the custodian of the Ka'bah, and after him, Nabt and his Jurhumī mother. When Nabt died, since Ishmael's sons were not numerous, Jurhum seized the custodianship. 'Amr b. al-Ḥārith b. Muḍāḍ said:

We were the custodians of the Ka'bah after Nābit;
we circumambulated it and good was manifest.

The first of the Jurhum to be custodian of the Ka'bah was Muḍāḍ, followed by his descendants, generation after generation. Eventually the Jurhum acted wrongfully in Mecca, held lawful that which was forbidden, misappropriated the wealth which had been presented to the Ka'bah, and oppressed those who came to Mecca. Their behavior became so unrestrained that when one of them could not find a place in which to fornicate he would go into the Ka'bah and do it there. It is asserted that Isāf fornicated with Nā'ilah in the interior of the Ka'bah and that they were transformed into two stones. During the Jāhiliyyah, any person who [1132] acted wrongfully or oppresively in Mecca, or any king who held lawful what was forbidden there, perished on the spot. Mecca was called al-Nāssah, and was also called Bakkah, because it used to break (tabukk) the necks of evildoers and tyrants when they acted wrongfully there.

67. These are the Amalekites of the Bible, but in the traditional history of pre-Islamic Arabia there is much non-Biblical material about them. See EI ^{2}, s.v. 'Amālīḳ.

The Jurhum did not desist from their wickedness. When the Banū ʿAmr b. ʿĀmir dispersed from the Yemen,[68] the Banū Ḥārithah b. ʿAmr split off (inkhazaʿa) from them, settled in Tihāmah, and became known as Khuzāʿah.[69] Khuzāʿah consists of the Banū ʿAmr b. Rabīʿah b. Ḥārithah together with the clans of Aslam, Mālik, and Milkān, sons of Afṣā b. Ḥārithah. God sent a bleeding of the nose and a plague of ants[70] against the Jurhum and destroyed them, while Khuzāʿah joined together to expel those of them who survived. The chief of Khuzāʿah at that time was ʿAmr b. Rabīʿah b. Ḥārithah, whose mother was Fuhayrah bt. ʿĀmir b. al-Ḥārith b. Muḍāḍ. A battle took place, and when ʿĀmir b. al-Ḥārith[71] felt that he would be defeated, he brought out the two gazelles of the Kaʿbah and the stone of the rukn,[72] seeking forgiveness, and recited:

O God, Jurhum are your servants; our enemies are newcomers, while we are your hereditary servants,
Through whom your dwelling has flourished of old.

However his repentance was not accepted (by the opponents), so he flung the two gazelles of the Kaʿbah and the stone of the rukn into Zamzam, buried them and left with the remnants of the Jurhum for part of the territory of Juhaynah. There a sudden torrent overtook them and swept them away. On this subject Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt said:

---

68. The reference is to 'Amr Muzayqiyā', who led the migration of several tribes from the Yemen at the time of the breaking of the dam of Ma'rib; he had sons called Ḥārithah and Afṣā.

69. The name Khuzāʿah is here explained as indicating that they have split off (inkhazaʿa) from the main tribe. The following sentence suggests that Khuzāʿah was at first a group of small related clans rather than being all descendants of a single ancestor.

70. The ants are mentioned on p. 1121.

71. There is some doubt about whether the name should be ʿĀmir or ʿAmr. ʿĀmir b. al-Ḥārith was the father of Fuhayrah, just mentioned.

72. The phrase ḥajar al-rukn is unusual. Each of the corners or angles of the Kaʿbah is called a rukn, but the English word "cornerstone" has misleading associations. It is possible that the stone here is the sacred Black Stone, which is now built into one rukn of the Kaʿbah and kissed or touched by pilgrims. Near the Black Stone is another stone, "the lucky stone" (al-ḥajar al-asʿad), which is touched but not kissed, and this might be what is meant here.

Jurhum blackened Tihāmah with the dung of their cattle for a while,
and then Iḍam was awash with them all.

[1133] The custodianship was taken over by ʿAmr b. Rabīʿah, or, according to the descendants of Quṣayy, by ʿAmr b. al-Ḥārith al-Ghubshānī. He it is who says:

We became custodians of the Kaʿbah after Jurhum that we might keep it prosperous, free from every wrongdoer and unbeliever.

He also said:

A valley whose birds and wild animals may not be touched.
We are its custodians and we do not discharge our duties dishonestly.

and:

It is as though there had never been a close friend between al-Ḥajūn and al-Ṣafā and no companion had engaged in evening conversation in Mecca.
Nay! We were its people, but we were destroyed by the vicissitudes of time and stumbling fate.[73]

and:

Travel, men, for it would be negligence on your part for you not to be travelling one day.
We were men like you, but fate changed our condition, and you shall be as we were.
Urge on your mounts and slacken your reins before you die, and perform your duties.

What he means is, "Strive for the hereafter and abandon the concerns of this world."

73. These two lines are quoted by Ibn Isḥāq (Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 73) as part of a longer poem which he attributes to ʿAmr b. al-Ḥārith b. Muḍāḍ al-Jurhumī. It is virtually impossible to clear up the confusion of names here. Al-Hajūn is a mountain above Mecca, and al-Ṣafā is the point near the Kaʿbah from which the pilgrims begin to run to al-Marwah.

The Ka'bah was taken over by the Khuzā'ah, except that there were three functions which were in the hands of tribes of (the group called) Muḍar. The first of these was the ijāzah, the giving of permission to the pilgrims to leave 'Arafah. This was in the hands of al-Ghawth b. Murr, who was (of the clan of) Ṣūfah. When it was time for the permission to be given the Arabs would say, "Give permission, Ṣūfah." The second function was the ifāḍah, the permission for the pilgrims to disperse to Minā on the morning of the sacrifice. This was in the hands of the Banū Zayd b. 'Adwān; the last of them to hold this position was Abū Sayyārah 'Umaylah b. al-A'zal b. Khālid b. Sa'd b. al-Ḥārith b. Wābish b. Zayd. The third function was the nasī', the delaying or postponement of the sacred month (by intercalation).[74] The right to decide this was in the hands of al-Qalammas, who was Ḥudhayfah b. Fuqaym b. 'Adī, of the Banū Mālik b. Kinānah. After him, it passed to his descendants, down to the last of them, Abū Thumāmah, who was Junādah b. 'Awf b. Umayyah b. Qala' b. Hudhayfah. When Islam came, the sacred months had returned to their original times, and God established them firmly and abolished the nasī'. [1134]

When Ma'add became numerous, they scattered, as Muhalhil says:

Our abode was in Tihāmah for a time, and the descendants of Ma'add dwelt there.

As for Quraysh, they did not leave Mecca.

When 'Abd al-Muttalib dug (the well of) Zamzam, he found the two gazelles of the Ka'bah which Jurhum had buried in it and brought them out. We have already mentioned the story of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib and the two gazelles in the appropriate place earlier

74. The Arabs observed lunar months, but, in order to keep their lunar year in line with the solar year, they occasionally intercalated an extra month; this is what is known as the nasī', the delaying or postponing of the sacred months. There is no mention of any fixed system of intercalation, and so it may have been carried out in haphazard fashion, and perhaps even in ways which were of personal advantage to those making the decision. This is presumably why it was forbidden by the Qur'ān (9:36f.). Muḥammad is said to have made these verses public at the Pilgrimage of Farewell (March 632). This committed the Muslims to a lunar year of 354 days, and thus caused difficulties for those engaged in agriculture who followed the solar calendar. It is difficult to give a reasonable sense to the phrase "had returned to their original times."

in this book.[75]

The Rebuilding of the Ka'bah (Continued)

Returning to the narrative of Ibn Isḥāq:[76] The person in whose house the treasure of the Ka'bah was found was Duwayk, a mawlā of the Banū Mulayḥ b. 'Amr of Khuzā'ah, and they cut off his hand publicly. Among those who were suspected in this matter were al-[1135] Ḥārith b. 'Āmir b. Nawfal, Abū Ihāb b. 'Azīz b. Qays b. Suwayd al-Tamīmī, who was a half brother of al-Ḥārith b. 'Āmir b. Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf on his mother's side, and Abū Lahab b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. These are the people who, Quraysh allege, left the treasure with Duwayk, the mawlā of the Banū Mulayḥ, after they had stolen it. When Quraysh accused them of the crime, they informed against Duwayk and his hand was cut off. It is said that they left the stolen treasure with him. They also relate that when Quraysh were certain that al-Ḥārith b. 'Āmir b. Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf had it, they took him to a female Arab soothsayer, who, using her occult skill, pronounced in rhyming prose that he should not enter Mecca for ten years because of his violation of the sanctity of the Ka'bah. They allege that they expelled him from Mecca and that he remained on its outskirts for ten years.

A ship belonging to a Greek merchant had been driven ashore by rough seas at Jeddah and had been broken to pieces. They took its timbers and prepared them for use in roofing over the Ka'bah. There was a Copt in Mecca who was a carpenter, and thus they had both the materials for restoring it and a craftsman ready and at hand. There was a snake which used to come out of the well in the Ka'bah into which votive objects were thrown, and which would lie on top of the Ka'bah wall every day. People were afraid of it because whenever anyone went near it it would draw itself up, make a rustling noise, and open its mouth. One day, as it was [1136] lying on top of the Ka'bah as usual, God sent against it a bird which seized it and carried it off. On seeing this, the Quraysh said, "We may hope that God is pleased with what we intend to do. We have a companion who is a craftsman and we have timber, while God has dealt with the snake for us."

75. Above, p.1088.

76. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 122–26. Ibn Hishām omits the passage about Duwayk apart from the first sentence.

This was fifteen years after the Sacrilegious War, when the Messenger of God was thirty-five years old. When they took the decision to demolish and rebuild the Ka'bah, Abū Wahb b. 'Amr b. 'Ā'idh b. 'Imrān b. Makhzūm rose and took a stone from it which leapt from his hand and returned to its place. Then he said, "Men of Quraysh, do not spend on its rebuilding any ill-gotten gains, nor money earned by prostitution, usury, or by wronging any man." Some people wrongly ascribe this saying to al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ al-Makkī—'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān b. Umayyah b. Khalaf: He saw a son of Ja'dah b. Hubayrah b. Abī Wahb b. 'Amr b. 'Ā'idh b. 'Imrān b. Makhzūm circumambulating the Ka'bah and asked about him. They said, "This is a son of Ja'dah b. Hubayrah." Then 'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān said, "This man's grandfather—meaning Abū Wahb—is he who, when Quraysh agreed to demolish the Ka'bah, lifted a stone from it which leapt from his hand and returned to its place. Then he said, 'Men of Quraysh, do not spend on its rebuilding any ill-gotten gains, nor money earned from prostitution, usury, or by wronging any man.' " Abū Wahb was a maternal uncle of the Messenger of God, and was a noble.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: Quraysh divided the work on the Ka'bah between them. The side containing the door went to the Banū 'Abd Manāf and Zuhrah; the section between the Black Stone and the southern corner went to the Makhzūm, Taym, and the clans of Quraysh who were attached to them; the back of the Ka'bah went to the Banū Jumaḥ and Banū Sahm; and the side facing the Ḥijr and the Ḥaṭīm went to the Banū 'Abd al-Dār b. Quṣayy, the Banū Asad b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. Quṣayy, and the Banū 'Adī b. Ka'b. Then, however, they were afraid to demolish it, so al-Walīd b. Mughīrah said, "I will make a start on the demolition for you." He took up his pickaxe and stood by the Ka'bah, saying, "O God, let the Ka'bah not fear. O God, we intend nothing but good." Then he demolished part of it near the two corners.[77] They waited to see what would happen to him that [1137] night, and they said, "Let us watch; if something happens to him we shall not demolish any more of it and shall restore it as it was, and if nothing happens to him we shall know that God is pleased with what we have done, and we shall demolish it." The next morning al-Walīd went early to his work and continued to demolish, and the others then did so also. At last they came to the foundations, reaching green stones like teeth, interlocked with one another.

77. Since al-Walīd b. Mughīrah belonged to Makhzūm, these were presumably the two corners of the side assigned to them, that is, what lay between the eastern corner (with the Black Stone) and the southern corner.

[1138] Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—certain narrators of traditions (Ḥadīths): A man of Quraysh who was among these demolishing it thrust a crowbar between two stones to prise one of them up. When the stone moved, the whole of Mecca shook, and then (they knew that) they had reached the foundations.

The clans then gathered stones to rebuild the Ka'bah. Each clan gathered them separately and built separately, and when the building reached the place where the Black Stone was to be put they began to dispute about it, since every clan wished to lift the Stone to its place to the exclusion of the other clans. They started to split up into factions, to form alliances, and to make agreements among themselves in preparation for battle. The Banū 'Abd al-Dār brought a bowl full of blood and made a compact with the Banū 'Adī b. Ka'b to support one another to the death. They thrust their hands into this bowl of blood, and were called "the bloodlickers" (la'aqat al-dam) on account of this. The Quraysh remained in this state for four or five days, and then they gathered in the mosque to consult together and to reach an equitable agreement.

Some narrators assert that Abū Umayyah b. al-Mughīrah, who at that time was the oldest member of Quraysh, said, "Men of Quraysh, make the first man who comes in at the door of this mosque the arbiter of your differences so that he may judge on the matter." The first man to come in was the Messenger of God, and when they saw him they said, "This is the trustworthy one (al-amīn) with whom we are satisfied. This is Muḥammad." He [1139] came up to them, and they told him about the matter, and he said, "Bring me a cloak." They brought him one, and he took the Black Stone and placed it on it with his own hands. Then he said, "Let each clan take one side of the cloak, and then lift it up all together." They did so, and when they had brought it to its place he put it in position with his own hands. Then they built on top of it. Before the revelation first came to him, Quraysh used to call the Messenger of God "the trustworthy one."

The Beginning of the Prophetic Mission

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabari): Quraysh's rebuilding of the Kaʿbah was fifteen years after the Sacrilegious War. There were twenty years between the Year of the Elephant and the Year of the Sacrilegious War. The early authorities differ as to the age of the Messenger of God when he became a prophet. Some say that it was five years after the Quraysh rebuilt the Kaʿbah, when his fortieth birthday had passed.[78]

Those who say this:

Muḥammad b. Khalaf al-ʿAsqalānī—Ādam—Ḥammad b. Salamah—Abū Jamrah al-Ḍubaʿī—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Messenger of God commenced his mission at the age of forty.

ʿAmr b. ʿAlī and Ibn al-Muthannā—Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad b. Qays—Rabīʿah b. Abī ʿAbd al-Raḥmān—Anas b. Mālik: The Messenger of God commenced his mission at the end of his fortieth year.

Al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd—his father—al-Awzāʿī—Rabīʿah b. Abī ʿAbd al-Raḥmān—Anas b. Mālik: The Messenger of God commenced his mission at the beginning of his fortieth year.

[1140] Ibn ʿAbd al-Raḥīm al-Barqī—ʿAmr b. Abī Salamah—al-Awzāʿī—Rabīʿah b. Abī ʿAbd al-Raḥmān—Anas b. Mālik: The Messenger of God commenced his mission at the beginning of his fortieth year.

Abū Shuraḥbīl al-Ḥimṣī—Abū al-Yamān—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAyyāsh—Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd—Rabīʿah b. Abī ʿAbd al-Raḥmān—Anas b. Mālik:

78. This places the beginning of his prophethood about the year A.D. 610.

The Messenger of God received the revelation when he was aged forty.

Ibn al-Muthannā—al-Ḥajjāj b. al-Minhāl—Ḥammād—ʿAmr b. Dīnār—ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr: The Messenger of God commenced his mission when he was aged forty.

Ibn al-Muthannā—al-Ḥajjāj—Ḥammād—ʿAmr—Yaḥyā b. Jaʿdah: The Messenger of God said to Fāṭimah, "[Gabriel] has reviewed the Qur'ān with me once a year, but this year he has reviewed it with me twice, and I fancy that my time has come. You are the nearest to me of my kin. Whenever a prophet has been sent, his mission has lasted for a period of half his predecessor's lifetime. Jesus was sent for a period of forty years, and I was sent for twenty."[79]

ʿUbayd b. Muḥammad al-Warrāq—Rawḥ b. ʿUbādah—Hishām—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Messenger of God commenced his mission at the age of forty, and remained in Mecca for thirteen years.[80]

Abū Kurayb—Abū Usāmah and Muḥammad b. Maymūn al-Zaʿfarānī—Hishām b. Ḥassān—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: The [1141]
Messenger of God commenced his mission and received the revelation when he was aged forty, and remained in Mecca for thirteen years.

Others say that he became a prophet when he was aged forty-three.[81]

Those who say this:

Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—Aḥmad—Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd—Hishām—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Prophet received the revelation when he was aged forty-three.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr—Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd—Saʿīd b. al-Musayyab: The Messenger of God received the revelation when he was aged forty-three.

Ibn al-Muthannā—ʿAbd al-Wahhāb—Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd—Saʿīd, that is, Ibn al-Musayyab: The Messenger of God received the revelation when he was aged forty-three.

79. This fits in better with the view that he became a prophet when he was forty-three.

80. Thirteen years would be from A.D. 610 to 622 inclusive.

81. This makes his prophethood begin about the year a.d. 613.

The Day and the Month on Which the Messenger of God Became a Prophet, and the Accounts Concerning This

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): The sound account is the one related by Ibn al-Muthannā—Muḥammad b. Ja'far—Shu'bah—Ghaylān b. Jarīr—'Abdallāh b. Ma'bad al-Zimmānī—Abū Qatādah al-Anṣārī: The Messenger of God was questioned about his Monday fast. He replied, "This is the day on which I was born and the day on which I commenced by mission." Another version has it: "on which I received the revelation."

Aḥmad b. Manṣūr—al-Ḥasan b. Mūsā al-Ashyab—Abū Hilāl—Ghaylān b. Jarīr al-Ma'walī—'Abdallāh b. Ma'bad al-Zimmānī—[1142] Abū Qatādah—'Umar: He said to the Prophet, "O Prophet of God, (what is the reason for) your Monday fast?" He replied, "This is the day on which I was born and the day on which the prophethood descended upon me."

Ibrāhīm b. Sa'īd—Mūsā b. Dā'ūd—Ibn Lahī'ah—Khālid b. Abī 'Imrān—Ḥanash al-Ṣan'ānī—Ibn 'Abbas: The Prophet was born on a Monday and became a prophet on a Monday.

First Revelation of the Qur'ān

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): There is no dispute among the scholars on the above point. There is however a dispute as to which Monday this was. Some say that the Qur'ān was revealed to the Messenger of God on the eighteenth of Ramaḍān.

Those who say this:

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. Dīnār—Ayyūb—Abū Qilābah 'Abd Allāh b. Zayd al-Jarmī: According to the information which had reached him, the Qur'ān was revealed to the Messenger of God on the eighteenth of Ramaḍān.

Others say that it was revealed on the twenty-fourth of Ramaḍān.

Those who say this:

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—one who is above suspicion—Sa'īd b. Abī 'Arūbah—Qatādah b. Di'āmah al-

Sadūsī—Abū al-Jald: The furqān[82] was revealed on the twenty-fourth of Ramaḍān.

Others say that it was revealed on the seventeenth of Ramaḍān. They quote as evidence for this the words of God:[83] "And that [1143] which we revealed to Our slave on the day of the furqān, on the day when the two armies met.[84] This refers to the meeting (in battle) of the Messenger of God with the polytheists at Badr, which took place on the morning of the seventeenth of Ramaḍān.

Signs of the Approach of Prophethood

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): Before Gabriel appeared to him to confer on him his mission as Messenger of God, it is said that he used to see signs and evidences indicating that God wished to ennoble him and to single him out for his favor. One of these is the account which I have previously given[85] of the two angels who came to him, opened up his breast, and removed the hatred and the impurity which were in it. This was when he was with his foster-mother, Ḥalīmah. Another is that it is said that whenever he passed along a road and passed by a tree or a stone, it would greet him.

Al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb—Manṣūr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—his mother Barrah bt. Abī Tajrāh: When God willed that Muḥammad should be ennobled and should enter upon prophethood, it came about that whenever he went out to attend his business[86] he would go a great distance, out of sight of houses, and into the ravines and wādī-beds; and then every stone and tree he passed would say, "Peace be upon 82. Here means the Qur'ān, but the word has several other meanings; see EI [2], s.v. Furḳān. This paragraph from Ibn Isḥāq is omitted by Ibn Hishām.

83. 8:41.

84. This verse refers to the battle of Badr, and furqān might then be understood as the Muslims' "deliverance" from the pagan Meccans; but that also seems to be connected somehow with a revelation of Muḥammad.

85. Though Ṭabarī says "I have previously given," he appears to be referring to what comes subsequently on pp. 1154f.

86. This seems to be the plain meaning of al-ḥājah; but "went out about his business" is also possible. The paragraph corresponds to Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I:102.17-23.

you, Messenger of God." He would turn to the right and the left and turn round, but could not see anyone.

Predictions of the Appearance of the Prophet

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): The various religious communities used to speak of his forthcoming mission, and the scholars of every community used to tell their people of it.

[1144] Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—'Alī b. 'Īsā al-Ḥakamī—his father—'Āmir b. Rabī'ah: I heard Zayd b. 'Amr b. Nufayl[87] saying, "I expect a prophet from the descendants of Ishmael, in particular from the descendants of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. I do not think that I shall live to see him, but I believe in him, proclaim the truth of his message, and testify that he is a prophet. If you live long enough to see him, give him my greetings. I shall inform you of his description, so that he will not be hidden from you." I said, "Tell me, then," and he said, "He is a man who is neither short nor tall, whose hair is neither abundant nor sparse, whose eyes are always red, and who has the seal of prophethood between his shoulders. His name is Aḥmad,[88] and this town is his birthplace and the place in which he will commence his mission. Then his people will drive him out and hate the message which he brings, and he will emigrate to Yathrib and triumph. Beware lest you fail to recognize him. I have travelled around every land in search of the faith of Abraham. Every person whom I ask, whether Jew, Christian, or Magian, says, 'This faith lies where you have come from,' and they describe him as I have described him to you. They say that no prophet remains but he."[89] 'Āmir said, "When I

87. One of the four men mentioned by Ibn Isḥāq (143-49) as a ḥanīf or searcher for a pure monotheism; see Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 162-64. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I:105.23-106.8.

88. Aḥmad is commonly regarded as a variant form of Muḥammad, following the standard interpretation of Qur'ān 61:6, where Jesus says to the Israelites that he brings "good tidings of a messenger who comes after me, whose name is Aḥmad." (Aḥmad is, of course from the same root as Muḥammad, namely ḥ-m-d.) There are strong grounds, however, for thinking that for the first century or so of Islam the word aḥmadu was understood as an adjective meaning "more praiseworthy" and not as a proper name; see Watt, "His Name is Aḥmad," Muslim World, xliii (1953):110-17.

89. This refers to the standard Muslim interpretation of the phrase "seal of the prophets" applied to Muḥammad in Qur'ān 33:40, namely, that he is the last became a Muslim, I told the Messenger of God what Zayd b. 'Amr had said, and I gave him his greetings. He returned his greetings and said, 'May God have mercy on his soul. I saw him in Paradise dressed in flowing robes.' "

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—one who is above suspicion —'Abdallāh b. Ka'b the mawlā of 'Uthmān: 'Umar b. al-Khattāb was sitting with others in the Messenger of God's mosque one day when a beduin came up and entered the mosque looking for 'Umar (b. al-Khaṭṭāb). When 'Umar looked at him he said, "This man is still a polytheist, although at one point he abandoned polytheism. He was a soothsayer in the Jāhiliyyah." The man greeted him and then sat down. 'Umar said to him, "Have you become a Muslim?" [1145] "Yes," he replied. "Were you a soothsayer in the Jāhiliyyah?" asked 'Umar. "Praise be to God," the man answered. "You have received me with words which I do not suppose that you have uttered to one of your subjects since you became Caliph." "God forgive me!" said 'Umar.[90] "During the Jāhiliyyah we used to do worse things than you. We used to worship idols and embrace graven images until God honored us with Islam." "Yes, by God, O Commander of the Faithful," answered the man. "I used to be a soothsayer in the Jāhiliyyah." "Tell me," said 'Umar, "what is the most amazing saying which your familiar spirit brought you?" "He came to me a month or a year before Islam," said the man, "and said to me:

Have you considered the Jinn[91] and their hopelessness and their despair of their religion, and their clinging to young female camels and their saddle cloths?"

---

prophet after whom there will be no other.

90. The point of this story appears to be that the Caliph 'Umar made a hasty judgement about this man's continuing polytheism, and then had to withdraw it. This account from Ibn Isḥaq is not in the standard text.

91. The jinn (plural; singular jinnī, formerly transliterated as "genie") are a third class of intelligent beings along with angels and humans. They are imperceptible to the senses, but may make appearances under different forms. They are capable of having a religion and believing in God; and the Qur'ān (72:1–19; 46:29–32) speaks of Muḥammad preaching to them and of some being converted. In the present passage their "despair of their religion" may be intended as a sort of premonition of the coming of Islam; the reason for the reference to camels is unknown. The jinn play a large part in folklore. See EI [2], s.v. Djinn, first part.

Then ʿUmar said to the gathering, "By God, I was by one of the idols of the Jāhiliyyah with a number of men of Quraysh. An Arab had sacrificed a calf to it, and we were waiting for it to be divided up in order to receive a share, when I heard coming from the belly of the calf a voice which was more penetrating than any voice I have ever heard—this was a month or a year before Islam—saying:

O people of Dharīḥ
A matter which has ended in success
A man shouting
Saying, "There is no deity but God."

Ibn Ḥumayd—ʿAlī b. Mujāhid—Ibn Ishāq—al-Zuhrī—ʿAbdallāh b. Kaʿb the mawlā of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān: a similar account.

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh—al-Zuhrī—Muḥammad b. Jubayr b.
[1146] Muṭʿim—his father: We were sitting by an idol at Buwānah a month before the Messenger of God commenced his mission, having slaughtered camels. Suddenly we heard a voice calling from the belly of one:[92]

Listen to the wonder;
There will be no more eavesdropping to overhear inspiration;
We throw down shooting stars
For a prophet in Mecca;
His name is Aḥmad,[93]
His place of emigration is Yathrib.

We held back and marvelled; then the Messenger of God appeared (that is, he began his mission).

Proofs of Prophethood

Aḥmad b. Sinān al-Qaṭṭān al-Wāsiṭī—Abū Muʿāwiyah—Aʿmash—Abū Ẓibyān—Ibn ʿAbbās: A man of the Banū ʿĀmir came to the Prophet and said, "Show me the seal which is between your shoulders, and if you lie under any enchantment I will cure you, for I am the best enchanter of the Arabs," "Do you wish me to show you a sign?" asked the Prophet. "Yes," said the man, "summon 92. Reading juzur instead of jazūr with Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I:105.12-17.

93. See n. 88.

that cluster of dates." So the Prophet looked at a cluster of dates hanging from a date palm and summoned it, and began to snap his fingers until it stood before him. Then the man said, "Tell it to go back," and it went back. The ʿĀmirī said, "O Banū ʿĀmir, I have never seen a greater magician than I have seen today."

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): The stories of the proof of his prophethood are too numerous to be counted. We shall devote a book to this subject, if God wills.

The Manner in Which the Qur'ān Was First Revealed

We now return to an account of the condition of the Prophet of God at the time when God began to ennoble him by sending Gabriel to him bearing the revelation.

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): We have mentioned previously some of the stories related to the first occasion on which Gabriel brought our Prophet Muḥammad the revelation from God and how old the Prophet was at that time. We shall now describe the manner in which Gabriel began to come to him and to appear to him [1147] bringing the revelation of his Lord.

Aḥmad b. ʿUthmān, known as Abū al-Jawzā—Wahb b. Jarīr—his father—al-Nuʿmān b. Rāshid—al-Zuhrī—ʿUrwah—ʿĀʾishah: The first form in which the revelation came to the Messenger of God was true vision; this used to come to him like the break of dawn.[94] After that, he grew to love solitude and used to remain in a cave on Ḥirāʾ engaged in acts of devotion[95] for a number of days before returning to his family. Then he would return to his family and supply himself with provisions for a similar number of days. This continued until the Truth came to him unexpectedly,[96] and said. 'Muḥammad, you are the Messenger of God.' " [Describing what happened next,) the Messenger of God said, "I had been standing, but fell to my knees; and crawled away, my shoulders trembling. I went to Khadījah and said, 'Wrap me up! Wrap me up!'[97] When the terror had left me, he came to me and said, 'Muḥammad, you are the Messenger of God.' "

94. This probably refers to the two visions described in the Qur'ān (53:1–18). These are now interpreted by Muslims as visions of Gabriel, but the use of the word 'abd (slave) in verse 10 implies that Muḥammad originally took it to be a vision of God, and this is allowed by some of the older commentators. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 151.

95. There has been much discussion over the precise meaning of the word yataḥannathu (verbal noun, taḥannuth), although it is clearly some form of devotional practice; further references in Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 44.

96. In this usage, the Truth (al-ḥaqq) is God, and the apparent declaration of Muḥammad's messengership by God supports the view that he originally took the visions to be of God.

He (Muḥammad) said: I had been thinking of hurling myself down from a mountain crag, but he appeared to me, as I was thinking about this, and said, "Muḥammad, I am Gabriel and you are the Messenger of God." Then he said, "Recite!" I said, "What shall I recite?"[98] He took me and pressed me three times tightly until I was nearly stifled and was utterly exhausted; then he said:[99] "Recite in the name of your Lord who created," and I recited it. Then I went to Khadījah and said, "I have been in fear for my life." When I told her what had happened, she said, "Rejoice, for God will never put you to shame, for you treat your kinsfolk well, tell the truth, deliver what is entrusted to you, endure fatigue, offer hospitality to the guest, and aid people in misfortune."

Then she took me to Waraqah b. Nawfal b. Asad[100] and said to [1148] him "Listen to your brother's son." He questioned me and I told him what had happened. He said, "This is the Nāmūs[101] which was sent down to Moses, son of 'Imrān. Would that I were a young

97. The word zammilūnī is masculine plural, and so not addressed to Khadījah alone. The same root is found in Qur'ān 73:1, "O enwrapped one" (muzzammil). Somewhat similar is the word in 74:1 muddaththir (wrapped in a dithār or cloak), and this was held by some scholars to the first sūrah to be revealed. Covering with a cloak is said to have been regarded as a form of protection from the danger involved in the near approach of the divine.

98. The words mā aqra'u can mean both "what shall I recite?" and "I do not (cannot) recite," and it is sometimes difficult to decide which meaning is to be preferred. The translations given are thus in a sense conjectural. Muslim scholars debated the question, and some modified the phrase to mādhā aqra'u, which can only have the first meaning, others to mā anā bi-qārin, which can only have the second. Since qara'a can also mean "read," Muḥammad's inability to read was part of later apologetic.

99. 96:1.

100. Waraqah was Khadījah's cousin, their fathers being brothers. He was counted as a ḥanīf (see n. 87), and is sometimes said to have become a Christian (Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 143;1151 below); he had certainly studied the Bible. There are other versions of this story in which he does not actually meet Muḥammad. The words "brother's son" may indicate that, as husband of Khadījah, Muḥammad was reckoned as son of her father.

101. The word nāmūs, which seems to represent the Greek nomos (law), is not found in the Qur'ān. It presumably refers to the five books of Moses (in Arabic usually Tawrāt); but see n. 114 below.

man now, and would that I could be alive when your people drive you out!" I said, "Will they drive me out?" "Yes," he said. "No man has ever brought the message which you have brought without being met with enmity. If I live to see that day, I shall come firmly to your aid."

The first parts of the Qur'ān to be revealed to me after Iqra' were:

> Nūn. By the pen, and that which they write. You are not, through your Lord's favor to you, a madman. Yours will be a reward unfailing, and you are of a great nature. You shall see and they shall see.[102]

and:

> O you enveloped in your cloak, arise and warn![103]

and:

> By the forenoon, and by the night when it is still.[104]

Yūnus b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Ibn Wahb—Yūnus—Ibn Shihāb—ʿUrwah—ʿĀʾishah: A similar account, but omitting the last part from the words "The first parts of the Qur'ān.... "

Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Abī al-Shawārib—ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. Ziyād—Sulaymān al-Shaybānī—ʿAbd Allāh b. Shaddād: Gabriel came to Muḥammad and said, "O Muḥammad, recite!" He said, "I cannot recite." Gabriel was violent towards him[105] and then said again, "O Muḥammad, recite!" He said, "I cannot recite," and Gabriel again was violent towards him . A third time he said, "O Muḥammad, recite!" He said, "What shall I recite?"[106] and he said:

> Recite in the name of your Lord who creates! He creates man from a clot of blood. Recite: And your Lord is the Most 102. 68:1-5. This is unlikely to be early, since it implies that Muḥammad has been charged with being majnūn, mad or possessed by jinn.

---

103. 74:1-2.

104. 93:1-2. This sūrah contains encouragement to Muḥammad, apparently after a period of depression, possibly the time when Gabriel did not come to him.

105. The word ghammahu (he afflicted or grieved him) replaces ghattanī of the previous account (he pressed tightly until I was nearly stifled).

106. Muḥammad uses the same words on all three occasions, but the meaning seems to have changed with the third; see n. 98.

> Bountiful, He who teaches by the pen, teaches man what he knew not.[107]

Then he went to Khadījah and said, "Khadījah, I think that I have gone mad." "No, by God," she said. "Your Lord would never do that to you. You have never committed a wicked act." Khadījah [1149] went to Waraqah b. Nawfal and told him what had happened. He said, "If what you say is true, your husband is a prophet. He will meet adversity from his people. If I live long enough, I shall believe in him."

After this, Gabriel did not come to him for a while, and Khadījah said to him, "I think that your Lord must have come to hate you." Then God revealed to him:

> By the forenoon, and by the night when it is still, your Lord has not forsaken you, nor does he hate you.[108]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq[109]—Wahb b. Kaysān the mawlā of the family of al-Zubayr: I heard ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr saying to ʿUbayd b. ʿUmayr b. Qatādah al-Laythi, "Relate to us, ʿUbayd, what the beginning of the Messenger of God's prophetic mission was like when Gabriel came to him." I was present as ʿUbayd related the following account to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr and those with him. He said, "The Messenger of God used to spend one month in every year in religious retreat on Ḥirā." This was part of the practice of taḥannuth in which Quraysh used to engage during the Jāhiliyyah. Taḥannuth means self-justification.[110] (Mentioning this practice) Abū Ṭālib said, "By those ascending Ḥirā' and those descending."

The Messenger of God used to spend this month in every year in religious retreat, feeding the poor who came to him. When he had completed his month of retreat the first thing which he would do on leaving, even before going home, was to circumambulate the Kaʿbah seven times, or however many times God willed; then he would go home.

When the month came in which God willed to ennoble him, in

---

107. 96:1-5.
108. 93:1-3.
109. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 151-54; this omits some sentences kept by Ṭabarī.
110. For taḥannuth see n. 95; the word translated "self-justification" is tabarrur, which has a wide range of meanings.

the year in which God made him his Messenger, this being the month of Ramaḍān, the Messenger of God went out as usual to Ḥirā' accompanied by his family. When the night came on which [1150] God ennobled him by making him his Messenger and thereby showed mercy to his servants, Gabriel brought him the command of God. The Messenger of God said, "Gabriel came to me as I was sleeping with a brocade cloth in which was writing. He said, "Recite!" and I said, "I cannot recite."[111] He pressed me tight and almost stifled me, until I thought that I should die. Then he let me go, and said, "Recite!" I said, "What shall I recite?" only saying that in order to free myself from him, fearing that he might repeat what he had done to me. He said:

> Recite in the name of your Lord who creates! He creates man from a clot of blood. Recite: And your Lord is the Most Bountiful, He who teaches by the pen, teaches man what he knew not.

I recited it, and then he desisted and departed. I woke up, and it was as though these words had been written on my heart. There was no one of God's creation more hateful to me than a poet or a madman; I could not bear to look at either of them. I said to myself, "Your humble servant (meaning himself) is either a poet or a madman, but Quraysh shall never say this of me.[112] I shall take myself to a mountain crag, hurl myself down from it, kill myself, and find relief in that way."

I went out intending to do that, but when I was halfway up the mountain I heard a voice from heaven saying, "O Muḥammad, you are the Messenger of God, and I am Gabriel." I raised my head to heaven, and there was Gabriel in the form of a man with his feet set on the horizon, saying, "O Muḥammad, you are the Messenger of God and I am Gabriel." I stood looking at him and this distracted me from what I had intended, and I could go neither forward nor back. I turned my face away from him to all points of

111. The phrase mā aqra'u seems here to have been given the meaning "I cannot read," since writing is mentioned. The verb qara'a can mean "read" as well as "recite."

112. It seems unlikely that it occurred spontaneously to Muḥammad that he was a poet or madman. This is almost certainly a criticism made of him by opponents after he began his public preaching. Later scholars have doubtless introduced the point here in order to explain how Muḥammad came to contemplate suicide.

the horizon, but wherever I looked I saw him in exactly the same form. I remained standing there, neither going forward nor turning back, until Khadījah sent her messengers to look for me. They went as far as Mecca and came back to her, while I was stand-[1151] ing in the same place. At last Gabriel left me and I went back to my family. When I came to Khadījah, I sat down with my thigh next to hers, and she said to me, "Abū al-Qāsim,[113] where have you been? I sent messengers to look for you all the way to Mecca and back." I said to her, "I am either a poet or a madman," but she answered, "May God save you from that, Abū al-Qāsim! God would not do that to you, considering what I know of your truthfulness, your great trustworthiness, your good character, and your good treatment of your kinsfolk. It is not that, cousin. Perhaps you did see something." "Yes," I said, and then told her what I had seen. "Rejoice, cousin, and stand firm," she said. "By Him is whose hand is Khadījah's soul, I hope that you may be the prophet of this community." Then she rose up, gathered her garments around her, and went to Waraqah b. Nawfal b. Asad, who was her paternal cousin. He had become a Christian, read the Scriptures, and learned from the people of the Torah and the Gospel. She told him what the Messenger of God had told her that he had seen and heard. Waraqah said, "Holy, Holy! By Him in whose hand is the soul of Waraqah, if what you say is true, Khadījah, there has come to him the greatest Nāmūs—meaning by Nāmūs, Gabriel—he who came to Moses[114] (That means that) Muḥammad is the prophet of this community. Tell him to stand firm."

Khadījah went back to the Messenger of God and told him what Waraqah had said, and this relieved his anxiety somewhat. When he had completed his retreat he went back to Mecca and, as was his usual practice, went first to the Ka'bah and circumambulated it. Waraqah b. Nawfal met him as he was doing this and said, "Son of my brother, tell me what you saw or heard." The Messenger of [1152] God did so, and Waraqah said to him, "By Him in whose hand is my soul, you are the prophet of this community, and there has come to you the greatest Nāmūs, he who came to Moses. They

113. This is Muḥammad's patronymic or kunyah (see n. 22) and a familiar way to address him.

114. This interpretation of Nāmūs differs from that adopted in the translation on p. 1148, which is justified by the use of the verb "sent down" there.

will call you a liar, molest you, drive you out, and fight you. If I live to see that, I will come to God's assistance in a way which he knows." Then he brought his head close and kissed the top of his head. The Messenger of God went home with his resolve strengthened by what Waraqah had said and with some of his anxiety relieved.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Ishāq—Ismā'īl b. Abī Ḥakīm the mawlā of the family of al-Zubayr: He was told that Khadījah said to the Messenger of God, to keep him steadfast in the prophethood with which God had ennobled him, "Cousin, can you tell me when this companion of yours who visits you comes?" He replied, "Yes," and she said, "Tell me then, when he comes." Gabriel came to him as before, and the Messenger of God said to Khadījah, "Khadījah, here is Gabriel who has come to me." She said, "Yes? Come and sit by my left thigh, cousin." He came and sat by her, and she said, "Can you see him?" He replied, "Yes," and she said, "Move around and sit by my right thigh." He did so, and she said, "Can you see him?" He replied, "Yes," and she said, "Move around and sit in my lap." He did so, and she said, "Can you see him?" He replied, "Yes." Then she was grieved, and flung off her veil while the Messenger of God was sitting in her lap. Then she said, "Can you see him?" and he replied, "No." At that she said, "Cousin, be steadfast and rejoice. By God, this being is an angel and no devil."[115]

Ibn Humayd—Salamah—Muhammad b. Ishāq: I related this tradition (ḥadīth) to 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥasan, and he said, "I heard my mother Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḥusayn relating this Ḥadīth on the authority of Khadījah, except that I heard her saying that Khadījah put the Messenger of God inside her shift next to her body, and that thereupon Gabriel departed. Then she said, 'This being is an angel and no devil.'" [1153]

Ibn al-Muthannā—'Uthmān b. 'Umar b. Fāris—'Alī b. al-Mubārak—Yaḥyā, that is, Ibn Abī Kathir: I asked Abū Salamah which part of the Qur'ān had been revealed first, and he replied:

"O you enveloped in your cloak, arise and warn!"[116]

115. The thought is that an angel respects a woman's modesty, whereas a devil or demon would not.

116. 74:1.

I said, "They say that it was Recite in the name of your Lord",[117]

but Abū Salamah replied, "I asked Jābir b. ʿAbdallāh which part of the Qur'ān had been revealed first, and he said, "O you enveloped in your cloak." I said, "What about 'Recite in the name of your Lord?' " but he answered, "What I am telling you is what the Prophet told me. He said, "I was in retreat on Ḥirā', and when I had completed my retreat I came down the mountain and went into the bottom of the wādī. Then I heard a voice calling me; I looked right and left, behind me and in front of me, but could not see anything. Then I looked up, and there he was sitting on a throne between heaven and earth, and I was afraid of him (fa-khashītu minhu). Ibn al-Muthannā: These were ʿUthmān b. ʿUmar's words, but the correct version is "I was terror-stricken by him." (fa-ju'iththu minhu) Then I went to Khadījah and said, "Envelop me!" So they enveloped me in a cloak and poured water over me, and then "O you enveloped in your cloak, arise and warn!" was revealed to me.

Abū Kurayb—Wakīʿ—ʿAlī b. al-Mubārak—Yaḥyā b. Abī Kathīr: I asked Abū Salamah which part of the Qur'ān had been revealed first, and he said, "It was 'O you enveloped in your cloak.' " I said, "They say that it was 'Recite in the name of your Lord who created,' " but he said, "I asked Jābir b. ʿAbdallāh, and he said 'I am only telling you what the Messenger of God told me. He said, "I was in retreat on Ḥirā', and when I had completed my retreat I [1154] came down the mountain and heard a voice. I looked left and right and saw nothing, and behind me and saw nothing. Then I raised my head and saw something, and went to Khadījah and said, 'Envelop me, and pour water on me.' So they enveloped me in a cloak and poured water on me, and then 'O you enveloped in your cloak' was revealed to me."

Hishām b. Muḥammad: Gabriel came to the Messenger of God for the first time on Saturday night and Sunday night.[118] On Monday he brought him the commission as Messenger of God, and taught him the ritual ablution, the prayer ritual, and the passage

117. 96:1.

118. The Arab day begins at sunset, so that by Western reckoning this would be the nights of Friday and Saturday.

"Recite in the name of your Lord who created." On the Monday on which he received the revelation, the Messenger of God was forty years old.

Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb al-Ṭūsī—Abū Dāūd al-Ṭayālisī—Ja'far b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Uthmān al-Qurashī—'Umar b. 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī: I said, "O Messenger of God, how did you first know with absolute certainty that you were a prophet?" "Abū Dharr," he replied, "two angels came to me while I was somewhere in the Valley of Mecca. One of them came down to earth, while the other remained between heaven and earth. One of them said to the other, 'Is this he?' and the other replied, 'It is he.' 'Weigh him against a man,' he said, so I was weighed against a man and outweighed him. 'Weigh him against ten,' he said, so he weighed me against ten and I outweighed them. Then he said, 'Weigh him against a hundred,' so he weighed me against a hundred and I outweighed them. Then he said, 'Weigh him against a thousand.' So he weighed me against a thousand and I outweighed them. People began to be scattered over me from the pan of the balance, and one angel said to the other, 'If you were to weigh him against the whole of his community he would outweigh them.'

"Then one said to the other, 'Open his breast.' He opened my breast, and then he said, 'Take out his heart' or 'open his heart.' He [1155] opened my heart, and took out from it the pollution of Satan and the clot of blood, and threw them away. Then one said to the other, 'Wash his breast as you would a receptacle—or, wash his heart as you would a covering.' Then he summoned the sakīnah,[119] which looked like the face of a white cat, and it was placed in my heart. Then one of them said to the other, 'Sew up his breast.' So they sewed up my breast and placed the seal between my shoulders. No sooner had they done this than they turned away from me. While this was happening I was watching it as though I were a bystander."[120]

---

119. The word sakīnah occurs six times in the Qur'ān. In five instances it is usually taken to mean a "peace of reassurance" sent down by God upon Muḥammad or the believers; but in the other instance (2:248) it is a material object contained in the sacred ark of the Israelites. Because of the uncertainty about its meaning, the word lent itself to various interpretations, of which there is an example here. It corresponds to the Hebrew shekhinah; see EI[1] s.v. Sakīna.

120. Ibn Isḥāq (Ibn Hishām Sīrah, 105–6) describes events similar to the above, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Ibn Thawr—Maʿmar—al-Zuhrī: The inspiration ceased to come to the Messenger of God for a while, and he was deeply grieved. He began to go to the tops of mountain crags, in order to fling himself from them; but every time he reached the summit of a mountain, Gabriel appeared to him and said to him, "You are the Prophet of God." Thereupon his anxiety would subside and he would come back to himself.

The Prophet used to relate this story as follows: "I was walking one day when I saw the angel who used to come to me at Ḥirāʾ on a throne between heaven and earth. I was terror-stricken by him, and I went back to Khadījah and said, "Wrap me up!" So we wrapped him up (zammalnāhu), that is, enveloped him in a cloak (daththarnāhu), and God revealed:

> O you enveloped in your cloak, arise and warn! Your Lord magnify, your raiment purify.[121]

Al-Zuhrī: The first thing to be revealed to him was "Recite in the name of your Lord who creates ... " as far as the words "what he knew not."

Yūnus b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Ibn Wahb—Yūnus—Ibn Shihāb—Abū Salamah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān—Jābir b. ʿAbdallāh al-Anṣārī: The Messenger of God said, relating the story of the interruption or gap
[1156] in the revelation, "As I was walking, I heard a voice from heaven. I looked up, and suddenly saw the angel who came to me at Ḥirāʾ seated on a throne between heaven and earth. I was terror-stricken and went (to Khadījah) and said "Wrap me up! Wrap me up" They enveloped me in my cloak, and God revealed, "O you enveloped in your cloak, arise and warn ... " as far as "and pollution shun."

After that, the revelation came in regular succession.

Khadījah the First to Believe in the Messenger of God

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): God commanded his Prophet to rise up and to warn his people that God would punish them for their ingratitude to their Lord and for their worship of false gods and idols to the exclusion of Him who created them and gave them their daily bread. He was also to tell them of his Lord's bounty to himself, but during Muḥammad's childhood; see also 1157 below.

---

121. 74:1-4; there is an awkward change of person in the previous sentence.

with the words: "Of the bounty of your Lord let your discourse be." According to Ibn Isḥāq, this refers to his prophethood.[122]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: The words "Of the bounty of your Lord let your discourse be" mean "Of God's bounty and generosity in bestowing Prophethood upon you, Let your discourse be," that is, "proclaim it and summon people to it." Thereupon the Messenger of God began to proclaim God's bounty to himself and to (God's) servants in conferring prophethood upon him. He did this in private to those of his family who trusted in him. It is related that of God's creatures the first to hold him truthful, to believe in him, and to follow him was his wife Khadījah.

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—al-Wāqidī: Our fellow scholars are agreed that the first of the people of the Qiblah to respond to the Messenger of God was Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid.

The First Rituals of Islam Are Prescribed

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): The first of the duties of Islam to be prescribed for Muḥammad by God, after that of confessing God's oneness, disavowing graven images and idols, and repudiating false gods, is said to have been that of ritual prayer or worship (ṣalāt).[123]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—certain scholars:[124] When ritual prayer was prescribed for the Messenger of God, Gabriel came to him while he was in the upper part of Mecca, [1157] and dug his heel into the side of the wādī, whereupon a spring gushed out. While the Messenger of God watched him, Gabriel then performed the ritual ablution in order to show him how to purify himself for prayer. Then the Messenger of God performed the ritual ablution as he had seen Gabriel do. Next, Gabriel rose up and led him in prayer, and the Prophet followed his actions. Then Gabriel departed, and the Messenger of God went to Khadījah and performed the ablution for her in order to show her how to purify 122. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 158; the verse is 93:11.

123. The word ṣalāt is commonly translated "prayer," although "worship" would be more appropriate, since there is virtually no petition or intercession. The ṣalāt consists of a series of acts accompanied by expressions of praise or adoration. The climax is touching the ground with the forehead in acknowledgement of God's majesty. Each Muslim is now required to accomplish the ṣalāt five times a day, though originally the number of times was probably not fixed.

124. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 158.

herself for prayer, as Gabriel had shown him. She performed the ablution as he had done, and then he led her in prayer as Gabriel had led him, and she followed his actions.

The Prophet Ascends to the Seventh Heaven [125]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Hārūn b. al-Mughīrah and Ḥakkām b. Salm—ʿAnbasah—Abū Hāshim al-Wāṣiṭi—Maymūn b. Siyāh—Anas b. Mālik: At the time when the Prophet became a prophet, he used to sleep around the Kaʿbah as did the Quraysh. On one occasion two angels, Gabriel and Michael, came to him and said, "Which of the Quraysh were we ordered to come to?" Then they said, "We were ordered to come to their chief," and went away. After this they came from the Qiblah and there were three of them. They came upon him as he slept, turned him on his back, and opened his breast. Then they brought water from Zamzam and washed away the doubt, or polytheism, or pre-Islamic beliefs, or error, which was in his breast. Then they brought a golden basin full of faith and wisdom, and his breast and belly were filled with faith and wisdom.

Then he was taken up to the earthly heaven. Gabriel asked for [1158] admittance, and they said, "Who is it?" "Gabriel," he said. "Who is with you?" they said. "Muḥammad," he answered. "Has his mission commenced?" they asked. "Yes," he said. "Welcome," they said, and called down God's blessings on him. When he went in, he saw before him a huge and handsome man. "Who is this, Gabriel?" he asked. "This is your father, Adam," he replied. Then they took him to the second heaven. Gabriel asked for admission, and they said the same as before. Indeed, the same questions were asked and the same answers given in all the heavens. When Muḥammad went in to the second heaven he saw before him two men. "Who are these, Gabriel?" he asked. "John and Jesus, the two maternal cousins," he replied. Then he was taken to the third heaven, and when he went in he saw before him a man. "Who is this, Gabriel?" he asked. He replied, "Your brother Joseph who was given preeminence in beauty over other men as is the full moon over the stars at night." Then he was taken to the fourth heaven, and he saw before him a man and said, "Who is this, Gabriel?" "This is Idrīs," he said,[126] and recited:

125. Ibid. 263–71, with slightly different material.

And we raised him to high station.

Then he was taken to the fifth heaven, and he saw before him a man and said, "Who is this, Gabriel?" "This is Aaron," he said. Then he was taken to the sixth heaven, and he saw before him a man and said, "Who is this, Gabriel?" "This is Moses," he said. Then he was taken to the seventh heaven, and he saw before him a man and said, "Who is this, Gabriel?" "This is your father Abraham," he said.

Then he took him to Paradise, and there before him was a river whiter than milk and sweeter than honey, with pearly domes on either side of it. "What is this, Gabriel?" he asked. Gabriel replied, "This is al-Kawthar, which your Lord has given to you, and these are your dwellings." Then Gabriel took a handful of its earth and lo! it was fragrant musk. Then he went out to the Sidrat al-Muntahā,[127] which was a lote tree bearing fruits the largest of which were like earthenware jars and the smallest like eggs. Then his Lord drew nigh,

"Till he was distant two bows' length or nearer." Because of [1159] the nearness of its Lord the lote tree became covered by the like of such jewels as pearls, rubies, chrysolites, and colored pearls. God made revelation to his servant, caused him to understand and know, and prescribed for him fifty prayers (daily).

Then he went back past Moses, who said to him, "What did he impose your community?" "Fifty prayers," he said. "Go back to your Lord," said Moses, "and ask him to lighten the burden for your community, for your community is the weakest in strength and the shortest-lived." Then he told Muḥammad what he himself had suffered at the hands of the Children of Israel. The Messenger of God went back, and God reduced the number by ten.

---

126. See n. 55. The verse is 19:57.

127. The "lote tree of the utmost boundary" is spoken of in the description of Muḥammad's second vision in Sūrah 53:14. The following phrase about being "distant two bows' length or nearer" is from verse 9 describing the first vision. Though many Muslim scholars associate the second vision with Muḥammad's "night journey" or ascent to heaven, this is improbable since the main verse referring to the "night journey" (17:1) was revealed about the middle of the Meccan period, whereas the passage 53:13–18 almost certainly refers to a very early experience.

Then he passed Moses again, who said, "Go back to your Lord and ask him to lighten the burden further." This continued until he had gone back five times. Once more Moses said, "Go back to your Lord and ask him to lighten the burden," but the Messenger of God said, "I am not going back, although I do not wish to disobey you," for it had been put into his heart that he should not go back. God said, "My speech is not to be changed, and my decision and precept is not to be reversed, but he (Muḥammad) lightened the burden of prayer on my community to a tenth of what it was at first."[128]

Anas: I never encountered any scent, not even the scent of a bride, more fragrant than the skin of the Messenger of God. I pressed my skin to his and smelt it.

The First Male to Believe in the Messenger of God

ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): There is a difference of opinion among the early scholars as to who after his wife Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid first followed the Messenger of God, believed in him, held true the message which he brought from God, and prayed with him. Some say that the first male to believe in the Messenger of God, pray with him, and hold the truth of the message which he brought from God was ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

Among those who take this view, whose reports we have heard, are the following:

[1160] Ibn Humayd—Ibrāhīm b. al-Mukhtār—Shuʿbah—Abū Balj—ʿAmr b. Maymūn—Ibn ʿAbbās: The first to perform the prayer was ʿAlī.

Zakariyyā b. Yaḥyā al-Ḍarīr—ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Baḥr—Sharīk b. ʿAbdallah b. Muḥammad b. ʿAqīl—Jābir: The Prophet was commissioned as prophet on Monday, and ʿAlī performed the prayer on Tuesday.

Ibn al-Muthannā—Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar—Shuʿbah—ʿAmr b. Murrah—Abū Ḥamzah—Zayd b. Arqam: The first to accept Is-

128. Literally, this runs: "he lightened the prayer for my community to a tenth." The translation adopted assumes that these words are a continuation of the speech of God, and seems to make best sense of "my"; but there are other possibilities.

lam with the Messenger of God was ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. I mentioned this to al-Nakhaʿī, and he denied it, saying, "Abū Bakr was the first to accept Islam."

Abū Kurayb—Wakīʿ—Shuʿbah—ʿAmr b. Murrah—Abū Ḥamzah the mawlā of the Anṣār—Zayd b. Arqam: The first to accept Islam with the Messenger of God was ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

Abu Kurayb—ʿUbayd b. Saʿīd—Shuʿbah—ʿAmr b. Murrah—Abū Ḥamzah, a man of the Anṣār—Zayd b. Arqam: The first to perform the prayer with the Messenger of God was ʿAlī.

Aḥmad b. al-Ḥasan al-Tirmidhī—ʿUbaydallāh b. Mūsā—al-ʿAlāʾ—al-Minhāl b. ʿAmr—ʿAbbād b. ʿAbdallāh: I heard ʿAlī saying, "I am the servant of God and the brother of his Messenger, and I am the most righteous one (al-ṣiddīq al-akbar).[129] No one other than I can say this but a liar and an inventor of falsehoods. I performed the prayer with the Messenger of God seven years before other men.

Muḥammad b. ʿUbayd al-Muḥāribī—Saʿīd b. Khuthaym—Asad b. ʿAbdah al-Baljī—Yaḥyā b. ʿAfīf—ʿAfīf: During the Jāhiliyyah I came to Mecca and stayed with al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib. [1161] When the sun came up and rose into the sky, while I was looking at the Kaʿbah a young man came up and gazed at the sky. Then he turned to face the Kaʿbah and stood facing it. Soon afterwards a youth came and stood on his right, and soon after that a woman came and stood behind them. The young man bowed, and the youth and woman bowed; then the young man stood erect, followed by the youth and the woman, and then the young man prostrated himself, and they did so with him. I said, "ʿAbbās, this is a weighty matter." "It is a weighty matter indeed," he said. "Do you know who this is?" "No", I said. "This is Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, my brother's son," he said. "Do you know who this is with him?" "No," I said. "This is ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, my brother's son," he said. "Do you know who this woman is who is behind them?" "No," I said. "This is Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid, my nephew's wife," he said "My nephew has told me that his Lord,[130] the Lord of Heaven, has commanded them to do what you see them doing. God's oath, I do not know anyone on the face of the earth but these three who follow this religion."

129. This is an implicit claim that ʿAlī is superior to Abū Bakr, since "the righteous one" (al-ṣiddīq) is a kind of by-name regularly given to Abū Bakr by Sunnites.

130. Following the variant rabbahu instead of the rabbaka of the printed text.

Abū Kurayb—Yūnus b. Bukayr—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. Abī al-Ashʿath al-Kindī, a Kūfan scholar—Ismāʿīl b. Iyās b. ʿAfīf—his father—his grandfather:[131] I was a merchant, and I came during the pilgrimage and stayed with al-ʿAbbās. While we were [1162] with him, a man came out to pray and stood facing the Kaʿbah. Then a woman came out and stood praying with him, followed by a youth who stood praying with him. I said, "ʿAbbās, what is this religion? I do not know what this religion is." He answered, "This is Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, who claims that God has sent him as His Messenger with this (religion), and that the treasures of Chusroes and Caesar will be given to him by conquest. This woman is his wife Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid, who has believed in him, and this youth is his cousin ʿAlī b. Abī Tālib, who has believed in him."

ʿAfīf: Would that I had believed in him that day, so that I had been the third.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl and ʿAlī b. Mujāhid: (then) Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. Abī al-Ashʿath (Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): elsewhere in my book the name is given as Yaḥyā b. al-Ashʿath)—Ismāʿīl b. Iyās b. ʿAfīf al-Kindī (ʿAfīf was the maternal halfbrother of al-Ashʿath b. Qays al-Kindī, and the son of his paternal uncle)—his father—his grandfather, ʿAfīf: Al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was a friend of mine. He used to go to the Yemen to buy perfume and sell it during the pilgrimage season. While I was staying with al-ʿAbbas b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib at Minā there came to him a man in the prime of life who performed the ritual ablution thoroughly and then stood praying. Then a woman came out, performed the ablution, and stood praying. Then a youth just past the age of puberty came out, performed the ablution, and stood by his side praying. I said, "Whatever is this, ʿAbbās" He replied, "This is my brother's son Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, who claims that God has sent him as a messenger; this is my brother's son ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib who has followed him in his [1163] religion, and this is Muḥammad's wife Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid who has followed him in his religion." After ʿAfīf had become a

131. This and the following paragraph are omitted by Ibn Hishām. See Guillaume, p.113.

Muslim and Islam had become firmly rooted in his heart, he used to say, "Would that I had been a fourth."

Ibn Humayd—Īsā b. Sawādah b. al-Ja'd—Muḥammad b. al-Munkadir, Rabī'ah b. Abī 'Abd al-Rahmān, Abū Ḥāzim al-Madanī and al-Kalbī: 'Alī was the first to accept Islam. According to al-Kalbī, he accepted Islam at the age of nine.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq:[132] The first male to believe in the Messenger of God, to pray with him, and to accept the truth of the message he brought from God was 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, who at that time was ten years old.

One of the favors which God bestowed on 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was that the Messenger of God was his guardian before Islam.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallah b. Abī Najīh—Mujāhid b. Jabr Abū al-Ḥajjāj: A mark of God's favor to 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and his beneficence and benevolence towards him was the following. When Quraysh were afflicted by a severe drought, the Messenger of God, seeing that Abū Ṭālib had many dependents, said to his uncle al-'Abbās, who was one of the richest of the Banū Hāshim, "'Abbās, your brother Abū Ṭālib has many dependents, and you see how people are suffering from this drought. Come with me and let us lighten the burden of his dependents. I will take one of his sons and you take one, and we will look after them for him." Al-'Abbās agreed, and they went to Abū Ṭālib and said, "We wish to lighten the burden of your dependents until the hardship from which the people are suffering lifts." [1164]

Abū Ṭālib said to them, "As long as you leave me 'Aqīl, do as you wish." The Messenger of God took 'Alī and made him a member of his household, and al-'Abbās did likewise with Ja'far. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib continued to live with the Messenger of God until the latter became a prophet, and then followed him, believed in him, and accepted the truth of his message. Ja'far remained with al-'Abbās until he (Ja'far) professed Islam and became financially independent of him.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: Some scholars mention that when the time for prayer came, the Messenger of God would go out to the ravines of Mecca, accompanied by 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, in order to conceal himself from his uncle Abū Ṭālib, his other uncles, and the rest of his clan. They would pray together there, and then as evening fell, would return. They continued in this fashion as long as God willed that they should. One day, however, Abū Ṭālib came across them as they were praying and said to the Messenger of God, "Nephew, what is this religion which I see you following?" He replied, "Uncle, this is the religion of God, of His angels, of His messengers and of our forefather Abraham," or words to that effect; "God has sent me as Messenger to His servants with this religion, and you, my uncle, are the most deserving person to whom I could give sincere advice and whom I could summon to right guidance, and you are the most deserving person to answer my call and assist me in this matter," or words to this effect. Abū Ṭālib replied, "Nephew, I cannot leave my religion and the religion of my forefathers and their practices, but, by God, as long as I live nothing unpleasant shall befall you."

132. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 158-60.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muhammad b. Isḥāq: They allege that he said to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, "My son, what is this religion which [1165] I see you practicing?" He replied, "Father, I believe in God and His Messenger. I accept the truth of the message which he has brought, and I pray to God with him." They also allege that Abū Ṭālib said "He calls you to nothing but good, so adhere to him."

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Ibrāhīm b. Nāfiʿ—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: ʿAli became a Muslim when he was ten years old.

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—al-Wāqidi: Our fellow scholars are agreed that ʿAlī accepted Islam a year after the Messenger of God began his prophetic mission, and that he remained in Mecca for twelve years.

Abū Bakr

Others say that Abū Bakr was the first male to accept Islam.

Those who say this:

Sahl b. Mūsā al-Rāzī—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Maghrā,—Mujālid—al-Shaʿbī: I said to Ibn ʿAbbās, "Who was the first to accept Islam?" He answered, "Have you not heard the lines of Ḥassān b. Thābit,[133]

If you call to mind trustworthy men to grieve for them, mention your brother Abū Bakr and his deeds.

133. Dīwān, ed. Arafat, I:125.

The best of men, the most pious and the most just after the Prophet, and the most faithful in fulfilling what he undertook.
The second, the follower, may his tomb be praised,
and the first of men to believe in the prophets.

Sa'īd b. 'Anbasah al-Rāzī—al-Haytham b. 'Adī—Mujālid—al- [1166] Sha'bī—Ibn 'Abbās: A similar account.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ—al-Haytham b. 'Adī—Mujālid—al-Sha'bī—Ibn 'Abbās: A similar account.

Baḥr b. Naṣr al-Khawlānī—'Abdallāh b. Wahb—Mu'awiyah b. Ṣāliḥ—Abū Yaḥyā and Ḍamrah b. Ḥabīb and Abū Ṭalhah—Abū Umānah al-Bāhilī—'Amr b. 'Abasah: I came to the Messenger of God when he was staying at 'Ukāẓ[134] and said, "O Messenger of God, who has followed you in this religion?" He replied, "Two men have followed me in it, a free man and a slave; Abū Bakr and Bilāl." Then I accepted Islam and reckoned myself at that time to be one quarter of those who believe in Islam.

Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥīm al-Barqī—'Amr b. Abī Salamah—Ṣadaqah—Naṣr b. 'Alqamah—his brother—Ibn 'Ā'idh—Jubayr b. Nufayr: Both Abū Dharr and Ibn 'Abasah used to say, "I reckoned myself to be a quarter of those who believed in Islam, for no one had accepted Islam before me but the Prophet, Abū Bakr and Bilāl." Neither knew when the other accepted Islam.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr—Mughīrah—Ibrāhīm: The first to accept Islam was Abū Bakr.

Abū Kurayb—Wakī'—Shu'bah—'Amr b. Murrah—Ibrāhīm al-Nakha'ī: Abū Bakr was the first to accept Islam.

Others say that a number of people accepted Islam before Abū Bakr.

Those who say this: Ibn Ḥumayd—Kinānah b. Jabalah— [1167]
Ibrāhīm b. Ṭahmān—al-Ḥajjāj b. al-Ḥajjāj—Qatādah—Sālim b. Abī al-Ja'd—Muḥammad b. Sa'd: I said to my father, "Was Abū Bakr the first of them to accept Islam?" He answered, "No, more than fifty people accepted Islam before him, but he was the best Muslim among us."

134. Site of an annual fair, lying between Nakhlah and al-Ṭā'if.

Zayd b. Ḥārithah

Others say that the first man to believe and follow the Prophet was Zayd b. Ḥārithah, his mawlā.

Those who say this:

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—al-Wāqidī—Ibn Abī Dhi'b: I asked al-Zuhrī who was the first person to accept Islam. He replied, "The first woman was Khadījah and the first man was Zayd b. Ḥārithah."

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Mus'ab b. Thābit—Abū al-Aswad—Sulaymān b. Yasār: The first to accept Islam was Zayd b. Ḥārithah.

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad (that is Ibn 'Umar)—Rabī'ah b. 'Uthmān—'Imrān b. Abī Anas: A similar report.

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Ḥakam—'Abd al-Malik b. Maslamah—Ibn Lahī'ah—Abū al-Aswad—'Urwah: The first to accept Islam was Zayd b. Ḥārithah.

Ibn Isḥāq's account[135]

Ibn Isḥāq's account, as transmitted by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah, is as follows: Then Zayd b. Ḥārithah, the mawlā of the Messenger of God, accepted Islam. He was the first male to accept Islam and [1168] to pray after 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. Then Abū Bakr b. Abī Quḥāfah al-Ṣiddīq accepted Islam. When he did so, he proclaimed this openly and summoned others to God and to his Messenger. He was well-liked among his tribe, popular and easy to get on with. He was also the most expert of Quraysh on the genealogy of the tribe and the best informed of them about their good and bad qualities. He was a merchant, upright and well-known, and, for various purposes, the men of his tribe used to come to him and associate with him because of his knowledge, his commercial skill, and the excellence of his company. He began to summon to Islam trustworthy members of his tribe who came and joined in his social gatherings. I have heard that 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf, Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ and Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh accepted Islam at his hands. When they responded to his summons, he took them to the Messenger of God, where they accepted Islam and joined in the prayer. These eight men were the first group to accept Islam, to pray, to accept the truth of his message, and to believe in the revelation which he brought from God. After that, people entered Islam in unbroken succession, both men and women, until Islam became a general topic of conversation in Mecca and everyone talked of it.

135. The passage from al-Wāqidī has not been located. That from Ibn Isḥāq is Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 160. Zayd b. Ḥārithah had been captured in war as a boy and sold as a slave to Khadījah. When Muḥammad freed him, he would become his "client" (mawlā). Usually, however, he is called Muḥammad's "adoptive son," and is even said to have been named Zayd b. Muḥammad. This "adoption" was presumably not like that practiced in the West, but some kind of social usage about which we are not fully informed, perhaps due to the fact that Zayd chose to remain with Muḥammad and Khadījah. This question became important when Muḥammad married Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh after Zayd had divorced her; see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 282, 329–31.

Al-Wāqidī's account

Al-Wāqidī's account, as transmitted by al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd, is as follows: Our fellow scholars are agreed that the first of the people of the Qiblah to respond to the Messenger of God's call was Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid. After this, there is a difference of opinion among us as to which of three men, Abū Bakr, 'Alī, and Zayd b. Ḥārithah, was the first to accept Islam. Khālid b. Sa'īd b. al-'Ās accepted Islam with them and made a fifth. According to some Abū Dharr accepted Islam fourth or fifth, while 'Amr b. 'Abasah al-Sulamī accepted Islam fourth or fifth according to others. There is a difference of opinion among us as to which of these men accepted Islam first and there are many accounts concerning this. There are disagreements about the first three and about those whose names we have given after them. [1169]

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Mus'ab b. Thābit—Abū al-Aswad Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nawfal: Al-Zubayr became a Muslim after Abū Bakr and he was the fourth or fifth.

Ibn Isḥāq: Khālid b. Sa'īd b. al-'Ās and his wife Humaynah bt. Khalaf b. As'ad b. 'Āmir b. Bayāḍah of Khuzā'ah became Muslims after a large number of people other than those whom I have mentioned by name as being early converts to Islam.[136]

136. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 164. It is not clear why Ṭabarī has selected these two names from a list of early Muslims given by Ibn Isḥāq.

Events of the Life of the Messenger of God

(Continued)

The Messenger of God Begins to Preach Openly

Three years after the commencement of his mission,[137] God commanded His Prophet to proclaim the divine message which he had received, to declare it publicly to the people, and to summon them to it. God said to him:

> So proclaim that which you are commanded, and withdraw from the polytheists.[138]

In the previous three years of his mission, until he was commanded to summon people openly to God, he had kept his preaching secret and hidden. Then God revealed:

> And warn your tribe of near kindred, and lower your wing (in kindness) to those believers who follow you. And if they (your kinsfolk) disobey you, say: "I am innocent of what they do."[139]

When the Messenger of God's Companions, prayed they went to the ravines and concealed themselves from their fellow tribesmen. Once while Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ and a number of the Messenger of God's Companions were in one of the ravines of Mecca, a group of polytheists suddenly appeared before them as they were praying, expressed their disapproval and reproached the believers for what they were doing. Finally, they came to blows, and Sa'd b.

---

137. Ibid., 166.
138. 15:94
139. 26:214-16.

Abī Waqqāṣ struck one of the polytheists with a camel's jawbone and split his head open. This was the first blood shed in the time of Islam. [1170]

Abū Kurayb and Abū al-Sā'ib—Abū Mu'āwiyah—al-A'mash—'Amr b. Murrah—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: One day the Messenger of God mounted al-Ṣafā and called out, "Beware this morning!" Quraysh gathered around him and said, "What is the matter?" Then he said, "If I were to tell you that the enemy would come upon you this morning or this evening, would you believe me?" "Certainly," they replied. He said, "I am a warner to you in the face of a terrible doom." Then Abū Lahab said, "May you perish! Did you call us together for this?" Then God revealed: "The power of Abū Lahab will perish and he will perish" ... reciting to the end of the sūrah.[140]

Abū Kurayb—Abū Usāmah—al-A'mash—'Amr b. Murrah—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbas: When God revealed the verse, "and warn your tribe of near kindred," the Messenger of God went out, mounted al-Ṣafā, and called out, "Beware this morning!" Some said, "Who is that calling out?" and others said, "It is Muḥammad." Then he said, "Banū so-and-so, Banū 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, Banū 'Abd Manāf!" They gathered round him, and he said, "If I were to tell you that horsemen were coming out at the foot of that mountain, would you believe me?" They replied, "We have never known you to tell a lie." Then he said, "I am 'a warner to you in the face of a terrible doom.'" Abū Lahab said, "May you perish! Did you only bring us together for this?" Then the following sūrah was revealed: "The power of Abū Lahab will perish, and he will perish ..." reciting to the end of the sūrah.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abd al-Ghaffār b. al-Qāsim—al-Minhāl b. 'Amr—'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Muttalib—'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās—'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib:[141] When the verse "and warn your tribe of near kindred" was revealed to the Messenger of God, he called me and said to me, "'Alī, God has commanded me to warn my tribe of near [1171]

140. Abū Lahab was the uncle of Muḥammad who succeeded Abū Ṭālib as chief of the clan of Hāshim, and then refused to continue to let Muḥammad have the protection of the clan. It was probably at that time that Sūrah 111 was revealed and not on the occasion described here. The verses quoted are 34:46 and 111:1-5.

141. This section is omitted by Ibn Hishām.

kindred. I was troubled by this, for I knew that when I broached the matter to them they would respond in a way which I would not like. I kept silent until Gabriel came to me and said, "Muḥammad, if you do not do what you are commanded, your Lord will punish you. So prepare a measure of wheat for us, add a leg of mutton to it, fill a large bowl of milk for us, and then assemble the Banū ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib for me so that I may speak to them and tell them what I have been commanded to tell them."

I did what he had told me to do and then called them to him. At that time they numbered forty men, more or less, including his uncles Abū Ṭālib, Ḥamzah, al-ʿAbbās, and Abū Lahab. When they had gathered together, he called on me to bring the food which I had prepared. I brought it, and when I put it down the Messenger of God took a piece of meat, broke it with his teeth, and threw it towards the dish. Then he said, "Take, in the name of God." They ate until they could eat no more, and yet the food was as it had been, except for where their hands had been. I swear by God, in [1172] whose hand ʿAlī's soul rests, that a single man could have eaten the amount of food which I put before all of them. Then he said, "Give them something to drink," so I brought them that bowl and they drank from it until they had drunk their fill, and I swear by God that one man could have drunk that amount.[142]

When the Messenger of God wanted to speak to them, Abū Lahab forestalled him and said, "Your host has long since bewitched you." Then they dispersed without the Messenger of God speaking to them. On the following day he said to me, ʿAlī, this man forestalled me by saying what you heard him saying, so that the people dispersed before I could speak to them. Prepare the same food for us as you did yesterday, and assemble them here."

I did this, assembled them, and brought the food to them when he called me. He did as he had done the previous day, and they ate until they could eat no more. Then he said, "Bring the bowl," and they drank until they could drink no more. Then he spoke to them, saying, "Banū ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, I know of no young man among the Arabs who has brought his people something better than what I have brought to you. I bring you the best of this world and the next, for God has commanded me to summon you to him. Which of you will aid me in this matter, so that he will be my brother, my agent (waṣī) and my successor (khalīfah) among you?"

142. This is an example of the miracles invented for Muḥammad by later Muslim scholars in order to refute the Christian argument that he could not be a prophet because he had performed no miracles.

They all held back, and although I was the youngest and the most bleary-eyed,[143] pot-bellied, and spindly-legged of them, I said, "I will be your helper, Prophet of God." He put his hand on the back of my neck and said, "This is my brother, my agent, and my successor among you, so listen to him and obey him." They rose up laughing and saying to Abū Ṭālib, "He has commanded you to [1173] listen to your son and to obey him!"

Zakariyyā' b. Yaḥyā al-Ḍarīr—'Affān b. Muslim—Abū 'Awānah —'Uthmān b. al-Mughīrah—Abū Ṣādiq—Rabī'ah b. Nājid: A man said to 'Alī, "Commander of the Faithful, how did you become the heir of your cousin to the exclusion of your paternal uncle?"[144] 'Alī said, "Ahem" three times until everybody craned their necks and pricked up their ears, and then said, "The Messenger of God assembled (or: invited) the whole of the Banū 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, including his own closest relatives, to eat a year-old lamb and to drink some milk.[145] He also prepared a quantity of wheat[146] for them, and they ate until they were full, while the food remained as it was, as though it had not been touched. Then he called for a drinking cup and they drank until they could drink no more, while the drink remained as though it had not been touched and they had not drunk.

"Then he said, 'Banū 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, I have been sent to all men in general and to you in particular. Now that you have seen what you have seen, which of you will swear an oath of allegiance to me to become my brother, my companion and my inheritor?' Not one of them rose up, so I stood before him, although I was the youngest there. He said. 'Sit down.' He repeated the words he had spoken three times, while I would rise up and would say to me, 'Sit down.' On the third occasion, he struck his hand on mine. In

143. The word armaṣ is literally "with eyes encrusted with matter."

144. This presumably refers to al-'Abbās, the ancestor of the 'Abbāsid dynasty.

145. Literally, "to drink a farq" which was a liquid measure used especially in al-Madīnah.

146. Literally "a mudd of wheat," but it is impossible to say even approximately how much this was.

this way I became the heir of my cousin to the exclusion of my uncle."

[1174] Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Amr b. 'Ubayd—al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-Ḥasan: When the verse "and warn your tribe of near kindred" was revealed to the Messenger of God, he rose up in the Valley and said, "Banū 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, Banū 'Abd Manāf, Banū Quṣayy!" Then he named the various groups of Quraysh, clan by clan, until he had come to the last of them, and said, "I summon you to God and warn you of his punishment."

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Jāriyah b. Abī 'Imrān—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Qāsim—his father:[147] The Messenger of God was commanded to proclaim the divine message which he had received, to declare it publicly to the people, and to summon them to God.

147. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I:132.22-5.

Other Events up to the Hijrah

Quraysh Begin to Oppose the Messenger of God

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq:[148] The Messenger of God proclaimed God's message openly and declared Islam publicly to his fellow tribesmen. When he did so, they did not withdraw from him or reject him in any way, as far as I have heard, until he spoke of their gods and denounced them. When he did this, they took exception to it and united in opposition and hostility to him, except for those of them whom God had protected from error by means of Islam. The latter were few in number and practiced their faith in secret. His uncle Abū Ṭālib was friendly to him, however, and protected him and shielded him from harm. The Messenger of God continued to do God's work and to proclaim his message, undeterred by anything. When Quraysh saw that he would not give them any satisfaction, they objected to his departing from their ways and denouncing their gods, and, seeing that Abū Ṭālib protected him, shielded him from harm, and would not hand him over to them, a number of the nobles of Quraysh, [1175] consisting of such men as 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah, Shaybah b. Rabī'ah, Abū al-Bakhtarī b. Hishām, al-Aswad b. al-Muṭṭalib, al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah, Abū Jahl b. Hishām, al-'Āṣ b. Wā'il, and Nubayh and Munabbih, the sons of al-Ḥajjāj,[149] went to Abū Ṭālib and said, "Abū Ṭālib, your nephew has reviled our gods, denounced our religion, derided our traditional values and told us that our forefathers were misguided. Either curb his attacks on us or give us a free hand to deal with him, for you are just as opposed to him as we are, and we will deal with him for you." Abū Ṭālib gave them a mild answer and declined courteously, and they left him. The Messenger of God continued as before, proclaiming the faith of God and summoning people to it.

148. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 166–8; Ibn Hishām omits the previous section from Ibn Isḥāq.

149. These were leading men from the clans of 'Abd Shams (2), Asad (2), Makhzūm (2), and Sahm (3). In the politics of pre-Islamic Mecca, these clans tended to be opposed to Hāshim and its associated clans.

After this, Muḥammad was estranged from the Quraysh, and they withdrew from him and harbored a secret hatred for him. They talked about him frequently amongst themselves and urged one another against him. Eventually they went to Abū Ṭālib once again. "Abū Ṭālib," they said, "we hold you in respect among us on account of your age, your nobility, and your standing. We asked you to forbid your nephew to attack us, but you did not do so. By God, we can no longer endure this vilification of our forefathers, this derision of our traditional values and this abuse of our gods. Either you restrain him or we shall fight both of you over this until one side or the other is destroyed," or words to that effect. Then they left. This breach and enmity with his tribe weighed heavily on Abū Ṭālib, but he could not reconcile himself to surrendering the Messenger of God to them or deserting him.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn—Aḥmad b. al-Mufaḍḍal—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: A number of men of the Quraysh gathered together, including Abū Jahl b. Hishām, al-'Āṣ b. Wā'il, al-Aswad b. al-Muṭṭalib [1176] and al-Aswad b. 'Abd Yaghūth, together with a number of other shaykhs of the Quraysh, and said to one another, "Let us go to Abū Ṭālib and speak to him about Muḥammad, so that he will give us justice against him and order him to desist from reviling our gods; and we will leave him to the god whom he worships, for we fear that this old man may die and we may do something which the Arabs will reproach us for and say, 'They let him alone until his uncle died, and then they laid hands on him.'"

They sent one of their number, whose name was al-Muṭṭalib,[150] to Abū Ṭālib to ask permission for them to enter. He said, "Here are the shaykhs and nobles of your tribe asking permission to visit you." He told him to ask them to come in, and when they had done so they said, "Abū Ṭālib, you are our elder and our chief, so give us justice against your nephew and order him to desist from reviling our gods, and we will leave him to his god."

150. This is not, of course, al-Muṭṭalib, the brother of Hāshim, who had been dead for a long time. It may have been al-Muṭṭalib b. Ḥantab from the clan of Makhzūm.

Abū Ṭālib sent for the Messenger of God, and when he came in he said, "Nephew, here are the shaykhs and nobles of your tribe. They have asked for justice against you, that you should desist from reviling their gods and they will leave you to your god." "Uncle," he said, "shall I not summon them to something which is better for them than their gods?" "What do you summon them to?" he asked. He replied, "I summon them to utter a saying through which the Arabs will submit to them and they will rule over the non-Arabs." Abū Jahl said from among the gathering, "What is it, by your father? We will give you it and ten like it." He answered, "That you should say; 'There is no deity but God.'" They took fright at that and said, "Ask for anything rather than that!" But he said, "If you were to bring me the sun and put it into my hand, I would not ask you for anything other than this." [1177]

They rose up to leave in anger and said, "By God, we shall revile you and your god who commands you to do this!" "The chiefs among them hurried about, exhorting; Go and be staunch to your gods! This is a thing designed ... " to the words "naught but an invention."[151]

Muḥammad turned toward his uncle, who said to him, "Nephew, why did you go too far with them?" He turned again toward his uncle and called upon him, saying, "Utter a saying by means of which I shall testify for you on the day of resurrection. Say, 'There is no deity but God.'" He replied, "Were it not that the Arabs would consider this shameful for you [all], and say that I was afraid of death, I would grant you this; but I must remain in the religion of my ancestors." Then came the revelation of the verse:

> You guide not whom you love, but God guides whom he will.[152]

Abū Kurayb and Ibn Wakī'—Abū Usāmah—al-A'mash—'Abbād—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: When Abū Ṭālib fell ill, a number of Quraysh visited him, among them Abū Jahl, who said, 151. 38:6-7.

152. 28:56.

"Your nephew is reviling our gods and doing and saying all sorts of things. Why do you not send for him and forbid him to do this?" He sent for him, and the Prophet came and entered the room. There was just room for one man to sit between Abū Ṭalib and his visitors, and Abū Jahl, being afraid that Abū Ṭālib would be more sympathetic to him if he sat beside him, leapt up and sat in that place himself, so that the Messenger of God could not find anywhere near his uncle to sit down and had to sit by the door. Abū Ṭālib said to him, "Nephew, how is it that your tribe are complaining of you and claiming that you are reviling their gods and saying this, that, and the other?" They showered accusations [1178] upon him, and then the Messenger of God spoke and said, "Uncle, I want them to utter one saying. If they say it, the Arabs will submit to them and the non-Arabs will pay the jizyah [153] to them." They were perturbed at this utterance and said, "One saying? Yes, by your father, and ten! What is it?" Abū Ṭālib said, "What saying is it, nephew" He replied, "There is no deity but God." They rose up in alarm, shaking the dust off their garments and saying, "Does he make the gods one god? This is indeed an astounding thing." Then came the revelation beginning with the words just spoken by these men and ending "they have not yet tasted my doom."[154] These are the exact words of Abū Kurayb's account.

Returning to Ibn Isḥāq's narrative.[155]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaʿqūb b. ʿUtbah b. al-Mughīrah b. al-Akhnas: He was told that when the Quraysh said this to Abū Ṭālib, he sent for the Messenger of God and said to him, "Nephew, your tribe have come to me and said such-and-such. Spare me and yourself, and do not put a greater burden on me than I can bear." The Messenger of God thought that his uncle had changed about him and was going to abandon him and hand him over, and that his determination to aid him and stand by him had weakened, so he said, "Uncle, if they were to place the sun in my right hand and the moon in my left, on condition that I should abandon (carrying on) my preaching before God gave it the victory or I died in the attempt, I should not abandon it." Then the Messenger of God burst into tears and wept, and rose up. When he turned away, Abū Ṭālib called him back and said, "Come here, nephew." The Messenger of God came up to him, and he said, "Go, nephew, and say what you like. By God, I [1179] will never hand you over for any reason."

153. The jizyah was the poll tax paid by members of "protected minorities" (dhimmīs) under the Caliphate.

154: 38:5-8.

155. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 168–70; Ṭabarī omits a poem ascribed to Abū Ṭālib.

When the Quraysh discovered that Abū Ṭālib had refused to abandon the Messenger of God and to hand him over, and was determined to break with them on this issue and become their enemy, they brought ʿUmārah b. al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah to him and said, I have been told, "Abū Ṭālib, this is ʿUmārah b. al-Walīd, the bravest, most poetically gifted and most handsome young man in Quraysh. Take him, and his intelligence and his support are yours. Take him as a son, and he is yours; and hand over your nephew who has opposed your religion and the religion of your forefathers, who has sowed discord among your tribe and who has derided their traditional values, and we shall kill him. A man for a man."

Abū Ṭālib said, "This is an evil bargain which you are offering me. Will you give me your son so that I can feed him for you, while I give you my son so that you can kill him? By God, this shall never be." Al-Muṭʿim b. ʿAdī b. Nawfal b. ʿAbd Manāf said, "By God, Abū Ṭālib, your tribe have treated you fairly, and have tried hard to avoid putting you in an unpleasant situation. I do not think that you wish to accept any proposal from them." Abū Ṭālib replied to al-Muṭʿim, "By God, they have not treated me fairly. You have decided to abandon me and to support the rest of the tribe against me. Do what you think fit." These, or something like them, were his words.

After this, the situation deteriorated, hostility became more bitter, and people withdrew from one another and showed open hatred to one another. Then the Quraysh incited one another against those in their various clans who had become Companions of the Messenger of God and had accepted Islam with him. Every clan fell upon those of its members who were Muslims, tormenting them and trying to force them to leave their religion. God pro- [1180] tected his Messenger from them by means of his uncle Abū Ṭālib who saw what the Quraysh were doing among the Banū Hāshim and the Banū al-Muṭṭalib and called on them to follow him in protecting and defending the Messenger of God. They gathered round him, stood by him, and responded to his call to defend the Messenger of God, with the exception of Abū Lahab. Abū Ṭālib was overjoyed when he saw how serious they were in supporting him and how solicitous they were for him, and he began to praise them and to extol the Messenger of God's merits and his standing among them in order to reinforce their decision.

The Emigration to Abyssinia

ʿAlī b. Naṣr b. ʿAlī al-Jahḍamī and ʿAbd al-Wārith b. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAbd al-Wārith—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAbd al-Wārith—Abān al-ʿAṭṭār—Hishām b. ʿUrwah—ʿUrwah: He wrote to ʿAbd al-Malik as follows, referring to the Messenger of God: When he summoned his people to the guidance and light which had been revealed to him and for which God had sent him, they did not withdraw from him at the beginning of his preaching, and were on the point of listening to him. When, however, he spoke of their idols, some wealthy men of Quraysh who had come from al-Ṭā'if took exception to this and reacted strongly against him, not liking what he said. They instigated those over whom they had influence against him, and the mass of the people turned away from him and abandoned him, except for those of them whom God pro-[1181] tected, and these were few in number. Matters remained thus as long as God willed, and then their chiefs conspired together to seduce from God's religion those of their sons, brothers, and fellow clansmen who had followed him. It was a trial which severely shook the people of Islam who had followed the Messenger of God. Some were seduced, but God protected from error those whom He wished to protect. When the Muslims were treated in this way, the Messenger of God commanded them to emigrate to Abyssinia. In Abyssinia there was a righteous king called the Negus in whose land no one was oppressed and who was praised for his righteousness. Abyssinia was a land with which Quraysh traded and in which they found an ample living, security, and a good market. When the Messenger of God commanded them to do this, the main body of them went to Abyssinia because of the coercion they were being subjected to in Mecca. His fear was that they would be seduced from their religion. He himself remained, and did not leave Mecca. Several years passed in this way, during which Quraysh pressed hard upon those of them who had become Muslims. After this, Islam spread in Mecca and a number of their nobles entered Islam.[156]

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): There is a difference of opinion as to the number of those who emigrated to Abyssinia in this, the first emigration. Some say that there were eleven men and four women.[157]

Those who say this:

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Yūnus b. Muḥammad al-Ẓafarī—his father—a man of his tribe; also 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās al-Hudhalī—al-Ḥārith b. al-Fuḍayl: Those who emigrated in the first emigration did so by stealth and in secret, and numbered eleven men and four women. They went to al-Shu'aybah, some riding and some walking. As they arrived, God caused two [1182] merchant ships to halt there for the Muslims, and in these they were carried to Abyssinia for half a dīnār. This took place in the month of Rajab in the fifth year from the time of the Messenger of God's commissioning as a prophet. Quraysh set out in pursuit of them and reached the sea at the place where the Muslims had embarked, but did not capture any of them. The emigrants said, "We came to Abyssinia and were hospitably lodged by the best of hosts. We had security to practice our religion, and we worshipped God without being persecuted and without hearing unpleasant words."

Al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd–Muḥammad b. 'Umar–Yūnus b. Muḥammad—his father; also 'Abd al-Ḥamīd—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥibbān: The names of this group, men and women, were: 'Uthmān b. 'Affān and his wife Ruqayyah, the daughter of the Messenger of God; Abū Ḥudhayfah b. 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah and his wife Sahlah bt. Suhayl b. 'Amr; al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām b. Khuwaylid b. Asad; Muṣ'ab b. 'Umayr b. Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf b. 'Abd al-Dār; 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf b. 'Abd 'Awf b. al-Ḥārith b. Zuhrah; Abū Salamah b. 'Abd al-Asad b. Hilāl b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. Makhzūm and his wife Umm Salamah bt. Abī Umayyah b. al-Mughīrah b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. Makhzūm; 'Uthmān b. [1183] Maẓ'ūn al-Jumaḥī; 'Āmir b. Rabī'ah al-'Anzī (from the tribe of 'Anz b. Wā'il, not from that of 'Anazah), the confederate of the 156. Reading dakhala fīhi for fīhā of the printed text. This is part of the letter to the Caliph 'Abd al-Malik.

157. For the emigrations to Abyssinia, see Introduction, p.46. The two following passages from al-Wāqidī are found in Ibn Sa'd, Tabaqāt, I:136. 9-137.2.

Banū ʿAdī b. Kaʿb, and his wife Laylā bt. Abī Ḥathmah; Abū Sabrah b. Abī Ruhm b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā al-ʿĀmirī; Ḥāṭib b. ʿAmr b. ʿAbd Shams; Suhayl b. Bayḍāʾ, from the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Fihr; and ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd, the confederate of the Banū Zuhrah.

Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī]: Others say that those Muslims who went to Abyssinia and emigrated there, apart from their children who went with them when they were young or were born there, were eighty-two men, if ʿAmmār b. Yāsir, who is doubtful, is included among them.

Those who say this:

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq:[158] The Messenger of God saw the sufferings which were inflicted on his Companions and saw that, although he himself was spared such treatment by virtue of his standing with God and his uncle Abū Ṭālib, he could not defend his Companions against the sufferings they were experiencing. He therefore said to them, "Why do you not go to Abyssinia? There is a king there under whom no one is oppressed, and it is a land of truth. Stay there until God creates a relief from the situation in which you find yourselves." Thereupon the Messenger of God's Muslim Companions went to Abyssinia, fearing they might be seduced and fleeing to God with their religion. This was the first emigration in Islam.

[1184] The first Muslims to emigrate were as follows: from the Banū Umayyah b. ʿAbd Shams b. ʿAbd Manāf, ʿUthman b. ʿAffān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ b. Umayyah, accompanied by his wife Ruqayyah, the daughter of the Messenger of God. From the Banū ʿAbd Shams, Abū Ḥudhayfah b. ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah b. ʿAbd Shams b. ʿAbd Manāf, accompanied by his wife Sahlah bt. Suhayl b. ʿAmr, one of the Banū ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy. From the Banū Asad b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā b. Quṣayy, al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām. After this, Ibn Isḥāq gives the same list of people as al-Wāqidī, except that he says: From the Banū ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy b. Ghālib b. Fihr, Abū Sabrah b. Abī Ruhm b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā b. Abī Qays b. ʿAbd Wudd b. Naṣr b. Mālik b. Ḥisl b. ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy; but some people say that this was not so and that it was Abū Ḥāṭib b. ʿAmr b. ʿAbd Shams b. ʿAbd Wudd b. Naṣr b. Mālik b. Ḥisl b. ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy. He is said to have been the first of all to go to Abyssinia. Ibn Isḥāq makes their number ten, saying: These ten, according to what I have been told, were the first Muslims to emigrate to Abyssinia.

158. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 208–9; Ṭabarī omits Ibn Isḥaq's second longer list, 209-16.

Then Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib emigrated, and after that there was a steady flow of Muslims. They assembled in Abyssinia and remained there, some coming with their families and some singly, without their families. Ibn Isḥāq then reckons that there were eighty-two men in all, including the ten I have mentioned by name, some who had their families and children with them, some who had children born in Abyssinia, and some who had no family with them.

Quraysh Show Increased Hostility to the Messenger of God

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): When those of the Messenger of God's Companions who emigrated to Abyssina had departed, the Messenger of God remained in Mecca preaching in secret and openly, protected by God through his uncle Abū Ṭālib and by those of his clan who answered his call for support. When Quraysh saw that they had no means of attacking him physically, they accused him of sorcery, soothsaying, and madness, and of being a poet. They began to keep away from him those whom they feared might listen to him and follow him. The most serious step which they are reported to have taken at that time was the following. [1185]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—his father 'Urwah—'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ:[159] I said to him, "What was the worst attack you saw by Quraysh upon the Messenger of God when they openly showed their enmity to him?" He replied, "I was with them when their nobles assembled one day in the Ḥijr and discussed the Messenger of God. They said, 'We have never seen the like of what we have endured from this man. He has derided our traditional values, abused our forefathers, reviled our religion, caused division among us, and insulted our gods. We have endured a great deal from him,' or words to that effect. While they were saying this, the Messenger of God suddenly appeared and walked up and kissed the Black Stone. Then he passed by them while performing the circumambulation, 159. Ibid., 183f.

and as he did so they made some slanderous remarks about him. I could see from the Messenger of God's face that he had heard them, but he went on. When he passed the second time they made similar remarks, and I could see from his face that he had heard them, but again he went on. Then he passed them the third time, and they made similar remarks; but this time he stopped and said, 'Hear, men of Quraysh. By Him in whose hand Muḥammad's soul [1186] rests, I have brought you slaughter.' They were gripped by what he had said, and it was as though every man of them had a bird perched on his head;[160] even those of them who had been urging the severest measures against him previously spoke in a conciliatory way to him, using the politest expressions they could think of, and said, 'Depart in true guidance, Abū al-Qāsim; by God, you were never ignorant.'

"The Prophet left, and the next day they gathered in the Ḥijr, and I ['Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ] was again present. They said to one another, 'You were talking about the unpleasantness which you have endured and the things which Muḥammad has done to you, but when he openly said something disagreeable you shrank from him.' While they were saying this, the Messenger of God suddenly appeared, and they leapt upon him as one man and surrounded him, saying, 'Is it you who says this and that?' repeating what they had heard of his denunciation of their gods and their religion. The prophet said, 'Yes, I am the one who says that.' "

"Then I saw one of them grabbing his cloak, but Abū Bakr stood in front of him weeping and saying, 'Woe upon you all! Would you kill a man because he says, My Lord is God?'[161] Then they left him, and that is the worst thing I ever saw Quraysh do to him."

Yunūs b. 'Abd al-A'lā—Bishr b. Bakr—al-Awzā'ī—Yaḥyā b. Abī Kathīr—Abū Salamah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān: I said to 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr, "Tell the worst thing which you saw the polytheists do to the Messenger of God." He said, "'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ came up while the Messenger of God was by the Ka'bah, twisted his robe round his neck, and throttled him violently. Abū Bakr stood behind him, put his hand on his shoulder, and pushed him away from the Messenger of God. Then he said, 'People, would you kill a man because he says, My Lord is God? ... ' to the words 'God guides not one who is prodigal, a liar?' " [1187]

160. In his translation, Guillaume interprets this as "not one of them but stood silent and still."

161. Abū Bakr quotes a verse from the Qur'ān (40:28) referring to a threat to kill Moses.

Ḥamzah Accepts Islam

Ibn Isḥāq—a man from Aslam, who had a good memory:[162] Abū Jahl b. Hishām passed by the Messenger of God as he was sitting by al-Ṣafā and abused him, reviled him, and spoke to him offensively, denouncing his religion and trying to humiliate him. The Messenger of God did not say anything, but a woman client (mawlāh) of ʿAbdallāh b. Judʿān al-Taymī, who was in her house above al-Ṣafā, overheard this. Then Abū Jahl left him, went to the assembly of the Quraysh at the Kaʿbah, and sat down with them. Soon afterwards, Ḥamzah b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib came up with his bow slung over his shoulder, on his way back from the hunt. He was a great huntsman and used to go out for game with his bow and arrows. When he came back from the hunt he would not go back to his family until he had circumambulated the Kaʿbah, after which, if he passed by an assembly of the Quraysh, he would always stop, greet them, and talk with them. He was the strongest man of Quraysh, and the most unyielding. By the time he went past the woman, the Messenger of God had risen and gone home, and she said to him, "Abū ʿUmārah, if only you had seen what your nephew Muḥammad had to endure just now, before you came, from Abū al-Ḥakam b. Hishām.[163] He found him sitting here and reviled him, abused him and spoke to him offensively, and then left him, while Muḥammad said nothing in return."

Ḥamzah was carried away by a fury, as it was God's will to honor him in this way, and went off quickly, not stopping to speak to anyone as he used to do when intending to circumambulate the Kaʿbah, ready to attack Abū Jahl when he saw him. When he entered the mosque, he saw him sitting among the people and went up to him. When he was standing next to him he raised his bow and gave him a blow with it which split his head open in an ugly way, and said, "Do you revile him when I am a member of his religion and say what he says? Return that blow against me if you can!"

162. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 184f.

163. Out of politeness, this woman addresses Ḥamzah by his kunyah (see n. 22) and refers to Abū Jahl by his, that is, Abū al-Ḥakam. Since Jahl is not a boy's name, Abū Jahl is not a proper kunyah but rather a kind of nickname, possibly meaning "father of violence (or bravado)." His primary name was ʿAmr. Similarly the name of Muḥammad's uncle Abū Lahab means something like "father of brightness."

[1188] The men of Banū Makhzūm (the clan of Abū Jahl), rose up to come to Abū Jahl's assistance against Ḥamzah, but Abū Jahl said, "Leave Abū 'Umārah, for, by God, I insulted his nephew gravely."

Ḥamzah persevered in his Islam. Quraysh recognized that by Ḥamzah's acceptance of Islam the Messenger of God had been strengthened and that Ḥamzah would protect him; after this, they curbed some of their attacks on him.

'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd Recites the Qur'ān Aloud to Quraysh

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—his father:[164] The first to recite the Qur'ān aloud in Mecca after the Messenger of God was 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd. One day the companions of the Messenger of God were assembled together and said, "By God, Quraysh have never heard this Qur'ān recited aloud to them. Who will let them hear it?" 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd said, "I will." They said, "We fear what they will do to you. What we want is a man who has a clan who will protect him against them if they seek to harm him." He replied, "Let me do it. God will protect me."

The next day, Ibn Mas'ūd went to the Maqām[165] in the late morning when the Quraysh were gathered in their groups. When he was standing at the maqām, he said, "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful," raising his voice as he did so, "The Compassionate has made known the Qur'ān. He has created man." He turned toward them as he recited, and they took notice of him and began to say, "What is this son of a slave's mother saying?" Then they said, "He is reciting some of what Muḥammad has brought," and rose up and began to hit him in the face. He continued to recite as much as God willed that he should, and then went back to his companions with the marks of their blows

164. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 202f.

165. Presumably the spot near the Ka'bah known as "the standing place of Abraham" (maqām Ibrāhīm). The verses recited are 55:1-3.

on his face. They said, "This is what we feared would happen to you," but he replied, "The enemies of God were never more despicable in my sight than they are now. If you wish, I will do the same thing to them tomorrow." They replied, "No, you have done enough. You have made them hear what they do not wish to hear." [1189]

Quraysh Boycott the Banū Hāshim and the Banū al-Muṭṭalib[166]

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): When those who had emigrated to Abyssinia had settled down in the land of the Negus and were living in security, Quraysh conferred together about taking some action against those Muslims who had taken refuge there. They then sent 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ and 'Abdallāh b. Abi Rabī'ah b. al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī to the Negus with many gifts for him and for his generals, telling them to ask the Negus to hand back those Muslims whom he had accepted into his country. 'Amr and 'Abdallāh travelled to him on this mission and carried out the task which their people had entrusted to them, but did not achieve the results from the Negus which their tribe had hoped for, and went home in disgrace.

'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who was a staunch, sturdy, and mighty warrior, had accepted Islam, as had Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib before him, and the Messenger of God's Companions began to feel stronger. Islam had begun to spread among the clans, and the Negus had given protection to those Muslims who had taken refuge in his country. When all of these things happened, the Quraysh gathered together to confer and decided to draw up a document in which they undertook not to marry women from the Banū Hāshim and the Banū al-Muṭṭalib, or to give them women in marriage, or to sell anything to them or buy anything from them. They drew up a written contract to that effect and solemnly pledged themselves to observe it. Then they hung up the document in the interior of the Ka'bah to make it even more binding upon themselves. When Quraysh did this, the Banū Hāshim and the Banū al-Muṭṭalib joined with Abū Ṭālib, went with him to his valley and gathered round him there; but Abū Lahab 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. [1190]

166. There is similar material in Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 230-32.

ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib left the Banū Hāshim and went to the Quraysh, supporting them against Abū Ṭālib. This state of affairs continued for two or three years, until the two clans were exhausted, since nothing reached any of them except what was sent secretly by those of the Quraysh who wished to maintain relations with them.

It is related that Abū Jahl met Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām b. Khuwaylid b. Asad with a slave carrying some wheat which he intended to take to his aunt Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid, who was with the Messenger of God in the valley. He hung on to him and said, "Are you taking food to the Banū Hāshim? By God, you and your food will not move until I disgrace you in Mecca!" Abū al-Bakhtarī b. Hishām b. al-Ḥārith b. Asad came up and said, "What is going on between you two?" Abū Jahl said, "He is taking food to the Banū Hāshim," but Abū al-Bakhtarī replied, "It is food belonging to his aunt which he has stored and which she has now sent for. Would you prevent him from taking her own food to her? Let the man pass." Abū Jahl refused, and in the end they came to blows. Abū al-Bakhtarī took hold of a camel's jawbone, struck him with it, split his head open, and trampled upon him violently. Ḥamzah b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was near by observing this. They did not want the Messenger of God and his Companions to hear of this and rejoice at their discomfiture. During all of this period of years the Messenger of God was calling upon his people in secret and openly, by night and by day, while the revelation from God was coming to him continuously, commanding and forbidding, threatening those who showed open hostility to him, and vindicating the Messenger [1191] of God against those who opposed him.

Quraysh Attempt to Induce the Messenger of God to Cease His Attacks on Their Gods

It is said that the nobles of his tribe gathered together to speak to him one day.

Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Ḥarashī—Abū Khalaf ʿAbdallāh b. ʿIsā—Dāūd—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: Quraysh promised the Messenger of God that they would give him so much wealth that he would become the richest man in Mecca, would give him as many wives as he wanted in marriage, and would submit to his commands.

They said, "This is what we will give you, Muḥammad, so desist from reviling our gods and do not speak evilly of them. If you will not do so, we offer you one means which will be to your advantage and to ours." "What is it?" he asked. They said, "You will worship our gods, al-Lāt and al-ʿUzzā, for a year, and we shall worship your god for a year." "Let me see what revelation comes to me from my Lord," he replied. Then, the following inspiration came from the Preserved Tablet:

> Say: O disbelievers! I worship not that which you worship; nor do you worship that which I worship. And I shall not worship that which you worship, nor will you worship that which I worship. To you your religion, and to me my religion.

God also revealed:

> Say: Do you bid me serve other than God? O fools! ... (reciting to the words) ... Nay, but God must you serve, and be among the thankful![167]

Yaʿqūb b. Ibrāhīm—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Saʿīd b. Mīna the mawlā of Abū al-Bakhtarī:[168] Al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah, al-ʿĀṣ b. Wā'il, al-Aswad b. al-Muṭṭalib, and Umayyah b. Khalaf met the Messenger of God and said, "Muḥammad, come and let us worship that which you worship and you worship that which we worship, and we shall make you a partner in all of our undertakings. If what you have brought is better than what we already have, we will be partners with you in it and take our share of it, and if what we have is better than what you have, you shall be partner with us in what we have, and you shall take your share of it." Then God revealed: "Say: O disbelievers ... (reciting) to the end of the sūrah.[169] [1192]

Satan Casts a False Revelation on the Messenger of God's Tongue

The Messenger of God was eager for the welfare of his people and

167. The verses revealed are 109:1-6 and 39:64-66.

168. Ibn Hishām seems to have omitted this section, although Guillaume has not noticed the fact.

169. 109.

wished to effect a reconciliation with them in whatever ways he could. It is said that he wanted to find a way to do this, and what happened was as follows.[170]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Ziyād al-Madanī—Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Qurazī: When the Messenger of God saw how his tribe turned their backs on him and was grieved to see them shunning the message he had brought to them from God, he longed in his soul that something would come to him from God which would reconcile him with his tribe. With his love for his tribe and his eagerness for their welfare it would have delighted him if some of the difficulties which they made for him could have been smoothed out, and he debated with himself and fervently desired such an outcome. Then God revealed:[171]

> By the Star when it sets, your comrade does not err, nor is he deceived; nor does he speak out of (his own) desire ...

and when he came to the words:

> Have you thought upon al-Lāt and al-'Uzzā and Manāt, the third, the other?

Satan cast on his tongue, because of his inner debates and what he desired to bring to his people, the words:

> These are the high-flying cranes; verily their intercession is accepted with approval.[172]

When Quraysh heard this, they rejoiced and were happy and delighted at the way in which he spoke of their gods, and they listened to him, while the Muslims, having complete trust in their Prophet in respect of the messages which he brought from God, did not suspect him of error, illusion, or mistake. When he came to the prostration, having completed the sūrah, he prostrated himself and the Muslims did likewise, following their Prophet, trusting in the message which he had brought and following his example. Those polytheists of the Quraysh and others who were in the

170. This section is also omitted by Ibn Hishām, perhaps because he felt it was discreditable to the Prophet.

171. Sūrah 53; the verses quoted are 1-3 and 19-20.

172. An alternative reading to turtaḍā is turtajā, meaning, "is to be desired or hoped for."

mosque[173] likewise prostrated themselves because of the reference to their gods which they had heard, so that there was no one in the mosque, believer or unbeliever, who did not prostrate himself. The one exception was al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah, who was a very old man and could not prostrate himself; but he took a handful of soil from the valley in his hand and bowed over that. Then they all dispersed from the mosque. The Quraysh left delighted by the mention of their gods which they had heard, saying, "Muḥammad has mentioned our gods in the most favorable way possible, stating in his recitation that they are the high-flying cranes and that their intercession is received with approval." [1193]

The news of this prostration reached those of the Messenger of God's Companions who were in Abyssinia and people said, "The Quraysh have accepted Islam." Some rose up to return, while others remained behind. Then Gabriel came to the Messenger of God and said, "Muḥammad, what have you done? You have recited to the people that which I did not bring to you from God, and you have said that which was not said to you." Then the Messenger of God was much grieved and feared God greatly, but God sent down a revelation to him, for He was merciful to him, consoling him and making the matter light for him, informing him that there had never been a prophet or a messenger before him who desired as he desired and wished as he wished but that Satan had cast words into his recitation, as he had cast words on Muḥammad's tongue. Then God cancelled what Satan had thus cast, and established his verses by telling him that he was like other prophets and messengers, and revealed:

> Never did we send a messenger or a prophet before you but that when he recited (the Message) Satan cast words into his recitation (umniyyah).God abrogates what Satan casts. Then God established his verses. God is knower, wise.[174]

---

173. The sacred area around the Ka'bah was not, of course, an Islamic mosque at this period, though the word masjid, "place of prostration, mosque," seems to have been applied to it.

174. 22-52. The translation deviates here from that of Pickthall in order to make it correspond with what is required by Ṭabarī's account. The meanings for tamannā and umniyyah, "recite" and "recitation," are well attested (see Lisān s.v. M-N-Y). An alternative rendering for this verse would be: "Never did we send a messenger or a prophet before you but that when he formed a wish Satan threw (some vanity) into his desire . . . ."

Thus God removed the sorrow from his Messenger, reassured him about that which he had feared and cancelled the words [1194] which Satan had cast on his tongue, that their gods were the high-flying cranes whose intercession was accepted with approval. He now revealed, following the mention of "al-Lāt, al-ʿUzza and Manāt, the third, the other," the words:

> Are yours the males and his the females? That indeed were an unfair division! They are but names which you have named, you and your fathers ...

to the words:

> to whom he wills and accepts.[175]

This means, how can the intercession of their gods avail with God?

When Muḥammad brought a revelation from God cancelling what Satan had cast on the tongue of His Prophet, the Quraysh said, "Muḥammad has repented of what he said concerning the position of your gods with God, and has altered it and brought something else." Those two phrases which Satan had cast on the tongue of the Messenger of God were in the mouth of every polytheists, and they became even more ill-disposed and more violent in their persecution of those of them who had accepted Islam and followed the Messenger of God.

Those of the Companions of the Messenger of God who had left Abyssinia upon hearing that Quraysh had accepted Islam by prostrating themselves with the Messenger of God now approached. When they were near Mecca, they heard that the report that the people of Mecca had accepted Islam was false. Not one of them entered Mecca without obtaining protection or entering secretly. Among those who came to Mecca and remained there until they emigrated to al-Madīnah and were present with the Prophet at Badr, were, from the Banū ʿAbd Shams b. ʿAbd Manāf b. Quṣayy, ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān b. Abī al-ʿĀs b. Umayyah, accompanied by his wife Ruqayyah the daughter of the Messenger of God; Abū Hudhayfah b. ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah b. ʿAbd Shams, accompanied by his [1195] wife Sahlah bt. Suhayl; together with a number of others number-

175. 53:21-23,26, Ṭabarī explains ḍīzā, "unfair," as meaning ʿawjā, "crooked."

ing thirty-three men.

Al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan—al-Ḥusayn b. Dāūd—Ḥajjā—Abū Ma'shar—Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Quraẓī and Muḥammad b. Qays: The Messenger of God was sitting in a large gathering of Quraysh, wishing that day that no revelation would come to him from God which would cause them to turn away from him. Then God revealed:

> By the Star when it sets, your comrade does not err, nor is he deceived ...

and the Messenger of God recited it until he came to:

> Have you thought upon al-Lāt and al-'Uzzā and Manāt, the third, the other?

when Satan cast on his tongue two phrases:

> These are the high flying cranes; verily their intercession is to be desired.[176]

He uttered them and went on to complete the sūrah. When he prostrated himself at the end of the sūrah, the whole company prostrated themselves with him. Al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah raised some dust to his forehead and bowed over that, since he was a very old man and could not prostrate himself. They were satisfied with what Muḥammad had uttered and said, "We recognize that it is God who gives life and death, who creates and who provides sustenance, but if these gods of ours intercede for us with him, and if you give them a share, we are with you."

That evening Gabriel came to him and reviewed the sūrah with him, and when he reached the two phrases which Satan had cast upon his tongue he said, "I did not bring you these two." Then the Messenger of God said, "I have fabricated things against God and have imputed to Him words which He has not spoken." Then God revealed to him:

> And they indeed strove hard to beguile you away from what we have revealed to you, that you should invent other than it against us ...

176. Sūrah 53. This version of the false verses has la-turjā, "to be desired or hoped for."

to the words:

and then you would have found no helper against us.[177]

He remained grief-stricken and anxious until the revelation of the verse:

[1196] Never did we send a messenger or a prophet before you ... to the words ... God is knower, wise.[178]

When those who had emigrated to Abyssinia heard that all the people of Mecca had accepted Islam, they returned to their clans, saying, "They are more dear to us"; but they found that the people had reversed their decision when God cancelled what Satan had cast upon the Messenger of God's tongue.

The Boycott Is Repealed

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq.[179] Then a number of the Quraysh took steps to repeal the agreement which the Quraysh had drawn up amongst themselves directed against the Banū Hāshim and the Banū al-Muṭṭalib. The most creditable part in this was played by Hishām b. ʿAmr b. al-Ḥārith al-ʿĀmirī of ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy. He was the son of the maternal half-brother of Naḍlah b. Hāshim b. ʿAbd Manāf, and he went to Zuhayr b. Abī Umayyah b. al-Mughīrah b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. Makhzūm, whose mother was ʿĀtikah bt. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, and said, "Zuhayr, are you content to eat food, wear clothes, and marry women while your maternal uncles are in the condition in which you know them to be, unable to buy or sell, and unable to give or take in marriage? I swear by God that if they were the maternal cousins of Abū al-Ḥakam b. Hishām[180] and you were to call on him to do what he has called on you to do, he would never agree to do it." "For goodness' sake, Hishām," he replied, "What can I do? I am only one man. By God, if I had another man with me I would take steps to repeal it and would continue until I had had it repealed." "You have found 177. 17:73,75.

178. 22:52.
179. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 247-49.
180. This is the man usually called Abū Jahl, who was one of the most vehement opponents of Muḥammad.

a man," he said. "Who?" he asked. "Myself," he replied. Then Zuhayr said, "Find me a third man."

So he went to al-Muṭʿim b. ʿAdī b. Nawfal b. ʿAbd Manāf and [1197] said to him, "Muṭʿim, are you content that two clans of the Banū ʿAbd Manāf are perishing while you look on,[181] agreeing with Quraysh on the matter? By God, if you allow them to do this, you will find that they will soon do the same to you." He replied, "For goodness' sake, what can I do? I am only one man." "You have found a second," he said. "Who?" he asked. "Myself," he replied. Then he said, "Find me a third." "I have already done so," he replied. "Who?" he asked. "Zuhayr b. Abī Umayyah," he said. Then he said, "Find me a fourth."

So he went to Abū al-Bakhtarī b. Hishām and said the same to him as he had said to al-Muṭʿim b. ʿAdī. He answered, "Is there anyone who will help in this?" "Yes," he said. "Who?" he asked. He said, "Zuhayr b. Abī Umayyah and al-Muṭʿim b. ʿAdī, and I am with you." "Find me a fifth," he said.

Then he went to Zamʿah b. al-Aswad b. al-Muṭṭalib b. Asad, spoke to him, and reminded him of how closely they were related to him and of his duty to them. He said, "Is there anyone who will help in this matter in which you are calling upon me to take part?" "Yes," he replied, and named them.

They promised to meet him at Khaṭm al-Ḥajūn, which is in the high ground above Mecca. When they gathered there, they agreed upon their course of action, and pledged themselves to deal with the document and to have it repealed. Zuhayr said, "I will be the first to begin and will be the first to speak." The next morning they went to their groups, and Zuhayr appeared in a gown, circumambulated the Kaʿbah seven times, and then went up to the people and said, "People of Mecca, shall we eat food, drink drink, and wear clothes while the Banū Hāshim are perishing, neither buying nor selling? By God, I shall not sit down until this unjust [1198] document which severs relationships is torn up." Abū Jahl, who was at one side of the mosque, said, "You lie, by God. It shall not be torn up." Zamʿah b. al-Aswad said, "By God, you are a greater liar. We did not approve of its being written when it was written."

181. ʿAbd Manāf had four sons, ancestors of four clans. The two who are perishing are Hāshim and al-Muṭṭalib. Muṭʿim belongs to a third, Nawfal, and the fourth is ʿAbd Shams.

Then Abū al-Bakhtarī said, "Zam'ah has spoken the truth. We do not approve of what was written in it, and we do not acknowledge it." Then al-Mut'im b. 'Adī said, "You have both spoken the truth, and anyone who says otherwise is lying. We are full of guilt for it before God and for what is written in it." Hishām b. 'Amr said much the same. Then Abū Jahl said, "This is something which has been decided during the night, and which has been decided elsewhere than in this place." Abū Ṭālib was sitting at one side of the mosque. Al-Muṭ'im b. 'Adī went up to the document to tear it up, and found that it had been eaten by termites except for the part on which had been written, "In your name, O God." These were the words with which the Quraysh prefaced their documents when they wrote anything.

I have heard that the writer of the document which the Quraysh drew up against the Messenger of God and his relatives from the Banū Hāshim and the Banū al-Muṭṭalib was Manṣūr b. 'Ikrimah b. Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf b. 'Abd al-Dār b. Quṣayy. [For having done so] his hand withered.

The Messenger of God Is Subjected to Further Insults

The rest of the emigrants remained in Abyssinia until the Messenger of God sent 'Amr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī to the Negus for them. He transported them in two ships and brought them to the Messenger of God while he was in Khaybar after al-Ḥudaybiyah. The total number of those who came in the two ships was sixteen men.[182]

The Messenger of God continued to live in Mecca with Quraysh, calling them to God secretly and openly, enduring their molestation of him, their calling him a liar, and their derision of him. Things came to such a pitch that one of them, it is said, [1199] would throw a sheep's womb upon him as he was praying or would throw it into his cooking pot when it was set up for him. Finally, I have been told, he took a large stone and sheltered behind it when he prayed.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Umar b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ur-

182. This final return was early in the year 7/628. Many others had returned before Muḥammad left Mecca.

wah b. al-Zubayr—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr:[183] The Messenger of God used to bring this out on a stick when it was thrown into his house and stand at his door and say, "Banū 'Abd Manāf, what protection is this?" Then he would throw it into the road.

The Deaths of Abū Ṭālib and Khadījah

After this Abū Ṭālib and Khadījah died in a single year.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq:[184] This was three years before his emigration to al-Madīnah. Their death was a great affliction to the Messenger of God. This is because after the death of Abū Ṭālib, Quraysh went to greater lengths in molesting him than they had ever done during his lifetime. One of them even poured dust upon his head.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Hishām b. 'Urwah—his father: When that foolish person poured dust upon the Messenger of God's head, he went into his house with the dust still on his head. One of his daughters stood next to him washing off the dust and weeping, while the Messenger of God said to her, "Do not weep, daughter, for God will protect your father." The Messenger of God used to say, "Quraysh never did anything unpleasant to me until Abū Ṭālib died."

The Messenger of God Goes to al-Ṭā'if

When Abū Ṭālib died, the Messenger of God went to al-Ṭā'if to seek support and protection against his own people from Thaqīf. It is said that he went to them alone.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Ziyād—Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Quraẓī:[185] When the Messenger of God reached al-Ṭā'if, he went to a group of men of Thaqīf who were at that time the chiefs and nobles of the tribe. They were three brothers, 'Abd Yālayl b. 'Amr b. 'Umayr, Mas'ud b. 'Amr b. 'Umayr, and Ḥabīb b. 'Amr. b. 'Umayr. One of them had a wife from Quraysh, from [1200]

183. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 277.

184. Ibid., 277.

185. Ibid., 279-81. Thaqīf was the dominant tribe in al-Ṭā' if. They had been forced into an alliance with the Meccans, and Muḥammad may have hoped that anti-Meccan feeling would lead men to support him.

the Banū Jumaḥ. He sat down with them and called them to God, and spoke to them of the requests which he had come to them to make, (that is,) that they should come to his aid in defense of Islam and take his side against those of his own tribe who opposed him. One of them said, "If God has sent you, I will tear off the covering of the Ka'bah;" another said, "Could God find no-one but you to send?" and the third said, "By God, I shall never say a single word to you, for if you are a messenger from God as you say, you are too important for me to reply to you, and if you are lying against God, it is not right for me to speak to you."

The Messenger of God rose up and left them, despairing of getting any good out of Thaqīf. I have been told that he said to them, "If that is your decision, do not tell anyone about it," for he did not want his tribe to hear about this matter and be emboldened against him. However, they did not comply with his request, but incited against him their ignorant rabble and their slaves, who reviled him and shouted at him until a crowd gathered and forced him to take refuge in a garden belonging to 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah and Shaybah b. Rabī'ah, who were in it at the time.[186] Those of the rabble of Thaqīf who had followed him went back, and he went to the shade of a trellised vine and sat there while the two sons of Rabī'ah watched him, seeing what he had to endure from the rabble of Thaqīf.

[1201] I have been told that the Messenger of God met that woman from the Banū Jumaḥ[187] and said to her, "What have I had to endure from your husband's relatives?" I have been told that when he felt secure the Messenger of God said, "O God, I make complaint to You of the weakness of my power, the fewness of my expedients, and the contempt in which I am held by men. O most merciful of the merciful, You are the Lord of the oppressed, and You are my Lord. To whom will You entrust me? To a stranger who will regard me with displeasure or to an enemy to whom You have given power over me? If You are not angry with me, I do not care, but Your protection is wide enough for me. I take refuge in the light of Your countenance by which the darkness is illumi-

186. These were two Meccans of the clan of 'Abd Shams. Many wealthy Meccans had property in al-Ṭā'if because, being higher up in the mountains, it had a much better climate.

187. The wife of one of the leaders of Thaqīf with whom he had been speaking.

nated, and in which this world and the next are rightly ordered, refuge from the descent of Your anger upon me or the falling of Your wrath upon me. You shall have satisfaction from me until You are content. There is no might and no power except in You."

When the two sons of Rabī'ah, 'Utbah and Shaybah, saw what had happened to him, they were moved by pity for their kinsman[188] and, calling a Christian slave of theirs named 'Addās, they said to him, "Take a bunch of these grapes, put it in this dish, take it to that man, and tell him to eat of it." 'Addās did so, went up to him and put it before the Messenger of God. When he stretched out his hand he said, "In the name of God," and then ate. 'Addās looked him in the face and said, "By God, these words are not used by the people of this country." The Messenger of God said to him, "From what country do you come, 'Addās, and what is your religion?" He replied, "I am a Christian, from the people of Nineveh." The Messenger of God said, "From the town of the righteous man Jonah the son of Mattā?"[189] "How do you know about Jonah the son of Mattā?" he asked. The Messenger of God replied, "He is my brother. He was a prophet, and I am a prophet." 'Addās bent down before the Messenger of God, kissing his head, his hands, and his feet. The two sons of Rabī'ah said one to the other, "As far as your slave is concerned, Muḥammad has corrupted your slave for you." When 'Addās came back to them they said to him, "Woe betide you, 'Addās, what made you kiss that man's head, hands, and feet?" He replied, "Masters, there is no one better in the world than that man. He has told me something which none but a prophet knows." They said, "Woe betide you, 'Addās, do not let him turn you away from your religion. Your religion is better than his." [1202]

The Messenger of God Returns to Mecca

When the Messenger of God despaired of getting any positive response from Thaqīf, he left al-Ṭā'if to return to Mecca. When he was at Nakhlah, he rose in the middle of the night to pray, and, as God has told, a number of the jinn passed by. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq says that he was told that they were seven jinn from Naṣībīn of 188. As being all descendants of 'Abd Manāf.

189. In the Bible his father is called Amittai.

the Yemen.[190] They listened to him, and when he had completed his prayer they went back to their people to warn them, having believed and responded to what they had heard. God mentioned their story when he said:

> And when we inclined toward you certain of the jinn, who wished to hear the Qur'ān and, when they were in its presence, said: Give ear! and when it was finished, turned back to their people, warning. They said: O our people! We have heard a scripture which has been revealed after Moses, confirming that which was before it, guiding to the truth and a right road. O our people! respond to God's summoner and believe in him. He will forgive you some of your sins and guard you from a painful doom.[191]

God also said:

> Say: It is revealed to me that a company of the jinn gave ear, and they said: It is a marvellous Qur'ān.

[1203] Muḥammad (Ibn Isḥāq) says that he has heard that the names of the jinn who listened to the revelation were Ḥassā, Massā, Shāṣir, Nāṣir, Aynā al-Ard, Aynayn, and al-Aḥqam.[192]

Then the Messenger of God came back to Mecca, and found that its people were even more determined to oppose him and to abandon his religion, except for a few weak people who believed in him. Some say that when the Messenger of God left al-Ṭā'if for Mecca[193] a certain Meccan passed by, and the Messenger of God

---

190. This phrase seems incorrect, since the well-known Naṣībīn is on the border between eastern Syria and Turkey. Another version of the story reads "on their way from Naṣībīn to the Yemen" (see Leiden text, footnote).

191. 46:29-31. Ṭabarī gives only the beginning and the end of this passage, but it has been given in full to make the story more intelligible. The following verse is 72:1.

192. These names are not vocalized in the text and the forms given here are hypothetical; the fifth and sixth names are particularly dubious.

193. This story implies (though there is no explicit statement) that following the death of Abū Ṭālib, Muḥammad had been deprived of the protection of his own clan of Hāshim by the new chief Abū Lahab. For this reason he had to obtain the protection of another clan before he could return to Mecca in safety. Al-Akhnas b. Sharīq, though technically a confederate from al-Ṭā'if, appears to have been the leading man of the Meccan clan of Zuhrah. Suhayl b. 'Amr was chief of the clan of 'Āmir. When he speaks of Banū Ka'b he means all the main clans of Quraysh except his own and al-Ḥārith b. Fihr (see table in the Introduction, p.xxx). Al-Muṭ'im said, "Will you deliver a message which I entrust to you?" He agreed, and he said, "Go to al-Akhnas b. Sharīq and say to him, 'Muḥammad asks you if you will give him protection so that he can deliver the message of his Lord.' The man went to him and delivered the message, and al-Akhnas replied, "The confederate does not give protection against the men of pure blood." He went back to the Prophet and gave him this reply. Muḥammad then asked him if he would go back again, and when he indicated that he would, said, "Go to Suhayl b. 'Amr and say to him, 'Muḥammad asks you if you will give him protection so that he can deliver the message of his Lord.' " He went to him and delivered the message, and he replied, "The Banū 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy do not give protection against the Banū Ka'b." The man went back to the Prophet and gave him this reply. Muḥammad asked him if he would go back yet again, and when he indicated that he would, he said, "Go to al-Muṭ'im b. 'Adī and say to him, 'Muḥammad asks if you will give him protection so that he can deliver the message of his Lord.' " Al-Muṭ'im replied, "Yes, let him enter."

The man went back and told him this, and the next morning al-Muṭ'im b. 'Adī, his sons, and his brother's sons appeared wearing their weapons and entered the mosque. When Abū Jahl saw him, he said, "Are you offering protection to someone or following a call to arms?" "I am offering protection," he said. Abū Jahl replied, "We shall protect whomever you protect." The Prophet entered Mecca and remained there. One day he went into the sacred mosque while the polytheists were by the Ka'bah. When Abū Jahl saw him he said, "This is your prophet, Banū 'Abd Manāf."[194] [1204] To this 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah said, "Is there anything wrong with there being a prophet or a king from among us?" The Prophet was told of this or heard it, and he went to them and said, "As for you, 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah, by God, you were not angered on behalf of God or

b. 'Adī was head of the clan of Nawfal, and had been one of those instrumental in ending the boycott. In his translation, Guillaume regards the whole story as derived by Ṭabarī from Ibn Isḥāq, but in this he appears to be mistaken. The introductory words "some say..." (dhakara ba'ḍuhum) indicate a different unspecified source. It is unlikely, too, that Ibn Hishām would have omitted the story at this point (Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 281), if it had been present in Ibn Isḥāq, since he gives the gist of it in his own additional note at an earlier point (Ibid., 251).

194. The designation Banū 'Abd Manāf includes the clans of 'Abd Shams and Nawfal as well as Hāshim and al-Muṭṭalib. Pride in his ancestry makes 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah (of 'Abd Shams) defend Banū 'Abd Manāf against the taunt of Abū Jahl.

his Prophet, but were angered on behalf of your own pride; and as for you, Abū Jahl b. Hishām, by God, not long will pass before you laugh little and weep much; and as for you, council (mala') of Quraysh, by God, not long will pass before you will enter unwillingly into that which you dislike."

The Messenger of God Preaches to the Arab Tribes

The Messenger of God used to appear at the times of pilgrimage before the Arab tribes, summoning them to God, informing them that he himself was a prophet sent by God, and asking them to believe his words and defend him so that he might make manifest the message from God he had been sent to convey.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ḥusayn b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbbās:[195] I heard Rabīʿah b. ʿAbbād telling my father: "I was in Minā with my father when I was a young man while the Messenger of God was stopping at the encampments of the Arab tribes and saying, Banū so-and-so, I am God's Messenger to you, commanding you to worship God and not to associate anything with Him, to cast off whatever idols you worship other than Him, to believe in me, and the truth of my message, and to defend me so that I may make manifest the message of God I have been sent to convey".

Behind him was a freshly washed man with a squint, with two locks of hair, wearing an ʿAdanī robe. When the Messenger of God had completed his speech and his appeal, the man would say, "Banū so-and-so, this man is calling upon you to cast off al-Lāt and [1205] al-ʿUzzā from your necks, both you and your confederates from the jinn of the Banū Mālik b. Uqaysh, and to accept the heresy and the error which he has brought; so do not obey him and do not listen to him." I said to my father, "Father, who is that man who is following Muḥammad and contradicting what he says?" He answered, "That is his uncle, ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā Abū Lahab b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Muslim b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī: The Messenger of God went to the Kindah—among whom was one of their chiefs called Mulayh—in their encampments, and summoned them to God and offered himself to them, but they refused him.

195. From here to p. 1224 Ṭabarī follows Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 282–301, with some omissions.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥuṣayn: He went to a clan of Kalb called the Banū ʿAbdallāh in their encampments, summoned them to God and offered himself to them, and finally said, "Banū ʿAbdallāh, God has given your ancestor an excellent name." However, they did not accept what he offered them.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—one of his companions—ʿAbdallāh b. Kaʿb b. Mālik: The Messenger of God went to the Banū Ḥanīfah in their encampments, summoned them to God and offered himself to them, but not one of the Arabs gave him an uglier answer than they.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq and Muḥammad b. Muslim b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī: He went to the Banū ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah, called them to God and offered himself to them. One of them called Bayḥarah b. Firās said, "By God, if I could take [1206] this young man from Quraysh I could conquer all the Arabs with him." Then he said, "Do you think that if we follow you and God gives you victory over your opponents we shall have the command after you?" He replied, "Command belongs to God, who places it where He wills." Bayḥarah said, "Are we to expose our throats to the Arabs in your defense, and when you are victorious the command will go to someone else? We do not need your religion." So they refused him. When the pilgrims dispersed, the Banū ʿĀmir (b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah) went back to one of their shaykhs who was so old that he was unable to participate in the pilgrimage with them. On returning to him they would tell him what had happened during the pilgrimage. In this particular year he asked them on their return what had happened during the pilgrimage, and they said, "A young man from the Quraysh, one of the Banū ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, who claimed that he was a prophet, came to us and called upon us to defend him, stand with him, and bring him back with us to our country." The old man put his hand to his head and said, "Banū ʿĀmir, is there any way we can put this right? Can we regain our lost opportunity? By him in whose hand my soul rests, no descendant of Ishmael has ever falsified this. It is indeed the truth! What happened to your ability to judge him?"

The Messenger of God continued in this manner. Whenever people gathered for the pilgrimage, he would go to them, summon the tribes to God and to Islam, and offer them himself together with the right guidance and mercy which he had brought to them [1207] from God. Whenever he heard of an arrival who had name and nobility among the Arabs, he would give special attention to him, summon him to God, and offer him his message.

The First Madīnans Said to Have Accepted Islam

Ibn Ḥumayd—ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. Qatādah al-Ẓafarī—some shaykhs of his people: Suwayd b. Ṣāmit the brother of the Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf came to Mecca on the pilgrimage or the ʿumrah. [196] Among themselves Suwayd's people called him al-Kāmil (the perfect one) on account of his steadfastness, his poetry, his descent, and his nobility. He is the author of the following lines:

Many a man is there whom you call a friend, but if you knew what he says behind your back, his slanders would grieve you.
His words are like fat when he is in your presence, but when you are absent they are a sword pointed at the base of your throat.
His outward appearance delights you, but beneath his skin is false slander which cuts through the sinews of your back.
His eyes show you what he is concealing for there is no concealing hatred and the malignant glance.
[1208] Aid me with good deeds, for you have been weakening me for too long;
the best friends are those who aid without weakening.

He also composed many other poems.

196. The ʿumrah or "lesser pilgrimage" consisted of those rites of the full pilgrimage (ḥajj) which took place in Mecca itself, and it could be performed at any time of the year. Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf was an important clan of the tribe of al-Aws in al-Madīnah. The phrase "brother of (a clan)" is common in al-Madīnah and seems to be equivalent to "member of" the clan; it is perhaps to be explained by the persistence in al-Madīnah of matrilineal kinship; see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 378–85, etc.

When the Messenger of God heard of his arrival, he was attentive to him and summoned him to God and to Islam. Suwayd said to him, "Perhaps what is with you is like what is with me." The Messenger of God asked, "What is with you?" "The book of Luqmān," he replied, meaning the wisdom of Luqmān.[197] The Messenger of God said, "Expound it to me." He expounded it to him, and he said, "This speech is good, but I have a speech better than this, a Qur'ān which God has revealed to me, guidance and light." Then the Messenger of God recited the Qur'ān to him and summoned him to Islam. He was close to accepting, and said, "This is indeed an excellent saying." He left him and went back to al-Madīnah, and soon afterwards was killed by the Khazraj. His clan used to say that he was a Muslim when he was killed; his death took place before (the battle of) Bu'āth.[198]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Ḥusayn b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Amr b. Sa'd b. Mu'ādh, brother of the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal—Maḥmūd b. Labīd, brother of the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal: When Abū al-Ḥaysar Anas b. Rāfi' came to Mecca accompanied by some young men of the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal,[199] including Iyās b. Mu'ādh, seeking an alliance with the Quraysh against their fellow citizens from the Khazraj, the Messenger of God heard of their arrival, came to them and sat down with them. He said to them, "Would you like something better than what you have come for?" "What is that?" they asked. He said, "I am the Messenger of God whom He has sent to His servants that I may call them to God, so that they may worship God and not associate anything with Him. He has revealed the Book to me." Then he told them about Islam and recited the Qur'ān to them. Iyās [1209]
b. Mu'ādh, who was a young lad, said, "My people, by God, this is better than what we came for." Abū al-Ḥaysar Anas b. Rāfi' took up a handful of dust from the valley, threw it in the face of Iyās b.

197. Luqmān was a legendary wise man of Arab tradition, also mentioned in the Qur'ān, Sūrah 31.

198. The battle of Bu'āth between two factions of the inhabitants of al-Madīnah, and involving nearly all of them, occurred about the year a.d. 617; see EI^{2}, s.v. Bu'āth. The story illustrates the rivalry between clans and tribes to claim priority in the acceptance of Islam.

199. Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal was another important clan of the tribe of al-Aws. The story has been handed down in the clan as a claim to have had one of the first Muslims in al-Madīnah.

Mu'ādh, and said, "Enough of that. By my life, we did not come here for this." Iyās remained silent, the Messenger of God rose up to leave them, and they went back to al-Madīnah, where the battle of Bu'āth took place between the Aws and the Khazraj. Iyās b. Mu'ādh died soon afterwards.

Maḥmūd b. Labīd: Those of my clan who were with him when he died told me that they heard him saying continually until he died, "There is no deity but God," "God is very great," "Praise be to God," "Glory be to God." They had no doubt that he died a Muslim, having embraced Islam at that meeting when he heard the Messenger of God saying what he said.

The First Deputation from al-Madīnah

When God wished to make His religion victorious, to render His Prophet mighty, and to fulfil His promise to him, the Messenger of God went out during that pilgrimage in which he met the group of the Anṣār,[200] and appeared before the Arab tribes as he had been doing in every pilgrimage season. While he was at al-'Aqabah, he met a party of the Khazraj to whom God wished good.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah—some shaykhs of his tribe: When the Messenger of God met them he said to them, "Who are you?" They said, "We are a group of the Khazraj." "Mawlās[201] of the Jews?" he asked. "Yes," they said. "Will you not sit down so that I may speak to you?" he asked. "Certainly," they said. So they sat down with him, and he summoned them to God, expounded Islam to them, and recited the Qur'ān to them.

One of the things which God had done for them in order to pre-[1210] pare them for Islam was that the Jews lived with them in their land. The Jews were people of scripture and knowledge, while the Khazraj were polytheists and idolaters. They had gained the mastery over the Jews in their land, and whenever any dispute arose

200. The Anṣār ("helpers") are the Muslims of al-Madīnah as a whole, but the name, given in honor for their support of Muḥammad, was not conferred until after this date.

201. Mawālī is the plural of mawlā, which can mean either "client" or "patron"; the latter would be more appropriate here, since most of the Arab clans of al-Madīnah were now politically stronger than the Jewish groups allied with them, as is indicated below.

among them the Jews would say to them, "A prophet will be sent soon. His time is at hand. We shall follow him, and with him as our leader we shall kill you as ʿĀd and Iram[202] were killed." When the Messenger of God spoke to this group of people and called them to God, they said to one another, "Take note! This, by God, is the prophet with whom the Jews are menacing you. Do not let them be before you in accepting him." They responded to his call, believed in the truth of his message, and accepted the Islam which he expounded to them, saying, "We have left our people behind us, and no people is as divided by enmity and malice as they are. Perhaps God will reunite them by means of you;[203] we shall go to them, summon them to your proposals, and expound to them this religion which we have accepted from you. If God reunites them in it, there will be no man mightier than you."

Then they left the Messenger of God to go back to their country, believing and accepting the truth of his message. I have been told that they were six men of the Khazraj; from the Banū al-Najjār, who are Taym Allāh, in particular from the Banū Mālik b. al-Najjār b. Thaʿlabah b. ʿAmr b. al-Khazraj b. Ḥārithah b. Thaʿlabah b. ʿAmr b. ʿĀmir: Asʿad b. Zurārah b. ʿUdas b. ʿUbayd b. Thaʿlabah b. Ghanm b. Mālik b. al-Najjār, who is Abū Umāmah, and ʿAwf b. al-Ḥārith b. Rifāʿah b. Sawād b. Mālik b. Ghanm b. Mālik b. al-Najjār, who is Ibn ʿAfrāʾ; from the Banū Zurayq b. ʿĀmir b. ʿAbd [1211]
Ḥārithah b. Mālik b. Ghaḍb b. Jusham b. al-Khazraj b. Ḥārithah b. Thaʿlabah b. ʿAmr b. ʿAmr b. ʿĀmir: Rāfiʿ b. Mālik b. al-ʿAjlān b. ʿAmr b. ʿĀmir b. Zurayq; from the Banū Salimah b. Saʿd b. ʿAlī b. Asad b. Sāridah b. Tazīd b. Jusham b. al-Khazraj b. Ḥārithah b. Thaʿlabah b. ʿAmr b. Āmir, in particular from the Banū Sawād: Qutbah b. ʿĀmir b. Ḥadīdah b. ʿAmr b. Sawād b. Ghanm b. Kaʿb b. Salimah; from the (subclan) Banū Ḥarām b. Kaʿb b. Ghanm b. Kaʿb b. Salimah: ʿUqbah b. ʿĀmir b. Nābī b. Zayd b. Ḥarām; and from the (subclan) Banū ʿUbayd b. ʿAdī b. Ghanm b. Kaʿb b. Salimah: Jābir b. ʿAbdallāh b. Riʾāb b. al-Nuʿmān b. Sinān b. ʿUbayd.

When they went back to their people in al-Madīnah, they told them about the Messenger of God and summoned them to Islam, 202. Two Arab tribes mentioned in the Qurʾān, but extinct by this time.

203. The hope of overcoming the divisions in al-Madīnah which had reached a climax in the battle of Buʿāth (n. 176), was an important motive for the acceptance of Islam there.

so that it spread among them, and there was not a single dwelling among the dwellings of the Anṣār in which the Messenger of God was not spoken of.

The First Pledge of al-ʿAqabah

The following year, twelve of the Anṣār came on the pilgrimage and met the Messenger of God at al-ʿAqabah, this being the first al-ʿAqabah, and took an oath of allegiance to him according to the terms of the "pledge of women."[204] This was before the duty of making war was laid upon them.

[1212] They were; from the Banū al-Najjār: Asʿad b. Zurārah b. ʿUdas b. ʿUbayd b. Thaʿlabah b. Ghanm b. Mālik b. al-Najjār, who is Abū Umāmah, ʿAwf and Muʿādh, sons of al-Ḥārith b. Rifāʿah b. Sawād b. Mālik b. Ghanm b. Mālik b. al-Najjār, who are the sons of ʿAfrāʾ; from the Banū Zurayq b. ʿĀmir: Rāfiʿ b. Mālik b. al-ʿAjlān b. ʿAmr b. ʿĀmir b. Zurayq and Dhakwān b. ʿAbd Qays b. Khaldah b. Mukhallad b. ʿĀmir b. Zurayq; from the Banū ʿAwf b. al-Khazraj: from the (subclan) Banū Ghanm b. ʿAwf, who are al-Qawāqil, ʿUbādah b. al-Ṣāmit b. Qays b. Aṣram b. Fihr b. Thaʿlabah b. Ghanm b. ʿAwf b. al-Khazraj and Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, who is Yazīd b. Thaʿlabah b. Khazmah b. Aṣram b. ʿAmr b. ʿAmmārah, one of the Banū Ghudaynah of the tribe of Balī, a confederate of theirs; from the Banū Sālim b. ʿAwf b. ʿAmr b. ʿAwf b. al-Khazraj: ʿAbbās b. ʿUbādah b. Naḍlah b. Mālik b. al-ʿAjlān b. Zayd b. Ghanm b. Sālim b. ʿAwf; from the Banū Salimah, from the (subclan) Banū Ḥarām: ʿUqbah b. ʿĀmir b. Nābī b. Zayd b. Ḥarām b.
[1213] Kaʿb b. Ghanm b. Kaʿb b. Salimah; from the (subclan) Banū Sawād, Quṭbah b. ʿĀmir b. Ḥadīdah b. ʿAmr b. Sawād b. Ghanm b. Kaʿb b. Salimah. From (the tribe of) al-Aws b. Ḥārithah b. Thaʿlabah b. ʿAmr b. ʿĀmir, from the clan of the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal, there was present Abū al-Haytham b. al-Tayyihān, whose name is Mālik, a confederate of theirs, and from (the clan of) the Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf: ʿUwaym b. Sāʿidah b. Ṣalʿajah, a confederate of theirs.

---

204. This was a pledge to accept and practice the religion of Islam, but without any undertaking to protect Muḥammad. It is called "the pledge of women" because in Sūrah 60:12 Muḥammad is told to require something like this from believing women wanting to become Muslims. A modified version of the Qurʾānic requirements is given below on p.1213.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb—Marthad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Yazanī–Abū ʿAbdallāh ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUsaylah al-Ṣunājī—ʿUbādah b. al-Ṣāmit: I was among those who were present at the first al-ʿAqabah. There were twelve of us, and we took an oath of allegiance to him according to the terms of the "pledge of women," this being before the duty of making war was laid upon us. The terms were that we should not associate anything with God, should not steal, should not commit adultery, should not kill our children, should not produce any lie we have devised between our hands and feet, and should not disobey him in what was proper. If we fulfilled this, we should have paradise, and if we committed any of these sins, we should be punished with the prescribed penalties in this world, which would be an expiation for them, while if we concealed them to the Day of Resurrection, then the matter was in God's hands; if He wished, He would punish us, and if He wished He would forgive us.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Ibn Shihāb—ʿĀʾidh Allāh b. ʿAbdallāh Abū Idrīs al-Khawlānī—ʿUbādah b. al-Ṣāmit—the Prophet: A similar account.

Islam Begins to Spread in al-Madīnah

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When they left the Messenger of God he sent with them Muṣʿab b. ʿUmayr b. Hāshim b. ʿAbd Manāf b. ʿAbd al-Dār b. Quṣayy, commanding him to teach them to recite the Qurʾān, to teach them Islam, and to instruct them in their religion. In al-Madīnah Muṣʿab was called "al-Muqriʾ" (the Qurʾān reciter) and lodged with Asʿad b. Zurārah b. ʿUdas Abū Umāmah. [1214]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Mughīrah b. Muʿayqīb and ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm: Asʿad b. Zurārah went out with Muṣʿab b. ʿUmayr to take him to the dwellings of the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal and the Banū Ẓafar. Saʿd b. Muʿādh b. al-Nuʿmān b. Imruʾ al-Qays was the son of Asʿad b. Zurārah's maternal aunt. Asʿad took Muṣʿab into one of the gardens of the Banū Ẓafar by a well called Biʾr Marq, and the two sat down there, while some of those who had become Muslims gathered around them. Saʿd b. Muʿādh and Usayd b. Ḥuḍayr were at that time the two chiefs of their clan, the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal, and both of them were polytheists according to the religion of their people. When they heard of the arrival of Asʿad and Muṣʿab, Saʿd b. Muʿādh said to Usayd b. Ḥuḍayr, "My excellent friend, go to those two men who have come to our quarter to make fools of our weaker members, drive them off, and forbid them to return to our quarter. If it were not that, as you know, Asʿad b. Zurārah is related to me, I would do it for you, but he is my maternal aunt's son, and I cannot tackle him in any way."

Usayd b. Ḥuḍayr took his javelin and went up to them. When Asʿad b. Zurārah saw him he said to Muṣʿab, "This is the chief of his clan who has come to you, so be true to God in dealing with him." Muṣʿab answered, "If he sits down I will speak to him." Usayd stood by them with a grim expression on his face and said, [1215] "Why have you come to us to make fools of our weaker members? Depart from us, if you set any value on your lives." Muṣʿab said to him, "Why do you not sit down and listen? If you like anything which we say, you can accept it, and if not, then what you dislike will have been removed from you." Usayd replied, "You have spoken fairly," planted his javelin in the ground and sat down with them. Muṣʿab spoke to him of Islam and recited the Qurʾān to him. It is reported that the two (Muṣʿab and Asʿad) said of this, "By God, we recognized Islam in (Usayd's) face, in its radiance and easiness, before he spoke." Then (Usayd) said, "How fair and beautiful is this. What do you do when you wish to enter this religion?" The two (Asʿad and Muṣʿab) replied, "Wash, purify yourself, pronounce the shahādah of Truth and then pray two rakʿahs."[205]

Usayd rose up, washed himself, purified himself, pronounced the shahādah of truth, and then rose and performed two rakʿahs. After this he said, "I have come from a man not one of whose clan, if he were to follow you, would lag behind him. I shall send him to you now. His name is Saʿd b. Muʿādh." He took his javelin and went to Saʿd and his people, who were sitting in their assembly. When Saʿd b. Muʿādh saw him coming he said, "I swear, by God, that Usayd b. Ḥuḍayr is coming back to you with a different face from that with which he left you." When Usayd stood by the assembly, Sa'd said to him, "What did you do?" He answered, "I spoke to the two men, and I did not find any harm in them. I forbade them to come here, and they said, 'We will do what you wish.' However I have been told that the Banū Ḥārithah[206] have come out against As'ad b. Zurārah in order to kill him; they want to show that you cannot protect your kin, for they know that he is your maternal aunt's son."

205. The shahādah is the "witnessing" that "there is no deity but God, Muḥammad is the Messenger of God." A rakʿah is a cycle of actions and words constituting part of the prayer or formal worship (ṣalāt). Each ṣalāt has two, three, or four rakʿahs, according to the time of day, as well as an introduction and a conclusion.

Sa'd rose in anger and in haste, being alarmed by what Usayd had told him about the Banū Ḥārithah. He took the javelin from Usayd's hand, saying, "By God, I think that you are useless," and went up to As'ad and Muṣ'ab. When he saw that they were at ease, he realized that Usayd had only wanted him to listen to them. He [1216] stood by them with a grim expression on his face, and then said to As'ad b. Zurārah, "Abū Umāmah, if we were not related, you would not seek to do this to me, coming to us in our dwellings with a message which we do not want." As'ad had said to Muṣ'ab, "By God, Muṣ'ab, there has come to you the acknowledged chief of his clan, no two of whom will oppose you if he follows you." Accordingly, Muṣ'ab said to Sa'd, "Will you not sit and listen? If you are pleased with anything or desire it, you can accept it, and if you do not like it we shall take away from you that which you dislike." Sa'd replied, "You have spoken justly," stuck the javelin into the ground and sat down. Then Muṣ'ab expounded Islam to him and recited the Qur'ān to him. The two (Muṣ'ab and As'ad) said of this, "We recognized Islam in (Sa'd's) face, in its radiance and easiness, before he spoke of it." Then Sa'd said, "What do you do when you accept Islam and enter into this religion?" They said to him, "Wash, purify yourself, pronounce the shahādah of truth and pray two rak'ahs."

He rose up, washed himself, purified himself, pronounced the shahādah of truth and prayed two rak'ahs. Then he took his javelin and headed for his people's assembly accompanied by Usayd b. Ḥuḍayr. When his people saw him coming, they said to one another, "We swear, by God, that Sa'd is coming back to you with a different face from that with which he left you." When Sa'd stood by them he said, "Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal, what do you recognize my position to be amongst you?" They replied, "You are our chief, the best of us in judgement and the most blessed of us in spirit." Then he said, "It is forbidden to me to speak to any man or woman of you until you believe in God and in His Messenger."

206. A clan whose ancestor Ḥārithah was reckoned to be a brother of 'Abd al-Ashhal.

By that evening there was not a man or woman in the dwellings of the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal who had not accepted Islam. Asʿad and Muṣʿab went back to Asʿad b. Zurārah's house, and Muṣʿab remained with him calling people to Islam until there was not a dwelling place among the dwellings of the Anṣār in which [1217] there were not Muslim men and women, except for those in the dwellings of the Banū Umayyah b. Zayd, Khaṭmah, Wāʾil, and Wāqif; these were the group Aws Allāh, of (the tribe of al-Aws b. Ḥārithah.[207] The reason for this was that Abū Qays b. al-Aslat, whose name was Ṣayfī, was among them. He was their poet and their leader, whom they used to heed and obey. He caused them to hold back from Islam, and continued in this course until the Messenger of God had emigrated to al-Madinah and the battles of the first Badr, Uḥud, and the Trench had taken place.

The Second Pledge of al-ʿAqabah

After this Muṣʿab b. ʿUmayr went back to Mecca. Some of the Muslim Anṣār went on the pilgrimage together with polytheist pilgrims from their people, and when they came to Mecca they agreed to meet the Messenger of God at al-ʿAqabah in the middle of the days of al-tashrīq.[208] Thus God wished to honor them, to aid his Prophet, to make Islam and its followers mighty, and to humble polytheism and its followers.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Maʿbad b. Kaʿb b. Mālik b. Abī Kaʿb b. al-Qayn, brother of the Banū Salimah—his brother ʿAbdallāh b. Kaʿb, who was one of the most learned men of 207. The four small clans Umayyah b. Zayd, Khaṭmah, Wāʾil, and Wāqif were collectively known as Aws Allāh, originally Aws Manāt. They were a small section of the tribe of al-Aws, but of little political importance and perhaps to some extent dependent on Jewish clans. This last point may explain why they did not at first become Muslims.

208. The three days of tashrīq are the eleventh to the thirteenth of the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, following on the day of sacrifice on the tenth. The pilgrims have to spend these days at Minā and are not to fast. The original meaning of tashrīq is uncertain.

the Anṣār—his father Ka'b b. Mālik, who was one of those present at al-'Aqabah and swore the oath of allegiance to the Messenger of God there We set out among the pilgrims of our tribe, having prayed and become instructed in our religion. With us was al-Barā' b. Ma'rūr, our chief and our oldest member. When we set off on our journey and left al-Madīnah al-Barā' said to us, "By God, I have made a decision, and I do not know whether you will agree with me in it or not." We said, "What is that?" and he said, "I have decided that I shall not turn my back on this building (meaning [1218] the Ka'bah) and that I shall pray toward it." We said, "By God, we have not heard that our Prophet prays in any other direction than toward Syria, and we do not wish to differ from him.[209] He answered, "I shall pray toward the Ka'bah." "We shall not do so," we said.

When the time for prayer came, we prayed toward Syria and he prayed toward the Ka'bah. This continued until we came to Mecca. We reproached him for what he was doing, but he insisted upon continuing the practice. When we came to Mecca he said to me, "Nephew, let us go to the Messenger of God so that I can ask him about what I have done during my journey, for I became concerned about it when I saw how you opposed me over it." We went to ask for the Messenger of God, as we did not know him and had not seen him before. We met a man from Mecca and asked him about the Messenger of God. "Do you know him?" he asked. "No," we said. "Do you know al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, his uncle?" he asked. We said that we did, as we knew al-'Abbās, who came frequently to us on business. He said, "When you go into the mosque, he is the man sitting with al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib."

We went into the mosque, and there was al-'Abbās sitting down, with the Messenger of God sitting with him. We greeted him, and then sat down with him. The Messenger of God said to al-'Abbās, "Do you know these two men, Abū al-Faḍl?" "Yes," he said. "This is al-Barā' b. Ma'rūr, the chief of his people (that is, the clan of Salimah) and this is Ka'b b. Mālik." By God, I shall never forget how the Messenger of God asked, "The poet?" to which al-'Abbās replied, "Yes."

209. Facing towards Syria means, of course, facing towards Jerusalem as the Jews did. The final change of qiblah (direction faced in prayer), from Jerusalem to Mecca occurred about February A.D. 624.

Al-Barā' b. Ma'rūr said to him, "O Prophet of God, I set out on my journey, having been guided by God to Islam, and I decided that I would not turn my back on this building, and so I prayed [1219] toward it. My companions opposed me in this, and I became concerned about it. What is your opinion, O Messenger of God?" The Messenger of God replied, "You would indeed have had a qiblah, had you kept to it patiently."[210] Then al-Barā' returned to the Messenger of God's qiblah and prayed with us toward Syria. His family assert that he prayed toward the Ka'bah until he died, but it is not as they say. We know more about the matter than they do.

Then we went on the pilgrimage, and agreed to meet the Messenger of God at al-'Aqabah in the middle of the days of al-tashrīq. When we had finished (the rites of) the pilgrimage, the night came upon which we had promised to meet the Messenger of God. We had with us 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. Ḥarām Abū Jābir. We had concealed our purpose from the polytheists among our people who were with us, but we told him about this meeting and spoke to him as follows: "Abū Jābir, you are one of our chiefs and one of our nobles, and we do not wish you to remain in your present state, which is that you will be fuel for the flames of Hell on the morrow." Then we summoned him to Islam, and informed him of the Messenger of God's arrangement to meet us at al-'Aqabah. He accepted Islam and was present at al-'Aqabah with us, and became a naqīb.[211]

We spent that night encamped with our people, but when a third of the night had gone by we left our encampment to meet the Messenger of God. We slipped away secretly, moving as silently as sand grouse, and met in the ravine by al-'Aqabah. We were seventy men and two women, Nusaybah bt. Ka'b Umm 'Umārah, a woman of the Banū Māzin b. al-Najjār, and Asmā' bt. 'Amr b. 'Adī, a woman of the Banū Salimah, who was Umm Manī'. We gathered in the ravine to wait for the Messenger of God. He came to us ac-[1220] companied by his paternal uncle al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, who at that time still adhered to the religion of his people, but wished to be present when his nephew was negotiating and to

210. The meaning of this reply is ambiguous.

211. Muḥammad asked that each clan which had accepted Islam should appoint a "representative" (naqīb), presumably to form a council of some sort, but there is no record of them ever functioning as such (see below p.1221).

see that there was a firm agreement. When he had sat down, al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was the first to speak, and said, "People of the Khazraj (the Arabs used to call the Anṣar, the Khazraj and the Aws together, by the name of the Khazraj), you know what Muḥammad's position is among us. We have protected him against those of our people who have the same religious views as ourselves. He is held in honor by his own people and is safe in his country. He is determined to leave them and to join you, so if you think that you can fulfil the promises which you made in inviting him to come to you and can defend him against his enemies, then assume the responsibilities which you have taken upon yourselves. But if you think that you will abandon him and hand him over after he has come to you, then leave him alone now, for he is honored by his people and is safe in his country."

We said to him, "We have heard what you have said. Speak, Messenger of God, and choose what you want for yourself and your Lord." The Messenger of God spoke, recited the Qur'ān, summoned us to God, and made us desirous of Islam. Then he said, "I will enter a contract of allegiance with you, provided that you protect me as you would your wives and children."

Then al-Barā' b. Maʿrūr took his hand and said, "By Him who sent you with the truth, we shall defend you as we would our womenfolk. Administer the oath of allegiance to us, O Messenger of God, for we are men of war and men of coats of mail; we have inherited this from generation to generation."

He was interrupted as he was speaking to the Messenger of God by Abū al-Haytham b. al-Tayyihān, the confederate of the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal, who said, "O Messenger of God, there are ties between us and other people which we shall have to sever (meaning the Jews). If we do this and God gives you victory, will you perhaps return to your own people and leave us?" The Messenger of God smiled and then said, "Rather, blood is blood, and blood shed [1221] without retaliation is blood shed without retaliation. You are of me and I am of you. I shall fight whomever you fight and make peace with whomever you make peace with." Then he said, "Appoint twelve representatives (naqīb) from among you for me, who will see to their people's affairs." They appointed twelve representatives, nine from the Khazraj and three from the Aws.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b.

Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm: the Messenger of God said to the representatives, "You are to see to your people's affairs; you are a surety for them, as the disciples were for Jesus, son of Mary, and I am for my people." They agreed to this.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. Qatādah: When they gathered to take the oath of allegiance to the Messenger of God, al-ʿAbbās b. ʿUbādah b. Naḍlah al-Anṣāri, the brother of the Banū Sālim b. ʿAwf, said, "People of the Khazraj, do you know what you are pledging yourselves to in swearing allegiance to this man?" "Yes," they said. He continued, "In swearing allegiance to him you are pledging yourselves to wage war against all mankind. If you think that when your wealth is exhausted by misfortune and your nobles are depleted by death you will give him up, then stop now, for, by God, it is disgrace in this world and the next if you later give him up. But if you think that you will be faithful to the promises which you made in inviting him, even if your wealth is exhausted and your nobles killed, then take him, for, by God, he is the best thing for you in this world and the next." They answered, "We shall take him even if it brings the loss of our wealth and the killing of our nobles. What shall we gain for this, O Messenger of God, if we are faithful?" He answered, "Par-[1222] adise." "Stretch out your hand," they said. He stretched out his hand, and they swore alleginace to him. According to ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. Qatādah, al-ʿAbbās (b. ʿUbādah) only said this in order to make the contract more binding upon them, while according to ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr he only said it in order to delay them that night in the hope that ʿAbdallāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl[212] would come, which would give more weight to the people's decision; but God knows best which version is true. The Banū al-Najjār claim that Abū Umāmah Asʿad b. Zurārah was the first to clasp hands, while the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal say that on the contrary it was Abū al-Haytham b. al-Tayyihān.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad (b. Isḥāq)—Maʿbad b. Kaʿb b. Mālik; and also Saʿīd b. Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd—his father—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Maʿbad b. Kaʿb—his father Kaʿb b. Mālik:

212. This is the man who a year or two later became the leader of the Hypocrites (munāfiqūn), that is, those men of al-Madīnah who had accepted Islam but were not happy to have Muḥammad as their leader. It is said that before Muḥammad's arrival ʿAbdallāh b. Ubayy had hoped to become ruler of al-Madīnah.

The first to clasp the hand of the Messenger of God was al-Barā' b. Ma'rūr, and after this they clasped his hand one after another. When we had all sworn the oath of allegiance to the Messenger of God Satan shouted from the top of al-'Aqabah in the most piercing voice I have ever heard, "people of the stations[213] of Minā, do you want a blameworthy person and the apostates with him[214] who have gathered together to wage war on you?" The Messenger of [1223] God said, "What does the Enemy of God say? This is the (devil) Azabb of al-'Aqabah, the son of the devil Azyab.[215] Listen, Enemy of God. By God, I shall deal with you!"

The Messenger of God told them to disperse to their encampments, and al-'Abbās b. 'Ubādah b. Naḍlah said to him, "By Him who sent you with the truth, if you wish we shall fall upon the people of Minā with our swords tomorrow." The Messenger of God replied, "We have not been commanded to do this; go back to your encampments."

We went back to our beds and slept upon them until the morning, when the chief men of Quraysh came to us in our encampments and said to us, "Men of the Khazraj, we have heard that you have come to this companion of ours to take him from our midst and to swear an oath of allegiance to him to wage war against us. By God, there is not tribe of the Arabs between whom and ourselves we should be more unwilling for war to break out than you." Those of the polytheists of our people who were there immediately swore to them by God that nothing of the sort had taken place and that they knew nothing about it. They were telling the truth, for they did not know.

We looked at one another, and the men of Quraysh rose up, among them al-Ḥārith b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī, who was wearing a pair of new sandals. I (Ka'b b. Mālik) spoke a few words as though I wished to associate all of our people with what our polytheists had said; "Abū Jābir,[216] can you not get sandals like those of this young man of Quraysh (that is al-

213. The place where the stomachs (jabājib) of the sacrificial victims were scattered.

214. "Blameworthy" (mudhammam) is an insulting way of referring to Muḥammad, whose name can mean "praiseworthy." The ṣubāt (plural of ṣābi') are people who have changed their religion.

215. Nothing further is known about this matter.

216. This is 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr of the subclan Ḥarām of the clan of Salimah.

Ḥārith), seeing that you are one of our chiefs?" Al-Ḥārith heard these words, took the sandals off his feet, and threw them at me, [1224] saying, "By God, put them on your feet!" Abū Jābir said, "Gently! By God, you have annoyed the young man! Give him back his sandals." I replied, "By God, I will not! It is a good omen. If the omen proves true I shall plunder him." This is Ka'b b. Mālik's account of al-'Aqabah and what he witnessed there.

Abū Ja'far (al-Tabarī): Other authorities than Ibn Isḥāq say that those of the Anṣār who came to swear allegiance to the Prophet came in (the month of) Dhū al-Ḥijjah. After this the Messenger of God remained in Mecca for the rest of that Dhū al-Ḥijjah and for the months of Muḥarram and Ṣafar, and emigrated to al-Madīnah in the month of Rabī' I (July-September 622) arriving there on Monday, the twelfth of that month (24 September).

'Alī b. Naṣr b. 'Alī and 'Abd al-Wārith b. 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-Wārith—'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-Wārith—his father—Abān al-'Attār—Hishām b. 'Urwah—'Urwah: When those who had emigrated to Abyssinia before the Messenger of God's emigration to al-Madinah came back from there, the number of Muslims began to increase and multiply. Many of the Anṣār in al-Madinah accepted Islam, which spread widely there, and the people of al-Madinah began to come to the Messenger of God in Mecca. When the Quraysh saw this, they urged one another to torment the Muslims and treat them harshly. They seized them and were eager to torment them, and the Muslims suffered great hardship. This was the second trial; there were two trials, one which forced out those of them who emigrated to Abyssinia, when the Messenger of God commanded them to do so and gave them permission to go there, and one they came back and saw the people of al-Madinah coming to them.

The seventy representatives,[217] chiefs of those who had accepted [1225] Islam, came to the Messenger of God from al-Madīnah met him during the pilgrimage, and swore an oath of allegiance to him at al-'Aqabah. They gave him their pledge in the following words: "We are of you and you are of us; whoever comes to us of your Companions, or you yourself if you come to us, we shall defend you as we would defend ourselves." After this Quraysh began to treat them harshly, and the Messenger of God commanded his Companions to go to al-Madīnah This was the second trial, during which the Messenger of God told his Companions to emigrate and himself emigrated. It was concerning this that God revealed:

217. The word naqīb is used here in a general sense. They did in a sense represent their clans, but not all of them were the "representatives" asked for by Muḥammad.

> And fight them until persecution is no more, and religion is all for God.[218]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm:[219] They (the Quraysh) came to ʿAbdallāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl and said much the same as Kaʿb b. Mālik reports them as saying. He replied, "This is a weighty matter; my people are not men to make a decision without consulting me in such a matter, and I have no knowledge that it has taken place." They then left him.

When the people dispersed from Minā, Quraysh investigated the report thoroughly, and found that there had indeed been an agreement. They went out in pursuit of the (men of al-Madīnah), and overtook Saʿd b. ʿUbādah at al-Ḥājir together with Al-Mundhir b. ʿAmr the brother of the Banū Sāʿidah b. Kaʿb b. al-Khazraj; both of these were representatives. Al-Mundhir evaded capture, but they took Saʿd, tied his hands to his neck with the thong of his camel's saddle girth and went back to Mecca with him, beating him and [1226] dragging him by his hair, for he had very luxuriant hair.

Saʿd said of this, "By God, I was in their hands when a group of the Quraysh came up to me, among them a white, clean, tall, pleasant-looking man. I said to myself, 'If there is any good among them, it will be in this man.' When he came near me, he raised his hand and gave me a severe blow. I said to myself, 'By God, there is no good in them after this.' I was in their hands and they were dragging me along, when one of the men with them was moved by pity for me and said, 'For heaven's sake! Don't you have any bond of protection or any compact with any of the Quraysh?' 'Certainly,' I said, 'I used to protect Jubayr b. Muṭʿim b. ʿAdī b. Nawfal b. ʿAbd Manāf's commercial agents and defend them against anyone who 218. This verse (8:39) was probably not revealed until after the battle of Badr. The almost identical verse 2:193 seems not to have been revealed until shortly before the conquest of Mecca.

219. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 301f.

wished to wrong them in my country, and I did the same for al-Ḥārith b. Umayyah b. ʿAbd Shams b. ʿAbd Manāf.' 'Well then,' he said, 'call out these two men's names and say what links there are between you and them.'

"I did so, and he went to them and found them in the mosque by the Kaʿbah. He told them that a man of the Khazraj was being beaten in the valley and that he was calling upon them and saying that there were bonds of protection between himself and them. They asked who it was, and he said that it was Saʿd b. ʿUbādah. They said, 'He speaks the truth, by God. He used to protect our agents and defend them against oppression in his country.' They [1227] came and released me from my captors' hands, and I departed. The person who punched me was Suhayl b. ʿAmr, the brother of the Banūʿ Āmir b. Luʾayy."

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) : When they came to al-Madīnah they proclaimed Islam there. There were among their people some of their shaykhs who remained in their polytheistic religion, among whom was ʿAmr b. al-Jamūḥ b. Zayd b. Ḥarām b. Kaʿb b. Ghanm b. Salimah, whose son Muʿādh b. ʿAmr had been present at al-ʿAqabah and had sworn an oath of allegiance to the Messenger of God along with others of their young men. Those members of the Aws and the Khazraj who took the oath of allegiance at the second al-ʿAqabah took the pledge of war, when, in contrast to the terms of the first al-ʿAqabah, God permitted fighting. The first was the pledge of women, as I have mentioned above on the authority of ʿUbādah b. al-Ṣāmit. The second pledge of al-ʿAqabah was to wage war against all men,[220] as I have mentioned above on the authority of ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿUbādah b. al-Walīd b. ʿUbādah b. al-Ṣāmit—his father al-Walīd—ʿUbādah b. al-Ṣāmit, who was one of the representatives:[221] We took the oath of allegiance to the Messenger of God according to the terms of the pledge of war. ʿUbādah was one of the twelve who took the pledge at at first al-ʿAqabah.

220. That is, on anyone who injured or killed Muḥammad.
221. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 304.

The Messenger of God Commands the Muslims to Emigrate to al-Madīnah[222]

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): After God had given his Messenger permission to fight by revealing the verse:[223] "And fight them until persecution is no more, and religion is all for God," and the Anṣār had pledged themselves to support him according to the terms which I have described, the Messenger of God commanded those of his Companions from among the Muslims who were with him at Mecca to emigrate, go to al-Madīnah, and join their brethren, the Anṣār. He told them, "God has made for you brethren and an abode in which you will be safe." They went in groups. The Messenger of God remained in Mecca waiting for his Lord to [1228] give him permission to leave Mecca and go to al-Madīnah. The first of the Messenger of God's Companions to emigrate to al-Madīnah was from the Quraysh, from the Banū Makhzūm. He was Abū Salamah b. ʿAbd al-Asad b. Hilāl b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. Makhzūm, who emigrated to al-Madīnah a year before the people of al-ʿAqabah took the oath of allegiance to the Messenger of God. He had come to the Messenger of God in Mecca from Abyssinia, and when Quraysh persecuted him and he heard that some of the Anṣār had accepted Islam, he went to al-Madīnah as an Emigrant. The first of the emigrants to go to al-Madīnah after Abū Salamah was ʿĀmir b. Rabīʿah the confederate of the Banū ʿAdī b. Kaʿb, accompanied by his wife Laylā bt. Abī Ḥathmah b. Ghānim b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAwf b. ʿAbīd b. ʿAwīj b. ʿAdī b. Kaʿb, and after him ʿAbdallāh b. Jaḥsh b. Riʾāb and Abū Aḥmad b. Jaḥsh, who was blind and used to go about Mecca, both the upper and the lower parts, without a guide. After this, the Companions of the Messenger of God went to al-Madīnah in successive groups, but the Messenger of God remained in Mecca after his Companions had emigrated, waiting to be given permission to emigrate.[224] None of the Emigrants remained behind with him in Mecca except those who had been seized and imprisoned (by their families) or who had been seduced (from Islam).The only exceptions were ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and Abū Bakr b. Abī Quḥāfah. Abū Bakr would often ask the Messenger of God for permission to emigrate, but the Messenger of God would say to him, "Do not do so; perhaps God will provide a companion for you." Abū Bakr hoped that the Messenger of God would be that companion.

222. This follows Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 314, 316 closely, though Ṭabarī does not mention the fact.

223. 8:39.

224. From this point to p.1234, Ṭabarī follows Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 323-26, apart from a paragraph on p.1232.

The Quraysh Plot to Kill the Messenger of God

[1229] When Quraysh saw that the Messenger of God had acquired a following and Companions from a tribe other than themselves in a region other than theirs, and when they saw his Emigrant Companions going to join them, they realized that these had found a home and were safe from their attacks. The Quraysh were now anxious about the Messenger of God going to the people of al-Madīnah as they knew that he had decided to join the Madīnans in order to make war on the Quraysh. They therefore met together about this matter in the House of Assembly, formerly the house of Quṣayy b. Kilāb, where Quraysh had always made their decisions, and there they deliberated what to do about the Messenger of God, since they had come to be afraid of him.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid b. Jabr Abū al-Ḥajjāj—Ibn ʿAbbās; also al-Kalbī—Abū Ṣālih—Ibn ʿAbbās and al-Ḥasan b. ʿUmārah—al-Ḥakam b. ʿUtaybah—Miqsam—Ibn ʿAbbās: They gathered together for this purpose and at the fixed time went into the House of Assembly to deliberate there about the Messenger of God. On the morning of the day fixed (the day called al-Zaḥmah) they went there, and the Devil met them in the form of a venerable old man wearing a coarse garment and stood at the door of the house. When they saw him standing at the door they said, "Who is this old man?" He said, "I am an old man from Najd who has heard what you have arranged to meet for and has come to be with you to [1230] hear what you say; perhaps you will not lack judgement and good advice from him." They replied, "Certainly, come in," so he went in with them. All the nobles of Quraysh, of every clan, had gathered there; from the Banū ʿAbd Shams, Shaybah and ʿUtbah the sons of Rabīʿah and Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb; from the Banū Nawfal b. ʿAbd Manāf, Ṭuʿaymah b. ʿAdī, Jubayr b. Muṭʿim and al-Ḥārith b.

ʿAmir b. Nawfal; from the Banū ʿAbd al-Dār b. Quṣayy, al-Naḍr b. al-Ḥārith b. Kaladah; from the Banū Asad b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā, Abū al-Bakhtarī b. Hishām, Zamʿah b. al-Aswad b. al-Muṭṭalib and Ḥakim b. Ḥizām; from the Banū Makhzūm, Abū Jahl b. Hishām; from the Banū Sahm, Nubayh and Munabbih the sons of al-Ḥajjāj; and from the Banū Jumaḥ, Umayyah b. Khalaf. In addition there were others, some from the Quraysh and others who were not counted as Quraysh.

They said to one another, "This man has done what he has done, and you have seen it for yourselves. We cannot be sure that he will not fall upon us with his followers who are not of us; so come to a decision about him." When they began to deliberate, one of them said, "Keep him in fetters, lock him up, and wait for the same kind of death to overtake him which overtook other poets of his sort before him, Zuhayr, al-Nābighah[225] and others." The old man from Najd said, "No, by God, this is not judicious; if you were to imprison him as you say, news of what had happened to him would leak out to his companions from behind the door which you had shut upon him, and in no time at all they would fall upon you and snatch him away from your hands. Then their numbers would grow against you and they would seize power from you. This is not judicious, so consider something else."

They consulted again, and one of them said, "Let us expel him from among us and banish him from our land; when he has left us, by God, we will not care where he goes or where he settles. The harm which he has been doing will disappear, we shall be rid of him and we shall be able to put our affairs in order again and restore our social harmony to what it was before." The old man from Najd said, "By God, this is not judicious; do you not see the beauty of his discourse, the sweetness of his speech and how he dominates the hearts of men with the message which he brings? By God, if you expel him, I think it not unlikely that he will descend upon some tribe of the Arabs and win them over with this speech and discourse of his so that they follow him in his plans; then he will lead them against you, crush you with them, seize power from your hands and do with you what he wants. Come to some other decision about him." [1231]

225. Two of the most famous pre-Islamic poets. The circumstances of their deaths are obscure.

Abū Jahl b. Hishām said, "By God, I have an idea about him, which I do not think you have hit upon yet." "What is it, Abū al-Ḥakam?" they asked. He said, "I think that you should take one young, strong, well-born, noble young man from each clan; then we should give each young man a sharp sword; then they should make for him and strike him with their swords as one man and kill him. Thus we shall be relieved of him, and if they do this, the responsibility for shedding his blood will be divided up among all the clans, and the Banū ʿAbd Manaf[226] will not be able to wage war against the whole of their tribe, and will be content to take blood money from us, which we can pay them." The old man from Najd was saying, "What this man says is right. This is the correct decision; you have no other." Thereupon they dispersed, having agreed upon this.

The Messenger of God Escapes from the Attempt to Kill Him

Then Gabriel came to the Messenger of God and said, "Do not spend this night in the bed in which you usually sleep." When [1232] the first third of the night had gone past, the young men gathered at his door and waited for him to go to sleep so that they could fall upon him. When the Messenger of God saw them there he said to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, "Sleep on my bed and wrap yourself up in my green Ḥaḍramī cloak; nothing unpleasant will befall you from them." The Messenger of God used to sleep in that cloak when he went to bed.

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): At this point one authority adds the following words to this story: Muhammad said to ʿAlī, "If Ibn Abī Quḥāfah—that is, Abū Bakr—comes to you, tell him that I have gone to Thawr and ask him to join me; send me some food, hire a guide for me who can show me the road to al-Madīnah, and buy me a riding camel." Then the Messenger of God went off, and God blinded the sight of those who were lying in wait for him so that he departed without their seeing him.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Ziyād—Muḥammad b. Kaʿb al-Quraẓī: They gathered against him, 226. This must mean only the subclans Hāshim and al-Muṭṭalib, since the other two subclans of ʿAbd Manāf were represented at the meeting.

and among them was Abū Jahl b. Hishām, who said, while they were waiting at his door, "Muḥammad claims that if you follow him in his religion, you shall be the kings of the Arabs and the non-Arabs, that after your death you shall be brought back to life and your lot shall then be gardens like the gardens of Jordan. He also claims that if you do not do this, you shall meet with slaughter from him, and that after your death you shall be brought back to life, and your lot shall then be a fire, in which you shall burn." Then the Messenger of God came out, took a handful of dust and said, "Yes, I do say that; and you are one of them." Then God took away their sight so that they could not see him, and Muḥammad began to sprinkle the dust on their heads while reciting the following verses from Sūrat Yā' Sīn: [1233]

> Yā' Sīn. By the wise Qur'ān, you are one of those sent on a straight path ...

to the words:

> and we have set a barrier before them and a barrier behind them, and have covered them so that they do not see.[227]

By the time he had finished reciting these verses he had put dust on the heads of every one of them, after which he went to where he wished to go. Someone who had not been with them came to them and said, "What are you waiting here for?" They answered, "Muḥammad." He said, "God has frustrated you, for Muḥammad has gone out despite you; furthermore, he has put dust on the heads of every one of you, and has gone away about his business. Do you not see what has happened to you?"

Every man of them put his hand on his head and found dust on it; then they began to investigate, and saw 'Alī on the bed shrouded in the Messenger of God's cloak. They said, "By God, this is Muḥammad asleep in his cloak," and they continued in this fashion until morning came, when 'Alī rose up from the bed. Then they said, "By God, the person who spoke to us was telling the truth."

Among the passages of the Qur'ān revealed concerning that day and what they had agreed upon are the following:

---

227. 3:1-9.

> And when those who disbelieve plot against you to wound you fatally or to kill you or to drive you out; they plot, but God plots; and God is the best of plotters.

and:

> Or they say: he is a poet, one for whom we may await the accident of time. Say; await! I am with you among those who await.[228]

Some of them assert that Abū Bakr came to ʿAlī and asked him [1234] about the Prophet of God. He told him that he had gone to the cave of Thawr and said, "If you have any business with him, join him there." Abū Bakr went out hastily and caught up with the Prophet of God on the road. The Messenger of God heard the sound of Abū Bakr coming in the darkness of the night and thought that he was one of the polytheists. He increased his pace and his sandal strap snapped, and he skinned his big toe on a stone. It bled profusely, and he walked even faster. Abū Bakr was afraid that he would cause the Messenger of God distress, and so he raised his voice and spoke to him. The Messenger of God recognized him, and stopped until Abū Bakr reached him. They then set off again, with the Messenger of God's foot pouring blood. The cave was reached at dawn and they went in together.

When morning came the group of people who were lying in wait for the Messenger of God went into his house. ʿAlī rose from his bed, and when they came close to him they recognized him and said, "Where is your companion?" He replied, "I do not know. Do you expect me to keep watch over him? You told him to leave, and he has left." They scolded him and beat him. Then they took him to the mosque and imprisoned him for a while, but after this they left him alone. Thus God delivered his Messenger from their plotting. About this event God revealed: "and when those who disbelieve plot against you to wound you fatally or to kill you or to drive you out; they plot, but God plots; and God is the best of plotters."[229]

---

228. 8:30; 52:30-31.
229. 8:30.

The Messenger of God Emigrates to al-Madīnah

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): After this God gave his Messenger permission to emigrate.

'Alī b. Naṣr al-Jahḍamī—'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-Wārith; also 'Abd al-Wārith b. 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-Wārith—his father ('Abd al-Ṣamad)—Abān al-'Aṭṭār—Hishām b. 'Urwah—'Urwah: When the Messenger of God's Companions had gone to al-Madīnah but before he himself left Mecca, and before the verse [1235] was revealed in which they were commanded to fight,[230] Abū Bakr, who had not been commanded to go, asked Muḥammad's permission to leave with the rest of his companions. The Messenger of God kept him back, however, and said, "Give me a little time. I do not know. Perhaps I shall be given permission to depart." Abū Bakr had bought two riding camels and had prepared them for departure to al-Madīnah with the Messenger of God's Companions. When the Messenger of God asked him to wait and told him of the hope which he had that God would give him permission to leave, he kept the two camels in expectation of accompanying the Messenger of God, and fed them well and fattened them. When the Messenger of God's departure was delayed, Abū Bakr said to him, "Do you hope that permission will be given to you?" He replied, "Yes. Wait until it comes." He then waited patiently.

'Ā'ishah told me that on a certain day, while they were in their house at noon time, there being nobody with Abū Bakr except his daughters 'Ā'ishah and Asmā', the Messenger of God suddenly appeared while the noonday sun was at its height. It had been his habit to come to Abū Bakr's house every day without fail at the beginning of the day and at the end of it, and so when Abū Bakr saw the Prophet coming at noon he said to him, "O Prophet of God, only something special has brought you here." When he came in, the Prophet said to Abū Bakr, "Ask whoever is with you to leave." He answered, "There are no spies upon us here. These are only my two daughters." Then the Prophet said, "God has given me permission to depart for al-Madīnah." Abū Bakr said, "O Messenger of God, may I accompany you?" "Yes," he replied. Abū Bakr said, "Take one of the riding camels." These were the riding camels which he had been feeding in preparation for departure when per- [1236] mission was granted to the Messenger of God. He gave him one of them and said, "Take it, O Messenger of God, and ride it." The Prophet replied, "I accept it, for its price."

230. The verse was alleged to be 8:39; see above pp.1225, 1227, and n. 218.

ʿĀmir b. Fuhayrah was a half-breed from the tribe of Azd belonging to al-Ṭufayl b. ʿAbdallāh b. Sakhbarah (who was Abū al-Ḥārith) b. al-Ṭufayl, who had the same mother as Abū Bakr's daughter ʿĀ'ishah and his son ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. ʿĀmir b. Fuhayrah became a Muslim while he was their slave, and Abū Bakr bought him and set him free. He was a good Muslim. At the time when the Prophet and Abū Bakr set out, Abū Bakr had the rights to the milk of a flock of sheep which used to come to his family in the evening. Abū Bakr sent ʿĀmir with the sheep to Thawr, and he used to bring them in the evening to the Messenger of God in the cave there, which is the cave named by God in the Qur'ān. [231]

They sent ahead with their mounts a man from the Banū ʿAbd b. ʿAdī, a confederate of the family of al-ʿĀṣ b. Wā'il of Banū Sahm of Quraysh. At that time, this man ʿAdī was a polytheist, but they hired him as a guide for the journey. During the nights which they spent in the cave ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr used to come to them in the evening and bring them all the news of Mecca, and then return to Mecca by morning. ʿĀmir would bring the sheep every evening so that they could milk them, and would then drive them to pasture at daybreak, and spend the morning with other people's shepherds, so that nobody realized what he was doing. When the clamor about Muḥammad and Abū Bakr died down and news came to them that people were no longer talking about them, their guide brought them their camels and they set off, taking with them ʿĀmir b. Fuhayrah to serve them and assist them. Abū Bakr mounted him behind him and shared the saddle with him by [1237] turns. There was nobody with them but ʿĀmir b. Fuhayrah and the brother of the Banū ʿAdī, who guided them along the road. He took them through the Meccan lowlands, then along a route parallel to the coast below ʿUsfān, then across country, rejoining the road after Qudayd, then along the al-Kharrār path, then across the pass of al-Marah, and then along a road called al-Mudlijah, between the ʿAmq road and the Rawḥā' road. He then met the ʿArj road, coming to a spring called al-Ghābir to the right of Rakūbah, and then ascended the Baṭn Ri'm, finally arriving, one day at high noon, at the quarter of the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf in (the south of) al-Madīnah. I have been told that the Messenger of God only stayed among them for two days, although the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf assert that he stayed among them for longer than that. Then he led his camel, which followed him to the quarter of the Banū al-Najjār. There the Messenger of God showed them a drying floor in the midst of their dwellings.

231. The verse is 9:40.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abd Allāh b. al-Ḥusayn al-Tamīmī—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—'Ā'ishah the wife of the Prophet:[232] The Messenger of God never failed to come to Abū Bakr's house at the two ends of the day, early morning and evening. When the day arrived upon which God gave his Messenger permission to emigrate and to go away from Mecca from among his tribe, the Messenger of God came to us in the heat of the day at a time at which it was not his custom to come. When Abū Bakr saw him he said, "The Messen- [1238] ger of God can only have come at such an hour because of something special." When he came in, Abū Bakr rose from his bed, and the Messenger of God sat down. There was nobody with Abū Bakr except for myself and my sister Asmā', and when the Messenger of God said, "Send out those who are with you," he said, "O Prophet of God, these are my daughters; there is no need for that, may my father and mother be your ransom."

Then the Messenger of God said, "God has given me permission to leave Mecca and to emigrate." Abū Bakr said, "May I accompany you, O Messenger of God?" "You may accompany me." he replied. By God, I was never aware that anyone could weep for joy until that day when I saw Abū Bakr weeping for joy. Then he said, "O Prophet of God, these are my two riding camels which I have prepared for this." They hired as a guide for the road 'Abdallāh b. Arqad, a man from the Banū al-Dīl b. Bakr, whose mother was from (the Meccan clan of) the Banū Sahm b. 'Amr, a polytheist. They handed their two riding camels over to him and he kept them with him to pasture them until the appointed time.

According to what I (Ibn Isḥāq) have been told not a single person knew of the Messenger of God's departure when he went except for ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq and his family. As for ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, the Messenger of God is said to have informed him that he was leaving and to have commanded him to stay behind in Mecca to hand back those things which people had entrusted to his custody. Everyone in Mecca who had any possession which he feared to lose would deposit it with the Messenger [1239] of God because they knew of his honesty and reliability. When the Messenger of God decided upon departure, he went to Abū Bakr b. Abī Quḥāfah, and the two of them left by a window in the back of Abū Bakr's house and went to a cave in Thawr, a mountain below Mecca, and entered it. Abū Bakr told his son ʿAbdallāh to listen to what people were saying about them during the day and to bring them the day's news in the evening. He also told his mawlā ʿĀmir b. Fuhayrah to pasture his flocks during the day and to bring them to them in the cave in the evening. Abū Bakr's daughter Asmāʾ brought them enough food for their needs in the evening.

232. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 327–30.

The Messenger of God and Abū Bakr spent three days in the cave. When Quraysh realized that he was missing, they offered a hundred she-camels for whoever would bring him back to them. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr spent his time among Quraysh listening to what they were plotting and to what they were saying about the Messenger of God and Abū Bakr. Then he would come to them in the evening and give them the news. ʿĀmir b. Fuhayrah, Abū Bakr's mawlā, pastured his flocks among the other Meccan shepherds, and brought Abū Bakr's sheep to the cave in the evening, when the two men would milk them and slaughter (one of) them. When ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr left for Mecca the following morning, ʿĀmir b. Fuhayrah would follow after him with the sheep in order to erase his trail.

When the third day had gone past, and the people's interest in the two had died down, the man whom they had hired brought them their camels and Asmāʾ brought them their travelling provisions. She had forgotten to bring them a strap, and when they set off, she went to attach the travelling provisions and found that [1240] there was no strap. She took off her girdle and used that as a strap to attach the provisions. Thereafter she was known as "She of the two girdles" on account of this incident.

When Abū Bakr brought the two riding camels to the Messenger of God, he gave him the better of the two and said, "Mount, may my father and mother be your ransom." The Messenger of God replied, "I will not ride a camel which does not belong to me." "It is yours, O Messenger of God whom I value more than my father and mother," he said. "No," said the Messenger of God. "What is the price which you paid for it?" He named the price, and the Messenger of God said, "I will take it for that price." Abū Bakr said, "It is yours, O Messenger of God." They mounted and set off, and Abū Bakr mounted behind himself his mawlā ʿĀmir b. Fuhayrah, who was to serve them during the journey.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Asmāʾ bt. Abī Bakr: When the Messenger of God and Abū Bakr left, a number of men of Quraysh, including Abū Jahl b. Hishām, came to us and stood at Abū Bakr's door. I went out to them and they said, "Where is your father, daughter of Abū Bakr?" I replied, "By God, I do not know where my father is." Abū Jahl raised his hand, for he was a loathsome and evil man, and gave me a blow on the cheek which knocked off my earring. Then they left, and for three days we did not know where the Messenger of God had gone. Then a man of the jinn came from the lower part of Mecca singing lines of verse in the manner of the Arabs, followed by people who were listening to his voice but could not see him, until at last he went out from the upper part of Mecca. He sang these lines:

May God the Lord of Men give his best recompense to two Companions who took their siesta, in the two tents of Umm Maʿbad.
They halted there bringing guidance and set off in the [1241] morning bearing it;
may whoever becomes Muḥammad's Companion prosper!
May the Banū Kaʿb be given joy by the position of their young woman, and by her sitting as a lookout for the Believers.[233]

When we heard what he said we knew where the Messenger of God had gone, and that he was making for al-Madīnah. There were four of them, the Messenger of God, Abū Bakr, ʿĀmir b. Fuhayrah, and ʿAbdallāh b. Arqad, their guide.

Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī]—Aḥmad b. al-Miqdām al-ʿIjlī—Hishām b.

233. Umm Maʿbad was a woman of the clan of Banū Kaʿb of the tribe of Khuzāʿah.

Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib al-Kalbī—'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. Abī 'Abs b. Muḥammad b. Abī 'Abs b. Jabr—his father: In the night, Quraysh heard a voice on (the hill of) Abū Qubays saying;

If the two Sa'ds accept Islam, Muḥammad will no longer fear the opposition of any opponent in Mecca.

[1242] The next morning Abū Sufyān said, "Who are the two Sa'ds? Sa'd Bakr? Sa'd Tamīm? Sa'd Hudhaym?" The following night they heard the voice saying:

Sa'd, Sa'd of the Aws, be a helper (nāṣir) and Sa'd, Sa'd of the noble Khazraj, Respond to him who calls you to right guidance, and wish through God for the object of desire in Paradise of one who knows.
God's reward for the seeker after right guidance is pavilioned gardens of Paradise.

In the morning, Abū Sufyān said, "By God it is Sa'd b. Mu'ādh and Sa'd b. 'Ubādah."[234]

The Messenger of God Arrives in al-Madīnah

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): Their guide brought them to Qubā'[235] in the quarter of the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf on Monday, the twelfth of Rabī' I (September 24, 622) when the heat of the forenoon had grown intense and the sun had almost reached its midpoint in the sky.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Uwaym b. Sā'idah—some men of his clan from the Companions of the Messenger of God:[236] When we heard that the Messenger of God had left Mecca and we were expecting his arrival, we used to go out after the morning prayer to the far side of our (lava-flow)

234. Sa'd b. Mu'ādh was the chief of the clan of 'Abd al-Ashhal of the tribe of the Aws, and was the leader of all the Muslims of al-Madīnah until he died of wounds received in the siege of al-Madīnah in A.D. 627. Sa'd b. 'Ubādah was chief of the clan of Sā'idah of the tribe of al-Khazraj; he was latterly the leading man of the Khazraj, and after A.D. 627 of the Muslims of al-Madīnah as a whole.

235. A district in the south of the oasis of al-Madīnah.

236. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 333-35.

ḥarrah to wait for him, and did not depart until the sun left us no shade to shelter in. When we could no longer find any shade we returned to our houses; this was during a hot period. When the day came on which the Messenger of God arrived, we sat as usual until there was no shade left and then went into our houses. The Messenger of God arrived after we had gone home, and the first person to see him was one of the Jews, who had observed what we were doing and knew that we were expecting the arrival of the Messenger of God. He shouted out at the top of his voice, "Banū Qaylah,[237] here is your good fortune who has come!" [1243]

We went out to where the Messenger of God was sitting in the shade of a palm tree with Abū Bakr, who was about the same age as he. Most of us had not seen the Messenger of God before then, and we crowded around without knowing him from Abū Bakr. Then the shade left the Messenger of God and Abū Bakr rose up and shaded him with his cloak, and we knew.

Some say that the Messenger of God lodged with Kulthūm b. Hidm the brother of the Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf, of (the subclan of) the Banū ʿUbayd, while others say that he lodged with Saʿd b. Khaythamah. Those who say that he lodged with Kulthūm b. Hidm say that when he came out of Kulthūm b. Hidm's house he sat to receive people in Saʿd b. Khaythamah's house. This was because Saʿd was a bachelor without any family, and those of the Messenger of God's Emigrant Companions who were unmarried were lodging with him. This is why it is said that Muḥammad lodged with Saʿd b. Khaythamah. The latter's house was called "the bachelors' house." God knows best which of these reports is correct; this is all that we have heard.

Abū Bakr b. Abī Quḥāfah lodged with Khubayb b. Isāf the brother of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. al-Khazraj at al-Sunḥ; but there are some who say that he lodged with Khārijah b. Zayd b. Abī Zuhayr the brother of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. al-Khazraj. [1244]

ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib remained in Mecca for three full days until he had returned to their owners on the Messenger of God's behalf the deposits which had been in his keeping. When ʿAlī had completed this task, he joined the Messenger of God and lodged with him with Kulthūm b. Hidm. ʿAlī used to say that he lodged at Qubāʾ for a night or two with a Muslim woman who had no husband. He used to tell the following story: "I was lodging at Qubā' with a Muslim woman who had no husband, and I noticed a person coming to her in the middle of the night and knocking on her door. She would open the door for him and he would give her something which he had with him. I had misgivings about this and said to her, 'Handmaid of God, who is this man who knocks on your door every night and who gives you something, I do not know what, and you a Muslim woman with no husband?' She answered, 'This is Sahl b. Ḥunayf b. Wāhib, who knows that I am a woman living on my own. In the evening he falls upon his people's idols, smashes them, and brings them to me, saying, "Use this as firewood."'" 'Alī used to tell this story about Sahl b. Ḥunayf after Sahl died while he was with 'Alī in Iraq.

237. The tribes of the Aws and the Khazraj together.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: This story was [1245] related to me by 'Alī b. Hind b. Sa'd d. Sahl b. Ḥunayf— 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

The Messenger of God remained at Qubā' among the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf for Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, and founded their mosque.[238] Then God caused him to leave them on Friday. The Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf assert that he remained among them longer than that, but God knows best. Some say that his stay at Qubā' lasted for ten days or so.

238. This presumably means that he discovered a suitable piece of ground and conducted prayers there, not that he started building anything. The Muslims of Qubā' may have continued to use the same ground for prayers.

The Beginning of the Prophetic Mission
(Continued)

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): The early scholars differ as to the length of the Messenger of God's stay in Mecca after he became a prophet. Some say that the length of his stay there, until he emigrated to al-Madīnah, was ten years.

Those who say this:

Ibn al-Muthannā—Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad b. Qays al-Madanī, who is known as Abū Zukayr—Rabī'ah b. Abī 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Anas b. Mālik: The Messenger of God received his mission at the age of forty and stayed in Mecca for ten years.

Al-Ḥusayn b. Naṣr al-Āmulī—'Ubaydallāh b. Mūsā—Shaybān—Yaḥyā b. Abī Kathīr—Abū Salamah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—'Ā'ishah and Ibn 'Abbās: The Messenger of God remained in Mecca for ten years receiving revelation of the Qur'ān.

Ibn al-Muthannā—'Abd al-Wahhāb—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd—Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab: The Qur'ān was first revealed to the Messenger of God when he was aged forty-three, and he remained in Mecca for ten years. [1246]

Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—Aḥmad—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd—Hishām—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbas: It was first revealed to the Prophet when he was aged forty-three, and he remained in Mecca for ten years.

Muḥammad b. Ismā'īl—'Amr b. 'Uthmān al-Ḥimṣī—his father—Muḥammad b. Muslim al-Ṭā'ifī—'Amr b. Dīnār: The Messenger of God emigrated ten years after his emergence as a prophet.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): Others say that this is not so, and that he remained in Mecca for thirteen years after becoming a prophet.

Those who say this:

Ibn al-Muthannā—Ḥajjāj b. al-Minhāl—Ḥammād, that is, Ibn

Salamah—Abū Jamrah—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Messenger of God remained in Mecca for thirteen years receiving revelations.

Muḥammad b. Khalaf—Ādam—Ḥammād b. Salamah—Abū Jamrah al-Ḍubaʿī—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Messenger of God received his mission at the age of forty, and remained in Mecca for thirteen years.

Muḥammad b. Maʿmar—Rawḥ—Zakariyyāʾ b. Isḥāq—ʿAmr b. Dīnār—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Messenger of God remained in Mecca for thirteen years.

ʿUbayd b. Muḥammad al-Warrāq—Rawḥ—Hishām—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Prophet received his mission at the age of forty and remained in Mecca for thirteen years receiving revelations; then he was commanded to emigrate.

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): The account of those who say that the Messenger of God received his mission at the age of forty and remained in Mecca for thirteen years agrees with the account of Abū Qays Ṣirmah b. Abī Anas the brother of the Banū ʿAdī b. al-Najjār which is found in his qaṣīdah (poem) in which he says, describing how God ennobled them with Islam and how the Messenger of God came to stay with them:

He stayed among Quraysh for some ten years
    reminding people of Islam if he found a favorable friend, Offering himself to the pilgrims, yet did not see anyone taking refuge in Islam or summoning others to it.
But when he came to us God gave victory to his religion, and he became joyful and satisfied at Ṭaybah.
He found a friend and his aim became secure and he had manifest support from God.
He related to us what Noah said to his people and what Moses saw when he answered the Caller.
He came to fear none of mankind,
[1248]   whether near or far.
We expended the greater part of our wealth upon him and our own lives in the clamor of battle and at the time of consolation.
We know that there is nothing but God and we know that God is the best guide.

Abū Qays informs us in this poem that the length of the Messenger of God's stay among his people of Quraysh after he became a prophet and made public his revelations from God was some ten years.

Some of them say that he remained in Mecca for fifteen years.

Those who say this:

Al-Ḥārith–Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar–Ibrāhīm b. Ismā'īl—Dāwūd b. al-Ḥuṣayn—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: He quoted the line by Abū Qays Ṣirmah b. Abī Anas except that he recited it as follows:

He stayed among Quraysh for fifteen years
reminding people of Islam if he found a favorable friend.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): It is related on the authority of al-Sha'bī that (the angel) Isrāfīl was associated with the Messenger of God [1249] for three years before he received any revelation.

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī—al-Thawrī—Ismā'īl b. Abī Khālid—al-Sha'bī: He (al-Wāqidi) also said that he had this from al-Manṣūr by dictation—al-Ash'ath—al-Sha'bī: Isrāfīl was associated with the Messenger of God's prophethood for three years. The Messenger of God was aware of him, but could not see his person. After that came Gabriel.

Al-Wāqidī: I mentioned that to Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Dīnār, who said, "By God, nephew, I heard 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Ḥazm and 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah conversing in the mosque. An Iraqi man was saying this to them and they both denied it, saying, 'We have neither heard nor learnt anything other than that it was Gabriel who was associated with him and used to bring him revelations from the day he became a prophet until he died.' "

Ibn al-Muthannā—Ibn Abī 'Adī—Dāwūd—'Āmir: Prophethood descended upon him when he was forty. Isrāfīl was associated with his prophethood for three years, and used to teach him the word and the deed,[239] but the Qur'ān was not revealed by his tongue. After three years had gone by Gabriel was associated with Muḥammad's prophethood and the Qur'ān was revealed by his tongue for ten years in Mecca and ten years in al-Madīnah.

239. The Qur'ān presupposes that the religion of Islam had already been given certain forms, such as those of the ṣalāt, or worship; and this pre-Qur'ānic nonverbal revelation to Muḥammad would appear to be what is here ascribed to Isrāfīl.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): Perhaps those who say that the length of Muḥammad's stay in Mecca after the revelation was ten years count this period from the time that Gabriel brought him the revelation from God and he began to summon men to acknowledge that God is one, while those who say that the length of his stay [1250] was thirteen years count from the beginning of the time that he became a prophet, when Isrāfīl was associated with him, this being the first three years in which he was not commanded to summon men to Islam.

A different account from the two which I have mentioned is related on the authority of Qatādah. This is as follows: Rawḥ b. 'Ubādah—Sa'īd—Qatādah: The Qur'ān was revealed to the Messenger of God for a period of eight years in Mecca and ten years in al-Madīnah) after the emigrated.

Al-Ḥasan used to say: Ten in Mecca and ten in al-Madīnah.

The Institution of the Islamic Calendar

The Date of the Institution of the Islamic Era

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): It is said that when the Messenger of God came to al-Madīnah he ordered the establishing of a new era.[240]

Zakariyyāʾ b. Yaḥyā b. Abī Zāʾidah—Abū ʿĀṣim—Ibn Jurayj—Abū Salamah—Ibn Shihāb: When the Prophet came to al-Madīnah, which was in Rabīʿ I (September 624), he ordered the establishing of a new era.

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): It is said that they used to reckon the date by the number of months after Muḥammad's arrival (in al-Madīnah), until the (first) year was completed. It is also said that the first person to order the establishing of a chronology was ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.

Reports on This Subject

Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—Abū Nuʿaym—Ḥibbān b. ʿAlī al-ʿAnazī—Mujālid al-Shaʿbī: Abū Mūsā al-Asharī wrote to ʿUmar saying, "Letters have come from you to us which do not have a date." ʿUmar assembled the people for consultation. Some said, "Date from the beginning of the Messenger of God's mission," while [1251] others said, "From the Messenger of God's emigration, for that

240. It is very improbable that Muḥammad was concerned about this matter, and almost certainly true that the formal institution of the Islamic era was due to ʿUmar, the second Caliph. Doubtless, however, people spoke of events as so many months after Muḥammad's arrival in al-Madīnah, as Ṭabarī mentions below; and there are in fact several examples of such dating in his accounts of the earlier years at al-Madīnah.

distinguished between truth and falsehood."

Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—Qutaybah b. Saʿīd—Khālid b. Ḥayyān Abū Yazīd al-Kharrāz—Furāt b. Salmān—Maymūn b. Mihrān: A money order was brought before ʿUmar which fell due in (the month of) Shaʿbān. ʿUmar said, "Which Shaʿbān? The one which is coming or the one we are in now?" Then he said to the Messenger of God's Companions, "Contrive something for the people which they can recognize." Some said, "Write according to the chronology of the Greeks; it is said that they date their letters from the time of Alexander, but that was a long time ago." Others said, "Write according to the chronology of the Persians; it is said that whenever a king rises up amongst them he discards the era of his predecessors." In the end they agreed that they should see how long the Messenger of God had remained in al-Madīnah. They found this to be ten years, and the era was reckoned from the Messenger of God's emigration.

Umayyah b. Khālid and Abū Dāwūd al-Ṭayālisī—Qurrah b. Khālid al-Sadūsī—Muḥammad b. Sīrīn: A man rose up before ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and said, "Institute a chronology." ʿUmar said, "What is that?" The man replied, "It is something which the non-Arabs do. They write, 'In such-and-such a month of such-and-such a year.'" ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb said, "This is good. Institute a chronology." They said, "Which year shall we begin from?" Some said, "From the beginning of Muḥammad's mission," and others said, "From his death." Finally they agreed upon his hijrah or emigration. Then they said, "From which month shall we be-[1252] gin?" They said, "Ramadān," and then they said, "al-Muḥarram, for that is the month when people depart from their pilgrimage, and it is a sacred month." So they agreed upon al-Muḥarram.

Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—Saʿīd b. Abī Maryam; and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Ḥakam—his father; both from ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Ḥāzim—Abū Ḥāzim—Sahl b. Saʿd: Whenever people calculated the date, they did not reckon from the beginning of the Messenger of God's mission, nor from his death; they only reckoned from his arrival in al-Madīnah.

Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—Saʿīd b. Abī Maryam—Yaʿqūb b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Muslim—ʿAmr b. Dīnār—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās: The era began in the year in which the Messenger of God came to al-Madīnah, which is the year in which ʿAbdallāh b. al-

Zubayr was born.

ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Ḥakam—Yaʿqūb b. Isḥāq b. Abī ʿAbbād—Muḥammad b. Muslim al-Ṭāʾifī—ʿAmr b. Dīnār—Ibn ʿAbbās: The era began in the year in which the Messenger of God came ... (his comment is) followed by a report similar to the one above.

Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—Qutaybah b. Saʿīd—Nūḥ b. Qays al-Ṭāḥī—ʿUthmān b. Miḥsan: concerning the Qurʾānic verses "By the dawn, and ten nights,"[241] Ibn ʿAbbās used to say, "The dawn is al-Muḥarram, the dawn of the year."

Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—Abū Nuʿaym al-Faḍl b. Dukayn—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq—Abū Isḥāq—al-Aswad b. Yazīd—ʿUbayd b. ʿUmayr: Al-Muḥarram is God's month, and it is the beginning (that is the first month) of the year. In it, the Kaʿbah is clothed, [1253] dating commences, and silver is struck. In it is a day upon which people repented, and God forgave them.

Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—Aḥmad—Rawḥ b. ʿUbādah—Zakariyyāʾ b. Isḥāq—ʿAmr b. Dīnār: The first person to date letters was Yaʿlā b. Umayyah, when he was in the Yemen. The Prophet of God came to al-Madīnah in Rabīʿ I (September 624) and people began their chronology from the beginning of the year in which he came to al-Madīnah ʿAli b. Mujāhid—Muḥammad b. Isḥaq—al-Zuhrī and Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ—al-Shaʿbī: The children of Ishmael dated from the fire of Abraham[242] until the building of the Kaʿbah, when Abraham and Ishmael built it. Then they dated from the building of the Kaʿbah until they dispersed, and every time a people departed from Tihāmah they dated from their departure. Those of the descendants of Ishmael who remained in Tihāmah dated from the departure from Tihāmah of Saʿd, Nahd, and Juhaynah, the sons of Zayd, until Kaʿb b. Luʾayy died; then they dated from his death until the Year of the Elephant. After that they dated from the Elephant until ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb established the era of the hijrah. This was in the year 17 or 18 (A.D. 638 or 639).

ʿAbd al-Rahmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Ḥakam—Nuʿaym b.

241. 89:1-2.

242. According to the Qurʾān (21:68–70, 29:24, 37:97), when Abraham attacked the idolatry of his people, they prepared a fire to burn him, but God saved him from them.

Ḥammād—al-Dārawardī—'Uthmān b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Rāfi'—Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb assembled the people
[1254] and asked them, "From what day shall we begin our dating?" 'Alī said, "From the day on which the Messenger of God emigrated and abandoned the land of polytheism." 'Umar followed this advice.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): The acount given by 'Alī b. Mujāhid narrated from his authorities for the chronology of the descendants of Ishmael is not far from the truth, which is that it was not their custom to date from an established (and well-known) event which the majority of them could adopt, but that, when they dated an event, they did so from (a local happening, such as) a drought which took place in some part of their country, a barren year which befell them, the reign of a governor who ruled over them, or an event the news of which became widespread among them. This is shown by the way in which their poets differ in their dating; if they had had a dating from an established event and a generally adopted basis, this difference among them would not have arisen. An example of this can be seen in the lines of al-Rabī' b. Ḍabu' al-Fazārī:

Here I am, hoping for immortality, and yet
my knowledge and my time of birth go back to Ḥujr,
The father of Imru' al-Qays – have you heard of him?
How far from the mark! How long have I lived!

Here he dates his life by Ḥujr b. 'Amr, the father of Imru' al-Qays.[243]

Likewise Nābighah of the Banū Ja'dah says:

Whoever asks about my age, let him know that I was young at the time of the glanders.

Here he dates his life by an epidemic which afflicted them. Another poet says:

I was still wearing boy's garments at the time when Ibn Hammām raided the encampment of Khath'am.

243. Imru' al-Qays is a well-known poet who is thought to have died about A.D. 550. See EI^{2} s.v. Imru' al-Ḳays b. Ḥujr. He was the youngest son of Ḥujr, king of the tribe of Kindah. Al-Rabī' al-Fazārī and Nābighah al-Ja'dī are minor poets, of whom the latter (who is not to be confused with the famous Nābighah al-Dhubyānī) lived to become a Muslim.

All of these poets whose chronology I have quoted in these lines lived close in time to one another, and the events from which they dated were also close in time to one another, and yet they all chose different events. If they had had a recognized era, as the Muslims and other communities do today, they would not, God willing, have used other than that; but matters stood with them, I believe, as I have stated. [1255]

As for the Quraysh among the Arabs, the latest epoch which I have been able to establish as being used by them in computing dates before the emigration of the Prophet from Mecca to al-Madīnah is that of the Year of the Elephant, which is the year in which the Messenger of God was born. There were twenty years between the Year of the Elephant and the Sacrilegious War, fifteen years between the Sacrilegious War and the rebuilding of the Ka'bah, and five years between the rebuilding of the Ka'bah and the beginning of the Prophet's mission.

Summary of Meccan Chronology

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): The Messenger of God received his call to prophethood at the age of forty. According to al-Shaʿbī, Isrāfīl was associated with the Messenger of God's prophethood, for three years, this being before he was commanded to call people to Islam and to proclaim it openly. We have already quoted the narratives and stories to this effect. After three years, Gabriel was associated with his prophethood, and he commanded him to summon people openly to God. He did this for ten years while resident in Mecca, and then emigrated to al-Madīnah in Rabīʿ I fourteen years after becoming a prophet. He left Mecca for al-Madīnah on a Monday and arrived in al-Madīnah on Monday the twelfth of Rabīʿ I (September 24, 624).

Ibrāhīm b. Saʿīd al-Jawharī—Mūsā b. Dāwūd—Ibn Lahīʿah—Khālid b. Abī ʿImrān—Ḥanash al-Ṣanʿānī—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Prophet was born on a Monday, became a prophet on a Monday, lifted the (Black) Stone on a Monday, left Mecca to emigrate to al-[1256] Madīnah on a Monday, arrived in al-Madīnah on a Monday, and passed away on a Monday.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī: The Messenger of God arrived in al-Madīnah on Monday, the twelfth of Rabīʿ I.

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): If the matter of the Muslim chronology is as I have described it, then although it is based on the emigration it actually begins two months and twelve days before the Prophet's arrival in al-Madīnah. This is because the year begins in al-Muḥarram, and the Prophet arrived in al-Madīnah after this period of time had elapsed; the era did not begin with the time of his arrival but with the beginning of that year.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME VII

The Foundation of the Community

TRANSLATED BY M. V. McDONALD
ANNOTATED BY W. MONTGOMERY WATT

The Events of the Year I

(JULY 16, 622–JULY 4, 623)

Part 2: The Period After the Hijrah

[1256]

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) states: We have already mentioned the date of the Prophet's arrival in Medina, the place in which he stayed when he arrived, the man with whom he stayed, the length of his stay in that place and his departure from it. We shall now mention the other noteworthy events of this year, the first year of the Hijrah.

The First Friday Prayer

Among these is his holding the Friday prayer with his companions on the day on which he left Qubā' for Medina. This was on Friday,[1] and the time for prayer—the Friday prayer—overtook

1. IH, 333, says that the Messenger reached Qubā' on the outskirts of the oasis of Medina on Monday, 12 Rabī' al-Awwal (September 24, 622), and stayed there until Friday of that week. According to the standard calendar, 12 Rabī' al-Awwal is itself a Friday; but the standard calendar is based on the assumption that from year 1 the Muslims observed a lunar year without intercalary months, whereas it is almost certain that some intercalary months had been observed before the revelahim in the territory of the Banū Sālim b. ʿAwf in the bed of a wadi belonging to them, and this was used as a mosque that day.[2] This [1257] was the first Friday prayer which the Messenger of God held in Islam. On this Friday he delivered a sermon, the first sermon he preached in Medina.

The Sermon of the Messenger of God at the First Friday Prayer[3]

According to Yūnus b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Ibn Wahb— Saʿīd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Jumaḥī: The sermon of the Messenger of God at the first Friday prayer which he led at Medina in the territory of the Banū Sālim b. ʿAwf was as follows:

> Praise be to God. I praise him, and call on him for help, forgiveness and guidance. I believe in him, do not deny him and am an enemy of whoever denies him. I bear witness that there is no deity but God alone, without partner, and that Muḥammad is his servant and his Messenger, whom he has sent with guidance, light and exhortation after an interval (fatrah)[4] in the appearance of messengers, at a time when tion of the verse (Qur. 9.7) abolishing them; because of this, some slight discrepancies of dating are only to be expected and will not be further commented on here. It is generally agreed in many sources that so long as Muḥammad was at Mecca there was no special observance of the Friday midday prayer.

---

2. According to IH, 335, the wadi is Wādī Ranūnah; see map in Watt, Medina, 152. Banū Sālim b. ʿAwf was a small but important clan in Medina, usually known as Qawāqilah. The clan system at Medina is very complex. Eight large clans are mentioned in the document known as the Constitution of Medina (IH, 341–4), but sixteen subclans seem to have functioned to some extent as independent units, and at least as many more are occasionally mentioned. A form of the genealogical table is given in Watt, Medina, 154, and this shows the nominal place of other clans to be mentioned later by al-Ṭabarī. Many of the names in the table appear to be fictitious, perhaps due to the persistence in Medina until about this period of a matrilineal kinship system. It should also be noted that the term banū, "sons of," is used for kinship groups of all sizes, from single families to the largest tribes; the use of words like "clan" and "tribe" depends on scholars' estimates of the size of the group.

3. IH, 340, gives a different sermon. The text here cannot be an exact reproduction of the original, since it contains a verse of the Qur'ān revealed at the time of the battle of Badr.

4. It is unlikely that Muḥammad himself would have used the words "I bear witness that Muḥammad is his servant and his Messenger." For fatrah, see EI^{2}, s.v. The word was used for the interval or period between any two prophets or knowledge is scarce, men are led astray, time is cut short, the Last Hour is at hand and the End is close. Whoever obeys God and his Prophet has been rightly guided; whoever disobeys them has erred, been remiss and gone far astray. I recommend to you the fear of God, for the best thing which a Muslim can enjoin upon a Muslim is that he should exhort him to seek the Other World and command him to fear God. Beware of what God has warned you against concerning himself. There is no better advice than this and no better admonition. The fear of God, for whoever acts according to it in fear and dread of his Lord, is a trusty aid to what you desire of the Other World. He who sets aright what is between him and his Lord in secret and in public, seeking nothing thereby but the face of God, will be remembered in this world, and will have a treasure in that which is after death. Then a man will have need of that good which he has done previously; and as for that which is otherwise, he will wish that there was a great distance between him and it. God warns you to beware of himself, but God is merciful to his servants and to those who believe his word and fulfil their promises. God says: [1258]

"The sentence that cometh from me cannot be changed, and I am in no wise a tyrant unto the slaves."[5] Fear God, then, in this world and the next, in secret and in public. He who fears God will have his evil deeds forgiven and his reward magnified; he will achieve a great success. The fear of God will ward off God's hatred and retribution and wrath. The fear of God will make people blameless in the sight of God, will please the Lord and will raise their degree. Seize hold of your portion, and do not be remiss with regard to God. God has caused you to know his Book and has opened his path before you in order that he may know those who speak the truth and those who lie. Act well, then, as God has acted well with you. Be enemies of his enemies, and strive on God's behalf in the way to which he is entitled. He has chosen you and named you Muslims, "that he who perished (on that day) messengers, but more particularly for that between Jesus and Muḥammad. It may also suggest a slackening of the previous prophet's religion.

---

5. Qur. 50.29; the "slaves" or "servants" (of God) are human beings generally.

might perish by a clear proof (of his sovereignty) and he who survived might survive by a clear proof."[6] There is no power but with God. Remember God frequently and act for the sake of that which is after today; for he who sets aright that which is between him and God will have that which is between him and other men taken care of by God. That is because God pronounces judgement upon men whereas they do not pronounce judgement upon him, and because God rules men whereas they do not rule him. God is most great. There is no might but with God the great.

The Choice of a Site for Mosque and House

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: The Messenger of God mounted his she-camel and let her reins hang loose. The inhabitants of every settlement of the Anṣār (the Muslims of Medina) which she went past invited him to stay with them, saying, "Come, O Messenger of God, to a settlement which has many defenders and is well-provisioned and impregnable." He would say to them, "Let go her reins, for she is commanded (by God)." Finally he reached the present site of his mosque, and his [1259] camel knelt down where the door of his mosque is. At that time this place was a drying-floor for dates and belonged to two orphan boys of Banū al-Najjār under the guardianship of Mu'ādh b. 'Afrā'; their names were Sahl and Suhayl, sons of 'Amr b. 'Abbād b. Tha'labah b. Ghanm b. Mālik b. al-Najjār. When the camel knelt down, the Messenger of God remained on her. After a little she got up and went a short distance, while the Messenger of God let go her reins and did not direct her with them. Then she turned round, went back to the place where she had knelt first, and there knelt and laid down her neck. When the Messenger of God dismounted from her, Abū Ayyūb took his saddle into his house. Others of the Anṣār invited him to stay with them but the Messenger of God said to them, "The man goes with his saddle," and stayed with Abū Ayyūb Khālid b. Zayd b. Kulayb among the Banū Ghanm b. al-Najjār.

6. Qur. 8.42; generally held to have been revealed about the time of the battle of Badr.

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): The Messenger of God asked to whom the drying-floor belonged, and Mu'ādh b. 'Afrā' told him, "It belongs to two orphans under my guardianship, whom I will compensate for it." The Messenger of God ordered that a mosque should be built there, and stayed with Abū Ayyūb until the mosque and his living-quarters had been completed.[7]

It is said that the Messenger of God bought the site of his mosque and then built upon it, but the correct version in our opinion is this, according to Mujāhid b. Mūsā—Yazīd b. Hārūn—Ḥammād b. Salamah—Abū al-Tayyāḥ—Anas b. Mālik: The site of the mosque of the Prophet belonged to Banū al-Najjār and contained palm trees, cultivated land and pre-Islamic graves. The Messenger of God said to them, "Ask me a price for it," but they said, "We do not want a price for it, but only the reward we [1260] shall receive from God." The Messenger of God then gave orders concerning the site; the palm trees were cut down, the cultivated land levelled, and the graves dug up. Before this mosque was completed the Messenger of God used to pray in sheep-enclosures or wherever the time of prayer overtook him.

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): He himself joined in the work of building his mosque, together with his companions from the Emigrants and the Anṣār.

Deaths and Minor Events

In this year the mosque of Qubā' was built.

The first Muslim to die after the Prophet's arrival in Medina, it is said, was Kulthūm b. al-Hidm, in whose house in Qubā' he had lodged; his death occurred shortly afterwards. There followed in the same year of the Prophet's arrival the death of Abū Umāmah As'ad b. Zurārah, which occurred before the Messenger of God had finished building his mosque; it resulted from diphtheria and a rattling in the throat.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abd Allāh b. Abī Bakr—Yaḥyā b. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān: The Messenger of God said, "The death of Abū Umā-

7. What was built was primarily the living quarters for Muḥammad and his wives. At first, the mosque was presumably only the courtyard beside these.

mah is an evil thing for the Jews and the Arab Hypocrites. They say, 'If Muḥammad were a prophet, his companion would not have died'; but I have no power with God either for myself or for my companion."

According to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-A'lā—Yazīd b. Zuray'—Ma'mar—al-Zuhrī—Anas: The Messenger of God cauterised As'ad b. Zurārah for a whitlow (shawkah).[8]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Āṣim b.
[1261] 'Umar b. Qatādah: Abū Umāmah As'ad b. Zurārah had been the representative (naqīb)[9] of Banū al-Najjār, and when he died they came as a group to the Messenger of God and said, "O Messenger of God, you know what position this man held among us; appoint one of us to his place to perform for us the functions he used to perform." The Messenger of God replied, "You are my maternal uncles,[10] and I am one of you; I will be your representative." The Messenger of God was unwilling to single out any one of them for this honour to the disadvantage of others. As a result, it was counted a distinction for the people of Banū al-Najjār that the Messenger of God was their representative.

In this year there died Abū Uḥayḥah in al-Ṭā'if with all his wealth, and al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah and al-'Āṣ b. Wā'il al-Sahmī in Mecca.[11]

The Marriage with 'Ā'ishah

In this year also the Messenger of God consummated his marriage with 'Ā'ishah.[12] This was in Dhū al-Qa'dah (May–June 623) eight

8. The identification of shawkah with "whitlow" is based on Hava's Dictionary. Elsewhere it is said to be a redness of face or body (Lane; Lisān al-'arab; s.v.).

9. At the second meeting at al-'Aqabah (June 622) twelve men were appointed as nuqabā' (sing. naqīb) or "representatives" of the Anṣār, the Muslims from Medina. They were leading men in their clans, but their function is obscure; see Watt, Mecca, 145–8; Medina, 248.

10. He is referring to the fact that his great-grandmother, Salmā bt. 'Amr, wife of Hāshim, was of Banū al-Najjār.

11. These were three powerful Meccan leaders of an older generation who had opposed Muḥammad; see Watt, Mecca, index.

12. 'Ā'ishah was the daughter of Abū Bakr, Muḥammad's chief lieutenant, and the marriage was important in cementing the relationship of the two men. According to the statements given below, the original marriage, which could be considered rather a betrothal, must have been about April or May, 620 or 621, since months after his arrival in Medina according to some accounts, or in Shawwāl (April–May 623) seven months after his arrival according to others. He had married her in Mecca three years before the Hijrah, after the death of Khadījah. At that time she was six or, according to other accounts, seven years old.

According to ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Bayān al-Sukkarī—Muḥammad b. Yazīd—Ismāʿīl (that is, Ibn Abī Khālid)—ʿAbd al-Raḥman b. Abī al-Ḍaḥḥāk—a man from Quraysh—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad: ʿAbd Allāh b. Ṣafwān together with another person came to ʿĀʾishah, and ʿĀʾishah said (to the latter), "O so-and-so, have you heard what Ḥafṣah has been saying?"[13] He said, "Yes, O Mother of the Faithful." ʿAbd Allāh b. Ṣafwān asked her, "What is that?" She replied, "There are nine special features in me that have not been in any woman, except for what God bestowed on Maryam bt. ʿImrān.[14] By God, I do not say this to exalt myself over any of my companions." "What are these?" he asked. She replied, "The angel brought down my likeness; the Messenger of God married me when I was seven; my marriage was consummated when I was nine; he married me when I was a virgin, no other man having shared me with him; inspiration came to him when he and I were in a single blanket; I was one of the dearest people to him; a verse of the Qurʾān was revealed concerning me when the community was almost destroyed;[15] I saw Gabriel when none of his other wives saw him; and he was taken (that is, died) in his house when there was nobody with him but the angel and myself." [1262]

According to Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): The Messenger of God married her, so it is said, in Shawwāl, and consummated his marriage to her in a later year, also in Shawwāl.

---

intercalary months presumably kept Shawwāl about the same time of the solar year.

13. Daughter of the second caliph ʿUmar; married Muḥammad in 3/625. "Mother of the Faithful" was a title conferred on Muḥammad's wives in 9/630 probably; and this incident must have occurred later; see Watt, Medina, 286f.

14. That is, Mary the mother of Jesus (see Qur. 3.35f.; 66.12); but hardly any of the special features apply to her.

15. This refers to the scandal about ʿĀʾishah after the raid on the tribe of al-Muṣṭaliq in 5/627. The verse is held to be Qur. 24.11.

Further Reports Concerning This

According to Ibn Bashshār—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd—Sufyān—Ismā'īl b. Umayyah—'Abd Allāh b. 'Urwah—his father ('Urwah)[16]—'Ā'ishah: The Messenger of God married me in Shawwāl and consummated his marriage to me in Shawwāl. 'Ā'ishah liked her women's marriages to be consummated in Shawwāl.

According to Ibn Wakī'—his father—Sufyān—Ismā'īl b.
[1263] Umayyah—'Abd Allāh b. 'Urwah—'Urwah—'Ā'ishah: The Messenger of God married me in Shawwāl and consummated his marriage to me in Shawwāl, and which of the Messenger of God's wives did he favour more than me? 'Ā'ishah liked her women's marriages to be consummated in Shawwāl.

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): It is said that the Messenger of God consummated his marriage to her on a Wednesday in Shawwāl in the house of (her father) Abū Bakr in al-Sunḥ.[17]

Muslim Women Brought to Medina

In this year the Prophet sent Zayd b. Ḥārithah and Abū Rāfi' to his daughters and his wife Sawdah bt. Zam'ah, and they brought them from Mecca to Medina.[18] It is said that when 'Abd Allāh b. Urayqiṭ[19] returned to Mecca he informed 'Abd Allāh b. Abī Bakr of the situation of his father Abū Bakr, and the latter brought his father's family to him. The party included Umm Rūmān, the mother of 'Ā'ishah, ('Ā'ishah herself) and 'Abd Allāh b. Abī Bakr, and they were accompanied to Medina by Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubayd Allāh.

---

16. 'Urwah, a son of al-Zubayr, had access to 'A'ishah because she was his maternal aunt. His important collection of historical material was known to al-Ṭabarī, partly through Ibn Isḥāq and partly through other channels. See n. 56 below.

17. Al-Sunḥ was a district of Medina where Abū Bakr lodged in the house of one of the local Muslims (IH, 334).

18. Zayd b. Ḥārithah was Muḥammad's adoptive son and Abū Rāfi' his mawlā or client. It is usually said that they escorted to Medina his two unmarried daughters, Umm Kulthūm and Fāṭimah, as well as his wife Sawdah, whom he had married after Khadījah's death.

19. Or b. Arqaṭ. He was a pagan who had guided Muḥammad and Abū Bakr on their Hijrah from Mecca to Medina.

Prayers of Travellers

In this year, it is said, two rak'ahs were added to the prayers of those who were not travelling; up till now the prayers of those not travelling and of those travelling had both been of two rak'ahs. This change took place a month after the arrival of the Messenger of God in Medina, that is, on 12 Rabī' al-Ākhir (October 24, 622). Al-Wāqidī asserts that there is no difference of opinion among the people of Ḥijāz on this point.

Births

In this year also, some say, 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubayr was born;[20] but according to al-Wāqidī, he was born in the second year of the Messenger of God's residence in Medina, in Shawwāl (April 624).

According to Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī: Ibn al-Zubayr was born in Medina twenty months after the Hijrah.

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): He was the first child born to the Emigrants in the abode of the Hijrah. It is said that the [1264]
Messenger of God's companions cried, "Allāh Akbar" ("God is very great"), when he was born. This was because a story was current among the Muslims that the Jews claimed that they had bewitched the Muslims so that no children would be born to them. The Muslims praised God in joy that he had shown the Jews' claim to be false. His mother, Asmā' bt. Abī Bakr, is said to have been pregnant with him when she emigrated to Medina.

It is also said that al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr was born in this year and that he was the first child born to the Anṣār after the Emigration of the Prophet to them.

Al-Wāqidī denies that this (happened in year 1).

According to Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—al-Wāqidī—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Sahl b. Abī Ḥathmah—his father—his grandfather: The first child born to the Anṣār was al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr, who was born fourteen months after the Hijrah (about October– 20. Son of the prominent Companion al-Zubayr. He attempted to set himself up as caliph in Mecca from 64/684 to 73/692. 'Urwah (n.16) was his full brother.

November 623); the Messenger of God died when he was aged eight or a little more. Al-Nu'mān was born three or four months before Badr.

According to Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—Muṣ'ab b. Thābit—Abū al-Aswad: Al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr was mentioned in the presence of Ibn al-Zubayr, and he said, "He is six months older than I."

According to Abū al-Aswad: Ibn al-Zubayr was born exactly twenty months after the Hijrah of the Messenger of God, and al-Nu'mān was born in Rabī' al-Ākhir, year 2 (October 623), fourteen months after the Hijrah.

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): It is said that al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd al-Thaqafī and Ziyād b. Sumayyah were born in this year.

Expedition Led by Ḥamzah

[1265] Al-Wāqidī asserts that in this year, in Ramaḍān, seven months after the Hijrah (about March 623), the Messenger of God entrusted a white banner to Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib with the command of thirty men of the Emigrants. Their aim was to intercept the caravans of Quraysh. Ḥamzah met Abū Jahl at the head of three hundred men. Majdī b. 'Amr al-Juhanī intervened between them, and they separated without a battle. The banner of Ḥamzah was carried by Abū Marthad.[21]

Expedition Led by 'Ubaydah

(He also says that) in this year, eight months after the Hijrah, in Shawwāl (April 623), the Messenger of God entrusted a white banner to 'Ubaydah b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Muṭṭalib b. 'Abd Manāf and ordered him to march to Baṭn Rābigh. His banner was carried by Misṭaḥ b. Uthāthah. He reached the pass of al-Marah, which is near al-Juḥfah, at the head of sixty Emigrants without a single Anṣārī (Muslim of Medina) among them. They met the polythe-

21. This is usually known as the expedition of Sīf al-Baḥr; cf. IH, 419–21; W, 9f. Ḥamzah was Muḥammad's uncle.

ists at a watering place called Aḥyā'; they shot arrows at one another but there was no hand-to-hand fighting.

There is a difference of opinion as to who was the commander of the (Meccan) expedition; some say that it was Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb and some that it was Mikraz b. Ḥafṣ.

Al-Wāqidī says: I consider the true account to be that it was Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb, and that he was at the head of two hundred polytheists.[22]

Expedition Led by Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ

In this year, in Dhū al-Qa'dah, the Messenger of God entrusted to Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ a white banner (for an expedition) to al-Kharrār. It was carried by al-Miqdād b. 'Amr.[23]

According to Abū Bakr b. Ismā'īl—his father—'Āmir b. Sa'd—his father: I set out on foot at the head of twenty men (or, twenty-one men). We used to lie hidden by day and march at night, until we reached al-Kharrār on the fifth morning. The Messenger of God had enjoined me not to go beyond al-Kharrār, but the caravan had got to al-Kharrār a day before me; there were sixty men with it. Those who were with Sa'd were all from the Emigrants. [1266]

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): Ibn Isḥāq's[24] account of all these expeditions differs from that of al-Wāqidī, which I have just related, and places them all in year 2.

Expedition Led by Muḥammad to al-Abwā'

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: The Messenger of God came to Medina on the twelfth of

22. The expedition of Rābigh, placed before Sīf al-Baḥr by IH, 416–8; cf. W, lof. Abū Sufyān of the clan of 'Abd Shams/Umayyah was one of the leading men in Mecca, and played an important part in later events. Art. Abū Sufyān in *EI*²; Watt, Medina, index.

23. See IH, 422f.; W,11.

24. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq (d. 150/767) is the author of the Sīrah (biography) of the Prophet, which is the primary source for his career. It has been preserved and published in the recension of Ibn Hishām (d. 218/833), and was also used by al-Ṭabarī in a different recension (see n.99). The other extant early source is the Maghāzī of al-Wāqidī (d. 207/823), which was also used by al-Ṭabarī. See Sezgin, GAS, i.288–90; 294–9.

Rabī' al-Awwal (September 24, 622), and remained there for the rest of Rabī' al-Awwal, Rabī' al-Ākhir, the two Jumādās, Rajab, Sha'bān, Ramaḍān, Shawwāl, Dhū al-Qa'dah, Dhū al-Ḥijjah—the pilgrimage in that month was directed by the polytheists—and Muḥarram. In Ṣafar (which began August 4, 623), nearly twelve months after his arrival in Medina on the twelfth of Rabī' al-Awwal, he went out on a raid as far as Waddān, searching for Quraysh and the Banū Ḍamrah b. Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah. This was the expedition of al-Abwā',[25] in the course of which the Banū Ḍamrah made a treaty of friendship with him; their fellow-tribesman and chief, Makhshī b. 'Amr, acted on their behalf. Then the Messenger of God returned to Medina without any [1267] fighting, and remained there for the rest of Ṣafar and the beginning of Rabī' al-Awwal.

Further Details About Expeditions

During this stay he sent 'Ubaydah b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Muṭṭalib at the head of eighty or sixty horsemen from the Emigrants without a single Anṣārī among them. He got as far as Aḥyā', a watering place in Ḥijāz, below the pass of al-Marah.[26] There he met a great band of Quraysh, but there was no fighting between them, except that Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ shot an arrow on that day, which was the first arrow shot in Islam. Then the two groups separated from one another, the Muslims leaving a rearguard. Al-Miqdād b. 'Amr al-Bahrānī, the confederate (ḥalīf) of the Banū Zuhrah, and 'Utbah b. Ghazwān b. Jābir, the confederate of the Banū Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf, fled from the polytheists to the Muslims. They were Muslims, but they had gone to try to effect a reconciliation between the unbelievers and the Muslims. The commander of the Meccan detachment was 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl.

Muḥammad (b. Isḥāq) says: The banner of 'Ubaydah, I have heard, was the first banner which the Messenger of God entrusted to a Muslim in Islam.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: Some of the scholars assert that the Messenger of God sent him

25. See IH, 415f.; W, 11f.; see also 1270f. below.
26. Apparently the same expedition as that reported 1265 above.

out while he was returning from the raid of al-Abwā', before he reached Medina.

During this stay he sent Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib at the head of thirty horsemen from the Emigrants, without a single Anṣārī among them, to Sīf al-Baḥr, near al-'Īṣ, which is in the territory of Juhaynah. He met Abū Jahl b. Hishām on the coast there at the head of three hundred Meccan horsemen. Majdī b. 'Amr al- [1268]
Juhanī intervened between them, being on friendly terms with both parties, and the two sides separated without a battle.[27]

Some say that the banner of Ḥamzah was the first banner which the Messenger of God entrusted to a Muslim. This is because he sent him and 'Ubaydah b. al-Ḥārith at the same time, so that there is confusion on this point.

What we have heard from scholars to whom we have spoken is that the banner of 'Ubaydah b. al-Ḥārith was the first banner to be entrusted in Islam.

Expeditions Led by Muḥammad

Then the Messenger of God led an expedition in Rabī' al-Ākhir (which began October 2, 623) in search of Quraysh. He went as far as Buwāṭ in the region of Raḍwā and then returned without any fighting.[28]

He stayed in Medina for the rest of Rabī' al-Ākhir and part of Jumādā al-Ūlā (which began October 31, 623) and then led another expedition in search of Quraysh.[29] He took the mountain track of the Banū Dīnār b. al-Najjār (of Medina) and then crossed the desert of al-Khabār, halting beneath a tree in the Baṭḥā' Ibn Azhar called Dhāt al-Sāq. He prayed there, and his mosque is there. Food was prepared for him there, and he and those with him ate. The site there of the stones on which his cooking-pot was supported is still well-known. Water was brought to him from water called al-Mushayrib. Then he set off, leaving al- [1269] Khalā'iq on the left and going through a pass, now called Shu'bat 'Abd Allāh. From that point, he went down to the left until he

27. Apparently the same expedition as the one reported 1265 above before that led by 'Ubaydah.

28. Expedition to Buwāṭ: IH, 421; W, 12. See also 1271 below.

29. Expedition of al-'Ushayrah: IH, 421f.; W, 12f. See also 1271 below.

reached Yalyal, halting where Yalyal adjoined al-Ḍabūʿah. Water was brought to him from a well at al-Ḍabūʿah. Next, he went through the plain of Malal until he joined the road at Ṣukhayrāt al-Yamām, then kept to the road until he halted at al-ʿUshayrah in the Baṭn Yanbuʿ. He stayed there for the rest of Jumādā al-Ūlā and a few days of Jumādā al-Ākhira (which began November 30, 623). During this time, the Banū Mudlij and their confederates from the Banū Ḍamrah made a treaty of friendship with him. Then he went back to Medina without any fighting. In the course of this expedition he made certain remarks to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

The Messenger of God had only spent a few days in Medina, less than ten, after coming back from the expedition to al-ʿUshayrah, before Kurz b. Jābir al-Fihrī raided the herds of Medina. The [1270] Messenger of God went out in pursuit of him and reached a valley called Safawān in the region of Badr, but Kurz eluded him and was not caught. This was the first expedition of Badr.[30]

Then the Messenger of God returned to Medina and stayed there for the rest of Jumādā al-Ākhirah, Rajab and Shaʿbān (December 623 to February 25, 624). Among other expeditions he sent out at this time was one under Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ at the head of eight men.[31]

Affair of Abū Qays

Al-Wāqidī asserts that in this year, the first year of the Hijrah, Abū Qays b. al-Aslat came to the Messenger of God;[32] the Messenger of God proposed Islam to him, and he said, "How excellent is that to which you call me! I will settle my affairs and then return to you." ʿAbd Allāh b. Ubayy[33] met him and said to him, "By God, you are unwilling to fight the Khazraj!" So Abū Qays said, "I will not become a Muslim for a year." He died, however, in Dhū al-Qaʿdah (which began May 7, 623).

---

30. Expedition of Safwān or Badr I: IH, 423; W,12. See also 1271 below.

31. Possibly another version of the expedition to al-Kharrār. See also 1265 above and n.23.

32. Abū Qays had been a prominent man in the struggles in Medina before the Hijrah, as chief of the clan of Wāʾil and leader of the wider group known as Aws Manāt; cf. Watt, Medina, index.

33. Leader of the Munāfiqūn or Hypocrites, who were nominally Muslims but opposed Muḥammad in various ways.

The Events of the Year 2

(JULY 5, 623–JUNE 23, 624)

Expeditions Led by the Messenger of God

In this year, according to all the Sīrah-writers, the Messenger of God personally led the expedition of Al-Abwā', or, as it is sometimes called, Waddān; the two places are six miles apart and opposite one another.[34] When he went there, the Messenger of God left Sa'd b. 'Ubādah b. Dulaym in command of Medina.[35] On this expedition his banner was carried by Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, and was, it is said, white.

Al-Wāqidī asserts that he stayed there for fifteen days and then returned to Medina.

According to Al-Wāqidī: Then the Messenger of God went on an expedition at the head of two hundred of his companions in the month of Rabī' al-Ākhir (which began October 2, 623), and reached Buwāṭ. His intention was to intercept the caravan of [1271]

34. See 1266 above and n. 25.

35. Sa'd b. 'Ubādah of the clan of Sā'idah was a leader of the whole tribe of al-Khazraj, and in Muḥammad's closing years became leader of all the Anṣār.

Quraysh, led by Umayyah b. Khalaf with a hundred men of Quraysh and two thousand five hundred camels.[36] In the end he returned to Medina without fighting. His banner was carried by Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, and he left Sa'd b. Mu'ādh in command of Medina during this expedition.[37]

Earlier, in Rabī' al-Awwal (which began September 2, 623), he went on an expedition at the head of the Emigrants in pursuit of Kurz b. Jābir al-Fihrī.[38] This man had raided the flocks of Medina which were pastured in al-Jammā' and had driven them off; the Messenger of God pursued him as far as Badr but failed to catch up with him. His banner was carried by 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, and he left Zayd b. Ḥārithah in command of Medina.

In this year the Messenger of God set forth at the head of the Emigrants to intercept the caravan of Quraysh when it set off for Syria. This was the expedition of al-'Ushayrah,[39] and it went as far as Yanbu'. He left Abū Salamah b. 'Abd al-Asad in command of Medina. His banner was carried by Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib.

'Alī and the Name Abū Turāb

According to Sulaymān b. 'Umar b. Khālid al-Raqqī—Muḥammad b. Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq[40]—Muḥammad b. Yazīd b. Khuthaym—Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Quraẓī—Yazīd b. Khuthaym (father of Muḥammad b. Yazīd b. Khuthaym)—'Ammār b. Yāsir: I and 'Alī were companions with the Messenger of God on the expedition of al-'Ushayrah. We halted on one occasion and saw some men of the Banū Mudlij working in one of their [1272] date groves, and I said, "Why don't we go and watch how they are working?" So we went and watched them for a while; then we felt drowsy and went to a date grove and went to sleep on some

36. See 1268 above and n. 28.

37. Sa'd b. Mu'ādh of the clan of 'Abd al-Ashhal was leader of the whole tribe of al-Aws and in effect of all the Anṣār.

38. See 1269f. above and n. 30.

39. See 1268 above and n. 29.

40. IH, 422; but only the second isnād is given; there is confusion about whether Yazīd was the son of Khuthaym and Muḥammad the grandson, or vice versa. Abū Turāb is literally "father of dust"; see also n.166 below.

dusty ground under the trees. The Messenger of God himself woke us up, coming to us as we were covered in dust. He stirred 'Alī with his foot and said, "Arise, O dusty one! (Abū Turāb). Shall I tell you who are the most wretched of men? Aḥmar of Thamūd[41] who slaughtered the she-camel, and the person who will strike you on this"—indicating the side of his head—"and will stain this from it,"—and he took hold of his beard.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Muḥammad b. Khuthaym al-Muḥāribī—Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Qurazī—Muḥammad b. Khuthaym, who is Abū Yazīd—'Ammār b. Yāsir: I and 'Alī were companions . . . (and he gave a similar account).

A Variant Account

According to Muḥammad b. 'Ubayd al-Muḥāribī—'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Ḥāzim—his father: Someone said to Sahl b. Sa'd,[42] "A certain governor of Medina intends to send to you (ordering you to) abuse 'Alī from the minbar." He said, "What shall I say?" The man replied, "Say Abū Turāb." Sa'd said, "By God, nobody called him that but the Messenger of God." I said, "How was that, O Abū al-'Abbās?" Sa'd replied, "'Alī went to pay a visit to Fāṭimah, and then came out and lay down in the shadow of the mosque. When the Messenger of God went to pay a visit to Fāṭimah, he [1273] asked her, 'Where is your cousin?' She replied, 'There he is, lying down in the mosque.' The Messenger of God went to him and found him with his cloak fallen off his back and the dust in direct contact with it. He began to wipe the dust off his back and to say, 'Sit up, Abū Turāb!' By God, nobody but the Messenger of God called him that, and, by God, he loved no name better than that."

---

41. The tribe of Thamūd is frequently mentioned in the Qur'ān as having been punished because they hamstrung a sacred camel. The perpetrator of the deed, Aḥmar (elsewhere Uḥaymir) is not named in the Qur'ān but is described as the "most wretched" (ashqā) of them (Qur.91.12).

42. Sahl b. Sa'd, with the kunyah Abū al-'Abbās, was a well-known Anṣārī, said to be aged fifteen in 632, who lived to be over ninety. The request to abuse 'Alī was presumably made under the Umayyads to test whether he had Shī'ite sympathies.

ʿAlī Marries Fāṭimah

According to Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): In this year, a few days before the end of Ṣafar (which ended September 1, 623), ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib married Fāṭimah.[43] I have been told this on the authority of Muḥammad b. ʿAmr—Abū Bakr b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī Sabrah—Isḥāq b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī Farwah—Abū Jaʿfar.

Expedition of Nakhlah[44]

According to Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): When the Messenger of God returned to Medina from his pursuit of Kurz b. Jābir al-Fihrī in Jumādā al-Ākhirah (December 623), he sent out in Rajab (which began December 29, 623) ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh with eight men of the Emigrants without any Anṣārī among them. This was related to me by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī and Yazīd b. Rūmān—ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr. As for al-Wāqidī, he asserts that the Messenger of God sent ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh (at the head of) a detachment of twelve Emigrants.

According to Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī and Yazīd b. Rūmān—[1274] ʿUrwah: The Messenger of God wrote him (i.e., ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh) a letter, but ordered him not to look at it until he had travelled for two days. Then he was to look at it and to carry out what he was commanded in it but not to compel any of his companions to do anything against their will. When ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh had travelled two days, he opened the letter and looked at it, and it said, "When you look at my letter, march until you halt at Nakhlah, between Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif. Observe Quraysh there, and find out for us what they are doing." When ʿAbd Allāh looked at the letter he said, "I heed and obey." Then he said to his companions, "The Messenger of God has commanded me to go to Nakhlah and observe Quraysh so that I can bring him news of them. He has for-

43. Different dates are given for this marriage in other sources; see *EI*², art. Fāṭimah.

44. For this expedition see IH, 423–7 and W, 13–19; also Watt, Medina, 5–8. The leader, ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh, was son of a maternal aunt of Muḥammad's. The reason for the sealed orders was doubtless to prevent enemy agents in Medina from learning the destination and passing on the information to Mecca. The precise location of this Nakhlah is uncertain; the road from Mecca to al-Ṭāʾif runs eastwards.

bidden me to compel any of you against your will, so whoever of you wishes and desires martyrdom, let him come with me, and whoever does not, let him go back. As for myself, I am going to carry out the command of the Messenger of God." He went, and his companions went with him, and not one of them stayed behind. He made his way through Ḥijāz, until, when he was at a mine above al-Furʿ, called Buḥrān, Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ and ʿUtbah b. Ghazwān lost a camel of theirs which they were taking turns to ride. They stayed behind to search for it, but ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh and the rest of his companions went on until he reached Nakhlah. A caravan of Quraysh went past him carrying raisins, leather, and other goods in which Quraysh traded. Among the Quraysh in it were ʿAmr b. al-Ḥaḍramī, ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Mughīrah and his brother Nawfal b. ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Mughīrah, both of the clan of Makhzūm, and al-Ḥakam b. Kaysān the mawlā[45] of Hishām b. al-Mughīrah (also of Makhzūm). When they saw (the Muslims) they were afraid of them, since they had halted very close to them. Then ʿUkkāshah b. Miḥṣan came into view and he had shaved his head, and when they saw him they felt safe [1275] and said, "They are on their way to the ʿumrah (or lesser pilgrimage); there is nothing to fear from them." The (Muslims) consulted one another concerning them, this being the last day of Rajab, and said, "By God, if you leave these people alone today, they will get into the Ḥaram (the sacred territory of Mecca) and be out of your reach there; and if you kill them (today) you will have killed them in the sacred month." They hesitated and were afraid to advance upon them, but then they plucked up courage and agreed to kill as many of them as they could and to seize what they had with them. Wāqid b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Tamīmī shot an arrow at ʿAmr b. al-Ḥaḍramī and killed him, and ʿUthman b. ʿAbd Allāh and al-Ḥakam b. Kaysān surrendered, but Nawfal b. ʿAbd Allāh escaped and they were unable to catch him. Then ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh and his companions took the caravan and the two captives back to the Messenger of God in Medina.

45. At this period the mawlā or "client" was usually a slave, probably one captured in warfare, who had been set free. A man could also become a mawlā by exchanging oaths with a "patron" (also mawlā). Later a non-Arab convert to Islam was attached to an Arab tribe as a mawlā. See I. Goldziher, Muslim Studies, ed. S.M.Stern, London 1967, i.101–4.

Questions After the Return to Medina

Some of the family of ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh relate that he said to his companions, "The Messenger of God receives a fifth of the booty you have taken." This was before God made (surrendering) a fifth of booty taken a duty.[46] He set aside a fifth of the booty for the Messenger of God and divided the rest between his companions. When they reached the Messenger of God he said, "I did not order you to fight in the sacred month," and he impounded the caravan and the two captives and refused to take anything of it. When the Messenger of God said this they were aghast and thought that they were ruined, and the Muslims rebuked them severely for what they had done, saying to them, "You have done what you were not commanded to do, and have fought in the sacred month when you were not commanded to fight." Quraysh said, "Muḥammad and his companions have violated the sacred month and [1276] shed blood in it, have seized property in it and taken men captive in it." Those Muslims who were (still) in Mecca refuted this, saying, "They seized what they seized in (the following month) Shaʿbān." The Jews, seeing in this (event) an omen unfavourable to the Messenger of God, said, "ʿAmr b. al-Ḥaḍramī was killed by Wāqid b. ʿAbd Allāh. 'ʿAmr' means war is flourishing (ʿamarat); 'al-Ḥaḍramī' means war is at hand (ḥaḍarat); 'Wāqid b. ʿAbd Allāh' means war is set ablaze (waqadat)." However God turned this to their disadvantage, not their advantage, and when people began to say this frequently God revealed to His Messenger: "They question thee with regard to warfare in the sacred month. . . ."[47] When the Qurʾānic passage concerning this matter was revealed, and God relieved the Muslims from the fear in which they found themselves, the Messenger of God took possession of the caravan and the two prisoners. Quraysh sent to him to ransom

46. The fifth, khums or khumus. In pre-Islamic Arabia it had been customary for a tribal chief to receive a fourth of any booty taken in order to cover what he expended on behalf of the tribe. Qur. 8.41 prescribes that Muḥammad should receive a fifth and is said to have been revealed after Badr but first applied in the case of the Jewish clan of Qaynuqāʿ. See Watt. Medina, 232, 255. Muḥammad himself was probably not worried at the violation of a month whose sacredness was part of the pagan religion he was attacking, but he would be concerned because some of his followers had strong scruples. These scruples, however, probably got their strength from Muslim fears of Meccan reprisals.

47. Qur. 2.217.

'Uthmān b. 'Abd Allāh and al-Ḥakam b. Kaysān, but the Messenger of God said, "We will not release them to you on payment of ransom until our two companions (meaning Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ and 'Utbah b. Ghazwān) get back, for we are afraid that you may harm them. If you kill them, we will kill your companions." Sa'd and 'Utbah came back, however, and the Messenger of God released the (prisoners) on payment of ransom. As for al-Ḥakam b. Kaysān, he became a Muslim, and an excellent one; he remained with the Messenger of God until he was killed as a martyr at the battle of Bi'r Ma'ūnah.

Expedition of Nakhlah—Another Account

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says that al-Suddī[48] differs from both Muḥammad b. Isḥāq and al-Wāqidī on some points of this story.

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ— [1277] al-Suddī: "They question thee with regard to warfare in the sacred month. Say: Warfare therein is a great (transgression), but to turn (man) from the path of Allah. . . ." This was revealed because the Messenger of God sent a detachment of seven men under the command of 'Abd Allāh b. Jaḥsh al-Asadī, consisting of 'Ammār b. Yāsir, Abū Ḥudhayfah b. 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah, Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, 'Utbah b. Ghazwān al-Sulamī the confederate of the Banū Nawfal, Suhayl b. Baydā', 'Āmir b. Fuhayrah and Wāqid b. 'Abd Allāh al-Yarbū'ī the confederate of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. He wrote a letter (which he gave) to Ibn Jaḥsh, ordering him not to read it until he halted at Baṭn Malal. When he halted at Baṭn Malal, he opened the letter, which read, "March until you halt at Baṭn Nakhlah." He said to his companions, "Whoever desires death, let him go on and make his will; I am making my will and acting on the orders of the Messenger of God." He went on, and Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ and 'Utbah b. Ghazwān, who had lost their riding-camel, stayed behind. They went to Buḥrān in search of it, while Ibn Jaḥsh went to Baṭn Nakhlah. Suddenly he encountered al-Ḥakam b. Kaysān, 'Abd Allah b. Mughīrah, al-Mughīrah b. 'Uthmān, and 'Amr b. al-Ḥaḍramī. They fought and took al-Ḥakam b. Kaysān and 'Abd Allāh b. al-Mughīra captive, while al-

48. Well-known Qur'ān-commentator, d.128/745; see Sezgin, GAS, i.32f.

Mughīrah escaped and ʿAmr b. al-Ḥaḍramī was killed by Wāqid b. ʿAbd Allāh. This was the first booty taken by the companions of Muḥammad. When they returned to Medina with the two captives and the property they had taken, the people of Mecca [1278] wanted to ransom the two captives. The Prophet said, "Let us see how our two companions fare." When Saʿd and his companion returned, he released the two captives on payment of a ransom. The polytheists spread lying slander concerning him, saying, "Muḥammad claims that he is following obedience to God, yet he is the first to violate the holy month and to kill our companion in Rajab." The Muslims said, "We killed him in (the previous month) Jumādā." Some say it was on the first night of Rajab, and some say it was on the last night of Jumādā and that the Muslims sheathed their swords when Rajab began. God revealed in rebuke of the Meccans, "They question thee with regard to warfare in the sacred month. Say: Warfare therein is a great (transgression). . . ."

Further Details About the Expedition of Nakhlah

According to Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): It is said that the Prophet had intended to ask Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ to lead this expedition but then thought it best to ask ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—al-Muʿtamir b. Sulaymān—his father—a man—Abū al-Sawwār—Jundub b. ʿAbd Allāh: The Messenger of God sent a group of men with Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ in charge of them. When he was about to set off he wept in fervent love for the Messenger of God, so he sent another man in his place named ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh. He wrote him a letter, ordering him not to read it until he reached such-and-such a place, (and said) "Do not compel any of your companions to go with you against their will." When he read the letter he said, "Verily, we belong to God and to him we shall return," and also, "Heeding and obeying the command of God and his Messenger (is incumbent)." He told the (others) the news and read them [1279] the letter. Two men went back and the rest went on. They met Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī and killed him, not knowing whether that day was in Rajab or Jumādā. The polytheists said to the Muslims, "You have done such-and-such in the sacred month." They came to the Prophet and told him the story, and God revealed, "They question thee with regard to warfare in the sacred month . . ." up to ". . . for fitnah is worse than killing." The word fitnah here means polytheism.[49]

According to one of those whom I doubt: They were [several] in the expedition, and, by God, only one person killed him, and he said, "If it is a good deed, then I am responsible for it, and if it is a sin, then I do it knowingly."

---

49. Fitnah originally meant the assaying or testing of metals; it then came to have other meanings, such as trying to seduce. A civil war between Muslims is regularly called a fitnah. The phrase in the verse [Qur.2.217] probably means trying to lure men away from their religion rather than simply "polytheism."

Other Events of the Second Year of the Hijrah

The Change of Qiblah[50]

One of these is God's changing of the Muslims' Qiblah (the direction faced in prayer) from Syria (that is, Jerusalem) to the Ka'bah. This was in the second year of the Prophet's residence in Medina, in Sha'bān (which began January 28, 624). The early scholars disagree as to the date at which the Qiblah was changed in this year; the majority say that it was changed halfway through Sha'bān, eighteen months after the arrival of the Messenger of God in Medina.

Those who say this.

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn al-Hamdānī—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn
[1280] 'Abbās and Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some companions of the Prophet: People used to pray towards

50. For the question of the Qiblah, the direction faced by the Muslims in prayer, cf. Watt, Medina, 198–202. The date, middle of Sha'bān (about 11 February 624), is that given in most sources; but it is possible that the change followed a period of hesitation and was not made in a single day. This may explain the reports that the change took place two months earlier, presumably in Jumādā al-Ākhirah (December). The verse quoted is Qur.2.144, but the whole passage 2.142–52 deals with the question of the Qiblah, though it is difficult to relate it to the historical accounts. The change was apparently linked with Muḥammad's changing attitudes towards the Jews.

Jerusalem when the Prophet came to Medina, and for eighteen months after his Emigration. He used to raise his head to heaven when he prayed, to see what he would be commanded; he used to pray towards Jerusalem, and then this was abrogated in favour of the Ka'bah. The Prophet used to like to pray towards the Ka'bah, and God revealed the verse: "We have seen the turning of your face to Heaven . . ."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: The Qiblah was changed in Sha'bān, eighteen months after the arrival of the Messenger of God in Medina.

Ibn Sa'd—al-Wāqidī offers a similar account, adding: The Qiblah was changed to the Ka'bah at midday on Tuesday, halfway through Sha'bān.

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): Others say that the Qiblah was changed to the Ka'bah sixteen months after the beginning of the Hijrah era.

Those who have said this.

According to Al-Muthannā b. Ibrāhīm al-Āmulī—al-Ḥajjāj—Hammām b. Yaḥyā—Qatādah: They used to pray towards Jerusalem while the Messenger of God was in Mecca before the Hijrah. After the Messenger of God emigrated, he prayed towards Jerusalem for sixteen months and after that was turned towards the Ka'bah.

According to Yūnus b. 'Abd al-A'lā—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Zayd: The Prophet turned towards Jerusalem for sixteen months, and then it reached his ears that the Jews were saying, "By God, Muḥammad and his companions did not know where their Qiblah was until we directed them." This displeased the Prophet and he raised his face toward Heaven, and God said, "We have seen the turning of your face to Heaven." [1281]

Arrangements About Fasting[51]

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): In this year, it is said, the fast of Ramaḍān was prescribed, and it is said that it was prescribed in

51. The Jewish fast of the 'Āshūrā' (Day of Atonement) had probably been observed by some Muslims in Medina before the Hijrah; cf. *EI*², art. 'Āshūrā' (A. J.

Sha'bān. When the Prophet came to Medina he saw the Jews fasting on the day of 'Āshūrā'. He questioned them, and they told him that it was the day upon which God drowned the people of Pharaoh and so saved Moses and those with him from them. He said, "We have a better right to Moses than they have," and he fasted and ordered people to fast with him. When the fast of Ramaḍān was prescribed, he did not order them to fast on 'Āshūrā', nor did he forbid them to do so.

In this year he commanded people to pay the zakāt al-fiṭr. It is said that the Prophet addressed the people one or two days before the fiṭr and commanded them to do this.

In this year he went out to al-Muṣallā and prayed the 'Īd prayer there.[52] This was the first occasion on which the people went out to al-Muṣallā for the 'Īd prayer.

In this year, it is said, the Staff was carried to al-Muṣallā for him and he prayed facing it. It belonged to al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām and had been given to him by the Negus, and it was carried before him on festivals. I am informed that it is today in the custody of the muezzins in Medina.

The Battle of Badr—the Date

In this year the greater battle of Badr[53] took place between the Messenger of God and the Unbelievers of Quraysh. This was in the month of Ramaḍān. There is a difference of opinion as to the [1282] day on which the fighting took place between them. Some say the Battle of Badr took place on 19 Ramaḍān (March 15, 624).

Those who have said this.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Hārūn b. al-Mughīrah—'Anbasah

Wensinck). The change to the fast of Ramaḍān is one aspect of the break with the Jews, but the precise details of the change are in dispute. The 'Āshūrā', observed on 10 Muḥarram, remains an optional feast for Muslims. The problems are discussed at length in K. Wagtendonk, Fasting in the Koran, Leiden 1968.

52. The 'īd prayer is that of 'īd al-fiṭr, the festival of the breaking of the fast. The zakāt al-fiṭr, alms of the breaking of the fast, is a prescribed quantity of food to be given to needy persons not later than the day of the 'īd. Both points imply that the fast of Ramaḍān was observed in year 2; but this is unlikely because of the expedition to Badr.

53. For the battle of Badr, see IH,427–539; W,19–174; also Watt, Medina, 10–13.

—Abū Isḥāq—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Aswad—his father—Ibn Mas'ūd: Make your requests (intended) for the Laylat al-Qadr[54] on the nineteenth night of Ramaḍān, for it is the night of Badr.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umārah al-Asadī—'Ubayd Allāh b. Mūsā—Isrā'īl—Abū Isḥāq—Ḥujayr al-Tha'labī—al-Aswad—'Abd Allāh: Make your requests (intended) for the Laylat al-Qadr on the nineteenth of Ramaḍān, for its morning was the morning of Badr.

According to Abū Kurayb—'Ubayd b. Muḥammad al-Muḥāribī—Ibn Abī al-Zinād—his father—Khārijah b. Zayd—Zayd: He used not to celebrate any night of Ramaḍān like the nights of the nineteenth and twenty-third, and in the morning his face would be pale from the effects of sleeplessness. They asked him why, and he said, "On its morning, God distinguished between Truth and Falsehood."

According to others: (The battle of Badr) was on a Friday, on the morning of 17 Ramaḍān (March 13, 624).

Those who have said this.

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—Muḥammad b. Ja'far—Shu'bah—Abū Isḥāq—Ḥujayr—al-Aswad and 'Alqamah—'Abd Allāh b. Mas'ūd: Make your requests (intended) for it (the Laylat al-Qadr) on the seventeenth, and he recited the verse: ". . . the day when the two armies met. . . ." that is, the day of Badr. Then he said, "Or on the nineteenth, or the twenty-first." [1283]

According to Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—al-Thawrī—al-Zubayr—'Adī—Ibrāhīm—al-Aswad—'Abd Allāh: Badr was on the morning of 19 Ramaḍān.

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—al-Thawrī—Abū Isḥāq—al-Aswad—'Abd Allāh give a similar report.

According to Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—al-Wāqidī: I mentioned this to Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ, and he said: "This is the most amazing thing! I never supposed that anyone in the world would doubt this! It was on the morning of 17 Ramaḍān, on Friday."

---

54. The Laylat al-Qadr (Night of Power or Decision) is spoken of in Surah L97, where it is said to be "better than a thousand months." It is popularly supposed that any prayer made on this night will be granted, but the precise date is not known. 19 Ramaḍān is only one suggestion. Cf. Wagtendonk, Fasting, 82–121, esp. 113.

Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ said to me (and I heard ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. Qatādah and Yazīd b. Rūmān saying this), "O my nephew, what need have you to name authorities on this subject? This is too obvious for that. Even the women in their houses are not ignorant of this!"

Al-Wāqidī says: I mentioned it to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī al-Zināḍ, and he said, "My father told me on the authority of Khārijah b. Zayd—Zayd b. Thābit: He used to celebrate the night of [1284] 17 Ramaḍān, and in the morning the traces of sleeplessness would be on his face, and he would say, 'On this morning God distinguished between truth and falsehood, and on this morning he made Islam mighty, and on it he revealed the Qur'ān, and on it he humbled the leaders of unbelief; and the battle of Badr was on Friday.'"

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ—Yaḥyā b. Yaʿqūb, Abū Ṭālib—Abū ʿAwn Muḥammad b. ʿUbayd Allāh al-Thaqafī—Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Sulamī ʿAbd Allāh b. Ḥabīb—al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib: The Laylat al-Furqān, the day when the two armies met, was on 17 Ramaḍān.[55] What provoked the Battle of Badr and the other fighting that took place between the Messenger of God and the polytheists of Quraysh, according to ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr, was the killing of ʿAmr b. al-Ḥaḍramī by Wāqid b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Tamīmī.

The Account of the Greater Battle of Badr in the Letter of ʿUrwah[56]

According to ʿAlī b. Naṣr b. ʿAlī and ʿAbd al-Wārith b. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAbd al-Wārith—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAbd al-Wārith—his father—Abān al-ʿAṭṭār—Hishām b. ʿUrwah: ʿUrwah wrote to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān as follows:

---

55. Part of Qur.8.41 is "on the day of the Furqān, the day the two armies met." The interpretation of the word furqān is difficult, but here it seems to mean something like "discrimination" or "deliverance"; God discriminated between believers and unbelievers, and delivered the believers. Laylat (night) has perhaps been introduced because of the relation to Laylat al-Qadr. For Furqān, see *EI*², art. Furḳān (R. Paret), and Watt, Bell's Introduction to the Qur'ān, Edinburgh 1970, 145–7.

56. This letter from ʿUrwah (cf.n.16) to the Umayyad caliph ʿAbd al-Malik is an important source apparently unknown to Ibn Isḥāq.

You have written to me asking about Abū Sufyān and the circumstances of his expedition. Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb came from Syria at the head of nearly seventy horsemen from all [1285] the clans of Quraysh. They had been trading in Syria and they all came together with their money and their merchandise. The Messenger of God and his companions were informed about them. This was after fighting had broken out between them and people had been killed, including Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī at Nakhlah, and some of Quraysh had been taken captive, including one of the sons of al-Mughīrah and their mawlā, Ibn Kaysān. Those responsible were ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh and Wāqid, the confederate of the Banū ʿAdī b. Kaʿb, together with other companions of the Messenger of God whom he had sent out with ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh. This incident had provoked (a state of) war between the Messenger of God and Quraysh and was the beginning of the fighting in which they inflicted casualties upon one another; it took place before Abū Sufyān and his companions had set out for Syria.

Subsequently Abū Sufyān and the horsemen of Quraysh who were with him returned from Syria, following the coastal road. When the Messenger of God heard about them he called together his companions and told them of the wealth they had with them and the fewness of their numbers. The Muslims set out with no other object than Abū Sufyān and the horsemen with him. They did not think that these were anything but (easy) booty and did not suppose that there would be a great battle when they met them. It is concerning this that God revealed, "And ye longed that other than the armed one might be yours."[57]

When Abū Sufyān heard that the companions of the Messenger of God were on their way to intercept him, he sent to Quraysh (saying), "Muḥammad and his companions are going to intercept your caravan, so protect your merchandise." When Quraysh heard this, since all the clans of Kaʿb b. Luʾayy[58] were represented in Abū Sufyān's caravan, the

57. Qur.8.7. The previous words are: "When God promised you one of the two bands (either the caravan or the armed body which came out to protect it). . . ."

58. Luʾayy was the grandson of Quraysh (Fihr), and all the main clans of Quraysh except two were his descendants. Cf. the genealogical table, Watt, Mecca, 7.

[1286] people of Mecca hastened towards it. The body of men was drawn from the clans comprised in the Banū Ka'b b. Lu'ayy but did not contain any of the clan of 'Āmir, except for some of the subclan of Mālik b. Ḥisl. Neither the Messenger of God nor his companions heard about this force from Mecca until the Prophet reached Badr, which was on the route of those horsemen of Quraysh who had taken the coastal road to Syria. Abū Sufyān then doubled back from Badr and kept to the coastal road, being afraid of an ambush at Badr.

The Prophet marched forward and spent the night near Badr. He sent al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām at the head of a group of his companions to the water of Badr. They did not suppose that Quraysh had come out against them, but while the Prophet was standing in prayer some water-carriers of Quraysh suddenly came to draw water at the water of Badr. Among these water-carriers was a black slave of the Banū al-Ḥajjāj. The men whom the Messenger of God had sent with al-Zubayr to the water seized him, while some of the slave's companions escaped towards Quraysh. They brought him to the Messenger of God in his bivouac, and questioned him about Abū Sufyān and his companions, having no idea that he was not of that party. The slave began to tell them about (the protecting force of) Quraysh, which of them had set out and who their leaders were, and gave them a true account. This account, however, was the most unwelcome possible, for the only object of their expedition at the time was Abū Sufyān and his companions. Meanwhile the Prophet was praying, bowing and prostrating himself, (and also) seeing and hearing the treatment of the slave. When (the slave) told them that Quraysh had come to meet them, they began to beat him and call him a liar, saying, "You are trying to conceal the whereabouts of Abū Sufyān and his companions."

[1287] When they beat him severely and asked him about Abū Sufyān and his companions, although he had no knowledge about them and was only one of Quraysh's water-carriers he said, "Yes, this is Abū Sufyān." In fact the convoy was below them, as is referred to in the word of God: "When ye were on the near bank (of the valley) and they were on the yonder bank, and the caravan was below you (on the coast plain). . . ." up to ". . . a thing that must be done."[59]

When the slave said to them, "This is Quraysh who have come out against you," they beat him, but when he said, "This is Abū Sufyān," they left him alone. When the Prophet saw what they were doing he left off his prayer, having heard the information which (the slave) had given them. They assert that the Messenger of God said, "By Him in Whose hand my soul rests, you beat him when he tells the truth and leave him alone when he lies." They said, "He is telling us that Quraysh have come." He replied, "He is telling the truth. Quraysh have come to protect their horsemen." He called the slave and questioned him, and the slave told him about Quraysh, and said, "I know nothing about Abū Sufyān." He asked him how many people there were, and the slave said, "By God, I do not know. There is a large number of them." They assert that the Prophet said, "Who fed them the day before yesterday?" and the slave named a man who had fed them. Then he said, "How many camels did he slaughter for them?" and the slave said, "Nine." Then he said, "Who fed them yesterday?" and the slave named a man. "How many camels did he slaughter for them?" he asked. "Ten," the slave said. They assert that the Prophet said, "There are between nine hundred and a thousand of them." The force of [1288]
Quraysh on that day was, in fact, nine hundred and fifty.

The Prophet set off and dismounted at the water. He filled up the cisterns and stationed his companions round them, waiting for the enemy to arrive. When the Messenger of God came to Badr, he said, "This is where you will fight." Thus Quraysh found that the Prophet had reached Badr before them and occupied it. When they came upon him, they assert that the Prophet said, "This is Quraysh, who have come with their hubbub and their boasting to oppose you and to show your Messenger to be a liar. O God, I ask you for what you have promised me." When Quraysh advanced he met them and threw dust in their faces, and God put them to flight.[60]

59. Qur.8.42. The verse asserts that the encounter between the Muslims and the armed party of Quraysh could not have happened in the normal course of events but was purposely brought about by God.

Before the Prophet met the force from Mecca a horseman from Abū Sufyān and his convoy came to these and said, "Go back!"[61]—meaning that Quraysh was to withdraw while they were at al-Juḥfah. They said, "By God, we will not go back without halting at Badr and staying there for three nights so that the men of Ḥijāz who have come to us can see us, for none of the Arabs will see us and our army and dare to fight us." They are the people concerning whom God said, ". . . who came forth from their dwellings boastfully and to be seen of men."[62]

The Meccan force and the Prophet met and God gave victory to His Messenger, shamed the leaders of the unbelievers, and satisfied the Muslims' thirst for revenge on them.

Another Account

According to Hārūn b. Isḥāq—Muṣ'ab b. al-Miqdām—Isrā'īl—Abū Isḥāq[63]—Ḥārithah—'Alī: When we came to Medina we ate of its produce and became jaded with it and unwell from eating it.
[1289] The Messenger of God was making enquiries about Badr, and when we learnt that the polytheists had come the Messenger of God went to Badr (which is a well) and we got there before the polytheists. We found there two of them, a man of Quraysh and a mawlā of 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ. As for the Qurashī, he escaped, and as for 'Uqba's mawlā, we took him and began to say, "How many men are there?" He said, "By God, they are many and formidable," and when he said that the Muslims began to beat him. Finally, they took him to the Messenger of God, and he said to him, "How many men are there?" He said, "By God, they are many and formidable." The Prophet tried to get him to tell him how many there were, but he refused. Then the Messenger of God

60. This is said to be evidence of a belief in magic, and it is claimed that Qur. 8.17 refers to it: "thou threwest not when thou didst throw but God threw"; but cf. Watt, Medina, 312f. [W,81 has the word ramā in the story.] Cf. 1322 below.

61. Omitting the words wa-l-rakabu alladhīna in De Goeje's text.

62. Qur. 8.47.

63. The historian Abū Isḥāq al-Sabī'ī (d. 127/745); cf. Sezgin, GAS, i.283.

asked him how many camels they slaughtered (for food) every day and he replied, "Ten each day." The Messenger of God said, "There are a thousand of them."

During the night there was a light drizzle, and we went under trees and leather shields to shelter from the rain there. The Messenger of God spent the night calling upon his Lord as follows: "O God, if this group perishes you will not be worshipped on earth." When dawn broke, he called out, "Come to prayer, servants of God!" and the people came from under the trees and the leather shields. The Messenger of God led us in prayer and urged us on to fight. Then he said, "The army of Quraysh is by that hillside." When they approached us and we drew ourselves up against them we suddenly saw a man on a red camel moving among them. The Messenger of God said, "'Alī, summon Ḥamzah to me (he was the closest to the unbelievers) and ask him who the man on the red camel is, and what he is saying to them." The Messenger of God said, "If there is anyone among them who will give them good advice, perhaps it will be the man on the red camel." Ḥamzah came [1290] to him, and said, "It is 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah, and he is telling them not to fight, and is saying to them, 'I see people who are determined to fight to the death. Your meeting them will not have any good outcome for yourselves. Wrap up my head, men, and say, "'Utbah b. Rabī'ah has turned coward"; yet you know that I am not the most cowardly of you.'"

Abū Jahl heard that and said, "Is this what you are saying? By God, if it were anyone else saying this, I would bite him! Your lungs and your belly are full of fear?" 'Utbah replied, "Are you abusing me, you cowardly wretch? You will see today which of us is the greater coward!" Then 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah, his brother Shaybah b. Rabī'ah, and his son al-Walīd went in front of the army in a fighting frenzy, and said, "Who will meet us in single combat?" Six young men of the Anṣār came forward, but 'Utbah said, "We do not want these; we want some of our cousins from the sons of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib!"[64] The Messenger of God said, "'Alī, rise up! Ḥamzah, rise up! 'Ubaydah b. al-Ḥārith, rise up!" Then God killed 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah, Shaybah b. Rabī'ah, and al-Walīd b. 'Ut-bah, and 'Ubaydah b. al-Ḥārith was wounded, and then we killed seventy of them and took seventy of them captive.

64. Muḥammad's grandfather; but 'Ubaydah b. al-Ḥārith is from the clan of al-Muṭṭalib, which was closely associated with the clan of Hāshim.

A short man of the Anṣār brought al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib[65] captive, and the latter said, "O Messenger of God, it was not this man who took me captive, but a man with bald temples, one of the most handsome of men, on a piebald horse, whom I cannot see among your army." The Anṣārī said, "It was I who took him captive!" The Messenger of God replied, "God assisted you with a noble angel." 'Alī said, "Of the sons of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib there were taken captive al-'Abbās, 'Aqīl, and Nawfal b. al-Ḥārith.

According to Ja'far b. Muḥammad al-Buzūrī—'Ubayd Allāh b.
[1291] Mūsā—Isrā'īl—Abū Isḥāq—Ḥārithah—'Alī: When it was the day of Badr, and we were facing the enemy, we feared for the Messenger of God, for he was one of the most intrepid of men, and none of us was closer to the enemy than he.

According to 'Amr b. 'Alī—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī—Shu'bah —Abū Isḥāq—Ḥārithah b. Muḍarrib—'Alī: I heard him saying, "There was no horseman among us on the day of Badr except for Miqdād b. al-Aswad,[66] and I saw no one among us who was not sleeping except for the Messenger of God, who was standing by a tree praying and calling upon God until the morning."

Account of Badr by Ibn Isḥāq

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq:[67] The Messenger of God heard that Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb was coming from Syria in a great caravan belonging to Quraysh containing money and merchandise of theirs and including thirty or forty horsemen of Quraysh, among them Makhramah b. Nawfal b.

---

65. The Prophet's uncle. Because he was the ancestor of the 'Abbāsid dynasty, the historians of that period tend to minimize the extent of his opposition to Muḥammad; but references such as this show that he fought with the Meccans at Badr and was taken prisoner. Cf. A. Guillaume, The Life of Muhammad (translation of Ibn Isḥāq), London 1955, xliv, 338n.; also 1323, 1339f., 1344, and n.101 below.

66. W, 27 says there were two horses and calls this man al-Miqdād b. 'Amr, a confederate of the clan of Zuhrah.

67. From this point on, al-Ṭabarī gives Ibn Isḥāq's account of the battle of Badr (commencing IH, 428) with some slight additions and some omissions (cf. n. 101).

Uhayb b. ʿAbd Manāf b. Zuhrah and ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ b. Wāʾil b. Hishām b. Suʿayd b. Sahm.[68]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —Muḥammad b. Muslim al-Zuhrī and ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. Qatādah and ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī Bakr and Yazīd b. Rūmān—ʿUrwah and other scholars—ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAbbās: All of them have told me part of this narrative, and their narrative is combined in the narrative I have given concerning Badr:[69] When the Messenger of God heard that Abū Sufyān was coming from Syria, he called the Muslims, both Emigrants and Anṣār, to go against them, saying, "This is the caravan of Quraysh, containing their wealth; so go out against it, and it is to be hoped that God will give it to you as booty." The people went out in answer to his urging, some eagerly and some reluctantly, as the latter did not suppose that the Messenger of God would take any booty. Abū Sufyān had been seeking information and questioning the riders whom he met as he approached Ḥijāz, being fearful for his people's wealth. Finally he received news from some riders; "Muḥammad has called his companions together to fight against you and your caravan." He was on his guard after that, and he engaged the services of Ḍamḍam b. ʿAmr al-Ghifārī and sent him to Mecca, telling him to go to Quraysh and summon them to come out to fight to protect their property, and to inform them that Muḥammad and his companions had set off to intercept the caravan. So Ḍamḍam b. ʿAmr set off swiftly to Mecca. [1292]

The Dream of ʿĀtikah, and the Relief Force

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—one whose veracity I do not doubt—ʿIkrimah the mawlā of Ibn ʿAbbās—Ibn ʿAbbās: also Yazīd b. Rūmān—ʿUrwah: Three days before Ḍamḍam got to Mecca, ʿĀtikah bt. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib had a dream which frightened her, so she sent for her brother al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd

68. Of these two men, the former became a Muslim after the capture of Mecca; the latter was converted before that event and played a prominent part in affairs as a Muslim; cf. *EI*², art. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ (A.J. Wensinck).

69. Ibn Isḥāq is speaking; he describes how he has used his sources.

al-Muṭṭalib and said to him, "Brother, last night I had a dream [1293] which horrified me, and I am afraid that it may portend evil and affliction for your people, so keep what I am going to tell you to yourself." He said, "What did you dream?" She said, "I saw a rider coming up on his camel. He halted in the valley and shouted at the top of his voice, 'Hasten to your deaths, you people of treachery, in three days' time!' I saw the people gathering round him, then he went into the mosque with the people following him. While they were round him, his camel climbed on top of the Ka'bah with him on its back. Then he shouted three times at the top of his voice as he had before, "Hasten to your deaths, you people of treachery, in three days' time!' Then his camel mounted to the summit of the mount of Abū Qubays with him on its back and he shouted the same thing. Then he picked up a boulder and sent it rolling down the mountain. When it reached the bottom it shattered into fragments, and a piece of it went into every house and settlement in Mecca."

Al-'Abbās said, "This is indeed a dream! As for you, keep it to yourself and do not mention it to anyone."

Then al-'Abbās went out and met al-Walīd b. 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah, who was a friend of his. He mentioned the dream to him and asked him to keep it to himself. However al-Walīd told it to his father, 'Utbah, and the story became public knowledge, and all Quraysh talked about it. Al-'Abbās said, "One morning I went to circumambulate the Ka'bah and there was Abū Jahl b. Hishām[70] sitting with a group of Quraysh talking about 'Ātikah's dream. When Abū Jahl saw me he said, "Abū al-Faḍl, when you have finished your circumambulation, come over to us." So when I had finished, I went over to him and sat down with them. Then Abū [1294] Jahl said to me, "Sons of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, when did this prophetess come among you?" I said, "What are you talking about?" He replied, "The dream which 'Ātikah had." "What was that?" I asked. "Sons of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib," he replied, "are you not content with your men claiming to be prophets, that your women also claim to be prophets? 'Ātikah claims that in her dream he said, 'Hasten in three days' time!' We shall be watching over you for these three days, and if what she says comes true, then so be it; but if the three days go by and nothing of this comes about, we will put it in writing that your family are the greatest liars among the Arabs."

70. Abū Jahl of the clan of Makhzūm was about Muḥammad's age and a particularly bitter opponent; he led the force which went out to protect the caravan and was killed at Badr.

Al-'Abbās said, "By God, I did not make a great issue of it. I simply rebutted it and denied that she had dreamt anything." Then we separated, and by that evening there was not a woman of the family of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib who had not come to me and said, "Did you allow that vicious profligate to attack your men, and then go on to attack the women, while you listened to it without being outraged by what you heard?" I replied, "By God, that is what I did do—I did not make an issue of it. God's oath, I will confront him, and if he says it again, I will give you satisfaction against him." On the third day after 'Ātikah's dream, I went out in the morning seething with rage, thinking I had missed the chance of paying him back for his words. I went into the mosque and saw him, and, by God, I went towards him to confront him and to give him the chance to repeat some of what he had said so that I could attack him—he was a slight man, with sharp features, a sharp tongue, and a sharp glance. Suddenly, however, he went out towards the gate of the mosque at a great pace. I said to myself, "What is the matter with him, God curse him! Is all of this because he is afraid that I will revile him?" In fact, however, he had heard something which I had not, the voice of Ḍamḍam b. 'Amr al Ghifārī, who was shouting in the bottom of the wadi, standing on his camel. He had cut off his camel's nose, put his saddle on back to front, and torn his shirt, and he was saying, "O people of Quraysh, The caravan! The caravan! Your wealth is with Abū Sufyān, and Muḥammad and his companions have set off to intercept it, and I do not think you will reach it. Help! Help!" [1295]

This occurrence made me forget him and made him forget me. The people hastily equipped themselves, saying, "Do Muḥammad and his companions imagine that it will be like the caravan of Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī? No, by God; they will find otherwise!" They were divided into two groups, some setting out in person and others sending another man in their place. Quraysh went out in a body, and none of their nobles stayed behind except for Abū Lahab b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib,[71] who stayed behind and sent in his place al-'Āṣ b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah. He induced the latter to do this because he owed Abū Lahab four thousand dirhams and was unable to pay him; so he hired al-'Āṣ for this sum to undertake the military duty in his place. Al-'Āṣ then went out on the expedition, while Abū Lahab stayed behind.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abd Allāh b. Abī Najīḥ: Umayyah b. Khalaf had decided to stay [1296] at home, being a bulky and heavy old man. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ came to him while he was sitting in the mosque among his people carrying a brazier with fire and aloes-wood in it. He put it before him and said, "Scent yourself, Abū 'Alī, for you are one of the women." He replied, "May God disgrace you and that which you have brought!" Then he equipped himself and went out with the others.

When they had finished equipping themselves and had decided to set out, they remembered the state of war which existed between them and the Banū Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah,[72] and said, "We are afraid that they may attack us from the rear."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq and Yazīd b. Rūmān—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr:[73] When Quraysh had decided to set out, they remembered the quarrel between them and the Banū Bakr. This almost caused them to go back, but Iblīs manifested himself to them in the form of Surāqah b. Ju'shum al-Mudlijī, who was one of the nobles of Kinānah. He said, "I will guarantee you security against any unwelcome attention from Kinānah." So they went off speedily.

The Number of Muslims at Badr

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): The Messenger of God went out, as I have been informed by authorities other than Ibn Isḥāq, on 3 Ramaḍān (February 28, 624) at the head of over three hundred and ten of his companions. There is a difference of opinion as to how many more than (three hundred and) ten there were. Some say there were three hundred and thirteen men.

71. The Prophet's uncle, who is denounced in Surah 111; cf. 1339 below.

72. An important section of the nomadic tribe of Kinānah with grounds to the west of Mecca; cf. Watt, Medina, 62f., 81–4.

73. This follows IH, 432.

Those who say this. [1297]

According to Abū Kurayb—Abū Bakr b. 'Ayyāsh—Abū Isḥāq—al-Barā': We used to relate that the people of Badr on the day of Badr were like the number of people of Saul,[74] three hundred men and thirteen men who crossed the river. The account ends at this point.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Ubayd al-Muḥāribī—Abū Mālik al-Janbī—al-Ḥajjāj—al-Ḥakam—Miqsam—a 'Abbās: The Emigrants on the day of Badr were seventy-seven men, and the Anṣār were two hundred and thirty-six men. The banner of the Messenger of God was carried by 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and the banner of the Anṣār was carried by Sa'd b. 'Ubādah.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq[76]: Those who were present, took part[75] in it, and reaped its reward were three hundred and fourteen men.

According to others: They were three hundred and eighteen.

Still others claim they were three hundred and seven. As for most of the early scholars, they (merely) say that there were over three hundred and ten men.

Those who say this.

According to Hārūn b. Isḥāq—Muṣ'ab b. al-Miqdām and Aḥmad b. Isḥāq al-Ahwāzī—Abū Aḥmad al-Zubayrī—Isrā'īl—Abū Isḥāq—al-Barā': We used to relate that the number of the people of Badr was the same as the number of the people of Saul who crossed the river with him; and nobody crossed with him but believers, over three hundred and ten of them. [1298]

According to Ibn Bashshār—Abū 'Āmir—Sufyān—Abū Isḥāq

74. Saul, king of Israel, is mentioned in the Qur'ān as Ṭālūt. The story to which reference is made here is to be found in al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj al-dhahab, ed. and tr. C. Barbier de Meynard and Pavet de Courteille, Paris 1861, i.102. Al-Mas'ūdī speaks of 313 men, but there seems to be some confusion with the story of Gideon and his 300 men in Judges 7.

75. Reading ḍaraba not ḍaruba.

76. IH, 506, after giving a complete list of names, concludes that there were 83 Emigrants and 231 of the Anṣār, or 314 in all.

—al-Barā': We used to relate that the companions of the Prophet on the day of Badr were over three hundred and ten, the same as the number of the people of Saul who crossed the river, and none but believers crossed with him.

Ibn Wakī'—his father—Sufyān—Abū Isḥāq—al-Barā' give a similar account.

According to Ismā'īl b. Isrā'īl al-Ramlī—'Abd Allāh b. Muḥammad b. al-Mughīrah—Mis'ar—Abū Isḥāq—al-Barā': The number of the people of Badr was the number of the people of Saul.

Aḥmad b. Isḥāq—Abū Aḥmad—Mis'ar—Abū Isḥāq—al-Barā' give a similar account.

According to Bishr b. Mu'ādh—Yazīd—Sa'īd—Qatādah: We were told that the Prophet of God said to his companions on the day of Badr: "You are the same number as the people of Saul on the day that he met Goliath." The companions of the Prophet of God on the day of Badr were over three hundred and ten men.

[1299] According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: Saul had over three hundred and ten men, the same number of people as the people of Badr.

According to Al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—'Abd al-Razzāq—Ma'mar—Qatādah: There were with the Prophet on the day of Badr over three hundred and ten men.

The Advance of the Muslims to Badr

Resumption of the narrative of Ibn Isḥāq.[77]

When several days of Ramaḍān had passed, the Messenger of God went out at the head of his companions, putting Qays b. Abī Ṣa'ṣa'ah, the brother of the Banū Māzin b. al-Najjār, in charge of the rearguard. He himself went ahead, and when he was near al-Ṣafrā' he sent Basbas b. 'Amr al-Juhanī—the confederate of the Banū Sā'idah (of the Anṣār)—and 'Adī b. Abī al-Zaghbā' al-Juhanī—the confederate of the Banū al-Najjār (of the Anṣār)—to Badr, in order to glean information for him about Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb and his caravan. Then the Messenger of God, having sent them on in advance, continued his march. When he got to al-Ṣafrā', which is a village between two mountains, he asked the names of its two mountains. They said, "One of them is called Musliḥ and the other is called Mukhri'." He asked about the people who lived in them, and they said, "The Banū al-Nār and the Banū Ḥurāq, two [1300] clans of the Banū Ghifār." The Messenger of God took a dislike to these mountains and to passing between them, regarding their names and the names of their inhabitants as an evil omen,[78] so leaving them and al-Ṣafrā' to his left, he went to the right along a valley called Dhafirān. When he had gone part way along it, he came out of it and halted. Here he received news that Quraysh had marched to protect their caravan. The Prophet consulted the people and told them about Quraysh. Abū Bakr stood up and spoke well; then 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb stood up and spoke well; then al-Miqdād b. 'Amr stood up and said, "O Messenger of God, carry on as God has commanded you, and we, by God, are with you; we will not say, as the Children of Israel said to Moses, 'Go thou and thy Lord and fight! We will sit here,'[79] but we will say, 'Go thou and thy Lord and fight! We will fight with thee.' By him who sent you with the truth, if you led us to Bark al-Ghimād[80] (meaning the town in Abyssinia), we would fight with you against those who stood in our way until you reached it." The Messenger of God replied, "Well said!"—and prayed for blessings for him.

77. IH, 433f.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Ubayd al-Muḥāribī—Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm Abū Yaḥyā—al-Mukhāriq—Ṭāriq—'Abd Allāh b. Mas'ūd: I saw something in al-Miqdād as a result of which I would rather be his companion than anything else in the world. He was a man [1301] who could read people's faces; when the Messenger of God was angry, his cheeks grew red, and so al-Miqdād came to him when he was in this condition and said, "Rejoice, O Messenger of God! We will not say to you, as the Children of Israel said to Moses, 'Go then and thy Lord and fight! We will sit here,' but, by him who sent you with the truth, we will be before you and behind

78. Musliḥ and mukhri' both mean "defecating"; nār is "fire" and ḥurāq "burning."

79. Qur.5.24.

80. This is said to be a place five nights' journey beyond Mecca towards the sea, or a town in the Yemen, or in the furthest part of the region of Hajar (eastern Arabia).

you, on your right hand and on your left hand, until God gives you victory!"

Resumption of the narrative of Ibn Isḥāq.[81]

Then the Messenger of God said, "Advise me, people," meaning by this the Anṣār, for they were the bulk of his force. The reason for this was that, when they had sworn allegiance to him at al-ʿAqabah,[82] they had said, "O Messenger of God, we are exempt from having to protect you until you reach our dwelling-place, but when you reach us, you will be under our protection, and we will protect you as we would our children and our womenfolk." The Messenger of God was afraid that the Anṣār might not consider themselves obliged to come to his aid except against those of his enemies who attacked him at Medina, nor might they consider themselves obliged to let him lead them out of their own territory against an enemy.

When the Messenger of God said this, Saʿd b. Muʿādh said to him, "By God, you seem to mean us, O Messenger of God." "Yes," he replied. "We have believed in you and accepted that what you say is true," Saʿd replied, "and we have testified that the message you have brought is the truth, and we have given you our word and covenant to that effect, to heed and to obey; so proceed [1302] as you wish, O Messenger of God, and by him who sent you with the truth, if you lead us headlong to that sea and plunge into it, we will plunge into it with you and not a single man will lag behind. We are not unwilling for you to meet the enemy with us tomorrow; we are steadfast in war and true in battle. It may be that God means to show you something through us which will gladden your heart, so lead us with God's blessing."

The Messenger of God was gladdened by Saʿd's reply, and it filled him with vigour. Then he said, "March, with God's blessing, and rejoice, for God has promised me one of the two opposing parties. By God, I seem to be looking at the slaughtered enemy now!"

Then the Messenger of God set out from Dhafirān and went through the mountain passes called al-Aṣāfir. Then he descended from them to a village called al-Dabbah, leaving al-Ḥannān (which is a huge sand dune as big as a mountain) to the right. Then he camped near Badr.

81. IH, 434–8.
82. Cf. IH, 296f.; Watt, Mecca, 144–9.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥibbān: The Messenger of God and one of his companions rode to an Arab shaykh and asked him what he had heard about Quraysh and about Muḥammad and his companions. The shaykh said, "I will not tell you until you tell me which side you are from." The Messenger of God replied, "If you tell us, [1303] we will tell you." "The one for the other?" he asked. "Yes," he said. The shaykh said, "I have heard that Muḥammad and his companions set out on such-and-such a date, and if the person who told me was telling the truth, he is today at such-and-such a place—naming the place where the Messenger of God in fact was—and I have heard that Quraysh set out on such-and-such a date, and if the person who told me was telling the truth, they are today at such-and-such a place—naming the place where Quraysh in fact were." When he had finished giving this information, he said, "Which side are you from?" The Messenger of God replied, "We are from water," and then left, while the shaykh was saying, "What do you mean, from water? From the water of Iraq?"

Then the Messenger of God went back to his companions, and the next morning he sent ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām and Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ and a few of his companions to the water of Badr to reconnoitre it for him, according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Rūmān—ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr. They came across a party of water-carriers from Quraysh there, including Aslam, a slave of the Banū al-Ḥajjāj, and ʿArīḍ Abū Yasār, a slave of the Banū al-ʿĀṣ b. Saʿīd, and took them to the Messenger of God. The Messenger of God was standing praying, so the companions questioned the slaves. They said, "We are water-carriers of Quraysh, who have sent us to get water for them from the water." This was unwelcome news to the companions, as they had hoped that the slaves belonged to [1304] Abū Sufyān; so they beat them, and when they had weakened them the slaves said, "We belong to Abū Sufyān," and were left alone.

The Messenger of God bowed and prostrated himself twice, then greeted the companions and said, "When the slaves tell you the truth you beat them, and when they lie to you you leave them alone. By God, they are telling the truth, they belong to Quraysh. Tell me, where are Quraysh?" They replied, "They are behind that sand dune which you can see on the far bank." [The sand dune was al-ʿAqanqal.] The Messenger of God said to them, "How many men are there?" They replied, "A lot." He said, "How many?" "We do not know," they replied. "How many camels do they slaughter every day?" he asked. "Nine or ten a day," they replied. The Messenger of God said, "They are between nine hundred and a thousand." Then the Messenger of God said to them, "Which of the nobles of Quraysh are among them?" They replied, "ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah, Shaybah b. Rabīʿah, Abū al-Bakhtarī b. Hishām, Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām, Nawfal b. Khuwaylid, al-Ḥārith b. ʿĀmir b. Nawfal, Ṭuʿaymah b. ʿAdī b. Nawfal, al-Naḍr b. al-Ḥārith b. Kaladah, Zamʿah b. al-Aswad, Abū Jahl b. Hishām, Umayyah b. Khalaf, Nubayh and Munabbih the sons of al-Ḥajjāj, Suhayl b.

[1305] ʿAmr, and ʿAmr b. ʿAbd Wudd." The Messenger of God turned to the people and said, "Here Mecca has flung its dearest flesh and blood to you!"[83]

Basbas b. ʿAmr and ʿAdī b. Abī al-Zaghbāʾ had gone ahead and stopped at Badr. They halted their camels by a hillock near the water and took an old water-skin to fetch water. Majdī b. ʿAmr al-Juhanī was at the water, and ʿAdī and Basbas heard two slave girls belonging to the settled inhabitants discussing a debt at the water. The first said to the second, "The caravan will come tomorrow or the day after. I will work for them, and then I will pay you what I owe." Majdī said, "That's right," and then separated them. ʿAdī and Basbas heard this, mounted their camels and left. They came to the Messenger of God and told him what they had heard.

Abū Sufyān Takes Evasive Action

Abū Sufyān came in advance of the caravan as a precaution and arrived at the water. He said to Majdī b. ʿAmr, "Have you noticed 83. The list includes most of the leading men of Mecca apart from the older generation. For details see Watt, Mecca, Medina, index.

anyone?" He replied, "I have not seen anyone I do not know, except that I saw two riders who halted their camels by that hillock, filled their water-skin with water, and left." Abū Sufyān went to the place where they had halted their camels, picked up some of the camels' droppings, and crumbled them; they contained date-stones. "By God," he said, "This is the camel fodder of Yathrib!"[84] He went back hastily to his companions, turned his caravan away from that road, and took the coastal route, leaving Badr on his left. Then he set off with all speed. [1306]

The Advance of Quraysh

Meanwhile Quraysh were advancing. They halted at al-Juḥfah, where Juhaym b. al-Ṣalt b. Makhramah b. al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbd Manāf had a dream. He said, "I was between sleep and wakefulness when I had a dream. I saw a man coming on a horse. Then he stopped, and he had a camel with him. Then he said, 'Utbah b. Rabīʿah, Shaybah b. Rabīʿah, Abū al-Ḥakam b. Hishām, Umayyah b. Khalaf, and so-and-so and so-and-so—enumerating nobles of Quraysh who were killed on that day—have been killed.' Then I saw him stab his camel's chest and send it off into the camp, and there was not a single tent in the camp which it did not sprinkle with its blood."

Abū Jahl heard of this dream, and said, "This is yet another prophet from the clan of al-Muṭṭalib. He will know tomorrow who is killed, if we meet in battle."

When Abū Sufyān saw that he had assured his caravan's safety, he sent to Quraysh saying, "You only came out to protect your caravan, your men, and your property. God has kept them safe, so go back." But Abū Jahl b. Hishām said, "By God! We will not go back until we have reached Badr—Badr was the location of one of the Arab festivals; every year a market was held there—spent three days there, slaughtered camels, given food to eat and wine to drink, and had our singing girls perform there, so that the Arabs may hear of what we have done and continue to hold us in [1307]

84. Since Yathrib (Medina) was an oasis, its camels could be fed on dates. The two scouts were actually nomads of the tribe of Juhaynah, as was also Abū Sufyān's scout, Majdī b. ʿAmr.

awe. Go ahead!" Al-Akhnas b. Sharīq b. 'Amr b. Wahb al-Thaqafī,[85] who was a confederate of the Banū Zuhrah, who were at al-Juḥfah, said, "O Banū Zuhrah, God has saved your property and rescued your companion Makhramah b. Nawfal. You only came out to defend him and his property, so let any charge of cowardice rest on my shoulders and go back; for there is no need for you to take the field except in the defence of property. Ignore what this man is saying," meaning Abū Jahl. So they went back, and not one of the clan of Zuhrah took part in the battle, since his word was law among them.

There was not a clan of Quraysh from which some men did not go out (to Badr), except for the Banū 'Adī b. Ka'b, from whom not a single man had gone out. Since the Banū Zuhrah had gone back with al-Akhnas b. Sharīq, nobody from those two clans was present at Badr. The rest went on.

[1308] Words were exchanged between Ṭālib b. Abī Ṭālib,[86] who was with the army, and some of Quraysh, who said, "By God, Banū Hāshim, we know that your sympathies are with Muḥammad, even if you have come out with us," and so Ṭālib was among those who returned to Mecca.

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): As for Ibn al-Kalbī,[87] among the narratives I was told on his authority is the following: Ṭālib b. Abī Ṭālib set out for Badr with the polytheists. He was sent out against his will, and he was not among the captives, nor the dead, and he did not return to his family. He was a poet, and he is the one who said:

O Lord, if Ṭālib goes on an expedition in one of these defiles
Let him be plundered, not the plunderer, conquered not the conqueror.

85. Although he was a confederate belonging to the tribe of Thaqīf in al-Ṭā'if, he appears to have been the leading man in the clan of Zuhrah in Mecca at this time; he may have been related to them matrilineally. Cf. Watt, Mecca, index.

86. Muḥammad's cousin, son of his uncle and guardian Abū Ṭālib, who was now dead.

87. Hishām b. Muḥammad, known as Ibn al-Kalbī, was a well-known scholar of pre-Islamic and early Islamic affairs; cf. *EI*², art. (al-)Kalbī, II.

Resumption of the narrative of Ibn Isḥāq.[88]

Quraysh went on and halted on the further bank of the wadi behind al-ʿAqanqal. The bed of the wadi (which is called Yalyal) lies between Badr and al-ʿAqanqal, the sand dune behind which were Quraysh, and the wells at Badr are on the bank of the Yalyal which is nearer to Medina. God had sent rain, and the wadi-bed was soft; the effect of the rainfall as far as the Messenger of God and his companions were concerned was to compact the ground without impeding their movement, but its effect on Quraysh was that they were not able to set off because of it. So the Messenger of God set out to get to the water before them, and when he got to [1309] the nearest well of Badr he halted.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—some men of the Banū Salimah: Al-Ḥubāb b. al-Mundhir b. al-Jamūḥ[89] said, "O Messenger of God, do you consider that this is a position in which God has placed you, and that it is not for us to move it forward or back, or do you consider that it is a matter of judgement, tactics and stratagem?" He replied, "Certainly not; it is a matter of judgement, tactics and stratagem." Then al-Ḥubāb b. al-Mundhir b. al-Jamūḥ said, "O Messenger of God, this is not the proper position for you. Arise with your men and go to the nearest well to the enemy. Halt there and then fill in the other wells. Then build a cistern next to it and fill it with water. Then we will fight the enemy and have water to drink while they do not." The Messenger of God said, "You have given judicious advice." Then the Messenger of God and the men who were with him arose and went to the well nearest to the enemy and halted there. Then he gave orders to fill in the other wells, and to build a cistern next to the well at which he had halted. This was filled [1310] with water and then they drew water from it in their drinking vessels.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī Bakr: Saʿd b. Muʿādh said, "O Messenger of God, let us build you a shelter of stripped palm branches, in which you can remain, and we will keep your riding-camels ready by you. Then we will meet our enemy, and if God gives us strength and grants us victory over our enemy, that will be as we would wish; and if it turns out otherwise, you can mount on your riding-camels and join those of our people who are left behind us (in Medina), for there remain behind from your expedition, O Prophet of God, many people who love you just as greatly as we do, and would not have remained behind from your expedition if they had thought that you would become involved in fighting. God will defend you by means of them, and they will give you good advice and strive along with you."

88. IH, 439–41.

89. This man, of the clan of Salimah, appears to have been the leader of the Khazraj at Badr but is not specially prominent in later events.

The Messenger of God praised him greatly and prayed for God's blessings on him. Then a shelter was built for the Messenger of God and he stayed in it.

At dawn Quraysh had set out and advanced, and when the Messenger of God saw them moving down from al-'Aqanqal, which is the sand dune from which they came, to the wadi, he said, "O God, here come Quraysh in their arrogance and their pride, opposing you and calling your Messenger a liar. O God, give me the aid which you have promised me. O God, destroy them this morning."

When the Messenger of God saw 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah among the [1311] enemy on his red camel he said, "If there is good in any of the enemy, it is in the man on the red camel. If they obey him, they will be rightly guided."

Preparations and Discussions of Quraysh

Khufāf b. Aymā' b. Raḥḍah al-Ghifārī, or his father Aymā' b. Raḥḍah[90] sent his son with a present of some slaughter-camels to Quraysh, as they passed by him, and added, "If you would like me to reinforce you with arms and fighting men, I will do so." They sent a message back to him by his son, saying, "You have discharged the duties of kinship and done what was incumbent upon you. By my life, if we are fighting against men, we are not too weak to deal with them, and if we are fighting God, as Muḥammad claims, nobody has any power against God."

90. The small nomadic tribe of Ghifār was reckoned a part of Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt, but some members seem to have been friendly to Quraysh.

When Quraysh halted, a number of them advanced until they reached the cistern of the Messenger of God; among them was Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām, riding his horse. The Messenger of God said, "Let them drink." Every man who drank was killed that day, with the exception of Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām. He escaped on his horse called al-Wajīh, and later became a Muslim, and a very good one. When he wanted to swear a very forcible oath, he would say, "No, [1312] by him who saved me on the day of Badr."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq and Isḥāq b. Yasār and other scholars—some shaykhs of the Anṣār: When the enemy army had settled down, they sent 'Umayr b. Wahb al-Jumaḥī, saying, "Estimate Muḥammad's numbers for us." So he circled the camp on his horse and then went back to them, saying, "Three hundred men, give or take a few, but give me a little more time so that I can see if they have any men lying in ambush or any reserves." He then rode about in the wadi for a considerable distance, but he could not see anything. He went back to them and said, "I could not see anything, but I saw, O people of Quraysh, saddlecloths carrying doom, the water-camels of Yathrib carrying certain death. The enemy are people who do not have any safe refuge or retreat except their swords. By God, I do not think a man of them will be killed until he has killed a man of you, and if they kill as many of you as there are of them, what will be the good of life after that? So decide as you think fit."

When Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām heard that, he went on foot among the [1313] army to 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah and said, "Abū al-Walīd, today you are a great man of Quraysh, their chief and obeyed among them. Would you like to continue to be remembered by them with gratitude to the end of time?" "How will I achieve that, Ḥakīm?" he asked. "Take the people back with you," he said, "and take upon yourself the responsibility for the blood of your confederate 'Amr b. al-Ḥaḍramī." "I will do so," he replied. "You are my witness in this. He was my confederate, and it is for me to seek compensation for his killing and for the property of his which was taken. So go to Ibn al-Ḥanẓaliyyah (meaning Abū Jahl b. Hishām), for I do not fear that anyone else will dispute the matter."

According to Al-Zubayr b. Bakkār—'Imāmah b. 'Amr al-Sahmī —Musawwar b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Yarbū'ī—his father—Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab: While we were with Marwān b. al-Ḥakam[91] his chamberlain came in and said, "Abū Khālid Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām is here." "Admit him," he said. When Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām came in he said, "Welcome, Abū Khālid! Come close." Then Marwān left his place at the head of the majlis until he was halfway between him and the cushion. Then Marwān welcomed him and said, "Tell us the story of Badr." He said, "We went out and halted at al-Juḥfah. Then one of the clans of Quraysh left in their entirety, and not [1314] one of their polytheists was present at Badr. Then we went on and halted on the bank which is mentioned by God.[92] I went to 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah and said, 'Abū al-Walīd, would you like to win the honour of this day as long as you live?' 'What must I do?' he asked. 'You want nothing from Muḥammad but restitution for the blood of Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī' I said, 'for he was your confederate; so take upon yourself the responsibility for his blood-money, and take the people back to Mecca with you.' 'I will do as you say,' he said. 'I will take upon myself the responsibility for his blood-money. Go to Ibn al-Ḥanẓaliyyah (meaning Abū Jahl) and say, "Would you and those with you be prepared to retreat from your cousin today?"'

"So I went to him, and saw him in a group of people in front of him and behind him. Suddenly I beheld Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī[93] standing at his head and saying, 'I take the responsibility for avenging me away from the clan of 'Abd Shams and give it to the clan of Makhzūm.' So I said to him, "Utbah b. Rabī'ah says to you, "Would you and those with you be prepared to retreat from your cousin today?"' Abū Jahl said to me, 'Could he find no other emissary but you?' I replied, 'No, and I have no intention of being an emissary for anybody except him.' I went out hastily to 'Utbah (Ḥakīm continued) in order not to miss any of the story. 'Utbah was leaning on Aymā' b. Raḥḍah al-Ghifārī, who had given ten slaughter-camels to the polytheists, when Abū Jahl appeared with malice

91. A prominent member of the clan of Umayyah, probably governor of Medina at the time of this incident. He became caliph in 64/684 but died about ten months later and was succeeded by his son 'Abd-al-Malik.

92. Qur. 8.42, "when ye were on the near bank (of the valley). . . ."

93. 'Amir b. al-Ḥaḍramī, brother of the man killed at Nakhlah.

all over his face, and said to 'Utbah, 'Your lungs are inflated with [1315] fear.' 'You will soon find out,' retorted 'Utbah. Abū Jahl drew his sword and slapped his horse's back with it, and Aymā' b. Raḥḍah said 'This is an evil omen.' Thereupon the battle began."

Resumption of the narrative of Ibn Isḥāq.[94]

Then 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah rose up to give a speech. "O people of Quraysh," he said, "you will achieve nothing by meeting Muḥammad and his companions in battle. By God, if you defeat him you will not be able to look one another in the face without loathing, for you will see someone who has killed the son of your paternal or maternal uncle, or a man from your clan. Go back, and leave Muḥammad to the rest of the Arabs. If they kill him, that will be what you want, and if not he will find that you have not done to him what you would have liked to do (and will respect you for it)."

"I left," said Ḥakīm, "to go to Abū Jahl, and I found him preparing his coat of mail which he had removed from its bag. 'Abū al-Ḥakam,' I said to him, "Utbah has sent me to you to tell you such-and-such (repeating what he had said).' 'By God!' he replied, 'his lungs were inflated with fear when he saw Muḥammad and his companions. No, by God, we will not go back until God gives the decision either for us or for Muḥammad and his companions. What is really troubling 'Utbah is not what he says, but the fact [1316] that he sees Muḥammad and his companions so few in number that one slaughtered camel would suffice them. His son is among them, and he is afraid of you for his sake.'

"Then he sent to 'Āmir b. al-Ḥaḍramī and said to him, 'This confederate of yours wants to take the army back at a time when you see your revenge before your eyes; so rise and remind them of your covenant and your brother's murder.' So 'Āmir b. al-Ḥaḍramī rose and uncovered himself; then he shouted out, 'Alas for 'Amr! Alas for 'Amr!' Then the zeal for battle grew intense, and they were ruined. They agreed upon the evil course on which they were set, and the counsel which 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah had urged upon them was wasted on them.

"When 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah heard that Abū Jahl had said, 'His lungs are inflated with fear,' he said, 'That cowardly wretch will find out whose lungs are inflated with fear, mine or his!' Then he asked for a helmet to put on his head, but he could not find a helmet in the army to fit him because his head was so big. When he saw this, he wrapped a striped cloth he had round his head."

94. IH, 441–4.

The Fighting Begins

In the expedition was al-Aswad b. 'Abd al-Asad al-Makhzūmī, who was a quarrelsome and bad-natured man. He now said, "I make a covenant with God that I will drink from their cistern and will destroy it, or will die in the attempt." When he took the field, Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib came out to meet him, and in the encounter Ḥamzah struck him and cut off his foot together with half his leg before he had reached the cistern. He fell on his back with blood gushing from his leg toward his companions.
[1317] Then he crawled toward the cistern and flung himself into it, intending[95] to fulfil his oath; but Ḥamzah followed him and struck him a blow which killed him in the cistern.

After this, 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah took the field, between his brother Shaybah b. Rabī'ah and his son al-Walīd b. 'Utbah. When he had drawn clear of the battle line, he issued a challenge to single combat. Three young men of the Anṣār came forward to meet him, 'Awf and Mu'awwidh, sons of al-Ḥārith with 'Afrā' for their mother,[96] and another man called 'Abd Allāh b. Rawāḥah. The Meccans said, "Who are you?" and the three young men replied, "A group of the Anṣār." "We have no business with you," the Meccans said. Then their herald called out, "Muḥammad, send out people of our rank from our tribe!" The Messenger of God said, "Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, rise; 'Ubaydah b. al-Ḥārith, rise; 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, rise." When they arose and approached the three Meccans, the latter said, "Who are you?" 'Ubaydah said "'Ubaydah," Ḥamzah said, "Ḥamzah," and 'Alī said "Alī." The Meccans said, "Yes, these are noble equals." 'Ubaydah b. al-

95. Omitting za'ama.

96. Each of these two (and a third brother) was commonly known as "Ibn 'Afrā'," perhaps a relic of the former matrilineal kinship system. See Watt, Medina, 166, 378, etc.

Ḥārith, who was the oldest of the Muslims, engaged 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah in single combat, Ḥamzah engaged Shaybah b. Rabī'ah, and 'Alī engaged al-Walīd b. 'Utbah. It was no time before Ḥamzah had killed Shaybah, and 'Alī had killed al-Walīd. 'Ubaydah and 'Utbah, however, each inflicted a blow upon his adversary which disabled him. Ḥamzah and 'Ali then turned upon 'Utbah [1318] with their swords and finished him off, and lifted up their companion 'Ubaydah and brought him to his companions. His foot had been cut off and the marrow was flowing out. When they brought 'Ubaydah to the Messenger of God he said, "Am I not a martyr, O Messenger of God?" "Yes indeed," Muḥammad replied. "If Abū Ṭālib were alive," said 'Ubaydah, "he would know that I am more worthy than he of his line of verse when he says:

> We keep him safe until we are struck down around him, > and forget our sons and our wives."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah: 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah said to the young men of the Anṣār when they gave their lineages, "Noble equals! But we only want men of our own tribe!"

The armies then advanced and drew near to one another. The Messenger of God had ordered his companions not to attack until he gave the command, and he had said, "If they approach you, keep them at a distance from you with a hail of arrows." The Messenger of God remained in the shelter with Abū Bakr.

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī)—Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah —Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Abū Ja'far Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn: The Battle of Badr was on Friday morning, 17 Ramaḍān (March 13, 624).

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq [1319] —Ḥibbān b. Wāsi' b. Ḥibbān b. Wāsi'—some shaykhs of his people: The Messenger of God straightened the ranks of his companions on the day of Badr with an arrow which he had in his hand. As he passed by Sawād b. Ghaziyyah, the confederate of the Banū 'Adī b. al-Najjār, who was standing forward from the line in his eagerness to fight, the Messenger of God poked him in the stomach with the arrow and said, "Get into line, Sawād b. Ghaziyya." "O Messenger of God," he said, "you have hurt me! God has sent you with the truth, so allow me to retaliate!" The Messenger of God uncovered his stomach and said, "Take your retaliation!" Sawād embraced him and kissed his stomach. "What induced you to do that, Sawād?" he asked. "O Messenger of God," he replied, "you see the situation we are in. I was not sure that I would not be killed, and I wanted my last recollection of you to be that my skin had touched yours." The Messenger of God prayed for his welfare and encouraged him. After straightening the ranks, the Messenger of God went back to the shelter and entered it. Abū Bakr was there with him but nobody else. The Messenger of God was calling on his Lord to grant him the aid which he had promised him, saying, among other things, "O God, if this band of people perishes today (meaning the Muslims), you will not be worshipped after today." Abū Bakr was saying, "O Prophet of [1320] God, do not call upon your Lord so much; for God will assuredly fulfil what he has promised you."

According to Muḥammad b. 'Ubayd al-Muḥāribī—'Abd Allāh b. al-Mubārak—'Ikrimah b. 'Ammār—Simāk al-Ḥanafī—Ibn 'Abbās—'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb: When it was the day of Badr, and the Messenger of God looked at the polytheists and their number, and then looked at his companions, who were something over three hundred, he turned toward the Qiblah and began to pray, saying, "O God, fulfil what you have promised me. O God, if this band of Muslims perishes, you will not be worshipped on the earth." He continued to say this until his cloak fell off. Abū Bakr picked it up and put it back on him, then grasped him from behind and said, "O Prophet of God, whom I value more than my father and mother, this is enough of calling upon your Lord. He will assuredly fulfil what he has promised you." Then God revealed, "When ye sought help of your Lord and he answered you (saying): I will help you with a thousand of the angels, rank on rank."[97]

According to Ibn Wakī'—al-Thaqafī (meaning 'Abd al-Wahhāb) —Khālid—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: The prophet said when he was in his awning on the day of Badr, "O God, I ask you to keep your contract and your promise. O God, if you so wish, you will not be worshipped after today." Abū Bakr took his hand and said, "This is enough, O Prophet of God. You have tired your Lord with your

97. Qur. 8.9.

importuning." He was in his coat of mail, and he went out saying, "The hosts will all be routed and will turn and flee. Nay, but the Hour (of doom) is their appointed tryst, and the Hour will be more wretched and more bitter (than this earthly failure)."[98]

Resumption of the narrative of Ibn Isḥāq.[99]

[1321] The Messenger of God slept a light sleep in the shelter for a while; then he awoke and said, "Abū Bakr, God's aid has come to you. Here is Gabriel, taking hold of the reins of his horse and leading it, and there is dust on its front teeth."

Mihja', the mawlā of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, was struck by an arrow and killed. He was the first Muslim to be killed. Then Ḥārithah b. Surāqah, one of the Banū 'Adī b. al-Najjār, was struck by an arrow as he was drinking at the cistern and was killed. Then the Messenger of God went out to his men and urged them to battle. He promised every man that he could keep all the booty he took, and then said, "By him in whose hands Muḥammad's soul rests, if any man fights them today and is killed, fighting steadfastly and with resignation, going forward and not turning back, then God will cause him to enter Paradise." 'Umayr b. al-Ḥumām, the brother of the Banū Salimah, who was holding some dates in his hand and eating them, said, "Excellent! All that stands between me and entering Paradise is being killed by these people!" Then he threw down the dates, took his sword, and fought the enemy until he was killed, reciting the following lines:

I hasten to God without provision except fear of God and working for the Hereafter
And patience in God in the struggle, for every other provision is liable to be exhausted
Except for fear of God, piety and right guidance.

[1322] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah: 'Awf b. al-Ḥārith, known as Ibn 'Afrā', said, "O Messenger of God, what makes the Lord laugh

98. Qur. 54.45f.

99. IH, 444–64. In this, al-Ṭabarī follows Ibn Isḥāq closely, though he has a short passage from another source on p.1328. He has also retained from Ibn Isḥāq passages about the capture of al-'Abbās (1340, 1344) which are omitted from Ibn Hishām's recension of Ibn Isḥāq in the form in which we have it; see n.65.

with joy at his servant?" He replied, "Plunging his hand into the enemy without armour." So he took off a coat of mail he was wearing and threw it away; then he took his sword and fought the enemy until he was killed.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Muslim b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī—'Abd Allāh b. Tha'labah b. Ṣu'ayr al-'Udhrī the confederate of the Banū Zuhrah: When the armies met and drew close to one another, Abū Jahl said, "O God, whichever of us has severed the ties of kinship more, and has committed more unacceptable acts, destroy him today." He was thus asking God to give the victory against himself.

Then the Messenger of God picked up a handful of gravel and faced Quraysh with the words, "May their faces be deformed!"[100] Then he threw it at them, and ordered his companions to attack. A rout followed, in which God killed many chiefs of Quraysh and caused many of their nobles to be taken captive. While the Muslims were taking captives, the Messenger of God was in his shelter. Sa'd b. Mu'ādh was standing at the door, girt with his sword, along with a few of the Anṣār, guarding the Messenger of God, since they were afraid that the enemy would wheel round and attack him. The Messenger of God, I have been told, saw in the face [1323] of Sa'd b. Mu'ādh disapproval of what the people were doing, and said, "It seems, Sa'd, that you disapprove of what the people are doing." "Yes, by God, O Messenger of God," he replied. "This was the first defeat inflicted by God on the polytheists, and killing the prisoners would have been more pleasing to me than sparing them."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-'Abbās b. 'Abd Allāh b. Ma'bad—a member of his family—Ibn 'Abbās: The Messenger of God said to his companions that day, "I know that some of the Banū Hāshim and others have been forced to march against us against their will, having no desire to fight us. Whoever of you meets one of the Banū Hāshim, let him not kill him; whoever meets Abū al-Bakhtarī b. Hishām b. al-Ḥārith b. Asad, let him not kill him; whoever meets al-'Abbās b.

100. See 1288 above and n.60.

'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the uncle of the Messenger of God,[101] let him not kill him, for he has been forced to march against us against his will."

Abū Ḥudhayfah b. 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah[102] said, "Are we to kill our fathers, our sons, our brothers, and our clansmen, and leave al-'Abbās alone? By God, if I meet him I will hack him with my sword!" These words reached the Messenger of God, and he said to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, "Abū Ḥafṣ, have you heard what Abū Ḥudhayfah says? He says, 'I will strike the face of the uncle of the Messenger of God with my sword!'" 'Umar said, "O Messenger of God, give me permission and I will cut off his head with my sword. By God, he is a Hypocrite!" In later times 'Umar used to say, "By God, that was the first day on which the Messenger of [1324]
God addressed me by the name Abū Ḥafṣ."

Abū Ḥudhayfah used to say, "I never felt safe afterwards on account of those words which I spoke that day, and I continued to be afraid because of them, but hoped that martyrdom might expiate them." He was killed as a martyr on the day of al-Yamāmah.[103]

The Messenger of God forbade the killing of Abū al-Bakhtarī because he used to restrain the people from harming the Messenger of God while he was still in Mecca. He himself neither injured him nor caused him any unpleasantness; and he was one of those who were active in cancelling the document[104] which Quraysh drew up against the Banū Hāshim and the Banū al-Muṭṭalib.

He was met by al-Mujadhdhar b. Dhiyād al-Balawī, the confederate of the Banū 'Adī of the Anṣār.[105] Al-Mujadhdhar b. Dhiyād said to Abū al-Bakhtarī, "The Messenger of God has forbidden us to kill you." Abū al-Bakhtarī had a fellow rider with him, who had come with him from Mecca, whose name was Junādah b. Mulayḥah bt. Zuhayr b. al-Ḥārith b. Asad. Junādah was a member of the Banū Layth, and Abū al-Bakhtarī's full name was al-'Āṣ b.

---

101. See 1290 above and n.65.

102. Abū Ḥudhayfah was of the clan of 'Abd Shams, and his father and several other kinsmen were among those killed at Badr.

103. The fierce battle in 12/633 in which the false prophet Musaylimah was defeated.

104. The so-called "boycott" of the clans of Hāshim and al-Muṭṭalib; cf. Watt, Mecca, 120–2.

105. Of the tribe of Balī; IH, 446, says he was a confederate of the clan of Sālim b. 'Awf.

Hishām b. al-Ḥārith b. Asad. He replied, "And my fellow rider?" Al-Mujadhdhar said, "No, by God. We will not spare your fellow rider. The Messenger of God only gave us orders about you." "No, by God," he replied. "Then he and I will die together. The women of Quraysh in Mecca will not relate of me that I abandoned my fellow rider in my greed for life." As he was engaged by al-Mujadhdhar and insisted on fighting, Abū al-Bakhtarī recited the following lines of rajaz:

[1325] The son of a noble woman will not surrender the man who shares his food
Until he dies or sees his (friend's) way (clear).

In the combat between the two he was killed by al-Mujadhdhar b. Dhiyād.

Then al-Mujadhdhar b. Dhiyād went to the Messenger of God and said, "By him who sent you with the truth, I tried to make him give himself up so that I could bring him to you, but he insisted on fighting, and I fought him and killed him."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. ʿAbbād b. ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Zubayr—his father: also ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī Bakr and others (than he and Yaḥyā)—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf: Umayyah b. Khalaf was a friend of mine in Mecca. My name was ʿAbd ʿAmr, but when I became a Muslim I was called ʿAbd al-Raḥmān.[106] Umayyah used to meet me when we were in Mecca and would say, "ʿAbd ʿAmr, do you dislike the name your father gave you?" I would reply, "Yes." He would then say, "I do not recognise al-Raḥmān, so find some name that I can call you by when we meet. You do not answer to your old name, and I will not call you by something I do not recognise." When he called me ʿAbd ʿAmr, I would refuse to answer him. At length I said to him, "You suggest whatever name you like for our use, Abū ʿAlī." He said, "Well then, you are ʿAbd al-Ilāh."[107] I agreed.

106. Omitting the words wa-naḥnu bi-Makkah.

107. The form ʿAbd ʿAmr, "servant (or slave) or ʿAmr," implies that ʿAmr was a pagan deity, and for this reason this name and several others were changed by Muḥammad. Nothing has been recorded, however, of any such deity; but it might conceivably be a secondary name or epithet of a deity known by some other name. The pagan Umayyah rejects Raḥmān as a name of the one God. ʿAbd al-Ilāh means "servant of the god," and could be understood as either polytheistic or monotheistic. Cf. J. Wellhausen, *Reste arabischen Heidentums*², Berlin 1897, 1–9.

After that when I passed him, he would say "'Abd al-Ilāh!"—and I would answer him and talk with him. On the day of Badr I passed him as he was standing with his son 'Alī b. Umayyah, holding his hand. I had with me some coats of mail which I had taken as plunder, which I was carrying, and when he saw me he said, [1326] "'Abd 'Amr!"—so I did not answer him. Then he said, "'Abd al-Ilāh!"—and I said, "Yes." "Would you like to take me (as prisoner)?" he asked. "I will be more use to you than those coats of mail which you are carrying." I said, "Yes! Come here then." I flung away the coats of mail and took his hand and his son 'Alī's hand while he said, "I have never seen a day like this. Have you no need for milk?"[108] Then I left, taking the two of them with me.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abd al-Wāḥid b. Abī 'Awn—Sa'd b. Ibrāhīm b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf—his father—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf: Umayyah b. Khalaf said to me, while I was between him and his son, holding them by the hands, "'Abd al-Ilāh, who is that man in your army wearing an ostrich feather on his chest as a mark of identification?" I said, "That is Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib." He said, "He is the one who wrought such havoc on us." 'Abd al-Raḥmān continued: And, by God, while I was leading them, Bilāl[109] saw him with me. It was Umayyah who used to torture Bilāl in Mecca in an attempt to make him abandon Islam. He used to take him out to the sun-baked ground of Mecca when it was scorching hot and make him lie down on his back. Then he would order a huge boulder to be placed on his chest, and then he would say, "You will stay like this until you leave the faith of Muḥammad." Bilāl would say, "God is one, God is one." When he saw Umayyah [1327] Bilāl said, "The head of disbelief, Umayyah b. Khalaf! May I not be spared, if they are spared!" I said, "Bilāl, would you harm my captives?" "May I not be spared, if they are spared!" he replied. "Do you hear what I am saying, son of the black woman?" I asked. "May I not be spared if they are spared!" he said. Then he shouted at the top of his voice, "O Helpers of God, the head of disbelief, Umayyah b. Khalaf! May I not be spared if he is spared!"

---

108. He is referring to the fact that the ransom will be paid in milch-camels.

109. Bilāl was an Abyssinian slave, tortured to make him renounce Islam (IH, 205), and ransomed by Abū Bakr. He was the first muezzin.

People surrounded us and placed us under a kind of restraint, while I was trying to protect Umayyah. One man struck his son, who fell down. Umayyah gave a scream the like of which I have never heard. I said, "Save yourself, for there is no escape (for him).[110] By God, I cannot do anything for you." Then they hacked at them with their swords until they had finished with them. 'Abd al-Raḥmān used to say, "May God have mercy on Bilāl! I lost my coats of mail, and he deprived me of my captives."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abd Allāh b. Abī Bakr—Ibn 'Abbās—a man from the Banū Ghifār: I and a cousin of mine went and mounted a hill from which we could overlook Badr (we were polytheists then) to await the outcome of the battle and see who would be defeated, so that we could join in the plundering afterwards. While we were on the [1328] hill a cloud approached us. We heard the neighing of horses in it, and I heard a voice saying, "Forward, Ḥayzūm!"[111] As for my cousin, the covering of his heart split open, and he died on the spot; as for myself, I almost perished, but then pulled myself together."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—his father Isḥāq b. Yasār—some men of the Banū Māzin b. al-Najjār—Abū Dā'ūd al-Māzinī, who was present at Badr: I was pursuing one of the polytheists on the day of Badr in order to strike him, when his head suddenly fell off before my sword touched him. Then I knew that someone other than I had killed him.

According to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Abd al-Ḥakam al-Miṣrī—Yaḥyā b. Bukayr—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Iskandarānī—al-'Alā' b. Kathīr—Abū Bakr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Miswar b. Makhramah—Abū Umāmah b. Sahl b. Ḥunayf: My father said to me, "My son, I saw us Muslims on the day of Badr, and saw that one of us would wave his sword at a polytheist, and the man's head would fall from his body before the sword touched him."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. 'Umārah—al-Ḥakam b. 'Utaybah—Miqsam the 110. Adding bi-hi with IH.

111. The angel Gabriel's horse; for angelic help cf. Qur. 8.9,12.

mawlā of 'Abd Allāh b. al-Ḥārith—'Abd Allāh b. 'Abbās: The sign of the angels on the day of Badr was white turbans which trailed down their backs, and on the day of Ḥunayn it was red turbans. The angels did not fight on any day except the day of Badr; on the other days they were assistants and helpers, but they struck no blows. [1329]

Abū Jahl and Other Meccan Dead

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad (ibn Isḥāq) —Thawr b. Zayd the mawlā of the Banū al-Dīl—'Ikrimah the mawlā of Ibn 'Abbās—Ibn 'Abbās: also 'Abd Allāh b. Abī Bakr: Mu'ādh b. 'Amr b. al-Jamūḥ the brother of the Banū Salimah used to say, "When the Messenger of God had finished with his enemy, he gave orders that Abū Jahl should be searched for among the dead, and said, 'O God, let him not have escaped you!'" The first man who encountered Abū Jahl was Mu'ādh b. 'Amr b. al-Jamūḥ, who said, "Abū Jahl was in a sort of thicket and I heard the people saying, 'We cannot get at Abū al-Ḥakam.' When I heard this, I made him my mark, and I made my way toward him. When he was within my reach, I attacked him and struck him a blow which severed his foot and half his leg. By God, when it flew off I could only compare it to a date-stone which flies out of a date-stone crusher when it is struck. [1330]

"Then his son 'Ikrimah struck me on the shoulder and struck off my arm, which dangled at my side from a piece of skin. The fighting prevented me from reaching him after that. I fought the whole day, dragging my arm behind me. When it began to hurt me, I put my foot on it and stood on it until I pulled it off." Mu'ādh survived this wound and lived until the caliphate of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.

Then Mu'awwidh b. 'Afrā' passed by Abū Jahl, who was now crippled, and struck him until he could no longer move, leaving him at his last gasp. Then Mu'awwidh fought until he was killed. 'Abd Allāh b. Mas'ūd[112] passed by Abū Jahl when the Messenger of God ordered that he should be searched for among the slain; the 112. One of the earliest Muslims and a client of the Meccan clan of Zuhrah; he later became an authority on the Qur'ān. Cf. *EI*², art. Ibn Mas'ūd (J. Vadet).

Messenger of God had said to them, I have been told, "If you cannot identify him among the dead, look for the mark of a wound on his knee, for I jostled against him at a feast given by ʿAbd Allāh b. Judʿān[113] when we were boys. I was a little thinner than he was, and I pushed him, so that he fell on his knees and got a scratch on one of them, the mark of which never went away." ʿAbd Allāh b. Masʿūd said, "I found Abū Jahl at his last gasp and recognised him, and put my foot on his neck. He had grabbed hold of me once at Mecca and had hurt me and punched me. Then I said, [1331] 'Has God disgraced you, O enemy of God?' 'In what way has he disgraced me?' he replied. 'Am I anything more important than a man whom you have killed? Tell me, to whom is the victory?' I said, 'To God and his Messenger.'"

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: Some men of the Banū Makhzūm assert that Ibn Masʿūd used to say, "Abū Jahl said to me, 'You have ascended a difficult ascent, you little shepherd.' Then I cut off his head and brought it to the Messenger of God, and I said, 'O Messenger of God, this is the head of the enemy of God, Abū Jahl.' Then the Messenger of God said, 'Is this so, by God, than whom there is no other deity?' This was the oath of the Messenger of God. I said, 'Yes, by God, than whom there is no other deity.' Then I threw down his head in front of the Messenger of God. He said, 'Praise be to God!'"

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq and Yazīd b. Rūmān—ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr—ʿĀ'isha: When the Messenger of God ordered the dead to be thrown into the well, all were thrown into it, except Umayyah b. Khalaf. He had swollen up in his coat of mail and filled it. They went to move him, but he fell apart, so they left him where he was and flung upon him enough earth and stones to cover him. When he threw the dead into the well, the Messenger of God stood over them and said, "O people of the well, have you found what your Lord promised you to be true? For I have found what my lord promised me to be [1332] true." His companions said to him, "O Messenger of God, are you speaking to dead people?" He replied, "They know (laqad ʿalimū) that what I promised them is the truth." ʿĀ'ishah said, "Other people report this saying with the words laqad samiʿū (they hear), but the Messenger of God said 'laqad ʿalimū.'"

113. A prominent man in Mecca at an earlier period; cf. Watt, Mecca, index.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —Ḥumayd al-Ṭawīl—Anas b. Mālik: The companions of the Messenger of God heard the Messenger of God saying in the depths of the night, "O people of the well, O ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah, O Shaybah b. Rabīʿah, O Umayyah b. Khalaf, O Abū Jahl b. Hishām —and he enumerated those who were with them in the well— have you found what your Lord promised you to be true? For I have found what my Lord promised me to be true." The Muslims said, "O Messenger of God, are you addressing people who have putrefied?" He replied, "You hear what I say no better than they, but they cannot answer me."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —certain scholars: The Messenger of God, on the day on which he uttered these words, also said, "O people of the well, you were evil fellow tribesmen to your prophet! You disbelieved me, when other people believed me. You drove me out, when other people gave me shelter. You fought me, when other people came to my aid." Then he added, "Have you found what your Lord promised you to be true?" . . . and the rest.

When the Messenger of God ordered the dead to be thrown into [1333] the well, ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah was taken and dragged to the well. As I have been informed, the Messenger of God looked into the face of his son Abū Ḥudhayfah b. ʿUtbah, which was dejected and altered, and said, "Abū Ḥudhayfah, perhaps some sadness has entered you on account of your father," or words to that effect. "No, by God, O Messenger of God," he replied. "I had no doubts about my father, nor about his death. But I knew my father to be a judicious, forbearing, and virtuous man, and I used to hope that these qualities would lead him to Islam. When I saw what had happened to him and remembered the state of unbelief in which he died, after the hopes which I had had for him, it saddened me." The Messenger of God prayed for his welfare and encouraged him.

The Division of the Booty

Then the Messenger of God gave orders concerning the contents of the camp which the people had collected, and it was all brought together. Among the Muslims, however, there was a difference of opinion concerning it. Those who had collected it said, "It is ours. The Messenger of God promised every man that he could keep the booty he took." Those who were fighting and pursuing the enemy said, "If it had not been for us, you would not have taken it. We distracted the enemy from you so that you could take what you took." Those who were guarding the Messenger of God for fear that the enemy would attack him said, "By God, you have no better right to it than we have. We wanted to kill the enemy when God gave us the opportunity and made them turn their backs, and we wanted to take property when there was no one to protect it; but we were afraid that the enemy might wheel round and attack the Messenger of God, so we remained standing before him; you have no better right to booty than we have."

[1334] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith and other companions of ours—Sulaymān b. Mūsā al-Ashdaq—Makḥūl—Abū Umāmah al-Bāhilī: I asked 'Ubādah b. al-Ṣāmit about (Sūrat) al-Anfāl (8). He replied, "It was revealed concerning us, the participants in the battle of Badr, when we disagreed about the booty and became very bad-tempered about it. God removed it from our hands and handed it over to his Messenger, and the Messenger of God divided it equally among the Muslims. In this matter there can be seen fear of God, obedience to his Messenger, and the settling of differences."

The Return of the Muslims to Medina

After the victory, the Messenger of God sent 'Abd Allāh b. Rawāḥah to take the good news that God had given the victory to his Messenger and the Muslims to the people of the upper part (of Medina), and he sent Zayd b. Ḥārithah to the people of the lower part. Usāmah b. Zayd said,[114] "The news came to us when we had buried Ruqayyah, the daughter of the Messenger of God, who was married to 'Uthmān b. 'Affān. The Messenger of God had left me to look after her together with 'Uthmān. Then Zayd b. Ḥārithah arrived so I went to him. He was standing in al-Muṣallā surrounded by people, and he was saying, "'Utbah b. Rabī'ah has been killed, and Shaybah b. Rabī'ah, Abū Jahl b. Hishām, Zam'ah b. al-Aswad, Abū al-Bakhtarī b. Hishām, Umayyah b. Khalaf, and Munabbih and Nubayh, the sons of al-Ḥajjāj.' I said, 'Father, is this true?' 'Yes, by God, my son,' he replied."

114. Usāmah, the son of Muḥammad's adopted son, Zayd b. Ḥārithah, was possibly only about eleven at this time.

Then the Messenger of God came back to Medina, bringing with him the booty which had been taken from the polytheists. In charge of the booty he put 'Abd Allāh b. Ka'b b. Zayd b. 'Awf b. Mabdhūl b. 'Amr b. Māzin b. al-Najjār. Then he himself advanced, halting when he had emerged from the defile of al-Ṣafrā' at a sand dune called Sayar between the defile and al-Nāziyah beside a sarḥ tree. There he divided equally the booty which God had bestowed upon the Muslims from the polytheists. After water had been brought to him from the spring there called al-Arwāq, he travelled on. When he was at al-Rawḥā', the Muslims met him, congratulating him and the Muslims with him on the victory which God had given them. [1335]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah and Yazīd b. Rūmān: Salamah b. Salāmah b. Waqsh said, "What are they congratulating us on? By God, we met nothing but bald old women like hobbled sacrificial camels, so we slaughtered them." The Messenger of God smiled and said, "My nephew, those were the mala'."[115]

The polytheist captives were with the Messenger of God, and there were forty-four of them. There was a similar number of dead.[116] Among the captives were 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ and al-Naḍr b. al-Ḥārith b. Kaladah,[117] but when the Messenger of God was at al-Ṣafrā' he had al-Naḍr b. al-Ḥārith killed by 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—one of the scholars of the people of Mecca: Then the Messenger of God went on, and when he was at 'Irq al-Ẓabyah he killed 'Uq- [1336]

115. The council or senate of Mecca; cf. Watt, Mecca, 8f.

116. Ibn Isḥāq has lists which give the numbers as 50 dead and 43 prisoners (IH, 511, 515); but Ibn Hishām adds further names which bring the totals to 70 dead and 70 prisoners.

117. Of the Meccan clan of 'Abd al-Dār; he had produced Persian stories which he claimed were as good as those in the Qur'ān bah b. Abī Muʿayṭ. When the Messenger of God ordered him to be killed, ʿUqbah said, "Who will look after my children, Muḥammad?" 'Hellfire," Muḥammad replied. He was killed by ʿĀṣim b. Thābit b. Abī al-Aqlaḥ al-Anṣārī, a member of the Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf. As I was informed by Abū ʿUbaydah b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmmār b. Yāsir, when the Messenger of God reached ʿIrq al-Ẓabyah and killed ʿUqbah b. Abī Muʿayṭ, he was met by Abū Hind, the mawlā of Farwah b. ʿAmr al-Bayāḍī with a butter-skin full of ḥays (ground dates mixed with butter). He had stayed away from Badr, but afterwards he was present at all the other battles with the Messenger of God; he was the Messenger of God's cupper.[118] The Messenger of God said, "Abū Hind is truly a man of the Anṣār, so relate yourselves to him by marriage," and they did so. Then the Messenger of God went on, reaching Medina a day before the captives.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī Bakr—Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Asʿad[119] b. Zurārah: When the captives were brought in, [1337] Sawdah bt. Zamʿah, the wife of the Prophet, was with the family of 'Afrā' participating in their mourning for her sons 'Awf and Muʿawwidh. This was before the veil had been imposed on women. Sawdah used to say, "By God, I was with them when someone came to us and said, 'Here are the captives who have been brought.' I went to my house," she said, "and the Messenger of God was there, and there was Abū Yazīd Suhayl b. ʿAmr[120] at one side of the room with his hands tied to his neck with a rope. By God," she said, "I could not restrain myself, when I saw Abū Yazīd like that, from saying, 'Abū Yazīd, did you surrender yourself? Why did you not choose an honourable death?' By God, it was only the voice of the Messenger of God coming from the house saying, 'Sawdah, (are you saying) this against God and to his Messenger?' which brought me back to myself. 'O Messenger

118. Cupping as a medical treatment to draw blood was popular with the Arabs.

119. IH, 459, reads As'ad, the well-known brother of Sa'd; but the editor of al-Ṭabarī says that As'ad had no sons.

120. Of the Meccan clan of 'Āmir (to which Sawdah belonged), and brother of her former husband. He was prominent in the resistance to Muḥammad in the years preceding the conquest of Mecca, but afterwards became a good Muslim; cf. Watt, Medina, index.

of God,' I said, 'by him who sent you with the truth, when I saw Abū Yazīd with his hands tied to his neck with a rope I could not restrain myself from saying what I said.'"

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Nubayh b. Wahb, the brother of the Banū ʿAbd al-Dār: When the Messenger of God came with the captives he divided them up among his companions, saying, "Look after the captives well." Abū ʿAzīz b. ʿUmayr b. Hāshim, the brother of Muṣʿab b. ʿUmayr by his father and his mother, was among the captives. Abū ʿAzīz said, "My brother Muṣʿab b. ʿUmayr passed by me while a man of the Anṣār had me captive, and said, 'Hold on to him tight, for his mother has property and she may ransom him from you.' I was in a group of the Anṣār when they brought me [1338] from Badr. When they took their lunch and their supper, they gave me bread in preference to themselves while they ate dates, because the Messenger of God had enjoined them concerning us, 'No crust of bread will fall into the hands of any one of them, but that he will reward me for it.' I would feel ashamed and give it back to one of them, but he would return it to me without touching it."

News of Defeat Reaches Mecca

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: The first person to reach Mecca with news of the defeat of Quraysh was al-Ḥaysumān b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Iyās b. Ḍubayʿah b. Māzin b. Kaʿb b. ʿAmr al-Khuzāʿī. (According to Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī], Al-Wāqidī says his name was al-Ḥaysumān b. Ḥābis al-Khuzāʿī.) "What has happened?" they asked. He said, "'Utbah b. Rabīʿah has been killed, and also Shaybah b. Rabīʿah, Abū al-Ḥakam b. Hishām, Umayyah b. Khalaf, Zamʿah b. al-Aswad, Abū al-Bakhtarī b. Hishām, and Nubayh and Munabbih, the sons of al-Ḥajjāj." When he started to enumerate the nobles of Quraysh, Ṣafwān b. Umayyah, who was sitting in the Ḥijr, said, "By God, if this man is in his right mind, question him about me." "What happened to Ṣafwān b. Umayyah?" they asked."There he is sitting in the Ḥijr," he said, "and by God, I saw his father and his brother when they were killed."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq

[1339] —Ḥusayn b. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Ubayd Allāh b. 'Abbās—'Ikrimah the mawlā of Ibn 'Abbās: Abū Rāfi', the mawlā of the Messenger of God, said, "I was a slave of al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, and Islam had entered us, the Ahl al-Bayt ("the people of the house," that is, Muḥammad's extended family). Umm al-Faḍl[121] became a Muslim, and I became a Muslim. Al-'Abbās was afraid of his people and was unwilling to oppose them, and he concealed the fact that he had become a Muslim. He had much property which was dispersed among his people. Abū Lahab, the enemy of God, had not gone to Badr and had sent in his place al-'Āṣ b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah; this is what they did—no man stayed away without sending another man in his place. When the news of the disaster which befell Quraysh at Badr came, God humbled and disgraced Abū Lahab, while we felt strength and might in our souls.

"I was a weak man, and I used to make arrows, which I would smooth in the enclosure of Zamzam.[122] By God, I was sitting there smoothing arrows, and Umm al-Faḍl was sitting there with me, both of us overjoyed by the news we had received, when the evildoer Abū Lahab approached, dragging his feet in malice. He sat down by the guy rope of the enclosure, so that his back was to my back. While he was sitting there the people said, 'Here is Abū Sufyān b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib who has just arrived.' Abū Lahab said, 'Come over here, my nephew, for you have news.' He sat down next to him while the others stood around him. Then Abū Lahab said, 'My nephew, tell me, what happened to our people?' 'Nothing, by God,' he replied, 'except that we met them and [1340] turned our backs, while they killed us and took us captive as they saw fit. Even so, I swear by God, I do not blame our people. We met white-robed men on piebald horses, between heaven and earth, for which we were no match and which nothing could resist."

"I lifted the guy rope of the enclosure with my hand and said, 'Those were the angels.' Abū Lahab raised his hand and gave me a violent blow on the face. I rushed at him but he picked me up and threw me to the ground and then knelt on me and beat me, for I was a weak man. Umm al-Faḍl went to one of the tent poles of 121. The wife of al-'Abbās.

122. A well near the Ka'bah.

the enclosure, picked it up and gave him a blow which split his scalp open and made an unpleasant wound. Then she said, 'You treat him arrogantly when his master is absent!' He got up and turned away humiliated. By God, he only lived for seven days before God afflicted him with pustules from which he died.[123] His two sons left him for two or three days without burying him until he began to stink in his house, for Quraysh were as afraid of pustules and their infectiousness as people are afraid of the plague. Finally, a man of Quraysh said to them, 'Woe to you! Are you not ashamed that your father is stinking in his house and you do not bury him?' 'We are afraid of those ulcers,' they said. 'Go, and I will come with you,' he said. They did not wash his corpse except by throwing water over it from a distance without touching it. Then they lifted it up and buried it in the highest part of Mecca [1341] next to a wall, and then threw stones over it until they covered it."

The Treatment of the Captives

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-'Abbās b. 'Abd Allāh b. Ma'bad—a member of his family—'Abd Allāh b.'Abbās: On the evening after the day of Badr, when the captives were confined in fetters, the Messenger of God could not sleep in the first part of the night. His companions said, "O Messenger of God, why do you not sleep?" He said, "I can hear al-'Abbās writhing in his fetters." So they went to al-'Abbās and released him from his fetters, and the Messenger of God went to sleep.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. 'Umārah—al-Ḥakam b. 'Utaybah—Miqsam—Ibn 'Abbās: The man who took al-'Abbās captive was Abū al-Yasar Ka'b b. 'Amr, the brother of the Banū Salimah. Abū al-Yasar was a slightly-built man, and al-'Abbās was a big man, and the Messenger of God said to Abū al-Yasar, "How did you take al-'Abbās captive, Abū al-Yasar?" "O Messenger of God," he replied, "a man whom I have never seen before or after helped me against him. His appearance was so-and-so." The Messenger of God said, "A noble angel helped you against him."

123. From here to the foot of p. 1341 is not in Ibn Hishām's text of Ibn Isḥāq, though al-Ṭabarī gives the latter as his source.

[1342] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: and Yaḥyā b. ʿAbbād—his father ʿAbbād: Quraysh bewailed their dead, and then said, "Do not act thus, in case Muḥammad and his companions get to hear of it and rejoice at your misfortune; and do not send any messages concerning the ransom of your captives, but keep Muḥammad and his companions waiting, so that they do not make excessive demands for ransoms."

Al-Aswad b. al-Muṭṭalib had lost three sons, Zamʿah b. al-Aswad, ʿAqīl b. al-Aswad, and al-Ḥārith b. al-Aswad, and he wanted to weep for them.[124] While he was in this condition, he suddenly heard a woman wailing in the night. He said to his slave, as he himself had lost his sight, "See if wailing has been made lawful and whether Quraysh are weeping for their dead, so that perhaps I can weep for Abū Ḥakīmah (meaning Zamʿah), for my belly is on fire." When the slave came back he said, "It is only a woman weeping for a camel of hers which she has lost." It was on that occasion that he composed the following verses:

Does she weep because a camel of hers is lost, and does sleeplessness prevent her from sleeping?
[1343] Do not weep for a young camel, but for Badr where our good fortune deserted us
For Badr and the chiefs of the Banū Ḥusayṣ, and Makhzūm and the clan of Abū al-Walīd.[125]
And weep, if you must weep, for ʿAqīl, and weep for al-Ḥārith, the lion of lions Weep for them all without tiring, and there is no equal to Abū Ḥakīmah.

---

124. Al-Ṭabarī appears to have made a mistake here and to have confused al-Aswad b. ʿAbd Yaghūth (of the clan of Zuhrah) with al-Aswad b. al-Muṭṭalib (of the clan of Asad). The former had no son called Zamʿah (al-Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, ed. E. Lévi-Provençal, Cairo 1953, 262), but the latter had a son Zamʿah and his kunyah was Abū Zamʿah. Al-Ṭabarī is also mistaken in speaking of al-Ḥārith b. al-Aswad; the man who died was his grandson al-Ḥārith b. Zamʿah b. al-Aswad. Below (1374) one should read Abū Zamʿah al-Aswad, since Zamʿah b. al-Aswad was killed at Badr.

125. Banū Ḥusayṣ means the clans of Sahm and Jumaḥ, Ḥusayṣ being nominally their grandfather. Abū al-Walīd is presumably ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah of ʿAbd Shams.

Indeed, men have become chiefs after them who would never have become chiefs if not for Badr.

Among the captives was Abū Wadā'ah b. Ḍubayrah al-Sahmī. The Messenger of God said, "He has a son who is a shrewd merchant with much money. It is as though he had already come to you about his father's ransom." When Quraysh said, "Do not hurry in ransoming your captives, so that Muḥammad and his companions do not make excessive demands on you," al-Muṭṭalib b. Abī Wadā'ah, who was the man the Messenger of God meant, said, "You are right! Do not hurry in ransoming your captives." Then he slipped away at night, went to Medina, ransomed his father for four thousand dirhams, and departed with him. After that, Quraysh sent to discuss ransoming the captives. Mikraz b. Ḥafṣ b. al-Akhyaf came to ransom Suhayl b. 'Amr, who had been taken captive by Mālik b. al-Dukhshum, the brother of the Banū Sālim b. 'Awf; Suhayl b. 'Amr had a split lower lip.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. 'Aṭā' b. 'Ayyāsh b. 'Alqamah, the [1344] brother of the Meccan clan of Banū 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb said to the Messenger of God, "O Messenger of God, pull out Suhayl b. 'Amr's two lower front teeth so that his tongue will loll out and he will never be able to stand up and make speeches against you anywhere." The Messenger of God said, "I will not mutilate him, or God will mutilate me even if I am a prophet." I have heard that the Messenger of God said to 'Umar in this ḥadīth, "Perhaps he will play a role which you will not find blameworthy." When Mikraz bargained with them over his ransom and finally reached an agreement with them, they said, "Give us what is due to us." He replied, "Fetter my foot instead of his and let him go, so that he can send you his ransom." So they let Suhayl go, and imprisoned Mikraz in his place.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Kalbī—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: The Messenger of God said to al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib when he reached Medina with him, "Al-'Abbās, you must ransom yourself, your two nephews, 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib and Nawfal b. al-Ḥārith, and your confederate, 'Utbah b. 'Amr b. Jaḥdam, the brother of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Fihr, for you are a wealthy man." "O Messenger of God," he replied, "I was a Muslim, but the people forced me (to fight) against my will." "God knows best concerning your Islam," he said. "If what you say is true, God will reward you for it. As for your external acts, they were against us; so ransom yourself." The Messenger of God had taken twenty ounces (ūqiyyah) of gold from him after Badr, and al-ʿAbbās said, "O Messenger of God, credit me with this amount towards my ransom." "No," he said, "that was something which God gave to us from you." "I have no [1345] money," al-ʿAbbās then said. "Well," was the reply, "Where is the money which you deposited with Umm al-Faḍl bt. al-Ḥārith in Mecca when you were setting out? You were by yourselves, and you said to her, 'If I am killed on my journey, so much is for al-Faḍl, so much is for ʿAbd Allāh, so much is for Qutham, and so much is for ʿUbayd Allāh'?" "By him who sent you with the Truth," he said, "nobody knows this except myself and her, and I know that you are the Messenger of God." So al-ʿAbbās ransomed himself, his two nephews, and his confederate.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad (Ibn Isḥāq)—ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm: ʿAmr b. Abī Sufyān b. Ḥarb, who was married to the daughter of ʿUqbah b. Abī Muʿayṭ, was a captive in the hands of the Messenger of God, one of the captives of Badr. They said to Abū Sufyān, "Ransom ʿAmr." "Shall I lose both my blood and my wealth?" he asked. "They have killed Ḥanẓalah and I am to ransom ʿAmr? Leave him in their hands and they can hold on to him as long as they like." While he was imprisoned in this way in the custody of the Messenger of God, Saʿd b. al-Nuʿmān b. Akkāl, the brother of the clan of ʿAmr b. ʿAwf, from the subclan of Muʿāwiyah,[126] went to Mecca to perform the ʿumrah accompanied by a young wife. He was a very old man, a Muslim, who had flocks in al-Naqīʿ. From there he went to perform the ʿumrah, not fearing what was to befall him and not imagining that he would be held captive in Mecca. He came simply to perform the ʿumrah, for Quraysh had undertaken not to interfere in any way with anyone [1346] who came to perform the ḥajj or the ʿumrah, apart from helping them. Abū Sufyān wrongfully imprisoned him at Mecca in exchange for his son 'Amr b. Abī Sufyān. Then Abū Sufyān composed the following lines of verse:

126. Cf. genealogical table in Watt, Medina, 154.

O clan of Ibn Akkāl, answer his prayer; may you lose one another! Do not forsake your mature chief.
The Banū 'Amr are base and lowly if they do not remove the fetters from their captive.

The Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf went to the Messenger of God, told him about this, and asked him to give them 'Amr b. Abī Sufyān so that they could obtain the release of their shaykh. The Messenger of God did so, and they sent 'Amr to Abū Sufyān, who allowed Sa'd to go.

The Release of Zaynab's Husband

Among the captives was Abū al-'Āṣ b. al-Rabī' b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. 'Abd Shams, the son-in-law of the Messenger of God, being the husband of his daughter Zaynab. Abū al-'Āṣ was one of the esteemed men of Mecca in respect of wealth, trustworthiness, and commerce. He was the son of Hālah bt. Khuwaylid (sister of Muḥammad's wife Khadījah) so that Khadījah was his maternal aunt. Khadījah asked the Messenger of God to marry him (to Zaynab) and he did not oppose this; this was before he had received any revelations. He married him (to her) and (Khadījah) used to regard Abū al-'Āṣ as her son. When God honoured his Messenger with his Prophethood Khadījah and his daughters believed in him, testified that the message which he brought was the truth, and followed his religion, but Abū al-'Āṣ held fast to his polytheism. The Messenger of God had married one of his daughters, either Ruqayyah or Umm Kulthūm, to 'Utbah b. Abī Lahab,[127] and when he openly proclaimed the command of God to Quraysh and they shunned it, they said to one another, "You had relieved Muḥammad of the worry of providing for his daughters; but now return his daughters to him and let him have responsibil-

127. As becomes clear later, this was not an actual marriage but only a betrothal. It is sometimes said that two daughters of Muḥammad had been betrothed to two sons of Abū Lahab. It was apparently Ruqayyah who, on being rejected by 'Utbah, was married to 'Uthmān.

ity for them." When they went to Abū al-'Āṣ b. al-Rabī' and said [1347] to him, "Leave your wife, and we will marry you to any woman you wish from Quraysh," he replied, "By God, I will do no such thing! I will not leave my wife, and I do not want any woman from Quraysh in exchange for my wife." I have been told that the Messenger of God used to praise him for being a good son-in-law.

Then they went to the evildoer, the son of the evildoer, 'Utbah b. Abī Lahab, and said to him, "Divorce Muḥammad's daughter and we will marry you to any woman you want from Quraysh." He said, "If you will marry me to the daughter of Abān b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ or the daughter of Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, I will leave her." So they married him to the daughter of Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, and he left Muḥammad's daughter. The enemy of God had not yet consummated the marriage, and God rescued Muḥammad's daughter from his enemy's clutches, to her honour and his shame. 'Uthman b. 'Affān (the later caliph) succeeded 'Utbah as her husband. The Messenger of God could not permit or forbid such marriages while in Mecca, since he was not in a position of authority.[128] Although Islam had in a sense separated Zaynab, the daughter of the Messenger of God, from Abū al-'Āṣ b. Rabī' when she became a Muslim, the Messenger of God was not able actually to separate them, and she continued to live with him until the Hijrah of the Messenger of God to Medina, despite the fact that she was a Muslim and he a polytheist. When Quraysh marched to Badr, Abū al-'Āṣ b. Rabī' marched with them, was taken captive on the day of Badr, and held in custody by the Messenger of God in Medina.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. 'Abbād b. 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubayr—his father, 'Abbād[129]—'Ā'ishah the wife of the Messenger of God: When the people of Mecca sent to negotiate about ransoming their captives, Zaynab, the daughter of the Messenger of God, sent money for [1348] the ransom of Abū al-'Āṣ b. al-Rabī' and included with it a necklace which Khadījah had presented to her when Abū al-'Āṣ married her. When the Messenger of God saw it, his heart softened greatly, and he said to the Muslims, "If you see fit to set free

128. The marriage of a Muslim woman to a non-Muslim, whether pagan or from the People of the Book, was later forbidden.

129. Cf. n.16; 'Ā'ishah was also maternal aunt of 'Abbād.

Zaynab's captive for her and to return her property to her, do so." They said, "Yes, O Messenger of God," and set Abū al-'Āṣ free and returned Zaynab's property. Either the Messenger of God extracted an undertaking from Abū al-'Āṣ, or he promised the Messenger of God that he would let Zaynab go to him, or else this was one of the conditions of his release which was not made public either by him or the Messenger of God so that we might know what it was. Whatever the truth of this, however, after Abū al-'Āṣ had been allowed to go and had reached Mecca, the Messenger of God sent Zayd b. Ḥārithah and a man of the Anṣār, saying, "Be in the Baṭn Ya'jaj until Zaynab passes by you, and then accompany her back to me." The two went there, a month or so after Badr. When Abū al-'Āṣ reached Mecca, he told Zaynab to go to her father, and she proceeded to get ready to travel.

Zaynab's Journey to Medina

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —'Abd Allāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm: I have been told that Zaynab said, "While I was getting ready to travel in Mecca in order to join my father, Hind bt. 'Utbah[130] met me and said, 'Daughter of Muḥammad, have I not heard that you wish to join your father?' I said, 'I do not want to do so.' She said, 'Cousin, do not deny it. If you need anything which will make your journey more comfortable or any money to help you reach your father, I have whatever you need, so do not be ashamed to ask; for [1349] men's quarrels have nothing to do with the women.' And, by God, I am sure that she meant what she said, but I was afraid of her, and denied that I wanted to go. Nevertheless, I got ready to travel."

When the daughter of the Messenger of God had completed her preparations, her brother-in-law, Kināmah b. al-Rabī', her husband's brother, brought her a camel, which she mounted. Then, taking his bow and quiver, he went out with her in broad day-

130. Hind was the wife of Abū Sufyān, who was of the same clan as Zaynab's husband, and this may be why Hind was friendly here; but she thirsted for vengeance on Muḥammad's uncle Ḥamzah because he had killed her father and uncle at Badr.

light, leading the camel with her in the camel litter. The men of Quraysh discussed this, and went out in pursuit of her, catching up with her at Dhū Ṭawā. The first men to reach her were Habbār b. al-Aswad b. al-Muṭṭalib b. Asad b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā and Nāfi' b. 'Abd al-Qays al-Fihrī. Habbār threatened her with a spear while she was in the camel litter; it is said that she was pregnant, and that when she went back again to Mecca, she had a miscarriage. After Habbār's threat, her brother-in-law knelt down, spread out the contents of his quiver, and said, "By God, if any man comes near me I will put an arrow into him." At this, they drew back from him until Abū Sufyān and the main body of Quraysh arrived. Abū Sufyān said, "Man, lower your bow so that we can talk to you." He lowered his bow, and Abū Sufyān came up and stood by him, and said, "You did the wrong thing in taking the woman away in public under everyone's noses. You know the affliction and disaster which have befallen us as a result of Muḥammad's actions. If his daughter is taken away from among us publicly, under their noses, people will think that this shows the humiliation which has befallen us as a result of the disaster we suffered, and [1350] that it is weakness and feebleness on our part. By my life, we have no need to keep her away from her father, and we have no intention of exacting vengeance in that way. But take the woman back, and when the clamour has died down and people are saying that we have brought her back, slip out secretly with her, and reunite her with her father." Kinānah did so, and when the clamour had died down he took Zaynab out by night and handed her over to Zayd b. Ḥārithah and his companion, and they took her to the Messenger of God.

The Conversion of Abū al-'Āṣ

Abū al-'Āṣ remained in Mecca, and Zaynab remained with the Messenger of God in Medina, separated by Islam. Just before the conquest of Mecca, however, Abū al-'Āṣ went on a trading expedition to Syria. He was regarded as a trustworthy man, and he had with him, besides his own merchandise, goods belonging to other men of Quraysh which they had entrusted to him to trade with. When he had concluded his business and was on his return journey, he encountered a detachment of the Messenger of God's men. They seized the goods he had with him, but he himself managed to elude them by flight. After the detachment reached Medina with his property which they had seized, Abū al-'Āṣ came under cover of night, entered the house of Zaynab, the daughter of the Messenger of God, and sought her protection, which she gave. He did this, seeking the recovery of his property.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —Yazīd b. Rūmān: When the Messenger of God came for the morning prayer, he said, "Allāh Akbar" and the people responded. Then Zaynab cried out from the women's bench, "O people, I have taken Abū al-'Āṣ b. al-Rabī' under my protection."

When the Messenger of God had completed his prayer, he turned round to the people and said, "O people, did you hear what I heard?" They said, "Yes." He said, "By him in whose hand Muḥammad's soul rests, I knew nothing of this until I heard the words you heard from Zaynab. It is the case, however, that the humblest of the Muslims has the right to extend protection (to someone) on their behalf."[131] Then the Messenger of God left and went to visit his daughter, and said, "Look after him well, but do not let him come near you, for you are not lawful for him (as a wife)." [1351]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq 'Abd Allāh b. Abī Bakr: The Messenger of God sent to the detachment who had seized Abū al-'Āṣ's property and said, "You know this man's relationship to us, and you have seized his property. If you would do him a kindness and return his property to him, we would like that, but if you do not wish to, then it is God's booty which he has bestowed upon you, and you have a better right to it." They replied, "O Messenger of God, we will return it to him."

So they returned his property to him; one man even brought rope, another brought old water-skins and leather bottles, and somebody even brought pegs for fastening sacks, until they had returned his property in its entirety, and nothing was missing. Abū al-'Āṣ then went to Mecca, and to every member of Quraysh who had entrusted him with merchandise handed over what belonged to him. Finally, he said, "Men of Quraysh, has any of you property remaining with me which he has not received back?" They said, "No, may God reward you well. We have found you to be faithful to your promise and generous." "Indeed then," he said, "I testify that there is no deity but God, and that Muḥammad is his servant and his Messenger. By God, nothing prevented me from accepting Islam when I was with him except the fear that you might think that I only wanted to help myself to your merchandise. Now that God has delivered it to you and I have no more to do with it, I accept Islam." Then he left Mecca and went to the Messenger of God.

131. This is the practice of ijārah, that is, the granting of protection as a "neighbour" (jār). Muḥammad emphasizes that the protection given by Zaynab is to be binding on all Muslims.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Dā'ūd b. al-Ḥuṣayn—'Ikrimah the mawlā of Ibn 'Abbās—'Abd Allāh b. 'Abbās: The Messenger of God returned Zaynab to him on the terms of his previous marriage six years earlier, and did not make any new conditions.

The Conversion of 'Umayr b. Wahb

[1352] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr: 'Umayr b. Wahb al-Jumaḥī was sitting in the Ḥijr with Ṣafwān b. Umayyah, a little after the disaster suffered by Quraysh at Badr. 'Umayr b. Wahb was one of the evil men of Quraysh, those who used to torment the Messenger of God and his companions, and cause them distress so long as they remained in Mecca. His son Wahb b.'Umayr was among the captives of Badr. While 'Umayr was discussing the People of the Well and what had happened to them, Ṣafwān said, "By God, there is nothing good in life after their death." "You are right, by God," replied 'Umayr. "If I did not have a debt which I cannot discharge, and a family who I fear might perish when I am gone, I would ride to Muḥammad and kill him. I have cause against his followers, for my son is captive in their hands." Ṣafwān b. Umayyah seized this opportunity and said, "I will accept your debt and will discharge it for you, and I will look after your family in exactly the same way as my own, as long as they live. They will lack nothing that is within my means." "Keep this agreement between us a secret, then," 'Umayr said. "I will do so," Ṣafwān replied.

Then 'Umayr called for his sword, had it sharpened and poisoned, and set out and came to Medina. While 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and a number of Muslims were in the Mosque talking about [1353] the day of Badr and discussing the way God had honoured them by it, and what he had taught them by the fate of their enemy, 'Umar suddenly noticed 'Umayr b. Wahb making his camel kneel at the door of the Mosque, and girt with his sword. "This is the dog, the enemy of God, 'Umayr b. Wahb," he said. "He has certainly come for some evil purpose. He is the one who set us against one another and estimated our numbers for the enemy on the day of Badr." 'Umar then went in to the Messenger of God and said, "O Messenger of God, here is the enemy of God 'Umayr b. Wahb, who has come wearing his sword." "Bring him in to me, then," he said. 'Umar went up to him, took hold of the shoulder-belt from which his sword was hanging, and seized him round the neck with it. Then he said to some men of the Anṣār who were with him, "Go in to the Messenger of God and sit near him, and watch out for this villain, for he is not to be trusted." 'Umar then took 'Umayr in to the Messenger of God, and when the Messenger of God saw him with 'Umar grasping his sword-belt he said, "Let him go, 'Umar. Approach, 'Umayr." He approached and said, "An'imū ṣabāḥan" [good morning]. This was the greeting of the people of the Jāhiliyyah among themselves. The Messenger of God replied, "God has honoured us with a greeting better than your greeting, 'Umayr, which is "al-salām" [peace], the greeting of the people of Paradise." "By God, Muḥammad," he said, "You have not been using this expression for long." "What brings you here, 'Umayr?" he asked. "I have come for this captive who is in your hands," he said, "so treat me well over him." "What is that sword round your neck for?" he asked. "God curse the swords," 'Umayr said. "Have they been of any use to us?" "Tell me the truth," he replied, "about what you have come for." "I have come for nothing but this," 'Umayr insisted. "No," the Messenger of God replied. "While you and Ṣafwān b. Umayyah were sitting in the Ḥijr and discussing the People of the Well of Quraysh, you happened to say, 'If it were not for a debt which I owe and for my family, I would go and kill Muḥammad.' Ṣafwān then said he would be responsible for your debt and your family on condition that you would kill me for him. God has intervened, however, be- [1354]

tween you and me." Then 'Umayr said, "I testify that you are the Messenger of God. We used to disbelieve the tidings of Heaven which you brought us and the revelations which came down to you. This is a meeting at which only Ṣafwān and I were present. By God, I know that nobody but God can have informed you of it. Praise be to God who has guided me to Islam and led me along this path." Then he pronounced the Shahādah,[132] and the Messenger of God said to the Muslims present, "Instruct your brother in his faith, teach him to recite and understand the Qur'ān, and release his captive for him," and they did so.

Later 'Umayr said, "O Messenger of God, I used to strive to put out the light of God and to persecute those who were in God's religion. I would like you to give me permission to go to Mecca and call the people there to God and to Islam. Perhaps God will guide them rightly; but, if not, I will make difficulties for them in their religion as I used to make difficulties for your companions in theirs."

The Messenger of God gave him permission and he went to Mecca. After 'Umayr b.Wahb had left Mecca, Ṣafwān used to say to Quraysh, "Rejoice, good news will come to you, in a few days from now, of an event which will make you forget what happened at Badr." Ṣafwān used to ask riders about 'Umayr, until one arrived who told him that he had become a Muslim. Ṣafwān swore that he would never again speak to 'Umayr and never again confer any benefit on him. 'Umayr, on arriving in Mecca, remained there calling people to Islam and making great difficulties for those who opposed him; many people accepted Islam at his hands.

Discussions About the Lawfulness of Taking Captives

When the events of Badr were over, God revealed al-Anfāl (Surah 8) in its entirety concerning it.

According to Aḥmad b. Manṣūr—'Āṣim b. 'Alī—'Ikrimah b. 'Ammār—Abū Zumayl—'Abd Allāh b. 'Abbās—'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb: On the day of Badr, the two armies met, and God defeated the polytheists. Seventy of them were killed and seventy were taken captive. On that day the Messenger of God consulted Abū Bakr, ʿAlī and ʿUmar. Abū Bakr said, "O Prophet of God, [1355] these people are cousins, fellow clansmen and nephews. I think that you should accept ransoms for them so that what we take from them will strengthen us, and perhaps God will guide them aright so that they may be an assistance for us." The Messenger of God said, "What do you think, Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb?" I said, "I say no, by God! I am not of the same opinion as Abū Bakr. I think that you should hand so-and-so over to me so that I can cut off his head, and that you should hand Ḥamzah's brother over to him so that he can cut off his head, and that you should hand over ʿAqīl to ʿAlī (his brother) so that he can cut off his head. Thus God will know that there is no leniency in our hearts towards the unbelievers. These are their chiefs, their leaders, and their foremost men."

132. The shahādah is the profession of faith: "I bear witness there is no deity but God, Muḥammad is the Messenger of God." Pronouncing this made a man a Muslim.

The Messenger of God liked what Abū Bakr said and did not like what I said, and accepted ransoms for the captives. The next day I went to the Prophet in the morning. He was sitting with Abū Bakr, and they were weeping. I said, "O Messenger of God, tell me, what has made you and your companion weep? If I find cause to weep, I will weep with you, and if not, I will pretend to weep because you are weeping." The Messenger of God said, "It is because of the taking of ransoms which has been laid before your companions. It was laid before me that I should punish them, more nearly than this tree (and he pointed to a nearby tree)." God revealed: "It is not for any Prophet to have captives until he hath made slaughter in the land . . ." to the words, "(Had it not been for an ordinance of Allah which had gone before) . . . an awful doom had come upon you on account of what ye took."[133] After that, God made the booty lawful for them. In the following year, at Uḥud, they were punished for what they had done. Seventy men of the companions of the Messenger of God were killed, and seventy were taken captive. (Muḥammad's) lateral incisor was bro-

133. Qur. 8.67f. The verses are interpreted to mean that Muḥammad should not have taken captives at Badr and that the Muslims should not have been so anxious to gain the ransom money. The next verse, however, says that they may keep and enjoy what they have taken (69).

ken, his helmet was shattered on his head, and the blood flowed over his face; the Prophet's companions fled and took to the mountain. (Then) God revealed: "And was it so, when a disaster smote you, though ye had smitten (them with a disaster) twice (as [1356] great), that ye said, How is this? Say (unto them, O Muḥammad): It is from yourselves. 'Lo! Allah is able to do all things.'"[134] And this other verse was revealed: "When ye climbed (the hill) and paid no heed to anyone, while the messenger in your rear was calling you (to fight). Therefore, he rewarded you grief for (his) grief that (he might teach) you not to sorrow either for that which ye missed or for that which befell you.... Then after grief he sent down security for you."[135]

According to Salm b. Junādah—Abū Mu'āwiyah—al-A'mash—'Amr b. Murrah—Abū 'Ubaydah—'Abd Allāh: When it was the day of Badr and the captives were brought, the Messenger of God asked, "What do you say concerning these captives?" Abū Bakr replied, "O Messenger of God, they are your people and your family. Spare them and give them time. Perhaps God will relent against them." 'Umar said, "O Messenger of God, they have called you a liar and driven you out. Bring them forward and cut off their heads." 'Abd Allāh b. Rawāḥah said, "O Messenger of God, look for a wadi with a lot of firewood in it, put them in it and set fire to it around them." Al-'Abbās said to him, "Your own kin have severed the bonds of kinship."

The Messenger of God was silent and did not answer them. Then he went indoors, and some people said, "He will take Abū Bakr's advice," some said, "He will take 'Umar's advice," and other people said, "He will take the advice of 'Abd Allāh b. Rawāḥah." When the Messenger of God came out again, he said, "God softens the hearts of men in each, so that they become softer than milk, and God hardens the hearts of men in each so that they become harder than stones. Abū Bakr, you are like Abraham, who said, 'Whoso followeth me, he verily is of me. And whoso disobeyeth me—Still thou art Forgiving, Merciful.'[136] And Abū Bakr, you are (also) like Jesus, who said, 'If thou punish them, lo! they are thy slaves, and if thou forgive them (lo! they are

134. Qur. 3.165.
135. Qur. 3.153f.

thy slaves). Lo! Thou, only Thou art the Mighty, the Wise.'[137] You, [1357]
'Umar, are like Noah, who said, 'My Lord! Leave not one of the disbelievers in the land.'[138] And you are like Moses, who said, 'Our Lord! Destroy their riches and harden their hearts so that they believe not till they see the painful doom.'"[139]

Then the Messenger of God said, "You today are a single household. Let not one of them escape without paying a ransom or losing his head." 'Abd Allāh b. Mas'ūd said, "Except for Suhayl b. Bayḍā', for I heard him professing Islam." The Messenger of God was silent, and I do not think that I have ever been more fearful that stones would fall on me from Heaven than I was that day; but at last the Messenger of God repeated, "Except for Suhayl b. Bayḍā'." In respect of this matter God revealed, "It is not for any Prophet to have captives until he hath made slaughter in the land . . ." to the end of the three verses.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: When it was revealed, "It is not for any Prophet to have captives . . ." the Messenger of God said, "If punishment were to descend from Heaven, none would escape from it but Sa'd b. Mu'ādh, because he said, 'O Prophet of God, extensive killing is dearer to me than sparing men's lives.'"

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: The total number of the Emigrants who were present at Badr and who were given a share and a reward from it by the Messenger of God was eighty-three, according to Ibn Isḥāq (Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah). The total number of al-Aws who were present and received a share was sixty-one, and the total number of al-Khazraj who were present was one hundred and seventy, according to Ibn Isḥāq. The total number of Muslims [1358] martyred on that day was fourteen men, six from the Emigrants and eight from the Anṣār.

The polytheists, so al-Wāqidī asserts, consisted of nine hundred and fifty fighters, and their cavalry consisted of a hundred horse.

On that day the Messenger of God sent back a number of people whom he considered to be too young, according to al-Wāqidī.

---

136. Qur. 14.36.
137. Qur. 5.118.
138. Qur. 71.26.
139. Qur. 10.88.

Among them, he claims, were 'Abd Allāh b. 'Umar, Rāfi' b. Khadīj, al-Barā' b. 'Āzib, Zayd b. Thābit, Usayd b. Ẓuhayr and 'Umayr b. Abī Waqqāṣ. Then he allowed 'Umayr to take part after sending him back, and he was killed on that day.[140]

Before setting out from Medina the Messenger of God had sent Ṭalḥah b.'Ubayd Allāh and Sa'īd b. Zayd b. 'Amr b. Nufayl along the road to Syria to gather information about the caravan. Their return to Medina did not take place until the actual day of the battle of Badr. They met the Messenger of God at Turbān, which is the descent from Badr, as he was making for Medina.

Al-Wāqidī says:[141] The Messenger of God set out from Medina with three hundred and five men. The Emigrants numbered seventy-four, and the rest were Anṣār. Eight (other) men got their rewards and shares; three of the Emigrants, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān who stayed behind to look after (his wife) the daughter of the Messenger of God, until she died, together with Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubayd Allāh and Sa'īd b. Zayd, whom he sent to gather information about the caravan; and five of the Anṣār, Abū Lubābah Bashīr b. 'Abd al-Mundhir, whom he left in charge of Medina, 'Aṣim b. 'Adī b. al-'Ajlān, whom he left in charge of the 'Āliyah, al-Ḥārith b.
[1359] Ḥāṭib, whom he sent back from al-Rawḥā' to the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf on account of some news he had about them, al-Ḥārith b. al-Ṣimmah, who broke his leg at al-Rawḥā' (he belonged to the Banū Mālik b. al-Najjār), and Khawwāt b. Jubayr, who was from the Banū Amr b. 'Awf, who also broke his leg. There were seventy camels and two horses, one belonging to al-Miqdād b. 'Amr and one to Marthad b. Abī Marthad.[142]

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī)—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Muḥammad b. Hilāl—his father—Abū Hurayrah: The Messenger of God was seen in pursuit of the polytheists on the day of Badr with drawn sword reciting, "The hosts will all be routed and will turn and flee."[143] On the Badr expedition, the Messenger of God took his sword Dhū al-Faqār as booty. It had belonged to Munabbih b. al-Ḥajjāj. On that day he also took Abū

140. W, 21.

141. W, 101; W. says that 'Āṣim b. 'Adī was left in charge of Qubā' and of Ahl al-'Āliyah, "the people of the upper districts."

142. W, 102.

143. Qur. 55.45.

Jahl's camel as booty. It was a Mahrī dromedary on which he used to go on raids and which he used to put to stud with his milch camels.

The Campaign Against the Banū Qaynuqāʿ

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: The Messenger of God remained in Medina after his return from Badr. When he first came to Medina he had made a compact with its Jews that they would not aid anyone against him and that if any enemy attacked him there they would come to his aid. After the Messenger of God killed many polytheists of Quraysh at Badr, (the Jews) were envious and behaved badly towards him, saying, "Muḥammad has not met anyone who is good at fighting. Had he met us, he would have had a battle which would be unlike a battle with anyone else." They also infringed the contract in various ways.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq:[144] What happened with regard to the Banū Qaynuqāʿ was that the [1360] Messenger of God assembled them in the Market of the Banū Qaynuqāʿ and said, "O Jews, beware lest God bring on you the like of the retribution which he brought on Quraysh. Accept Islam, for you know that I am a prophet sent by God. You will find this in your scriptures and in God's covenant with you." They replied, "Muḥammad, do you think that we are like your people? Do not be deluded by the fact that you met a people with no knowledge of war and that you made good use of your opportunity. By God, if you fight us you will know that we are real men!"

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b.Qatādah: The Banū Qaynuqāʿ were the first Jews to infringe the agreement between them and the Messenger of God; they took to arms between Badr and Uḥud.

According to Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh—al-Zuhrī: The campaign of the Messenger of God against the Banū Qaynuqāʿ was in Shawwāl (which began March 27, 624) in the second year of the Hijrah.

144. IH, 545. The Jewish clan had a settlement near the middle of the oasis of Medina; they worked as goldsmiths and armourers but did not engage in agriculture.

According to Al-Zuhrī—'Urwah: Gabriel brought the following verse down to the Messenger of God: "And if thou fearest treachery from any folk, then throw back to them their treaty fairly."[145] When Gabriel had finished delivering this verse, the Messenger of God said, "I fear the Banū Qaynuqā'."

'Urwah says: It was on the basis of this verse that the Messenger of God advanced upon them.

According to Al-Wāqidī—Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ—'Āṣim b.'Umar b. Qatādah: The Messenger of God besieged them for fifteen days and prevented any of them from getting out. They then surrendered at the discretion of the Messenger of God. They were fettered, and he wanted to kill them, but 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy spoke to him on their behalf.[146]

[1361] Resumption of the narrative of Ibn Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah.

The Messenger of God besieged them until they surrendered at his discretion. 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl rose up when God had put them in his power, and said, "Muḥammad, treat my mawālī well"; for they were the confederates of al-Khazraj. The Prophet delayed his answer, so 'Abd Allāh repeated, "Muhammad, treat my mawālī well." The Prophet turned away from him, and he put his hand into (the Messenger's) collar. The Messenger of God said, "Let me go!"—he was so angry that they could see shadows in his face (that is, his face coloured). Then he said, "Damn you, let me go!" He replied, "No, by God, I will not let you go until you treat my mawālī well. Four hundred men without armour and three hundred with coats of mail, who defended me from the Arab and the non-Arab alike, and you would mow them down in a single morning? By God, I do not feel safe and am afraid of what the future may have in store." So the Messenger of God said, "They are yours."

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī)—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah: The Prophet said, "Let them go; may God curse them, and may he curse ('Abd Allāh b. Ubayy) with them." So the Muslims let them go. Then

145. Qur. 8.58.
146. W, 177, summarized.

the Messenger gave orders to expel them, and God gave their property as booty to his Messenger and the Muslims. The Banū Qaynuqāʿ did not have any land, as they were goldsmiths. The Messenger of God took many weapons belonging to them and the tools of their trade. The person who took charge of their expulsion from Medina along with their children was ʿUbādah b. al-Ṣāmit. He accompanied them as far as Dhubāb, saying "The most distant and furthest honour is the furthest." On this occasion [1362] the Messenger of God left Abū Lubābah b. ʿAbd al-Mundhir in charge of Medina.

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: In this year, the first khums (fifth) to be levied by the Messenger of God in Islam took place. The Messenger of God took his ṣafī, the khums and his share, and distributed the other four fifths among his companions. This was the first khums to be taken by the Messenger of God.[147]

The banner of the Messenger of God in the battle against the Banū Qaynuqāʿ was a white banner, carried by Ḥamzah b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib. There were no flags (rāyāt) on that day.

Celebration of the First ʿĪd al-Aḍḥā

Then the Messenger of God returned to Medina, and (the festival of) al-Aḍḥā came.[148] It is related that the Messenger of God made his sacrifice together with those of his companions who had the means to do so on the tenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (June 3, 624). He took the people to al-Muṣallā and led them in prayer. This was the first prayer which the Messenger of God led at al-Muṣallā on a festival. On this festival, he slaughtered two sheep there with his own hands, or according to some people, one sheep.

According to Al-Wāqidī—Muḥammad b. Faḍl, one of the descendants of Rāfiʿ b. Khadīj—Abū Mubashshir: I heard Jābir b. ʿAbd Allāh saying, "When we came back from fighting the Banū

147. The khums or "fifth" has already been mentioned (1275; n.45). The ṣafī or "first pick" was a special privilege of the Messenger (as of tribal chiefs). The "share" was what was due to him as one of the participants.

148. The ʿīd al-aḍḥā or "festival of the sacrifice" is primarily part of the Ḥajj or pilgrimage to Mecca. On the 10th of the pilgrimage month (Dhū al-Ḥijjah), the pilgrims immolate sacrificial victims (sheep, camels, etc.) at Mina. The festival is also celebrated by all Muslims everywhere. See *EI*², art. ʿId al-aḍḥā.

Qaynuqāʿ, we sacrificed on the morning of the tenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah. This was the first Aḍḥā which the Muslims witnessed. We sacrificed in the territory of the Banū Salimah, and seventeen sacrificial victims were counted there."[149]

Minor Expeditions—Dating[150]

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: As for Ibn Isḥāq, he does not specify any date for the campaign of the Messenger of God against the Banū Qaynuqāʿ, except for saying that it was between the expedition of al-Sawīq and the expedition of the Messenger of God from Medina against Quraysh, in which he went as far as the Banū Sulaym and Buḥrān, a mine in Ḥijāz in the direction of al-Furʿ.
[1363] Others say that there were three expeditions led by the Messenger of God himself and one raiding party which he dispatched between his first expedition to Badr and the campaign against the Banū Qaynuqāʿ. They claim that the Prophet attacked the latter on 7 Ṣafar (July 30, 624) in the third year of the Hijrah, and that the Messenger of God led this attack after coming back from Badr, his return to Medina being on a Wednesday, eight days before the end of Ramaḍān (which ended March 26, 624). After spending the rest of Ramaḍān there, he led an expedition to Qarqarat al-Kudr[151] when he heard that the Banū Sulaym and Ghaṭafān were gathering. He set out from Medina on a Friday, when the sun was high in the sky, on the first day of Shawwāl in the second year of the Hijrah (March 27, 624).

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When the Messenger of God came to Medina from Badr, having finished with Badr at the end of Ramaḍān or the beginning of Shawwāl, he spent only seven days in Medina before leading an expedition in person against the Banū Sulaym. He got as far as one of their watering places, called al-Kudr, stayed there for three days, and then went back to Medina without any fighting. He remained there for the rest of Shawwāl and Dhū al-Qa'dah (which ended May 24, 624), and during this period most of the captives of Quraysh were ransomed.

149. This paragraph seems to be from a source other than the Maghāzī of al-Wāqidī.

150. There is much uncertainty about the order and dating of these minor expeditions between the battles of Badr and Uḥud; they are described in IH, 539–55 and W, 181–98.

151. W, 182, has Qarārat al-Kudr.

As for al-Wāqidī, he asserts that the Prophet's expedition to al-Kudr was in Muḥarram in the third year of the Hijrah (which began June 24, 624), that on this expedition his banner was carried by 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, and that he left Ibn Umm Maktūm al-Ma'īṣī in charge of Medina.[152]

Some authorities say that the Prophet returned to Medina from the expedition to al-Kudr, having driven off livestock without any fighting, on 10 Shawwāl (April 5, 624). He then sent Ghālib b. [1364] 'Abd Allāh al-Laythī, on Sunday, 10 Shawwāl, as leader of a raid against the Banū Sulaym and Ghaṭafān. The Muslims killed some of the enemy, took their livestock, and returned to Medina with their booty, on Saturday, fourteen days before the end of Shawwāl (April 11, 624). Three of the Muslims were martyred. The Messenger of God stayed in Medina until Dhū al-Ḥijjah (May 25—June 23, 624) and led the expedition of al-Sawīq on Sunday, seven days before the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah.

The Expedition of al-Sawīq (the Barley-Meal)[153]

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī)—Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When the Messenger of God returned to Medina from the expedition to al-Kudr, he remained there for the rest of Shawwāl of the second year of the Hijrah and Dhū al-Qa'da (which ended May 24, 624). Then Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb went on the expedition of al-Sawīq in Dhū al-Ḥijjah. In this year the polytheists led the pilgrimage.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr, and Yazīd b. Rūmān and one whose authority I do not doubt—'Ubayd Allāh b. Ka'b b. Mālik, who was one of the best-informed of the Anṣār: After the battle of Badr, when Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb returned to Mecca, along with the routed remnants of Quraysh, he swore that no water would touch his head to purify him from ritual impurity until he had led an ex- [1365]

152. Ibn Umm Maktūm is said to have been the blind man in respect of whom Sūrah 80 was revealed. Ma'īṣ is a subclan of the Meccan clan of 'Āmir.

153. IH, 543f.; W,181f. Sawīq is barley-meal, which was usually consumed in the form of gruel. The reason for the name is explained by al-Wāqidī below.

pedition against Muḥammad. In order to fulfil his vow, he set out at the head of two hundred horsemen of Quraysh and took the Najdī route, halting in the upper part of Qanāt by a mountain called Tayt (variant Thayb), a stage or so from Medina. Then he set out by night and came, while it was still night, to the Banū al-Naḍīr. He went to Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab and knocked at his door, but Ḥuyayy refused to open up, being afraid of him. Then he went to Sallām b. Mishkam, who was the chief of al-Naḍīr at that time and their treasurer, and asked to be allowed to enter. Sallām did so, provided him with food and drink, and gave him confidential information about the Muslims. Towards the end of the night, Abū Sufyān left and returned to his companions, then sent some men of Quraysh into Medina. These went to a district called al-'Urayḍ, set fire to date gardens there, and killed a man of the Anṣār and his confederate whom they found in arable ground belonging to the man. After that, they left and went back. The Muslims caught sight of them, however, and the Messenger of God set out in pursuit. He went as far as Qarqarat al-Kudr but then turned back, because Abū Sufyān and his companions had eluded them. The Muslims saw the provisions which these had discarded in the fields in order to lighten their load and escape. When the Messenger of God returned, the Muslims said to him, "Do you hope that this will be counted in our favour as an expedition?" He replied, "Yes."

As Abū Sufyān was equipping himself to go from Mecca to Medina, he had recited the following lines of verse to spur on Quraysh:

[1366] Wheel round and attack Yathrib and its population, for what they have gathered together is booty for you.
Even though the day of the Well may have gone in their favour,
what comes after it will turn out in your favour.
I have sworn that I will not approach women and that the water of ablution will not touch my head and skin Until you destroy the tribes of al-Aws and al-Khazraj; indeed my heart is on fire.

Ka'b b. Mālik replied to him in these words:

The mother of those who praise God sighs for Ibn Ḥarb's army which was so futile in the Ḥarrah
When the Muslims threw aside the bodies of those upon whom the birds had gorged their fill, flying to the top of the mountains.
They came with an army the kneeling-place of whose camels,
if it were measured,
would be no more than the hollow left by a jackal, Denuded of victory and wealth, and denuded of the heroes of the Valley, and of spears.

As for al-Wāqidī, he asserts that the expedition of al-Sawīq was in Dhū al-Qa'dah in the second year of the Hijrah (which began April 25, 624), and says, "The Messenger of God set out at the head of two hundred of his companions, of the Emigrants and the Anṣār." Then he gives an account of the journey of Abū Sufyān which is similar to that given by Ibn Isḥāq, except that he says, "He (meaning Abū Sufyān) passed by a man called Ma'bad b. 'Amr, who had a hired worker with him, at al-'Urayḍ, killed them both and set fire to some houses and straw there. He then considered that he was released from his vow. The clamour came to the ears of the Prophet, and the people assembled for fighting and set out on his track, but they were unable to catch him." [1367]

He goes on, "Abū Sufyān and his companions were throwing down sacks of barley-meal in order to lighten themselves, this being the main part of their provisions. For this reason it was called the ghazwat al-sawīq (the barley-meal expedition).

Al-Wāqidī says: The Messenger of God left Abū Lubābah b. 'Abd al-Mundhir in charge of Medina.

Other Events of the Year

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī says): In this year, that is the second year of the Hijrah, there died, in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 'Uthmān b. Maẓ'ūn. The Messenger of God buried him in al-Naqī', and set a stone at his head to mark his grave. It is said that al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was born in this year.

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī)—al-Wāqidī—Ibn Abī Sabrah—Isḥāq b. 'Abd Allāh—Abū Ja'far: 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib married Fāṭimah in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, at the beginning of the twenty-second month.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: If this account is correct, then the previous report is erroneous.[154]

It is said that in this year the Messenger of God wrote the Ma'āqil, which was suspended from his sword.[155]

---

154. See 1273 above and n.43.

155. Ma'āqil, plural of ma'qūlah, which like diyah means "blood-money." Muḥammad is said to have drawn up regulations about this; Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, Musnad, i.271; ii.204. Cf. also *EI*², arts 'Āḳila (R.Brunschwig), Diya (E. Tyan).

The Events of the Year 3

(JUNE 24, 624–JUNE 12, 625)

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: When the Messenger of God returned from the "barley-meal expedition" he remained in Medina for the rest of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (which began May 25, 624) and for Muḥarram (which began June 24, 624), or nearly all of it, and then mounted an expedition to Najd against Ghaṭafān, which is known as the expedition of Dhū Amarr.[156] He spent the whole of Ṣafar (which began July 24, 624), or almost all of it, in Najd and then returned to Medina without [1368] any fighting. He spent all but a small part of Rabīʿ al-Awwal (which began August 22, 624) there, and then went on an expedition against Quraysh and the Banū Sulaym. He went as far as Buḥrān, a mine in Ḥijāz in the region of al-Furʿ, spent Rabīʿ al-Ākhir and Jumādā al-Ūlā (September 21–November 18, 624) there, and then returned to Medina without any fighting.

156. IH, 544. IH omits "Muḥarram," but it is implied by what follows.

The Story of Ka'b b. al-Ashraf[157]

Abu Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: In this year the Prophet sent a party against Ka'b b. al-Ashraf. Al-Wāqidī asserts that the Prophet sent this party in Rabī' al-Awwal of this year. Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq says: When the Meccans suffered disaster at Badr, Zayd b. Ḥārithah went to the people of the Sāfilah and 'Abd Allāh b. Rawāḥah went to the people of the 'Āliyah, both sent by the Messenger of God to the Muslims in Medina to bring the good news of the victory granted to him by God and the killing of a number of polytheists.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —'Abd Allāh b. Mughīth b. Abī Burdah b. Asīr al-Ẓafarī, and 'Abd Allāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm, and 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah and Ṣāliḥ b. Abī Umāmah b. Sahl; all of them, (Ibn Isḥāq) said, related a part of his story to me: Ka'b b. al-Ashraf, was a man of (the tribe of) Ṭayyi', one of the Banū Nabhān, and his mother was from the (Jewish clan of) Banū al-Naḍīr. When the news reached him, he said, "Alas! Is this true? Can Muḥammad have killed these people whom these two men (meaning Zayd b.
[1369] Ḥārithah and 'Abd Allāh b. Rawāḥah) have named? These are the nobles of the Arabs and the kings of men! By God, if Muḥammad has killed these people, then the belly of the earth is a better place for us than its surface!" When the enemy of God became convinced of the truth of the report, he set out and went to Mecca to stay with al-Muṭṭalib b. Abī Wadā'ah b. Ḍubayrah al-Sahmī, who was married to 'Ātikah bt. Asīd b. Abī al-'Īṣ b. Umayyah b. 'Abd Shams. She received him and offered him hospitality, and he began to arouse people against the Messenger of God, to recite verses, and to weep for the People of the Well from Quraysh who were killed at Badr. Then Ka'b b. al-Ashraf went back to Medina and composed the following amatory poem on Umm al-Faḍl bt. al-Ḥārith:[158]

Are you leaving without stopping in a valley, and abandoning Umm al-Faḍl in the Ḥaram?

---

157. IH, 548–55; W, 184–93.

158. Umm al-Faḍl bt. al-Ḥārith was the wife of al-'Abbās, but it is not clear why Ka'b should have praised her. She was from the important nomadic tribe of 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah.

Pale-skinned she is, and scented with saffron; if she were squeezed, she would exude scent, henna and hair-dye.
When she makes to rise, but then does not, what lies between her ankles and her elbows quivers.
Like Umm Ḥakīm when she was close to us,
the bonds that link us are firm and unsevered
One of the Banū ʿĀmir by whom my heart is driven to madness; but if she wished, she could cure Kaʿb of his sickness.
The chief of women; and her father is the chief of his tribe, a people of high repute, who live up to their obligations.
Never before her have I seen a sun rising at night, appearing to us when there is no moon.

Then he composed love poetry on some of the women of the Muslims, causing them offence.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbd Allāb b. al-Mughīth b. Abī Burdah: The Prophet said, "Who will rid me of Ibn al-Ashraf?" Muḥammad b. Maslamah, the brother of the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal, said, "I will rid you of him, O Messenger of God. I will kill him." "Do it then," he said, [1370] "if you can." Muḥammad b. Maslamah went back and remained for three days, neither eating nor drinking more than would keep him alive. The Messenger of God got to hear of this, so he summoned him and said to him, "Why have you left off food and drink?" "O Messenger of God," he said, "I said something, and I do not know whether or not I can fulfil it." "All that you are obliged to do is try," he replied. "O Messenger of God," he said, "we shall have to tell lies." "Say what you like," he replied. "You are absolved in the matter." Then Muḥammad b. Maslamah, Silkān b. Salāmah b. Waqsh, otherwise known as Abū Nāʾilah, one of the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal, and the foster brother of Kaʿb, ʿAbbād b. Bishr b. Waqsh, one of the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal, al-Ḥārith b. Aws b. Muʿādh, one of the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal, and Abū ʿAbs b. Jabr, one of the Banū Hāritḥah, made a plan to kill him. Before they all went to Ibn al-Ashraf, they sent ahead Silkān b. Salāmah Abū Nāʾilah. He went to him, and they spoke together for a while, and recited verses to one another, for Abū Nāʾilah was something of a poet. Then he said, "Ibn al-Ashraf, I have come to you about a matter of which I should like to speak to you, but keep it to yourself." "Go ahead," he replied. "The arrival of this man has been an affliction for us," he said. "The Beduin are hostile to us, and all of them attack us. We cannot travel along the roads, and the result is that our families are facing ruin and suffering. We are all suffering and our families are suffering." Ka'b replied, "By God, I, Ibn al-Ashraf, warned you, Ibn Salāmah, that things would turn out like this." Silkān said, "I would like you to sell us some food. We will give you a surety and make a firm contract; please treat us generously." "Give me your sons as a surety," he said. "Do you want to disgrace us?" he asked. "I have [1371] some companions with me who think the same way that I do. I would like to bring them to you so that you can sell to them; please treat us generously. We will deposit with you sufficient coats of mail to guarantee payment of the debt." Silkān wanted him not to be suspicious about the weapons when they came bearing them. He replied, "Coats of mail will be a satisfactory guarantee." Silkān went back to his companions, informed them of what had happened, and told them to take their weapons, set off, and join him. They came together at the house of the Messenger of God.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Thawr b. Zayd al-Dīlī—'Ikrimah, the mawlā of Ibn 'Abbās—Ibn 'Abbās: The Messenger of God went with them to Baqī' al-Gharqad and then sent them off, saying, "Go in the name of God; O God, aid them!" Then the Messenger of God went back to his house. It was a moonlit night, and they went forward until they reached Ka'b's stronghold.[159] Then Abū Nā'ilah called out to him. He had recently married, and he leapt up in his blanket. His wife took hold of one end of it, and said, "You are a fighting man; a man of war does not leave his house at an hour like this." He replied, "It is Abū Nā'ilah. If he had found me sleeping, he would not have wakened me." "By God," she said, "I sense evil in his voice!" Then Ka'b said to her, "Even if a brave man is summoned to a sword thrust, he responds." He went down and spoke with them for a while, and they spoke with him. Then they said to him, "Would you like to walk with us, Ibn al-Ashraf, to Shi'b al-'Ajūz, so that we can talk there for the rest of the night?" "If you like," he said. So they set out together and walked for a while. Then Abū Nā'ilah thrust his hand into the hair of his temple, smelt it, and said, "I have never known perfume to smell so good as it does tonight." Then he walked on for a while, and did the [1372] same thing again, so that Ka'b relaxed his guard. Then he walked on for a while, and did it again, taking hold of the hair of both temples. Then he said, "Strike the enemy of God!" Their swords rained blows upon him, but to no avail. Muḥammad b. Maslamah said later, "When I saw that our swords were of no avail, I remembered a long, thin dagger which I had in my scabbard, and took hold of it. By this time the enemy of God had shouted so loudly that lamps had been lit in all the strongholds around us. I plunged the dagger into his breast and pressed upon it so heavily that it reached his pubic region, and the enemy of God fell. Al-Ḥārith b. Aws b. Mu'ādh had been wounded in the head or the leg, struck by one of our swords. We left, passing through the quarters of the Banū Umayyah b. Zayd and the Banū Qurayẓah, and then through Bu'āth, until we climbed up the ḥarrah of al-'Urayḍ. Our companion al-Ḥārith b. Aws was lagging behind us, bleeding heavily, so we waited for him for a while, and then he came to us, having followed in our footsteps.

159. One of the features of Medina was the existence of many "strongholds" (āṭām, sing. uṭum), that is, small forts or fortified houses where those inside were secure from hostile attack.

We lifted him up and carried him to the Messenger of God at the end of the night. He was standing in prayer, so we greeted him, and he came out to meet us. We told him that the enemy of God had been killed, he spat upon the wound of our companion, and we returned to our families. The next morning, the Jews were in a state of fear on account of our attack upon the enemy of God, and there was not a Jew there but feared for his life.

The Messenger of God said, "Whoever of the Jews falls into your hands, kill him." So Muḥayyiṣah b. Mas'ūd fell upon Ibn Sunaynah, one of the Jewish merchants who was on close terms with them and used to trade with them, and killed him. Ḥuwayyiṣah b. Mas'ūd (his brother) at that time had not accepted Islam; he was older than Muḥayyiṣah, and when (the latter) killed (the Jew), he began beating him and saying, "O enemy of God, have [1373] you killed him? By God, you have much fat in your belly from his wealth." Muḥayyiṣah said, "I said to him, 'By God, if he who commanded me to kill him had commanded me to kill you, I would have cut off your head.'" And, by God, that was the beginning of Ḥuwayyiṣah's acceptance of Islam. He said, "If Muḥammad had ordered you to kill me, you would have killed me?" and I replied, "Yes, by God, if he had ordered me to kill you I would have cut off your head." "By God," he said, "a faith which has brought you to this is indeed a marvel." Then Ḥuwayyiṣah accepted Islam.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: This report was related to me by a mawlā of the Banū Ḥārithah —the daughter of Muḥayyiṣah—her father.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: Al-Wāqidī asserts that they brought Ibn al-Ashraf's head to the Messenger of God. Al-Wāqidī also asserts that in Rabī' al-Awwal of this year (which began August 22, 624) 'Uthmān b. 'Affān married Umm Kulthūm, the daughter of the Messenger of God, and that she was brought to his house in Jumādā al-Ākhirah (which began November 19, 624). He further asserts that in Rabī' al-Awwal of this year the Messenger of God led the expedition of Anmār, known as Dhū Amarr. We have mentioned Ibn Isḥāq's opinion about this previously.

Al-Wāqidī says: In this month was born al-Sā'ib b. Yazīd b. Ukht al-Namir.

The Expedition to al-Qaradah[160]

Al-Wāqidī says: in Jumādā al-Ākhirah (which began November [1374] 19, 624) of this year the expedition to al-Qaradah took place. Its leader is said to have been Zayd b. Ḥārithah. This is the first expedition led by Zayd b. Ḥārithah.

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī)—Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah —Ibn Isḥāq: The Messenger of God sent Zayd b. Ḥārithah on an expedition in which he captured the caravan of Quraysh led by Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb at Qaradah, a watering place in Najd. After what happened at the battle of Badr, Quraysh were afraid to take the road which they used to follow to Syria and instead took the 160. IH, 547f.; W, 197f.

Iraq route. A number of their merchants set out, and among them was Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb with a large amount of silver, since this was the main part of their merchandise. They hired a man of Bakr b. Wā'il named Furāt b. Ḥayyān to guide them along this route. The Messenger of God sent out Zayd b. Ḥārithah, who met them at that watering place and captured the caravan and its goods, but was unable to take the men. He then brought the caravan to the Messenger of God.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: As for al-Wāqidī, he asserts that the reason for this expedition was that Quraysh said, "Muḥammad has damaged our trade, and sits astride our road." Abū Sufyān and Ṣafwān b. Umayyah then argued, "If we stay in Mecca we will consume our capital." Abu Zam'ah al-Aswad said, "I will show you a man who will guide you along the Najdī route; he would find his way if he followed it with his eyes shut." Ṣafwān said, "Who is he? Our need for water is small, for winter is upon us." He said, "Furāt b. Ḥayyān." They summoned him and hired him. He led them out, it being winter, and took them by Dhāt 'Irq and then by Ghamrah. The news of the caravan reached the Prophet, [1375] as also the information that it contained much wealth and silver vessels which were being carried by Ṣafwān b. Umayyah. Zayd b. Ḥārithah therefore set out, intercepted the caravan, and made himself master of it, although the leading men escaped. The fifth (khums) was twenty thousand (dirhams); the Messenger of God took it and divided the other four fifths among the members of the expedition. Furāt b. Ḥayyān al-'Ijlī was taken captive. They said to him, "If you accept Islam, the Messenger of God will not kill you." When the Messenger of God summoned him to Islam, he accepted it, and was allowed to go free.

The Killing of Abū Rāfi' the Jew[161]

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: In this year, it is said, the killing of Abū Rāfi' the Jew took place. The reason for his being killed was, it is said, that he used to take the part of Ka'b b. al-Ashraf against the Messenger of God. The Messenger of God is said to have sent

161. IH, 714–6, 981; W, 391–5; Watt, Medina, 212f.

'Abd Allāh b.'Atīk against him in the middle of Jumādā al-Ākhirah of this year (which began November 19, 624).

According to Hārūn b. Isḥāq al-Hamdānī—Muṣ'ab b. Miqdām —Isrā'īl—Abū Isḥāq—al-Barā': The Messenger of God sent some of the Anṣār under the command of 'Abd Allāh b. 'Uqbah or 'Abd Allah b. 'Atīk against Abū Rāfi' the Jew, who was in the Ḥijāz. Abū Rāfi' used to injure and wrong the Messenger of God. He lived in his stronghold in the Ḥijāz. When the Muslim party drew [1376] close to it, as the sun was setting and the people were bringing their flocks back, 'Abd Allāh b. 'Uqbah or 'Abd Allāh b. 'Atīk said to the others, "Stay where you are, and I will go and ingratiate myself with the doorkeeper, in the hope of gaining entrance." He went forward, and when he was close to the door, he wrapped himself up in his cloak as though he were relieving himself. Everybody else had gone in, and the doorkeeper called to him, "You there, if you want to come in, come in, because I want to shut the door." "I went in," he said, "and hid myself in a donkey pen. When everybody had come in, the man shut the door and hung up the keys on a wooden peg. I went to the keys, took them, and opened the door. Abū Rāfi' had company that evening in some upper rooms, and when his guests left I went up to him. Every time I opened a door, I shut it again behind me from inside, saying to myself, 'If they become aware of me, they will not be able to reach me before I kill him.' When I reached him, he was in a dark room along with his family. As I did not know where he was in the room, I said, 'Abū Rāfi'!' and he said, 'Who is that?' I rushed toward the sound and gave him a blow with my sword, but I was in a state of confusion and did not achieve anything. He gave a shout, and I left the room but remained close at hand. I then went in again and said, 'What was that noise, Abū Rafi'?' 'God damn it,' he said, 'there is a man in the house who has just struck me with [1377] his sword.' Then I hit him and covered him with wounds, but I could not kill him, so I thrust the point of my sword into his stomach until it came out through his back. At that, I knew that I had killed him, and I opened the doors one by one until I reached a flight of stairs. Thinking that I had reached the ground, I put my foot out but fell into a moonlit night and broke my leg. I bound it up with my turban and moved on. Finally, finding myself sitting by the door, I said to myself, 'By God, I will not leave tonight until I know whether I have killed him or not.' When the cock crowed, the announcer of his death stood upon the wall and said, 'I announce the death of Abū Rāfiʿ, the profit-maker of the people of Ḥijāz.' I went to my companions and said, 'Deliverance! God has killed Abū Rāfiʿ.' Then I went to the Prophet and told him, and he said, 'Stretch out your leg!' When I stretched it out, he stroked it, and it was as though I had never had anything wrong with it."

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: As for al-Wāqidī, he asserts that this expedition sent by the Messenger of God against Abū Rāfiʿ Sallām b. Abī al-Ḥuqayq was sent in the fourth year of the Hijrah in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (which began May 4, 626) and that those who went to him and killed him were Abū Qatādah, ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAtīk, Masʿūd b. Sinān, al-Aswad b. Khuzāʿī, and ʿAbd Allāh b. Unays. [1378]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Sallām b. Abī al-Ḥuqayq, who was Abū Rāfiʿ, was one of those who had mustered the aḥzāb against the Messenger of God. Al-Aws had killed Kaʿb b. al-Ashraf before Uḥud on account of his enmity to the Messenger of God and his inciting people against him, and so al-Khazraj asked permission of the Messenger of God to kill Sallām b. Abī al-Ḥuqayq, who was in Khaybar, and was granted this.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Muslim b. ʿUbayd Allāh b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī—ʿAbd Allah b. Kaʿb b. Mālik: One of the favours which God conferred upon his Prophet was that these two tribes of the Anṣār, al-Aws and al-Khazraj, used to vie with one another like stallions as regards the Messenger of God; al-Aws did not do anything which benefited the Messenger of God without al-Khazraj saying, "By God, they will not gain superiority over us in Islam in the eyes of the Messenger of God by doing this," and they would not cease until they had done something similar. When al-Khazraj did something, al-Aws said the same. Thus, when al-Aws killed Kaʿb b. al-Ashraf on account of his hostility to the Messenger of God, al-Khazraj said, "They will never take superiority from us by doing that." They conferred together to find a man comparable to Ibn al-Ashraf in hostility to the Messenger of God and called to mind Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq, who was in Khaybar. They then asked the Messenger of God for permission to kill him, and this he gave. Five men of al-Khazraj, of the clan of Banu Salimah, [1379] set out, 'Abd Allāh b.'Atīk, Mas'ūd b. Sinān, 'Abd Allah b. Unays, Abū Qatādah al-Ḥārith b. Rib'ī, and Khuzā'ī b. al-Aswad, a confederate of theirs from (the tribe of) Aslam. The Messenger of God put 'Abd Allāh b. 'Atīk in command of them and forbade them to kill women or children. Setting out, they reached Khaybar and entered Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq's house by night. As they went, they shut the door of every room in the house upon its occupants. Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq was in an upper room reached by a spiral stairway. They climbed up this, went to the door, and asked permission to enter. A woman came out to them and said, "Who are you?" They replied, "We are some beduin seeking provisions of grain." She said, "The man you want is over there; go in and see him." "When we went in," (they said), "we shut the door behind her, ourselves, and him, being afraid that a patrol might prevent us from getting at him. His wife gave a shout to warn him of our presence, and we rushed upon him with our swords as he was in his bed. By God, the only thing which guided us to him in the blackness of the night was his whiteness, as though he were a piece of Egyptian linen thrown down there.

"When his wife shouted that we were there, one of us would raise his sword against her; then he would remember the Prophet's prohibition and withdraw his hand. If it had not been for that, we would have dispatched him that night. After we had struck him with our swords, 'Abd Allāh b. Unays thrust his sword into his stomach and transfixed him while he was shouting, 'Enough! Enough!' At once we went out. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Atīk had bad eye-[1380] sight, and he fell off the stairway, bruising his leg severely. We lifted him up, took him to one of their water channels, and entered it. They lit lamps, and searched for us in every nook and cranny, but finally they gave up hope and went back to their master, crowding round him as he lay dying. We said to ourselves, 'How shall we know that the enemy of God is dead?' One of us said, 'I will go and look for you.' He set off and mingled with the people. He said later, 'I found him with the men of the Jews, and with his wife, who had a lamp in her hand and was looking into his face. Then she said, speaking to them, "By God, I recognised the voice of Ibn 'Atīk, but then I thought I must be wrong, and said to myself, 'How could Ibn 'Atīk be in this country?'" Then she turned to him to look in his face, and said, "By the God of the Jews, he is dead." 'I never heard any words more pleasing to me, said our companion.

"He then came back to us and told us the news. We lifted up our injured companion, went to the Messenger of God, and told him that we had killed the enemy of God. We disagreed in his presence about the killing of Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq, each of us claiming to have done it. The Messenger of God then said, 'Bring your swords,' and when we did so he looked at them and said, 'This sword of 'Abd Allāh b. Unays killed him. I can see the marks left by bones on it.'"

Speaking of the killing of Ka'b b. al-Ashraf and Sallām b. Abī al-Ḥuqayq, Ḥassān b.Thābit[162] said:

How excellent are the people whom we met, Ibn (Abī) al-Ḥuqayq and you, Ibn al-Ashraf!
Travelling by night towards you with nimble swords, [1381] as proud as lions in a wooded den
Until they came to you in your country, and made you taste death with sweeping swords,
Vigilant for the victory of the faith of their Prophet, and setting at naught every calamity.

According to Mūsā b.'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Masrūqī and 'Abbās b. 'Abd al-'Aẓīm al-'Anbarī—Ja'far b. 'Awn—Ibrāhīm b. Ismā'īl —Ibrāhīm b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ka'b b. Mālik—his father—his mother, the daughter of 'Abd Allāh b. Unays—'Abd Allāh b. Unays: The company whom the Messenger of God sent to Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq to kill him comprised 'Abd Allāh b. 'Atīk, 'Abd Allāh b. Unays, Abū Qatādah, one of their confederates, and a man of the Anṣār. They reached Khaybar at night. 'Abd Allāh b. Unays said, "We went to their doors, shut them from the outside, and took the keys, so that they were locked in. Then we threw the keys into an irrigation ditch and went to the upper room where [1382] Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq was lying. 'Abd Allāh b.'Atīk and I went up there while our companions sat down by the wall. 'Abd Allāh b.'Atīk asked permission to enter, and Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq's wife said, 'That is 'Abd Allāh b. 'Atīk's voice.' Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq said, 'May your mother be bereaved of you! 'Abd Allāh b. 'Atīk is in Yathrib. How could he be with you at this hour? Open the door! No honourable man turns visitors from his door at such an hour.' So she got up and opened the door, and I and 'Abd Allāh went in to Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Atīq said, 'You take care of her!' So I unsheathed my sword against her, and I was going to strike her with it, but I remembered that the Messenger of God had forbidden the killing of women and children, and I desisted. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Atīk went up to Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq. 'I looked at him,' he said, 'at the extreme whiteness of his skin in a dark upper room, and when he saw me and saw the sword, he took the pillow and tried to fend me off with it. I made to strike him, but was unable to do so, and instead pierced him with it.' Then 'Abd Allāh b. Unays came out to join me, and said, 'Shall I kill him?' I said, 'Yes,' so he went in and finished him off.

162. Ḥassān b. Thābit of the tribe of al-Khazraj in Medina was the most prominent of the poets supporting Muḥammad; cf. *EI*², art. Ḥassān b. Thābit (W. Arafat). This poem is to be found in his Dīwān, ed. Arafat, London 1971, i.211f.

"Then (said 'Abd Allāh b. Unays) I went out to 'Abd Allāh b. 'Atīk and we left, and the woman shouted, 'A night raid! A night raid!' Then 'Abd Allāh b. 'Atīk fell down the staircase and said, 'My leg! My leg!' I carried him until I was able to lay him down on the ground and said, 'Go! There is nothing wrong with your leg.' So we left. We came to our companions and set off. Then I remembered my bow, which I had left in the staircase. I returned for my bow, and there were the people of Khaybar, surging against [1383] one another and saying nothing but, 'Who has killed Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq? Who has killed Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq?" I did not look anybody in the face, while nobody looked me in the face, but I merely said, "Who has killed Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq?" I then went up the staircase, while people were going up and down, took my bow from where it was and left. When I reached my companions, we hid during the day and travelled by night; when we were hiding we posted one of our number as a sentry to keep watch for us, and if he saw anything he would signal to us, and we would move on. When we were at al-Bayḍā', I (Mūsā said, 'I was their sentinel,' and 'Abbās said, 'I was their sentry,') gave the signal, and they moved off at a brisk pace. I followed in their footsteps until we were close to Medina, and then caught up with them. They said, "What is the matter? Have you seen something?" "No," I said, "But I knew that you were exhausted and ill, and I wanted fear to spur you on."'"

The Prophet Marries Ḥafṣah

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: In this year the Prophet married Ḥafṣah bt. 'Umar, in Sha'bān (which began January 17, 625).[163] She had previously been married to Khunays b. Ḥudhāfah al-Sahmī in the Jāhiliyyah, and he had left her a widow.

The Expedition to Uḥud[164]

In this year also there took place the expedition of the Messenger of God to Uḥud. This is said to have been on Saturday, 7 Shawwāl, in Year Three of the Hijrah (March 23, 625).

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: What provoked the expedition to Uḥud by the polytheists of Quraysh against the Messenger of God was the battle of Badr and the killing of those nobles and chiefs of Quraysh who were killed there.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: (Ibn Isḥāq said) Muḥammad b. Muslim b. 'Ubayd Allāh b. Shihāb [1384]
al-Zuhrī and Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥibbān and 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatāda b and al-Ḥusayn b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Amr b. Sa'd b.Mu'ādh and others of our scholars have all related a part of this narrative concerning the day of Uḥud, and their narrative is combined in the account which I have given of the day of Uḥud. They say that when Quraysh—or, according to some versions, when the People of the Well of the unbelievers of Quraysh on the day of Badr—were overtaken by disaster, and their defeated remnants reached Mecca, and when Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb returned with his caravan, 'Abd Allāh b. Abī Rabī'ah, 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl, and Ṣafwān b. Umayyah went at the head of a number of men of Quraysh whose fathers, sons, and brothers had been killed at Badr

163. There were reasons of state for Muḥammad's marriage with Ḥafṣah, as with virtually all his other marriages. She was the daughter of one of his chief supporters, 'Umar, later second caliph. Her first husband was a Muslim from Mecca killed at Badr.

164. IH, 555–638; W, 199–334; Watt, Medina, 21–9.

and addressed Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb and those members of Quraysh who had goods in that caravan, saying, "Men of Quraysh, Muḥammad has bereaved you and killed the best of you; aid us with this wealth to wage war against him and perhaps we will obtain vengeance upon him for those of us who have been killed." They agreed to do so. When Abū Sufyān and the owners of the caravan agreed to this, Quraysh assembled to wage war against the Messenger of God, together with their Aḥābīsh[165] and those of the tribes of Kinānah and the people of Tihāmah who obeyed them.
[1385] All of these people raised a clamour to wage war against the Messenger of God.

Abū ʿAzzah ʿAmr b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Jumaḥī had been treated kindly by the Messenger of God on the day of Badr, being a poor man with daughters. He was among the captives, and he said, "O Messenger of God, I am a poor man with a family and with needs which you are aware of; so treat me kindly, may God bless you!" The Messenger of God then treated him kindly.

Ṣafwān b. Umayyah now said, "Abū ʿAzzah, you are a poet, so aid us with your tongue, and join our expedition." "Muḥammad has treated me kindly," he replied, "and I do not wish to help against him." "No," he urged, "aid us in person, and I swear before God that if you return I will make you a rich man and that if you are killed I will treat your daughters as I treat my own daughters; whatever hardship or prosperity comes my daughters' way will come their way." With this assurance, Abū ʿAzzah joined the expedition, travelling through Tihāmah and calling upon the Banū Kinānah. Similarly, Musāfiʿ b. ʿAbd Manāf b. Wahb b. Hudhāfah b. Jumaḥ went to the Banū Mālik b. Kinānah to rouse them and call upon them to fight the Messenger of God.

Jubayr b.Muṭʿim called a slave of his called Waḥshī, who was an Abyssinian who threw his javelin in the Abyssinian manner and rarely missed with it, and said to him, "Go with the army, and if you kill Muḥammad's uncle in retaliation for my uncle Ṭuʿaymah b. ʿAdī, you are free." Quraysh set out armed and determined on battle, with their Aḥābīsh and those of the Banū Kinānah and the people of Tihāmah who were with them. They had taken their womenfolk with them in the hope that they would be spurred on by zeal to defend these and would not run away. Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb, who was the leader of the army, had with him [1386] Hind bt. 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah; 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah had with him Umm Ḥakīm bt. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah; al-Ḥārith b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah had with him Fāṭimah bt. al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah; Ṣafwān b. Umayyah b. Khalaf had with him Barzah [Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] asserts that some say Barrah] bt. Mas'ūd b. 'Amr b. 'Umayr al-Thaqafiyyah, the mother of 'Abd Allāh b. Ṣafwān; 'Amr b. al-'Aṣ b. Wā'il had with him Rayṭah bt. Munabbih b. al-Ḥajjāj, the mother of 'Abd Allāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ; Ṭalḥah b. Abī Ṭalḥah, who was 'Abd Allāh b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b.'Uthmān b. 'Abd al-Dār, had with him Sulāfah bt. Sa'd b. Shuhayd, the mother of Musāfi', al-Julās, and Kilāb, sons of Ṭalḥah, who were killed on that day together with their father; Khunās bt. Mālik b. al-Muḍarrib, one of the women of the Banū Mālik b. Ḥisl, and the mother of Muṣ'ab b. 'Umayr, set out with her son Abū 'Azīz b. 'Umayr, and 'Amrah bt. 'Alqamah, one of the women of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah, also set out.

165. These Aḥābīsh (meaning "group of people not all of one tribe") were a confederacy of small clans or subtribes. The most important was Banū al-Ḥarith b. ʿAbd Manāt b. Kinānah; others were al-Muṣṭaliq and al-Hūn (with subdivisions ʿAḍal and al-Qārah). The assertion of Henri Lammens that they were Abyssinian slave mercenaries is mistaken. Cf. *EI*², art. Ḥabash. last section.

Every time Hind bt. 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah passed by Waḥshī, or he [1387] passed by her, she would say, "Go to it, Abū Dusmah! Quench my thirst for vengeance, and quench your own!" Abū Dusmah was Waḥshī's kunyah.[166]

The Meccan force went forward, and halted at 'Aynayn on a hill in the valley of al-Sabkhah of Qanāt on the edge of the wadi nearest to Medina. When the Messenger of God and the Muslims

166. The kunyah or "parent name" is the name of the form "Abū M" or "Umm N" ("father of M," "mother of N"), and was a title of respect. M or N was usually the eldest son, but, especially in Medina, could instead be a daughter. Sometimes a kunyah seems to have been given to children as a first name, as in the case of Muḥammad's daughter Umm Kulthūm, and sometimes as a kind of nickname. While Waḥshī could conceivably have had a daughter called Dusmah (or Dasmah), it seems more likely that Abū Dusmah, "father of duskiness or blackness," was felt to be an appropriate name for an Abyssinian slave; but it does not seem to be a disrespectful mode of address, just as the name of Muḥammad's uncle Abū Lahab probably originally meant "father of brightness," although Sūrah 91 links it with the flame (lahab) of Hell.

heard that they were camped there, the Messenger of God said to the Muslims, "I saw in a dream some cattle, and interpreted them as a good omen; and I saw that the blade of my sword was notched, and I saw that I had put on an invulnerable coat of mail, and I interpreted that as Medina. If you see fit to remain in Medina and to leave them encamped where they are, well and good; for, if they remain there, they will be in the worst possible place, and if they enter Medina to fight us, we will fight them here."

Quraysh camped at Uḥud on Wednesday and remained there on that day, Thursday, and Friday. When the Messenger of God had led the Friday prayer, he went out and reached the gorge of Uḥud the following morning. Battle was joined on Saturday, halfway through Shawwāl (March 23, 625).

The opinion of 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl was the same as the opinion of the Messenger of God on this matter, that he should not go out to meet the enemy. Yet, although the Messenger of God had not wanted to go out of Medina, some men of the Muslims whom God ennobled with martyrdom on the day of Uḥud, and others who had missed Badr and the chance to be there, said, [1388] "O Messenger of God, lead us out to our enemies so that they may not think that we are too cowardly and weak to face them." 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl said, "O Messenger of God, stay in Medina and do not go out to meet them. By God, we have never gone out of it to meet an enemy but that they have inflicted severe losses on us; and no enemy has ever entered it but that we have inflicted severe losses on them. Leave them alone, O Messenger of God, and if they remain, they will be in the worst possible place; and if they enter Medina, the men will fight them face to face, and the women and boys will hurl stones at them from above; if they then withdraw, they will withdraw disappointed in their hopes, as they came." Those who were eager to meet the enemy, however, continued to press the Messenger of God until he went into his house and put on his coat of mail. This was on Friday, after he had finished the prayer.

On that day there had died a man of the Anṣār called Mālik b. 'Amr, one of the Banū al-Najjār. The Messenger of God prayed over him, and then went out to meet the enemy. By this time the people had repented; they said, "We have compelled the Messenger of God against his wishes, and we had no right to do this."

The narrative of al-Suddī.

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] says that according to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn—Aḥmad b. al-Mufaḍḍal—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī, when the Messenger of God heard that the polytheists of Quraysh and their followers had camped at Uḥud he said to his companions, "Advise me what I should do." They said, "O Messenger of God, lead us out to these dogs." The Anṣār said, "O Messenger of God, no enemy of ours has ever overcome us who came to us in our dwelling places, so how much more will this be the case now that you are among us." The Messenger of God called upon 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl, although he had never called upon him before, [1389] and asked for his counsel. "O Messenger of God," he said, "lead us out to these dogs." The Messenger of God would have preferred that the enemy should enter Medina, so that the fighting could be in the alleyways. Al-Nu'mān b. Mālik al-Anṣārī came to him and said, "O Messenger of God, do not deprive me of Paradise! By him who sent you with the truth, I shall indeed enter Paradise!" "In what way?" the Messenger of God said. Al-Nu'mān replied, "By testifying that there is no deity but God and that you are the Messenger of God, and by not fleeing from the advancing enemy." "You have spoken the truth," the Messenger of God said. Al-Nu'mān was killed that day.

The Messenger of God then called for his coat of mail and put it on. When they saw him armed, the people repented and said, "What an evil deed we have done, giving the Messenger of God advice when inspiration comes to him!" They rose up and apologised to him, saying, "Do what you see fit!" The Messenger of God replied, "It is not fitting for a prophet to put on his coat of mail and take it off again before fighting." So the Messenger of God went out to Uḥud at the head of a thousand men, having promised them victory if they showed endurance. When he went out, however, 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl returned with three hundred men. Abū Jābir al-Salimī followed them, calling them, but they did not heed him[167] and said to him, "We know of no battle; and if you take our advice, you will come back with us." On this occasion God said, "When two parties of you almost fell away. . . ."[168] The two parties were the Banū Salimah and the Banū Ḥārithah, who were minded to go back when 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy went back; but God restrained them, and the Messenger of God remained at the head of seven hundred men.

167. Al-Ṭabarī's text does not quite make sense here, perhaps owing to a careless abridgement, and has been slightly changed in translation; see Ibn Isḥāq's version below.

Resumption of the narrative of Ibn Isḥāq.

When the Messenger of God went out to do battle with the en-[1390] emy, the Muslims said, "O Messenger of God, we have compelled you against your will, and we had no right to do this. If you wish, stay here, may God bless you." The Messenger of God replied, "It is not fitting for a prophet when he has put on his coat of mail to take it off until he fights." So the Messenger of God went out at the head of a thousand men of his companions until, when they were at al-Shawṭ, between Uḥud and Medina, 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl split off from him with a third of the army, saying, "He obeyed them by setting out and disobeyed me. By God, we do not know why we should get ourselves killed here, men." So he went back to Medina with those of his people of the Hypocrites and doubters who followed him. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Amr b. Ḥarām, the brother of the Banū Salimah, followed them saying, "I call on you in God's name not to abandon your Prophet and your people when the enemy is here!" They replied, "If we knew that we were going to fight, we would not desert you, but we do not think that there is going to be a battle." When they thus refused to heed him and insisted on going back, he said, "God curse you, enemies of God! God will let us manage without you."

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī)—Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī: 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy split off from the Messenger of God at al-Shaykhayn with three hundred men, and the Messenger of God remained with seven hundred. The polytheists numbered three thousand and their cavalry numbered two hundred horse. Their womenfolk numbered fifteen.

Among the polytheists there were seven hundred men wearing coats of mail, while among the Muslims there were only one hundred. The Muslims had no cavalry with them apart from two horses, one belonging to the Messenger of God and one belonging to Abū Burdah b. Niyār al-Ḥārithī. The Messenger of God set out before daybreak from al-Shaykhayn, just as the sky was beginning [1391] to redden. Al-Shaykhayn received the name from two strongholds which were looked after by a blind Jew and a blind Jewess who used to talk to one another; they were called al-Shaykhayn (the two old people) because of this. They lie at the furthest extremity of Medina.

168. Qur. 3.22.

The Messenger of God had reviewed his troops at al-Shaykhayn after sunset, allowing some to go on and sending some back. Among those whom he sent back were Zayd b. Thābit, Ibn 'Umar, Usayd b. Ẓuhayr, al-Barā' b. 'Āzib, and 'Arābah b. Aws. The latter is the person of whom al-Shammākh said:

I considered 'Arābah the Awsite a man of good deeds, one without equal
When the banner of glory was raised aloft,
'Arābah accepted it with his right hand.

He also sent back Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī, but allowed Samurah b. Jundub and Rāfi' b. Khadīj to go on. The Messenger of God had considered Rāfi' too young, but he stood on his pair of patched shoes and stretched himself on tiptoe to his full height, and when the Messenger of God saw him, he passed him.

According to Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī): Samurah's mother was married to Murayy b. Sinān b. Tha'labah, the uncle of Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī, and he was Samurah's stepfather. When the Messenger of God went out to Uḥud, reviewed his men and sent back those whom he thought too young, he sent back Samurah b. Jundub and passed Rāfi' b. Khadīj. Then Samurah b. Jundub said to his stepfather Murayy b. Sinān, "Father, the Messenger of God has passed Rāfi' b. Khadīj and sent me back, but I can throw Rāfi' b. Khadīj in wrestling." So Murayy [1392] b. Sinān said, "O Messenger of God, you have sent back my son and passed Rāfi' b. Khadīj, but my son can throw him in wrestling." The Messenger of God said to Rāfi' and Samurah, "Wrestle!" Samurah threw Rāfi', and so the Messenger of God passed him, and he was present at the battle with the Muslims. The Prophet's guide was Abū Ḥathmah al-Ḥārithī.

Resumption of the narrative of Ibn Isḥāq.

As the Messenger of God was proceeding across the ḥarrah of the Banū Ḥārithah, a horse swished its tail, hit the handle of a sword, and knocked it out of its scabbard. The Messenger of God, who liked omens, although he did not take auguries from the flight of birds, said to the owner of the sword, "Sheathe your sword, for I see that swords will be drawn today." Then the Messenger of God said to his companions, "Who can take us close to the enemy by a road which will not cause us to pass by them?" Abū Ḥathmah, the brother of the Banū Ḥārithah b. al-Ḥārith, said, "I can, O Messenger of God." He took him through the ḥarrah of the Banū Ḥārithah and between their property, until he brought him to the property of al-Mirbaʿ b. Qayẓī, who was a Hypocrite, and blind. When the latter became aware of the presence of the Messenger of God and the Muslims with him, he rose up and threw dust in their faces, saying, "Even if you are the Messenger of God, I will not allow you into my garden!" I was told that he [1393] took a handful of dust and then said: "If only I knew that I would not hit anyone else, Muḥammad, I would throw it in your face." The people rushed up to kill him, but the Messenger of God said, "Do not do so, for this man who is blind of sight is also blind of heart." Saʿd b. Yazīd, the brother of the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal, had rushed up to al-Mirbaʿ as the Messenger of God uttered this prohibition, and he split al-Mirbaʿ's head open with his bow.

The Messenger of God proceeded until he came down into the gorge from Uḥud on the slope up from the wadi towards the mountain. He stationed his men with their backs and their camp towards Uḥud, and said, "Let no one fight until I command him to fight." Quraysh had set their camels and horses free to pasture in some crops in al-Ṣamghah of Qanāt belonging to the Muslims, and one of the Muslims said, when the Messenger of God ordered them not to join battle, "Are the crops of the Banū Qaylah[169] to be used as grazing before we come to blows?" Then the Prophet prepared to fight with his seven hundred men, and Quraysh prepared to fight with their three thousand men and two hundred horses. They put Khālid b. al-Walīd in command of the right wing of the cavalry and 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl in command of the left wing. The Messenger of God put 'Abd Allāh b. Jubayr, the brother of the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf, in comı and of the archers. He was distinguished on that day by white clothes, and the archers numbered fifty men. "Defend us against the cavalry with your arrows," he said, "and do not come up behind us whether the battle goes for us or against us. Hold firm to your position, so that we will not be attacked from your direction." Then the Messenger of God put on two coats of mail.

169. Banū Qaylah is the name for the two tribes of al-Aws and al-Khazraj together, Qaylah being ostensibly the mother of both.

The Fighting Begins

According to Hārūn b. Isḥāq—Muṣ'ab b. al-Miqdām—Isrā'īl; [1394] and (also) Ibn Wakī'—his father—Isrā'īl—Abū Isḥāq—al-Barā': When it was the day of Uḥud and the Messenger of God met the polytheists, he stationed certain men as archers and put them under the command of 'Abd Allāh b. Jubayr, with the order, "If you see us victorious over them, do not leave your position, and if you see them victorious over us, do not come to our assistance." When battle was joined, the polytheists were put to flight, and I saw the women tucking up their skirts in flight and exposing their anklets. A cry went up of "Booty, booty!" 'Abd Allāh said, "Not so fast! Do you not know the orders the Messenger of God gave you?" They refused to listen to him, however, and left. When they reached the others, God turned away their faces and seventy of the Muslims were killed.

According to Muḥammad b. Sa'd—his father—his paternal uncle—his father—his father—Ibn 'Abbās: Abū Sufyān arrived on 3 Shawwāl (March 19, 625) and camped at Uḥud. The Prophet marched out, called on the people to come to fight and assembled them round him. He ordered al-Zubayr, who had al-Miqdād b. al-Aswad al-Kindī with him on that day, to engage the cavalry, and gave the banner to a man of Quraysh called Muṣ'ab b. 'Umayr. Next Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib marched out at the head of those who had no armour; he sent Ḥamzah out immediately in front of himself.

When Khālid b. al-Walīd advanced with the polytheist cavalry, together with 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl, the Messenger of God dispatched al-Zubayr with the order, "Meet Khālid b. al-Walīd and [1395] engage him until I give you further orders." Then he gave orders concerning other (enemy) horsemen who were in another part of the field, and said, "Do not leave your positions until I give you further orders."

Abū Sufyān advanced, raising a cry of "Al-Lāt! Al-'Uzzā!"[170] The Prophet sent al-Zubayr against the enemy, and when he attacked Khālid b. al-Walīd, God put Khālid and his companions to flight. With reference to this, God said, "Allah verily made good His promise unto you . . . after He had shown you that for which ye long." God had promised the believers that He would give them victory and that He would be with them.

The Messenger of God had sent certain people to take up positions behind his army, and said to them, "Stay here and turn back any of us who flees, and act as a guard for our rear." When the Messenger of God and his companions put the enemy to flight, those who had been posted to the rear said to one another, when they saw the enemy's women scrambling up the hill and saw the booty, "Let us go to the Messenger of God and get the booty before the others beat us to it." Another group said, "No, we should obey the Messenger of God and keep to our position." It is to this that God's words refer: "Whoso desireth . . . the world," i.e., those who desired the booty, "and whoso desireth . . . the Hereafter," i.e., those who said, "We should obey the Messenger of God and keep to our position."[171] Ibn Mas'ūd used to say, "I never realised that any of the Prophet's companions desired the world and its goods until that day."

[1396] According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn—Aḥmad b. al-Mufaḍḍal—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: When the Messenger of God took the field at Uḥud, he gave orders to the archers who then took up a position at the base of the mountain facing the polytheist cavalry. He said, "Do not leave your positions if you see that we have put them to flight, for we shall not cease to be victorious as long as you keep to your positions."

He put 'Abd Allāh b. Jubayr, the brother of Khawwāt b. Jubayr, in command of them.

---

170. These are two goddesses worshipped by the Meccans; see Watt, Mecca, 102–4. The verse quoted below is Qur. 3.152.

171. Qur. 3.145.

Then Ṭalḥah b. 'Uthmān,[172] the polytheist's standard-bearer, rose up and said, "You companions of Muḥammad, you assert that God will hasten us to Hell by means of your swords, and that He will hasten you to Paradise by means of our swords. Is there one of you whom God will hasten to Paradise by means of my sword, or who will hasten me to Hell by means of his sword?" 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib rose up and said, "By him who holds my soul in his hand, I shall not separate from you until I have hastened you to Hell by means of my sword or until you have hastened me to Paradise by means of your sword." Then 'Alī struck him, cutting off his foot, and Talhah b. 'Uthmān fell down, exposing his genitals. He said, "I call on you in the name of God and in the name of blood-relationship, cousin!" So 'Alī left him, and the Messenger of God cried out, "God is great!" His companions said to 'Alī, "What prevented you from finishing him off?" He said, "My cousin called on me in God's name with his genitals exposed, and I felt a sense of shame before him."

After this al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām and al-Miqdād b. al-Aswad attacked the polytheists and put them to flight, while the Prophet and his companions charged and put Abū Sufyān to flight. When Khālid b. al-Walīd, who was in command of the polytheists' cavalry, saw this, he made a countercharge, but the archers rained arrows upon him, and his advance was checked. However, when the archers saw the Messenger of God and his companions in the heart of the polytheists' camp and plundering them, they hurried down to the booty. Some of them said, "Do not go against the command of the Messenger of God," but most of them went to the camp. When Khālid saw how few archers there were left, he [1397] shouted to his cavalry, charged, and killed the archers, and then charged the Prophet's companions. When the polytheists on foot saw that their cavalry was in action, they called to one another and renewed their attack on the Muslims, defeating them and killing some.

According to Bishr b. Ādam—'Amr b. 'Āṣim al-Kilābī—'Ubayd

172. The person intended is Ṭalḥah b. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. 'Uthmān, also known as Ṭalḥah b. Abī Ṭalḥah; see W, 225f. The exposure of the genitals was deliberate and was a way of asking for mercy. It is not clear what precise cousinship Ṭalḥah intended; his paternal aunt Barrah bt. 'Abd al-'Uzzā was Muḥammad's maternal grandmother.

Allāh b. al-Wāzi'—Hishām b. 'Urwah—his father—al-Zubayr: The Messenger of God displayed a sword in his hand on the day of Uḥud, and said, "Who will take this sword with its right?" I rose up and said, "I will, O Messenger of God." But he turned away from me, and said again, "Who will take this sword with its right?" I said again, "I will, O Messenger of God," but he turned away from me and said, "Who will take this sword with its right?" Then Abū Dujānah Simāk b. Kharashah rose up and said, "I will take it with its right. What is its right?" The Messenger of God replied,"Its right is that you should not kill a Muslim with it, and that you should not flee with it from an unbeliever." Then he gave it to him.

When he was eager for battle, Abū Dujānah used to wear a headband as a distinguishing mark, and I said to myself, "I shall see what he will do today." Thereafter if any one rose up before him, he slashed them down and ripped them apart. Finally, he came to some women on the lower slopes of a mountain who had tambourines with them; among them was a woman who was chanting:

> We are the daughters of Ṭāriq
> If you advance we will embrace you
> And spread cushions
> If you turn your backs we will leave you
> And show you no tender love.

He raised his sword to strike them, but then let them be. I said to him, "I saw all of your deeds. Why did you decide to lower your sword after raising it against the woman?" He replied, "I respected the Messenger of God's sword too much to kill a woman with it."

[1398] Resumption of the narrative of Ibn Isḥāq.

The Messenger of God said, "Who will take this sword with its right?" Various men rose up, but he withheld it from them. Finally Abū Dujānah Simāk b. Kharashah, the brother of the Banū Sā'idah, rose up and said, "What is its right, O Messenger of God?" The Messenger of God replied, "That you should strike the enemy with it until it bends." Abū Dujānah said, "I will take it with its right, O Messenger of God"; so he gave it to him. Abū Dujānah was a brave but conceited man when war broke out, and whenever he bound a red headband on his head as a distinguishing mark, people knew that he was going to fight. When he took the sword from the hand of the Messenger of God, he took his headband and bound it on his head. Then he began to strut between the opposing ranks.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —Ja'far b. 'Abd Allāh b. Aslam, the mawlā of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb—a man of the Anṣār from the Banū Salima: When the Messenger of God saw Abū Dujānah strutting he said, "That is a gait which God hates except on an occasion like this."

Abū Sufyān had sent a messenger saying, "Men of al-Aws and al-Khazraj, leave us to deal with our cousin, and we will leave you; for we have no need to fight you." But they gave him a disagreeable answer.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq [1399]
—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah: Abū 'Āmir 'Abd 'Amr b. Ṣayfī b. Mālik b. al-Nu'mān b. Amah, one of the Banū Ḍubay'ah, had gone to Mecca in order to distance himself from the Messenger of God, accompanied by fifty young men of al-Aws, including 'Uthmān b. Ḥunayf; some people say there were fifteen of them. He kept promising Quraysh that if he met Muḥammad, no two men of them would meet him. When battle was joined, the first man to meet the Muslims was Abū 'Āmir with the Aḥābīsh and the slaves of the Meccans. He called out, "Men of al-Aws, I am Abū 'Āmir." They replied, "God curse you, you evildoer!" In the Jāhiliyyah, Abū 'Āmir had been called "the monk," but the Messenger of God called him "the evildoer." When he heard their reply, he said, "Evil has befallen my people since my departure." Then he fought the Muslims vigorously and pelted them with stones.

Abū Sufyān had said to the standard-bearers of the Banū 'Abd al-Dār, urging them on to battle, "Banū 'Abd al-Dār, you had charge of our banner on the day of Badr, and you saw what a disaster befell us. Men are dependent on what happens to their banners; if their banners are destroyed, they are destroyed too. Either [1400] you must take proper care of our banner or leave it to us, and we will take care of it for you." This disgraceful possibility worried them, and they furiously retorted, "Are we to hand our banner over to you? You will see how we will act tomorrow when we join battle." That was what Abū Sufyān wanted.

When battle was joined, and the armies closed upon one another, Hind bt. 'Utbah stood up among the women who were with her, and they took up their tambourines. They beat their tambourines behind the men and urged them on to fight. Hind chanted:

If you advance we will embrace you
And spread cushions;
If you turn your backs we will leave you
And show you no tender love.

She also chanted:

On, Banū 'Abd al-Dār!
On, protectors of our rear!
Strike with every sharp-edged sword!

The armies engaged one another and the battle grew hot. Abū Dujānah fought until he had penetrated deep into the enemy ranks. Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib and 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib fought at the head of a band of Muslims. God sent down his victory and made good his promise to them. They cut down the enemy with their swords until they put them to flight. There was no doubt about the defeat the Muslims had inflicted on the Meccans.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. 'Abbād b. 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubayr—his father—his [1401] grandfather, al-Zubayr: "By God, I found myself looking at the anklets of Hind bt. 'Utbah and her companions as they tucked up their skirts and fled. There was nothing to prevent us taking them, but the archers turned aside to the (enemy) camp in search of plunder after we had driven the enemy away from it and thus left our rear exposed to the cavalry. These came upon us from behind, and somebody shouted out, 'Muḥammad has been killed!' We turned back, and the enemy turned back after us, but not before we had killed the men guarding the (Meccan) banner so that none of the enemy were near it."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—certain scholars: The banner remained flung on the ground until 'Amrah bt. 'Alqamah al-Ḥārithiyyah took hold of it; she then raised it for Quraysh and they flocked to it.[173] It had previously been in the hands of Ṣu'āb, an Abyssinian slave belonging to the sons of Abū Ṭalḥah (the group responsible for the banner). He was the last of the group to take it. He had fought until his hands were cut off, and then he had knelt over it and clutched it to his chest and throat. Finally he was killed over it, saying all the while, "O God, am I forgiven?" Ḥassān b. Thābit said on the subject of Ṣu'āb's hand being cut off when they were exchanging mutual taunts:

You boasted of your standard: the worst possible boast is a standard handed over to Ṣu'āb.
You have made your boast of it over a slave, one of the lowliest men who walks the earth.
You supposed, though only a fool supposes,
for it has nothing to do with the truth,
That fighting us on the day when we met, was [1402]
like your selling red leather bags in Mecca.
It gladdened the eye to see his hands reddened, though they were not reddened by dye.[174]

According to Abū Kurayb—'Uthmān b. Sa'īd—Ḥibbān b. 'Alī—Muḥammad b. 'Ubayd Allāh b. Abī Rāfi'—his father—his grandfather: When 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib had killed the (Meccan) standard-bearers, the Messenger of God saw a group of the unbelievers of Quraysh and said to 'Alī, "Attack them." So 'Alī attacked them, dispersed them, and killed 'Amr b. 'Abd Allāh al-Jumaḥī. Then the Messenger of God saw another group of the unbelievers of Quraysh and said to 'Alī, "Attack them." So 'Alī attacked them, dispersed them, and killed Shaybah b. Mālik, one of the Banū 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy. Then Gabriel said, "O Messenger of God, this is for consolation." The Messenger of God said, "Verily he is of me and I am of him," and Gabriel said, "And I am of both of you." And they heard a voice saying,

173. This woman was the wife of Ghurāb, son of Sufyān b. 'Uwayf, the leader of the Banū 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah; in W, 203 she is called 'Amrah bt. al-Ḥārith b. 'Alqamah. Several sons and grandsons of Abū Ṭalḥah (of Banū 'Abd al-Dār) were killed defending the banner. Ṣu'āb is the reading of the slave's name by Wüstenfeld, Marsden Jones and Arafat.

174. See Dīwān of Ḥassān, i.367f.

There is no sword but Dhū al-Faqār, and no brave young man but ʿAlī.

The Muslims Retreat

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: When the Muslims were attacked from behind and put to flight, the polytheists killed many of them. When this catastrophe befell the Muslims, they were afflicted in three ways; some were killed, some wounded, and some put to flight. The latter were so exhausted by battle that they did not know what they were doing. The Messenger of God's lower [1403] lateral incisor was broken, his lip was split, and he was wounded on the cheeks and on the forehead at the roots of his hair. Ibn Qamīʾah stood over him to his left with his sword. The person who wounded him was ʿUtbah b. Abī Waqqāṣ.

According to Ibn Bashshār—Ibn Abī ʿAdī—Ḥumayd—Anas b. Mālik: On the day of Uḥud, the Messenger of God's incisor was broken and he was wounded in the head. Blood began to pour down his face, and he kept wiping it away, saying, "How can a people prosper who stain the face of their Prophet with blood while he is calling them to God?" God revealed concerning this,"It is no concern at all of thee, (Muḥammad), whether He relent toward them or punish them: for they are evildoers."[175]

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: When the enemy overwhelmed him, the Messenger of God said, "Who will sell his life for us?"

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAmr b. Saʿd b. Muʿādh—Maḥmūd b. ʿAmr b. Yazīd b. al-Sakan:[176] Then Ziyād b. al-Sakan rose up with five of the Anṣār (some people say it was ʿUmārah b. Ziyād b. al-Sakan), and they fought to protect the Messenger of God. Man after man of them was killed in front of him until only Ziyād—or ʿUmārah b. Ziyād b. al-Sakan—was left; and he fought 175. Qur. 3.128; only the first clause is quoted in the text.

176. Maḥmūd's grandfather Yazīd appears to be the brother of Ziyād.

until his wounds made him incapable of further fighting. By this time a group of Muslims had come back and driven the enemy away from Ziyād. The Messenger of God said, "Bring him close to [1404] me." They brought Ziyād close to him, and the Messenger of God made his foot a pillow for him so that he died with his cheek on the Messenger of God's foot.

Abū Dujānah shielded the Messenger of God with his body, bending over him while arrows struck his back until it was full of them.

Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ used his bow in defence of the Messenger of God. He said, "I saw him handing me arrows and saying, 'Shoot, may my father and mother be your ransom.' He even handed me an arrow without a head and said, 'Shoot this.'"

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —'Āṣim b.'Umar b. Qatādah: The Messenger of God shot from his bow until its end broke. Qatādah b. al-Nu'mān took it and kept it. (Qatādah's) eye was so badly injured that day that it fell out onto his cheek. The Messenger of God put it back with his hand, and it was his best and keenest eye (thereafter).

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: Muṣ 'ab b. 'Umayr fought in defence of the Messenger of God and bore his banner until he was killed. The man who killed Muṣ'ab was Ibn Qamī'ah al-Laythī, who thought it was the Messenger of God, and went back to Quraysh announcing that he had killed Muḥammad. After Muṣ'ab b. 'Umayr was killed, the Messenger of God gave the banner to 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib fought until he killed Arṭāt b. 'Abd Shuraḥbīl b. Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf b. 'Abd al-Dār b. Quṣayy, who was one of those who were carrying the (Meccan) banner. Then Sibā' b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā al-Ghubshānī, whose kunyah [1405] was Abū Niyār, passed by him, and Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib said to him, "Come over here, you son of a cutter-off of clitorises." His mother was Umm Anmār, the mawlāt of Sharīq b. 'Amr b. Wahb al-Thaqafī, who was a female circumciser in Mecca. When they met, Ḥamzah struck him and killed him.

Waḥshī, the slave of Jubayr b. Muṭ'im, said, "By God, I saw Ḥamzah cutting down men with his sword, not sparing anyone who went past him; he was like an ash-colored camel (in size). When Sibā' b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā reached him before me, Ḥamzah said to him, 'Come over here, you son of a cutter-off of clitorises.' He then struck him so swiftly that he could not be seen striking his head. I balanced my javelin until I was satisfied with it, and then I hurled it at Ḥamzah. It struck him in the lower part of the belly with such force that it came out between his legs. He came towards me, but was overcome and fell. I waited until he was dead and then went and recovered my javelin; after that I returned to the camp, since there was nothing else I wanted to do there."

ʿĀṣim b. Thābit b. Abī al-Aqlaḥ, the brother of the Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf, killed Musāfiʿ b. Ṭalḥah and his brother Kilāb b. Ṭalḥah (son of Abū Ṭalḥah), hitting each of them with an arrow; each went to his mother Sulāfah and put his head in her lap. When she asked, "My son, who has wounded you?" each replied, "I heard a [1406] man saying, when he shot me, 'Take that! I am Ibn al-Aqlaḥ.'" "The Aqlaḥī!" she exclaimed, and vowed that if God put her in possession of ʿĀṣim's skull she would drink wine from it. ʿĀsim had made a compact with God that he would never touch a polytheist and that no polytheist should touch him.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Qāsim b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rāfiʿ, the brother of the Banū ʿAdī b. al-Najjār: Anas b. al-Naḍr, the paternal uncle of Anas b. Mālik, went to ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbayd Allāh, who were with some of the Emigrants and the Anṣār who had given up the fight. "Why have you stopped fighting?" he asked. "Muḥammad, the Messenger of God, has been killed," they replied. "What will you do with life after him?" he said. "Rise up and die as the Messenger of God has died!" Then he went towards the enemy and fought until he was killed. Anas b. Mālik was named after him.[177]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ḥumayd al-Ṭawīl—Anas b. Mālik: That day we found seventy cuts and stab wounds on Anas b. al-Naḍr, and nobody but his sister could recognise him. She recognised him by the beauty of his fingertips.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: The first man to recognise the Messenger of God after the defeat and the rumour that the Messenger of God had been killed was, according to Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī, Kaʿb b. Mālik the brother of the 177. Anas b. Mālik was an important Companion, source of many Ḥadīth.

Banū Salimah. (He said,) "I recognised his eyes shining beneath his helmet and I called out at the top of my voice, 'Muslims, rejoice! This is the Messenger of God!'" The Messenger of God [1407] signed to me to be silent. When the Muslims recognised the Messenger of God, they went up with him towards the gorge.[178] With him were 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, Abū Bakr b. Abī Quḥāfah, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubayd Allāh, al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām, al-Ḥārith b. al-Ṣimmah, and a number of other Muslims. As the Messenger of God was climbing up the gorge, he was overtaken by Ubayy b. Khalaf, who was saying, "Where is Muḥammad? May I not escape if you escape!" They said, "O Messenger of God, shall one of us go over and deal with him?" "Leave him," he said. When he drew close, the Messenger of God took a javelin from al-Ḥārith b. al-Ṣimmah. I have been told that some people say that when the Messenger of God took it, he shook us off, so that we flew off from him like camel-flies from a camel's back when it shakes itself. Then he confronted (Ubayy) and gave him such a thrust in the neck that he swayed in the saddle several times.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ṣāliḥ b. Ibrāhīm b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf: Ubayy b. Khalaf used to meet the Messenger of God in Mecca and say to him, "Muḥammad, I have a horse called al-'Awd, whom I feed every day on a measure (faraq) of millet. I shall kill you on it." "Not so," said the Messenger of God. "I shall kill you, if God wills." When he went back to Quraysh with a scratch on his throat which was not particularly large and in which the blood had stopped flowing, he said, "By God, Muḥammad has killed me." "By God, you have lost heart," they answered, "by God, there is [1408] nothing wrong with you." He replied, "He said to me in Mecca, 'I will kill you,' and, by God, even if he spat on me he would kill me." The enemy of God died at Sarif as they were taking him back to Mecca.

When the Messenger of God got to the mouth of the gorge, 'Alī went out and filled his shield from al-Mihrās and brought it to the Messenger of God so that he could drink from it. He thought it had an unpleasant smell, however, and he felt so disgusted by it that he would not drink. He washed the blood from his face and poured the water over his head, saying, "May God's anger be intense against those who have bloodied the face of His Prophet."

178. The gorge was some feature of the lower slopes of the hill of Uḥud where the Muslims were safe from the Meccan cavalry; the place called "the rock" was presumably nearby.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān—somebody who told him from Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ: Sa'd used to say, "By God, I never thirsted to kill anyone as I thirsted to kill 'Utbah b. Abī Waqqāṣ.[179] Even if I had not known that he was evil of character and hated among his own people, the Messenger of God's saying, 'May God's anger be intense against those who have bloodied the face of the Messenger of God,' would have been enough for me."

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn—Aḥmad b. al-Mufaḍḍal—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: Ibn Qamī'ah al-Ḥārithī, one of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah, came and threw a stone at the Messenger of God, breaking his nose and his lateral incisor, splitting his face open, and stunning him. His companions dispersed and abandoned him, some of them going to Medina and some of them climbing up the mountain (of Uḥud) to the rock, and standing there. The Messenger began calling out to his army, "To me, servants of God! To me, servants of God!" Thirty men [1409] gathered round him and moved forward ahead of him, but none stood their ground except Ṭalḥah and Sahl b. Ḥunayf. Ṭalḥah protected him from behind and was wounded in the hand by an arrow, as a result of which his hand withered. Ubayy b. Khalaf al-Jumaḥī—who had sworn to kill the Prophet, and to whom the latter had replied, "No, I will kill you"—advanced saying, "Where will you flee to now, you liar!" He charged at him, but the Prophet gave him a thrust in the collar of his coat of mail which wounded him lightly. He fell down bellowing like an ox, and they picked him up and said, "You are not wounded, so there is nothing to worry about." He replied, "Did he not say, 'I will kill you'? If this wound had been inflicted on the whole of Rabī'ah and Muḍar[180] it would have killed them." In no more than a day or so he died of that wound.

179. 'Utbah was Sa'd's brother but had remained a pagan, whereas Sa'd was one of the earliest Muslims.

180. Two great groups of tribes.

The rumour spread among the army that the Messenger of God had been killed. Some of the people on the rock began to say, "Would that we had an envoy to 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy, so that he could secure our safety from Abū Sufyān! Muḥammad has been killed, so go back to your people before the Meccans come and kill you." Anas b. al-Naḍr, however, called out, "Men, if Muḥammad has been killed, the Lord of Muḥammad has not been killed, so fight as Muḥammad fought. O God, I apologise to you for what these people are saying, and I disavow before you what they have done." Then he rushed at the enemy with his sword and fought until he was killed.

The Messenger of God set off uphill, calling upon his men to follow, and soon reached the people on the rock. When they saw him, one man put an arrow in his bow and would have shot him, but he said, "I am the Messenger of God." They rejoiced when they realised that the Messenger of God was alive, and the Messenger of God rejoiced when he saw companions among whom he could hold out. [1410]

When they regrouped with the Messenger of God among them, their sorrow vanished, and, as they climbed up, they spoke of how the victory had eluded them and of their companions who had been killed. To those who said, "Muḥammad has been killed, so go back to your people," God said, "Muḥammad is but a messenger, messengers (the like of whom) have passed away before him. Will it be that, when he dieth or is slain, ye will turn back on your heels! He who turneth back doth no hurt to Allah, and Allah will reward the thankful."[181]

Then Abū Sufyān advanced until he was nearly upon them. When they saw him, they forgot what they had been about and directed their attention to Abū Sufyān. The Messenger of God said, "These men must not get to a higher position than ours! O God, if this band of people is killed, you will have no worshippers!" Then his companions bestirred themselves and threw stones at the enemy which forced them to retreat downhill.

On that day Abū Sufyān said, "Hubal be exalted! A Ḥanẓalah for a Ḥanẓalah, and a day for the day of Badr."[182] On the day (of

181. Qur. 3.144.
182. Hubal was a prominent Meccan deity. Muḥammad is alleged to have said

Uḥud) they had killed Ḥanẓalah b. al-Rāhib, who was in a state of ritual impurity and was cleansed by the angels, while Ḥanẓalah b. Abī Sufyān had been killed on the day of Badr. Abū Sufyān said, We have "Al-'Uzzā, and you have no 'Uzzā."[183] The Messenger of God said to 'Umar, "Say, 'God is our Lord, and you have no Lord.'" Abū Sufyān said, "Is Muḥammad among you? Some of your dead have been mutilated. I neither commanded this nor forbade it, and it neither gave me pleasure nor saddened me."

God spoke of Abū Sufyān's approaching them and said, "Therefore, He rewarded you with grief upon grief that (He might teach) you not to sorrow either for that which ye missed or for that which befell you."[184] The first grief is the victory and booty which eluded them, and the second grief is the enemy's approaching [1411] them; they were not to grieve for the booty which eluded them, nor the memory of the killing which was inflicted upon them. Abū Sufyān distracted them from this.

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī)—Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah —Ibn Isḥāq: While the Messenger of God was in the gorge with those companions of his, suddenly a group of Quraysh came up the mountain. The Messenger of God said, "They should not be above us," so 'Umar and a group of Emigrants with him fought until they forced them to retreat down the mountain. The Messenger of God went up to the rock on the mountain to get on top of it. He had become stout with age and was wearing two coats of mail. When he tried to climb up, he could not manage to do so, and Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubayd Allāh bent down beneath him and then rose up until the Messenger of God was settled on the rock.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah —Muḥammad (b. Isḥāq) —Yaḥyā b. 'Abbād b. 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubayr—his father —'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubayr —al-Zubayr: I heard the Messenger of God saying on that day, "Ṭalḥah performed an action deserving of reward when he did what he did for the Messenger of God."

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: The army had fled and abandoned the Messenger of God, some of them getting as far as al-Munaqqā, after the death of Ḥanẓalah b. Abī 'Amir (al-Rāhib) that he was being washed by the angels (1412 below and IH, 568).

---

183. The name of the goddess al-'Uzzā means "the mighty one."

184. Qur. 3.153; Pickthall's translation has been lightly modified to correspond to al-Ṭabarī's understanding of the verse.

near al-A'waṣ. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, together with 'Uqbah b. 'Uthmān and Sa'd b. 'Uthmān, two men of the Anṣār, fled as far as al- [1412]
Jal'ab, a mountain in the neighbourhood of Medina, near al-A'waṣ.[185] They stayed there for three days, and then came back to the Messenger of God. They claimed that he said to them, "On that day you were scattered far and wide."

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: Ḥanẓalah b. Abī 'Āmir, he whom the angels cleansed, met Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb in battle. He had gained the better of Abū Sufyān when Shaddād b. al-Aswad, who was known as Ibn Sha'ūb, seeing him poised over Abū Sufyān, struck and killed him. The Messenger of God said, "Your companion (meaning Ḥanẓalah) is being cleansed by the angels. Ask his family what this is about." When they asked his wife, she replied, "He went out to battle in a state of ritual impurity when he heard the call to battle." The Messenger of God said, "That is why the angels were cleansing him."

Shaddād b. al-Aswad said of his killing of Ḥanẓalah:

Verily I protect my companion and myself with a thrust swift as a sunbeam.

Extolling his endurance on that day and the way in which Ibn Sha'ub Shaddād b al-Aswad came to his assistance against Ḥanẓalah, Abū Sufyān said:

Had I wished, my thoroughbred bay horse could have rescued me,
and I should owe no thanks to Ibn Sha'ūb.
My colt kept a short distance from them from morning until near sunset
I was fighting them and calling out, "Men of Ghālib!"
and driving them off with unbending strength[186]
So weep, and pay no attention to those who reprove you, [1413]
And do not weary of tears and lamentation.

185. There is a reference to the conduct of 'Uthmān, the later caliph, in W, 278f. W,277 says Sa'd b. 'Uthmān, an Anṣārī, was the first to inform those in Medina that Muḥammad was dead.

186. Ghālib was the son of Fihr (Quraysh) from whom nearly all the clans of Mecca were descended; see Watt, Mecca, 7.

For your father and his brothers who followed one another to death, for they are worthy of their share of tears
My soul's grief has been consoled by the fact that I have killed every noble of the Banū al-Najjār
A noble stallion of Hāshim, and Muṣ'ab who was not fearful in war.[187]
If I had not slaked my soul's thirst for vengeance on them, my heart would have been grieved and scarred
They retired, their companies dead, covered with sword wounds, bleeding and dejected.
Stricken by those who were not equal to them in blood, nor similar to them in quality.[188]

He was answered by Ḥassān b. Thābit:[189]

[1414] You have spoken of the proud-necked stallions of the people of Hāshim but you have not hit the mark in the falsehood you have uttered
Do you marvel that you have killed Ḥamzah from them,
a noble, whom you name a noble?
Did they not kill 'Amr, 'Utbah and his son,
Shaybah, al-Ḥajjāj and Ibn Ḥabīb
On the morning when al-'Āṣ challenged 'Alī, and he surprised him with a sharp blow which drenched him with blood?

Shaddād b. al-Aswad, speaking of the benefit he had conferred upon Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb in coming to his rescue, said:

If not for my being present and defending you, Ibn Ḥarb,

187. The claim to have killed the nobles of the clan of al-Najjār (of Medina) seems exaggerated. The stallion of Hāshim is Ḥamzah, and Mus'ab is a Muslim from the Meccan clan of 'Abd al-Dār.

188. He presumably means that the Muslims were inferior in quality to those who killed them.

189. See Dīwān, ed. Arafat, i.446; ii.315. The Meccans killed at Badr and mentioned here by Ḥassān include 'Amr (who is Abū Jahl), 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah, al-Walīd b. 'Utbah, Shaybah b. 'Utbah, and al-'Āṣ b. Sa'īd; but the others are not clearly identifiable.

you would have been found speechless on the day when we fought in the mountain valley.
If I had not wheeled my horse round in the mountain valley,
hyenas and rabid dogs would have mangled your limbs.

Replying to Abū Sufyān's words, "My colt kept a short distance from them," al-Ḥārith b. Hishām,[190] who thought he was alluding to him as he had fled from Badr, said:

If you had seen what they did at the pool of Badr, [1415]
You would have gone back with a heart which would be terror-struck as long as you lived.
Or mourning-women would have risen up to bewail you, and you would not care about the loss of a loved one.
I requited them later for Badr with its like, mounted on a swift, smoothly-moving, galloping horse.

Mutilation of the Muslim Dead

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]—Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān: Hind bt. 'Utbah and the women who were with her stopped to mutilate the Messenger of God's dead companions, cutting off their ears and noses until Hind was able to make anklets and necklaces of them. She gave her own anklets, necklaces, and earrings to Waḥshī, the slave of Jubayr b. Muṭ'im. Then she ripped open Ḥamzah's body for his liver and chewed it, but she was not able to swallow it and spat it out. Then she climbed a high rock and screamed at the top of her voice the lines of verse which she had spoken when they took possession of the booty they had seized from the companions of the Messenger of God.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb said to Ḥassān, "Ibn al- [1416]

190. Al-Ḥārith b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah, a full brother of Abū Jahl, had fled from Badr; he became a Muslim at the conquest of Mecca.

Furay'ah,[191] I wish you had heard what Hind was saying and seen her insolence as she stood on a rock reciting rajaz-poetry against us and recounting how she had treated Ḥamzah." Ḥassān said, "By God, I was watching the javelin falling as I was on top of Fāri' (meaning his 'stronghold'), and I said to myself, 'By God, this is a weapon which is not one of the weapons of the Arabs.' It seemed to be falling towards Ḥamzah, but I did not know. Tell me some of what she said, and I will deal with her for you." 'Umar recited part of what she had said to him, and he satirized Hind as follows:[192]

The vile woman was insolent, and she was habitually base, since she combined insolence with disbelief.
May God curse Hind, distinguished among Hinds, she with the large clitoris, and may he curse her husband with her.
Did she set out for Uḥud on an ambling camel, among the army on a saddled camel-colt?
A slow-paced camel which would not move, whether scolded or rebuked.
Spur on your mount with your backside, Hind,
and soften sinews, pounding them with a stone
Her backside and her genitals are covered with ulcers as a result of prolonged swift travel in the saddle.
[1417] Her companion continued to treat her with water which she sprinkled and with sidr-leaves.
Did you set out hastily in search of vengeance for your father and your son on the day of Badr?
And for your uncle, who was wounded in the backside, lying in his blood, and your brother, all of them coated in dust in the well?
And did you forget a foul deed which you committed?
Hind, woe to you, the shame of the age.

---

191. Al-Furay'ah bt. Khunays was the mother of Ḥassān b. Thābit. The form of address is respectful and is a relic of the former matriliny at Medina.

192. Dīwān, ed. Arafat, i.384f. The kinsmen for whom she sought vengeance were her father 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah, her stepson Ḥanẓalah b. Abī Sufyān, her uncle Shaybah b. Rabī'ah and her brother al-Walīd b. 'Utbah.

And you went back humbled, without obtaining vengeance on us and without victory.
Slave girls claim that they give birth to a small child as a result of fornication.

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī)—Hārūn b. Isḥāq— Muṣ'ab b. al-Miqdām—Isrā'īl: Then Abū Sufyān went up to the Muslims.

According to Ibn Wakī'—his father—Isrā'īl— Abū Isḥāq—al-Barā': Then Abū Sufyān came up to us and said, "Is Muḥammad among you?" The Messenger of God said, "Do not answer him the first two times." Then he said three times, "Is Ibn Abī Quḥāfah[193] among you?" but the Messenger of God said, "Do not answer him." Then he said three times, "Is Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb among you?" but the Messenger of God said, "Do not answer him." Then he turned to his companions and said, "These people must have been killed, for if they were alive they would have answered." Then 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb could not restrain himself, and said, "You lie, enemy of God. God has preserved for you that which will disgrace you." Then Abū Sufyān said, "Be exalted, Hubal, be exalted, Hubal!"

Then the Messenger of God said, "Answer him!" "What shall we say?" they asked. "Say, 'God is most exalted and most lofty,'" he replied. Abū Sufyān said, "We have al-'Uzzā, and you have no 'Uzzā (mighty one)." The Messenger of God said, "Answer him." "What shall we say?" they asked. "Say, 'God is our Lord, and you have no lord,'" he replied. Abū Sufyān said, "A day for the day of Badr. War has its ups and downs. You will find that some of your dead have been mutilated. I did not command it, nor did it displease me." [1418]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq:[194] When 'Umar answered Abū Sufyān, Abū Sufyān said, "Come here, 'Umar." The Messenger of God said to him, "Go to him, and see what he wants." So he went, and Abū Sufyān said to him, "In God's name, 'Umar, tell me; have we killed Muḥammad?" "No, by God," said 'Umar, he is listening to what you are saying now."

193. Abū Bakr.
194. IH, 583; but the following passage about al-Ḥulays is on p.582.

He replied, "You are more truthful and more upright than Ibn Qamī'ah in my opinion." This was referring to Ibn Qamī'ah's having claimed that he had killed Muḥammad. Then Abū Sufyān called out and said, "Some of your dead have been mutilated. By God, I neither approved of this nor was I displeased with it, and I neither forbade it nor commanded it."

Al-Ḥulays b. Zabbān, the brother of the Banū al-Ḥarith b. 'Abd Manāt, who was then the chief of the Aḥābīsh, had passed by Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb as he was striking the side of Ḥamzah's mouth with the point of his spear and saying, "Taste that, you rebel!" Al-Ḥulays said, "Banū Kinānah, can this be the chief of Quraysh acting as you see with the dead body of his cousin?" "Keep it quiet," Abū Sufyān said. "It was a slip."

When Abū Sufyān and those with him left, he shouted out, [1419] "Your rendezvous is Badr next year." The Messenger of God said to one of his companions, "Say, 'Yes, it is a rendezvous between us and you.'" Then the Messenger of God sent 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, saying, "Go out following in the tracks of the enemy, and see what they are doing and what they intend doing. If they are leading their horses and riding their camels, they are making for Mecca, but if they are riding their horses and leading their camels, they are making for Medina. By the one who has my soul in his hands, if they are making for Medina, I shall go to them there and take the field against them!"

'Alī said, "So I went out in their tracks to see what they were doing. They mounted their camels, led their horses and set off for Mecca.[195] The Messenger of God had said, 'Whichever it is, keep it to yourself until you come to me.' But when I saw them setting off for Mecca, I came shouting, unable to conceal what the Messenger of God had commanded me to conceal because of the joy I felt at seeing them leaving Medina for Mecca."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Ṣa'ṣa'ah al-Māzinī, the brother of the Banū al-Najjār: While the people were occupying themselves with their dead, the Messenger of God said, "Who will look for me to see weather Sa'd b. al-Rabī' is among the living or the dead?" Sa'd was the brother of the Banū

195. The following words spoken by 'Alī are not found in IH.

al-Ḥārith b. al-Khazraj. A man of the Anṣār offered to look on behalf of the Messenger of God. When he found Sa'd lying wounded among the dead, and himself at the point of death, he said to him, "The Messenger of God has commanded me to see for him whether you are among the living or the dead." He replied, "I am among the dead. Give the Messenger of God my greetings, and tell him that Sa'd b. al-Rabī' says to him, 'May God give you the best reward that any prophet has been given in his community.' Give your people my greetings, and tell them that Sa'd b. al-Rabī' says to them, 'You have no excuse in God's sight if anybody reaches your Prophet while you have an eye that blinks.'" Sa'd died soon after, and the man went to the Messenger of God and told him the story. [1420]

Then, as I (Ibn Isḥāq) have been told, the Messenger of God went out in search of Ḥamzah b 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, and found him at the bottom of the wadi; his belly had been ripped open and his liver removed, and he had been mutilated by the cutting off of his nose and ears.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr: When the Messenger of God saw Ḥamzah in that condition, he said, "If it were not that Ṣafiyyah[196] would grieve, or that it would become a sunnah (standard practice) after me, I would leave him so that he would find his way into the bellies of wild beasts or the crops of birds. If God gives me victory over Quraysh at any time, I shall mutilate thirty of their men!" When the Muslims saw the grief and rage of the Messenger of God at what had been done to his uncle, they said, "By God, if one day we are victorious over them, we shall mutilate them in a way which none of the Arabs has ever mutilated anybody." [1421]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Buraydah b. Sufyān b. Farwah al-Aslamī—Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Qurazī—Ibn 'Abbās; and (also) Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. 'Umārah—al-Ḥakam b. 'Utaybah—Miqsam—Ibn 'Abbās: God revealed concerning these sayings of the Messenger of God and his companions, "If ye punish, then punish with the like of that wherewith ye were afflicted.

196. Ṣafiyyah bt. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib was Ḥamzah's full sister and Muḥammad's aunt.

But if ye endure patiently, verily it is better for the patient . . ." to the end of the Sūrah.[197] So the Messenger of God forgave, was patient, and forbade mutilation.

Ibn Isḥāq says: I have been told that Ṣafiyyah bt. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib came up to look at Ḥamzah, who was her full brother. The Messenger of God said to her son, al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām, "Go to meet her and turn her back so that she does not see what has happened to her brother." Al-Zubayr met her and said to her, "Mother, the Messenger of God commands you to go back." She said, "Why? I have heard that my brother has been mutilated, but that is a small thing for the sake of God, and I am fully resigned to what has happened. I shall accept God's will and be patient if God will." Al-Zubayr went to the Messenger of God and told him this, and he said, "Let her come." She came to (Ḥamzah), looked at him, prayed over him, exclaimed, "We belong to God and to him do we return," and prayed for his forgiveness. Then the Messenger of God gave orders for him to be buried.

[1422] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: 'Abd Allāh b. Jaḥsh, the son of Umaymah bt. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, who had Ḥamzah as his maternal uncle, was mutilated in the same way as Ḥamzah, except that his liver was not ripped out. Some of his family claim that the Messenger of God buried him along with Ḥamzah in one grave; but I have only heard that from his family.

Various Accounts Concerning Uḥud

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah—Maḥmūd b. Labīd:[198] When the Messenger of God went out to Uḥud, Ḥusayl b. Jābir—who was al-Yamān, the father of Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān —and Thābit b. Waqsh b. Za'ūrā', who were very old men, were sent up into the strongholds with the women and children. One of them said to 197. Qur. 16.126–8. Al-Ṭabarī has a fuller isnād for this section than IH.

198. IH, 577. Al-Yamān was a nickname (laqab) given to Ḥusayl because he (or an ancestor) had incurred blood-guilt in his own tribe and fled to Medina, where he became a confederate of the clan of 'Abd al-Ashhal, which like all the Anṣār was reckoned to the group known as al-Yamān. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd al-ghābah, s.v. Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān.

the other, however, "What are you waiting for, confound you? By God, neither of us has more of his life left than it takes a donkey to drink. We will both be corpses today or tomorrow, so let us take our swords and join the Messenger of God, and perhaps God will grant us martyrdom with the Messenger of God." So they took their swords and went out, entering the ranks without anyone being aware of them. Thābit b. Waqsh was killed by the polytheists, but Ḥusayl b. Jābir al-Yamān was killed by Muslims who failed to recognise him and rained sword blows on him. Ḥudhayfah said, "This is my father." They said, "By God, we did not recognise him," and they spoke the truth. "May God forgive you," said Ḥudhayfah, "for he is the most merciful of the merciful." The Messenger of God wanted to pay him blood-money, but [1423] Ḥudhayfah distributed his blood-money as alms to the Muslims, which increased the Messenger of God's high regard for him.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah:[199] One of the (Anṣār) called Ḥāṭib b. Umayyah b. Rāfi' had a son called Yazīd b. Ḥāṭib, who was wounded on the day of Uḥud and brought dying to his people's settlement. The people of the settlement gathered round him and the Muslim men and women began to say, "Rejoice, Ibn Ḥāṭib, at the good news of Paradise." Ḥāṭib was an elderly man who had grown old in the Jāhiliyyah, and his being a Hypocrite appeared that day, for he said, "What are you congratulating him on? A Garden of rue?[200] By God, you have deluded this lad into losing his life, and stricken me with grief at his death."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah: There was among us a stranger, whose origins were unknown, called Quzmān. When anybody mentioned his name, the Messenger of God used to say, "He is one of the people of Hell-fire." On the day of Uḥud he fought hard, and killed eight or nine polytheists with his own hand, being bold, brave, and redoubtable. Finally he was disabled by his wounds and was carried to the settlement of the Banū Ẓafar. Some Muslims began to say, "You have fought valiantly today, 199. IH, 578; W, 263. Ḥāṭib and his son belonged to the clan of Ẓafar, but Ḥāṭib seems to have had some connection with the Jewish clan of Qurayẓah (W, 511).

200. Rue (ḥarmal) was placed in tombs at the feet of the dead.

Quzmān, so rejoice!" "What have I to rejoice about?" he answered. "By God, I only fought for the honour of my people; but for that, I would not have fought." When the pain of his wounds [1424] became too severe, he took an arrow from his quiver,[201] slit his wrists, and bled to death. The Messenger of God was told of this, and said, "I testify that I am truly the Messenger of God."

Among those who were killed on the day of Uḥud was Mukhayrīq the Jew. He was one of the Banū Tha'labah b. al-Fityawn.[202] On that day he said, "O Jews, by God you know that it is your duty to go to Muḥammad's aid." They replied, "Today is the Sabbath." He said, "There is no Sabbath," and took up his sword and his equipment. Then he said, "If I am killed, I leave my property to Muḥammad to do with as he will." Then he went out to the Messenger of God and fought along with him until he was killed. The Messenger of God said, as I have been told, "Mukhayrīq is the best of the Jews."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq:[203] Some of the Muslims carried their dead to Medina and buried them there. Then the Messenger of God forbade that and said, "Bury them where they fell."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —his father, Isḥāq b. Yasār—some shaykhs of the Banū Salimah:[204] The Messenger of God said on that day when he ordered the burial of the dead, "Look out for 'Amr b. al-Jamūḥ and 'Abd Allāh b. 'Amr b. Harām. They were close friends in this world, so

---

201. The rest of this sentence and also the following sentence are not in IH, 578. Al-Wāqidī has two accounts of the death of Quzmān (223f.; 263) and gives more information. He was reckoned to the clan of Ẓafar but his origin was unknown, and he had no wife or child. Like Ḥāṭib b. Umayyah he was reckoned a Hypocrite. He went out to fight because the women of Ẓafar taunted him with cowardice. By committing suicide he condemned himself to Hell. There are many references to the story in theological contexts because it is taken as an example of predestination and of Muḥammad's foreknowledge of that. This is the reason for Muḥammad's testifying below.

202. Tha'labah was an important group of Jews in Medina, but they may have been Arabs who had accepted Judaism, since they also had links with the tribe of Ghassān; see Watt, Medina, 193.

203. IH, 585f.

204. IH, 586; the sentence about Mu'āwiyah, the later caliph, is not in IH.

put them in one grave." When Muʿāwiyah dug the canal, they were exhumed, and their bodies were as supple as though they had been buried the day before.

Then the Messenger of God left to go back to Medina. He was met, as I have been told, by Ḥamnah bt. Jaḥsh, who was given the [1425] news of the death of her brother ʿAbd Allāh b. Jaḥsh. She said, "We belong to God and to him do we return," and prayed for his forgiveness. Then she was given the news of the death of her maternal uncle Ḥamzah b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, and repeated these words. Then she was told of the death of her husband Muṣʿab b. ʿUmayr, and she screamed and wailed. The Messenger of God said, "The woman's husband occupied a special place in her heart," because he saw her steadfastness at the death of her brother and uncle and her screaming over her husband.

The Messenger of God passed by a settlement of Anṣār of the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal and Ẓafar and heard sounds of lamentation and women weeping. The Messenger of God's eyes filled with tears and he wept, but then he said, "Yet Ḥamzah has no women weeping for him." When Saʿd b. Muʿādh and Usayd b. Ḥuḍayr came back to the settlement of the Banū ʿAbd al-Ashhal, they told their women to gird themselves up and to go and weep for the Messenger of God's uncle.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. Abī ʿAwn—Ismāʿīl b. Muḥammad b. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ: The Messenger of God passed by a woman of the Banū Dīnār whose husband, brother, and father had been killed fighting along with the Messenger of God at Uḥud. When she was told of their deaths, she said, "What about the Messenger of God?" They said, "He is well. God be praised, he is as you would wish him to be." She said, "Show him to me, that I may look upon him." He was pointed out to her, and when she saw him she said, "Every loss is bearable now that I have seen you safe." Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: When the Messenger of God got [1426] back to his family, he gave his sword to his daughter Fāṭimah and said, "Wash the blood off this, my daughter." Then ʿAlī gave her his sword and said, "Wash this one too, for by God it has served me well today." The Messenger of God said, "If you have fought well, Sahl b. Ḥunayf and Abū Dujānah Simāk b. Khara-shah fought well with you."[205] They assert that when 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib gave Fāṭimah his sword, he said:

Fāṭimah, take the sword which is not blameworthy, for I am neither cowardly nor blameworthy.
By my life, I fought for love of Muḥammad and in obedience to a Lord who is merciful to his servants.
With my sword in my hand which I was brandishing like a meteor, hacking with it freedman and noble alike.
I continued in this way until my Lord dispersed them, and until we had slaked the thirst for vengeance of every forbearing man.

When Abū Dujānah took the sword from the hand of the Messenger of God, he fought fiercely with it. He used to say, "I saw a person stirring up the enemy to a fury, so I made my way over there and attacked with my sword; then she wailed, and I realised that it was a woman. I respected the Messenger of God's sword too much to strike a woman with it." Abū Dujānah said:

I am he with whom my friend made a compact as we were at the foot of the mountain near the date-palms [1427] That I would not stand forever among those in the rear ranks, so strike with the sword of God and the Messenger!

The Messenger of God returned to Medina on Saturday, the day of the battle at Uḥud.

The Expedition of Ḥamrā' al-Asad

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ḥusayn b. 'Abd Allāh—'Ikrimah:[206] The day of Uḥud was on 205. It is not clear why these two men are singled out for mention. They are named together as receiving some of the goods of the clan of al-Naḍīr because they were poor (1453 below; IH,654).

206. IH, 588–90, but without the first isnād; W, 334–40. The retreat of the Meccans showed that they had been roughly handled by the Muslims, even if the Muslim casualties had been higher, and that they were not in a position to attack the "strongholds" of Medina and so benefit from such advantage as they had gained. Muḥammad presumably realized this, and his march out to Ḥamrā' al-Asad was primarily a display of strength to the enemy and a way of boosting the morale of the Muslims after their losses; see Watt, Medina, 28f.

Saturday, halfway through Shawwāl. On the following day, which was Sunday, 16 Shawwāl (March 24, 625), the Messenger of God's crier called out to the people to go in pursuit of the enemy, but added that nobody was to join the force except those who had been present at the battle the day before. Jābir b. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Amr b. Harām[207] spoke to him and said, "O Messenger of God, my father left me behind to look after my seven sisters and said to me, 'My son, it is not right for me and you to leave these women without a man among them, and I am not one to give you the precedence over myself in fighting along with the Messenger of God; you must stay behind to look after your sisters.' So I stayed behind to look after them." The Messenger of God gave him permission, and he went out with him. The Messenger of God's only purpose in this expedition was to lower the morale of the enemy; by going out in pursuit of them, he wanted to give them the impression that his strength was unimpaired, and that the Muslims' casualties had not weakened their ability to engage [1428] in fighting.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abd Allāh b. Khārijah b. Zayd b. Thābit—Abū al-Sā'ib, the mawlā of 'Ā'ishah bt. 'Uthmān: One of the Messenger of God's companions from the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal said, "I and my brother were present at the battle with the Messenger of God, and we came back wounded. When the Messenger of God's crier called on us to go out in pursuit of the enemy, I said to my brother and he said to me, 'Shall we miss the chance of taking part in an expedition with the Messenger of God? We have no beast to ride, and both of us are badly wounded.' So we went out with the Messenger of God. I was less severely wounded than he was, and at times when his wounds were too much for him I carried him, while at other times he walked, until we reached the spot where the other Muslims were."

The Messenger of God went out until he reached Ḥamrā' al-Asad, which is eight miles from Medina, and stayed there three days—Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday (March 25–27, 625)—and then went back to Medina.

---

207. Jābir's father had been killed at Uḥud and, as recorded above (1414), buried in one grave with 'Amr b. al-Jamūḥ. Jābir took part in many later expeditions.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq —ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm: Maʿbad al-Khuzāʿī passed by (the Messenger of God). The Khuzāʿah, both Muslims and polytheists, were trusted allies of the Messenger of God in Tihāmah, having made an agreement with him that they would not conceal from him anything that happened there. At that time Maʿbad was a polytheist. "O Muḥammad," he said, "the losses among your companions which you have endured are grievous to [1429] us, and we hope that God will preserve you despite these losses." Then he left the Messenger of God at Ḥamrāʾ al-Asad and went to Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb and his men at al-Rawḥāʾ. They had decided to return to the attack against the Messenger of God and his companions. They argued, "We killed a proportion of Muḥammad's companions, including leaders and nobles, and now we have turned back home before exterminating them. Let us return to Medina for the rest of them and finish them off." When Abū Sufyān saw Maʿbad, be said, "What is going on over there, Maʿbad?" He replied, "Muḥammad has come out at the head of his companions in pursuit of you, leading an army the like of which I have never seen. They are burning with anger against you. Those who stayed away on the day when you fought and have repented of what they did have gathered round him. I have never seen the like of their fury against you." "What are you saying, confound you?" he said. "By God," replied Maʿbad, "I do not think you will leave here before seeing the forelocks of their cavalry." "By God," he said, "we have decided to attack them again to exterminate the remainder of them." "I advise you against that," said Maʿbad. "By God, what I saw has prompted me to compose some verses about it." "What are they?" Abū Sufyān asked. Maʿbad said:

My riding-camel was almost knocked over by the noise when the earth was flowing with troops of short-haired horses, Pounding along carrying noble lions who are not idle in battle, nor clumsy or weak.
[1430] I continued running, thinking that the earth was tilting, when they brought up a leader who is never deserted,

And I said, "Woe betide Ibn Ḥarb when he meets them, when the valley is seething with men."
I give an open warning to the people of the sanctuary (of Mecca), to every intelligent and reasonable man of them,
Of the army of Muḥammad, whose riders are far from contemptible, and my warning is no idle prattle.

This was enough to turn back Abū Sufyān and his men.

When a party of riders from (the tribe of) 'Abd al-Qays went past (Abū Sufyān), he said to them, "Where are you making for?" They replied, "We are making for Medina." "Why?" he asked. "For provisions," they said. "Will you give Muḥammad a message from me," he said, "and I will load these camels of yours with raisins in 'Ukāẓ later on, when you get there?" They agreed, so he said, "When you go to him, tell him that we have resolved to march against him and his companions and to exterminate the remainder of them."

The party of riders passed by the Messenger of God while he was in Ḥamrā' al-Asad and told him what Abū Sufyān had threatened, but he only said, "God is sufficient for us, the best in whom to trust."

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: Then the Messenger of God left for Medina after the third day. Some specialists in historical reports (akhbār) claim that the Messenger of God captured Mu'āwiyah b. al-Mughīrah b. Abī al-'Āṣ and Abū 'Azzah al-Jumaḥī on his way to Ḥamrā' al-Asad.[208] When he went on that expedition he left Ibn Umm Maktūm in charge of Medina. [1431]

208. There is no mention of this in Ibn Isḥāq, but IH has a long addition to Ibn Isḥāq in which he gives several variants (590f.). According to W, 332–4, and one of IH's accounts this Mu'āwiyah, who was maternal grandfather of the Umayyad caliph 'Abd al-Malik, had fled from the battle of Uḥud and taken refuge with 'Uthmān the later caliph, to whom Muḥammad granted security for him for three days; but he mistook the route back to Mecca and after the three days were over fell into the hands of some Muslims and was killed. Abū 'Azzah 'Amr b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Uthmān (or 'Umayr) was captured at Badr, but, because he was a poor man with five daughters, Muḥammad allowed him to go free without a ransom on condition

The Sons of 'Alī, etc.

In this year, al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was born, halfway through the month of Ramaḍān (about March 1, 625).

In this year also, Fāṭimah became pregnant with al-Ḥusayn; it is said that there were only fifty days between her giving birth to al-Ḥasan and her conceiving al-Ḥusayn.

In this year also, it is said that Jamīlah bt. 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy conceived 'Abd Allāh b. Ḥanẓalah b. Abī 'Āmir, in Shawwāl (which began March 17, 625).[209] he did not fight against him (IH, 471). Before the battle of Uḥud, the Meccan leader Ṣafwān b. Umayyah prevailed on him to join the expedition, promising to enrich him or, of he was killed, to provide for his daughters (1385 above; IH, 556). It is not stated how he came to be captured by the Muslims, but when he was brought to Muḥammad the latter ordered his execution because he had given his word and broken it (IH, 591, from Ibn Hishām only). On p.1402 'Alī is said to have killed him. See also W, 101f., 201, 308f.

---

209. Jamīlah, the daughter of the leading Hypocrite 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy, was the wife of the Ḥanẓalah killed at Uḥud and washed by the angels (1412 above). His death occurred only six days after the month began.

The Events of the Year 4

(JUNE 13, 625–JUNE 1, 626)

Then the fourth year of the Hijrah commenced.

The Expedition of al-Rajī', in Ṣafar (July–August, 625)[210]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah: After Uḥud a group of men from 'Aḍal and al-Qārah came to the Messenger of God and said to him, "O Messenger of God, some of us are good Muslims; please send a few of your companions back with us to instruct us in the faith, teach us to recite the Qur'ān, and teach us the laws of Islam." The Messenger of God agreed and sent six men back with them, Marthad b. Abī Marthad al-Ghanawī, the confederate of Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, Khālid b. al-Bukayr, the confederate of the Banū [1432]
'Adī b. Ka'b, 'Āṣim b. Thābit b. Abī al-Aqlaḥ, the brother of the 210. IH, 638–48; W, 354–63; Watt, Medina, 33f. According to al-Wāqidī, the tribe of Liḥyān were seeking vengeance for the killing of their chief Sufyān b. Khālid al-Hudhalī, and they paid the men of 'Aḍal and al-Qārah to ask for instructors; but this raises difficulties about dating. 'Aḍal and al-Qārah were subclans of al-Hūn b. Khuzaymah and included in the Aḥābīsh.

Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf, Khubayb b. ʿAdī the brother of the Banū Jaḥjabā b. Kulfah b. ʿAmr b. ʿAwf, Zayd b. al-Dathinnah, the brother of the Banū Bayāḍah b. ʿĀmir, and ʿAbd Allāh b. Ṭāriq, a confederate of the Banū Ẓafar from (the tribe of) Balī. The Messenger of God put Marthad b. Abī Marthad in charge of them, and they set out with the delegation. When they got to al-Rajīʿ, a watering place belonging to (the tribe of) Hudhayl, in a district of Ḥijāz in the upper part of al-Had'ah, the (delegation) betrayed the (Muslims) and called Hudhayl to their assistance against them. The (Muslims) who had bivouacked for the night were taken completely by surprise by men with swords in their hands; they took up their swords to fight them, but the (men) said, "By God, we do not want to kill you. We only want to get some (money) for you from the people of Mecca. We swear to you by God's covenant that we will not kill you." Marthad b. Abī Marthad, Khālid b. Bukayr, and ʿĀṣim b. Thābit b. Abī al-Aqlaḥ said, "By God, we will never accept a compact or contract from a polytheist," and then fought until they were all killed. Zayd b. al-Dathinnah, Khubayb b. ʿAdī, and ʿAbd Allāh b. Ṭāriq, however, were soft and [1433] yielding, desiring life, and surrendered; they were made prisoners and taken to Mecca to be sold there.

When they got as far as al-Ẓahrān, ʿAbd Allāh b. Ṭāriq broke loose from his bonds, and seized his sword. His captors kept well back from him, but threw stones at him until they had killed him. They buried him at al-Ẓahrān. As for Khubayb b. ʿAdī and Zayd b. al-Dathinnah, their captors took them to Mecca and sold them there. Khubayb was bought by Ḥujayr b. Abī Ihāb al-Tamīmī, the confederate of the Banū Nawfal, on behalf of ʿUqbah b. al-Hārith b. ʿĀmir b. Nawfal, Ḥujayr being the brother of al-Ḥārith b. ʿĀmir by his mother; this was so that ʿUqbah might kill him in revenge for his father. Zayd b. al-Dathinnah was bought by Ṣafwān b. Umayyah in order to kill him in revenge for his father, Umayyah b. Khalaf.

When ʿĀṣim b. Thābit was killed, Hudhayl had wanted his head in order to sell it to Sulāfah bt. Saʿd b. Shuhayd,[211] because she had vowed, when he killed her son at Uḥud, to drink wine from his skull if she ever got hold of his head. He was protected by hornets, however, and when these prevented the men from reaching him, they said, "Leave him until evening; then the hornets will leave him and we can take him." But God sent a flood in the wadi which lifted up ʿĀṣim's body and carried it away. ʿĀṣim had made a covenant with God that no polytheist should touch him and [1434] that he would never touch a polytheist, for fear of being defiled. When the news that the hornets had protected him reached ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, he used to say, "How wonderful! God protected his believing servant! ʿĀṣim swore that no polytheist would ever touch him, and that he would never touch a polytheist in his life, and God protected him from this after his death just as he abstained from contact in his life."

211. See 1405 above. Sulāfah was the wife of Ṭalḥah b. Abī Ṭalḥah, whose clan ʿAbd al-Dār were responsible for guarding the Meccan standard. In defence of the standard Ṭalḥah and four sons were killed.

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: Other authorities than Ibn Isḥāq have a different account of this expedition. One variant version is that of Abū Kurayb—Jaʿfar b. ʿAwn al-ʿAmrī—Ibrāhīm b. Ismāʿīl —ʿAmr or ʿUmar b. Asīd—Abū Hurayrah: The Messenger of God sent out a group of ten men, putting ʿĀṣim b. Thābit in command of them, and they travelled until they reached Had'ah. There somebody told a clan of (the tribe of) Hudhayl called the Banū Liḥyān about them. The latter sent a hundred archers against the Muslims. This force found the remains of the Muslims' food, which had consisted of dates. "These are the date-stones of Yathrib," they said, and followed the Muslims' tracks. When ʿĀṣim and his companions became aware of them, they withdrew to a hill, but the others surrounded them and called on them to surrender, giving them their word that they would not kill them. ʿĀṣim said, "By God, I will not surrender on the word of an infidel. O God, inform your prophet about us." Ibn al-Dathinnah al-Bayāḍī, Khubayb, and another man gave themselves up, and the enemy removed the bowstrings from their bows and tied them up with them. When they wounded one of the three, he said, "By God, is this the beginning of treachery? By God, I will not follow you!"—they beat him until he died. Then they took Khubayb and Ibn al-Dathinnah to Mecca. Khubayb they handed over to the [1435] sons of al-Ḥārith b. ʿĀmir b. Nawfal b. ʿAbd Manāf, as it was he who had killed al-Ḥārith at Uḥud. While he was with al-Ḥārith's daughters, he borrowed a razor from one of them to shave himself with before being killed. The woman, who had a son who was just beginning to walk, was thunderstruck to see Khubayb with the boy on his knee and the razor in his hand. She screamed, but Khubayb said, "Are you afraid that I will kill him? Treachery is not one of our customs."

The woman said later, "I never saw a more virtuous captive than Khubayb. At a time when there was no fruit in Mecca, I saw him with a bunch of grapes in his hand which he was eating; it was indeed sustenance which God bestowed on Khubayb."

One section of Quraysh sent asking for a part of 'Āṣim's body to be brought to them, since he had left his mark on them at Uḥud; but God sent a swarm of hornets which guarded his body, and they were not able to take any part of him.

When they took Khubayb out of the ḥaram (sacred area round Mecca) to kill him, he asked to be allowed to pray two rak'ahs; they left him, and he prayed two prostrations. After that, it be-[1436] came the sunnah for those about to be executed to pray two *rak'ah*s. Khubayb said, "If it were not that they would say I did not want to die, I would have prayed longer.

I do not care which side it comes from; my death is for God."

Then he said:

"This is for God himself, and if he will he will bless the limbs of a mangled corpse.
O God, count them by number and take them one by one!"

Then Abū Sirwa'ah b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Āmir b. Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf took him out and beheaded him.

According to Abū Kurayb—Ja'far b. 'Awn—Ibrāhīm b. Ismā'īl—Ja'far b. 'Amr b. Umayyah—his father—his grandfather:[212] The Messenger of God sent him alone to Quraysh as a spy. He said, "I came to the cross to which Khubayb was bound, frightened that someone might see me, climbed up it, and untied Khubayb. He fell to the ground, and I withdrew a short distance. Then I turned round, and I could not see a trace of Khubayb—it was as though the earth had swallowed him up. Nothing has been heard of [1437]

212. According to the isnād on 1437f. the great-grandfather (jadd) is 'Amr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī. The subtribe of Ḍamrah was part of Banū Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah and had grounds close to Mecca.

Khubayb to this day."

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]—Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah —Ibn Isḥāq: Zayd b. al-Dathinnah was sent to al-Tan'īm by Ṣafwān b. Umayyah along with a mawlā of his called Nisṭās who was to take him outside the ḥaram and then kill him. A group of Quraysh, among whom was Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb, gathered around Zayd, and when he was brought forward to be killed Abū Sufyān said to him, "I call on you in God's name to tell me the truth, Zayd; do you not wish that Muḥammad was here in your place, so that we could execute him, and that you were at home among your family?" "By God," he replied, "I do not even wish that Muḥammad, at home as he is now, should be hurt by a thorn prick in order that I could be at home among my family." Abū Sufyān used to say, "I never saw anyone love another person so completely as Muḥammad's companions love Muḥammad." Finally Nisṭās killed him.

The Mission of 'Amr b. Umayyah against Abū Sufyān[213]

The story of 'Amr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī, when he was sent by the Messenger of God to kill Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb.

When the men whom the Prophet had sent to 'Aḍal and al-Qārah were killed at al-Rajī' and the news reached the Messenger of God, he sent 'Amr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī and one of the Anṣār to Mecca, ordering them to kill Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ja'far b. al-Faḍl b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Amr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī—his father—his great-grandfather, that is 'Amr b. Umay- [1438] yah, whose account is as follows: After the death of Khubayb and his companions, the Messenger of God sent me together with one of the Anṣār, saying, "Go to Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb and kill him." I and my companion set out. I had a camel and he had not, and he had a weakness in his foot, so I carried him on my camel until we reached the valley of Ya'jaj. Then we hobbled our camel in the bottom of a ravine and climbed up. I said to my companion, "Come with me to Abū Sufyān's house, as I am going to try to kill him. You keep watch, and if a patrol comes or something alarms you, get back to your camel, mount it, return to Medina, and go to the Messenger of God and tell him what has happened. You can leave me to my own devices, because I know the town well, am bold, and have strong legs."

213. This story is not in our text of Ibn Isḥāq, and Ibn Hishām (992) says the latter omitted it and gives a version from another unspecified source. Al-Ṭabarī, however, ascribes his version (1437–41) to Ibn Isḥāq. See also Guillaume, xlii, 790n.

When we entered Mecca I had with me the like of an eagle's secondary feather—meaning his dagger—which I had ready to kill anybody who laid hold of me. My companion said to me, "Shall we make a start by circumambulating the Ka'bah seven times and praying two *rak'ah*s?" I said to him, "I know the people of Mecca better than you do. When it gets dark, they sprinkle their courtyards with water and sit in them; and I am better known there than a piebald horse."

But he kept on pestering me until in the end we went to the Ka'bah, circumambulated it seven times, and prayed two *rak'ah*s. When we came out we went past a group of men sitting together, and one of them recognized me and shouted out at the top of his voice, "That is 'Amr b. Umayyah!" The Meccans rushed after us, saying "By God, 'Amr b. Umayyah has not come here for any good purpose! By the God by whom we swear, he has never come here except for some evil purpose!" ['Amr had been a cutthroat and a desperado before accepting Islam].

They set out in pursuit of my companion and myself, and I said [1439] to him, "Let us get out of here! This is just what I was afraid of! We will never reach Abū Sufyān now, so save your own skin." We left at full speed, took to the hills, and hid in a cave, where we spent the night. In this way we gave them the slip, and they had to return without us. As we went into the cave, I concealed the entrance with stones, saying to my companion, "Let us wait here until the hue and cry has died down; they are sure to hunt for us the rest of the night and all tomorrow until the evening." I was still in the cave when, by God, 'Uthmān b. Mālik b. 'Ubayd Allāh al-Taymī came up riding proudly on his horse. He kept coming nearer and nearer, riding proudly on his horse, until he reached the entrance to our cave. I said to my companion, "This is Ibn Mālik. By God, if he sees us, he will tell everyone in Mecca about us!" So I went out and stabbed him below the breast with my dagger. He gave a shout which all the Meccans heard, and they came up to him while I went back to my hiding place, went in and said to my companion, "Stay where you are!" The Meccans hastily followed the shout, and found him on the point of death. They asked him, who had wounded him. "'Amr b. Umayyah," he replied, and died. They could not find anything to show them where we were, and merely said, "By God, we knew that he came for no good purpose." The death of their companion impeded their search for us, for they carried him away. We remained in the cave for two days until the pursuit had died down and then went out to al-Tan'īm, where Khubayb's cross was. My companion said to me, "Shall we take Khubayb down from his cross?" "Where is he?" I said. "You can see him over there," he said. "Very well," I [1440] said, "but leave it to me, and keep well away from me." The cross was watched over by a guard, so I said to the Anṣāri, "If you are afraid of anything, make your way to your camel, mount it, go to the Messenger of God, and tell him what has happened." I went quickly to Khubayb's cross, untied him, and carried him on my back, but I had gone no more than forty paces when they spotted me. At once I threw him down, and I will never forget the sound his body made when it fell. They ran after me, and I took the path to al-Ṣafrā' and managed to throw them off. They went back, while my companion made his way to his camel, mounted it, went to the Prophet and told him what had happened to us. I proceeded on foot until I was overlooking Ghalīl Ḍajnān. There I went into a cave with my bow and arrows. While I was in it a tall one-eyed man from the Banū al-Dīl b. Bakr came in driving some sheep. He said, "Who is there?" and I said, "One of the Banū Bakr."[214] He said, "I am from the Banū Bakr, one of the Banū al-Dīl." Then he lay down next to me, and raised his voice in song:

I will not be a Muslim as long as I live, and will not believe in the faith of the Muslims.

I said, "You will soon see!" Before long the beduin went to sleep and started snoring, and I went to him and killed him in the most dreadful way that anybody has ever killed anybody. I leant over him, stuck the end of my bow into his good eye, and thrust it down until it came out of the back of his neck. After that I rushed [1441] out like a wild beast and took to the highway like an eagle, fleeing for my life. First, I came to such and such a village, then to Rakūbah, and then to al-Naqī'. At this place there were two Meccans whom Quraysh had sent to spy out how things were with the Messenger of God. I recognized them and called on them to surrender. "Shall we surrender to you?" they said; so I shot an arrow at one of them and killed him, and then called on the other to surrender. He did so and I tied him up and took him to the Messenger of God.

214. 'Amr's tribe of Ḍamrah was part of Bakr, as was also al-Dīl.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Sulaymān b. Wardān—his father—'Amr b. Umayyah: When I came to Medina, I went past some shaykhs of the Anṣār. "By God," they said, "that is 'Amr b. Umayyah!" Some boys heard what they were saying and rushed to the Messenger of God to tell him. I had tied my prisoner's thumbs together with my bowstring, and the Messenger of God looked at him and laughed so that his back teeth could be seen. Then he questioned me and I told him what had happened. "Well done!" he said, and prayed for me to be blessed.

Muḥammad's Marriage to Zaynab bt. Khuzaymah[215]

In this year, in the month of Ramaḍān (which began February 4, 626), the Messenger of God married Zaynab bt. Khuzaymah, known as "the Mother of the Poor," a woman of the Banū Hilāl. He consummated his marriage to her in the same month and settled twelve *ūqiyyah*s and a nashsh on her as a dowry. She had previously been married to al-Ṭufayl b. al-Ḥārith, who had divorced her.[216]

---

215. This Zaynab, who is not to be confused with Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh, belonged to Banū Hilāl, part of the nomadic tribe of 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah. After her divorce from Ṭufayl, a Muslim of the Meccan clan of al-Muṭṭalib, she married his brother 'Ubaydah, who was killed at Badr. See i.1775f. below and Watt, Medina, 396.

216. The ūqiyyah is usually rendered "ounce" and the nashsh is half of that. Zaynab's dowry consisted of this weight of gold or silver presumably.

The Story of Bi'r Ma'ūnah[217]

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: In this year there occurred the disaster of the expedition sent out by the Messenger of God which was killed at Bi'r Ma'ūnah.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: [1442] (After the battle of Uḥud) the Messenger of God remained in Medina for the rest of Shawwāl, and Dhū al-Ḥijjah (of year 3) and Muḥarram (of year 4) (late March 625 to early July 625). The polytheists had charge of the pilgrimage that year. Then in Ṣafar (which began July 13, 625), four months after Uḥud, he sent out the men of Bi'r Ma'ūnah. The reason was as follows.

According to (Ibn Isḥāq)—my father, Isḥāq b. Yasār—al-Mughīrah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām, and also 'Abd Allāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm and other scholars: Abū Barā' 'Āmir b. Mālik b. Ja'far, the "Player with spear-heads," who was the chief of the Banū 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah, came to the Messenger of God in Medina and presented him with a gift. The Messenger of God declined to accept it, saying, "Abū Barā', I do not accept presents from polytheists, so become a Muslim if you want me to accept it." Then he expounded Islam to him, explained its advantages for him and God's promises to the believers, and recited the Qur'ān to him. He did not accept Islam, but was not far from doing so, saying, "Muḥammad, this matter of yours to which you call me is good and beautiful. If you were to send some of your companions to the people of Najd to call them to your religion, I would hope that they would respond to you." The Messenger of God said, "I fear that the people of Najd would do them some harm." Abū Barā' replied, "I will guarantee their protection, so send them to call people to your religion." The Messenger of God thereupon sent al-Mundhir b. 'Amr, the brother of the Banū Sā'idah, "he who hastens to death," at the head of forty of the best Muslims from his companions; among them were al-Ḥārith b. Ṣimmah, Ḥarām b. Milḥān, the brother of the Banū 'Adī b. al-Najjār, 'Urwah b. Asmā' b. al-Ṣalt al-Sulamī, [1443] Nāfi' b. Budayl b. Warqā' al-Khuzā'ī, and 'Āmir b. Fuhayrah, the 217. See also IH, 648–52; W, 346–52; Watt, Medina, 31–3; *EI*², art. Bi'r Ma'ūna (C. E. Bosworth).

mawlā of Abū Bakr, together with other named men from the best of the Muslims.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ḥumayd al-Ṭawīl—Anas b. Mālik: The Messenger of God sent al-Mundhir b. ʿAmr with seventy riders. They went on until they halted at Biʾr Maʿūnah, which lies between the territory of the Banū ʿĀmir and the ḥarrah of the Banū Sulaym, near to both of them but closer to the latter. After halting, they sent Ḥarām b. Milḥān to ʿĀmir b. al-Ṭufayl[218] with a letter from the Messenger of God. When Ḥarām arrived, ʿĀmir did not even look at the letter but rushed on him and killed him. Then he called on the Banū ʿĀmir to aid him against the Muslims, but they refused to do what he asked them, saying, "We will not betray Abū Barāʾ. He has entered into a compact with them and given them his protection." ʿĀmir then called on some clans of the Banū Sulaym, ʿUṣayyah, Riʿl, and Dhakwān, to come to his aid against the Muslims, and they responded to his request. They set out and took the Muslims by surprise, surrounding them while they were dismounted and encamped. The Muslims, on seeing them, snatched up their swords and fought them until they themselves were killed to the last man, except for Kaʿb b. Zayd, the brother of the Banū Dīnār b. al-Najjār. The enemy left Kaʿb at the point of death, but he was pulled out from among the slain and survived, eventually being killed at the battle of the Trench (in 5/627).

ʿAmr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī and one of the Anṣār belonging to the Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf were out with the grazing camels and only realized what had happened to their companions from the birds which were hovering over the camp. "By God," they said, "these birds mean something." They went up to see and found their companions lying in their blood, while the horsemen who had killed them stood close by. The Anṣārī said to ʿAmr b. Umayyah, [1444] "What do you think we should do?" He said, "I think that we should go to the Messenger of God and tell him what has happened." The Anṣārī said, "I do not want to leave a place in which al-Mundhir b. ʿAmr has been killed, and I do not want people to say that I did so." He then fought against the enemy until he was killed. The latter took 'Amr b. Umayyah prisoner, but when he told them that he was from Muḍar 'Āmir b. al-Ṭufayl set him free, after cutting off his forelock. He freed him, so he claimed, because of an oath taken by his mother.

218. ʿAmir b. Ṭufayl was the nephew of Abū Barāʾ and also had a position of leadership in the tribe, but the precise details are not known. The tribe refused to support ʿĀmir in disregarding the protection (ijārah) granted by Abū Barāʾ.

'Amr b. Umayyah proceeded towards Medina until, when he was at al-Qarqarah in the upper part of Qanāt, two men of the Banū 'Āmir came up and halted next to him in the shade, where he was. The 'Āmirīs had a compact of protection with the Messenger of God which 'Amr b. Umayyah did not know about. When they dismounted he asked them who they were, and they replied that they were from the Banū 'Āmir. He let them be until they were asleep, but then rushed on them and killed them, thinking that he had taken vengeance on them for the companions of the Messenger of God who had been killed by the Banū 'Āmir. When he came to the Messenger of God he told him what had happened, and the Messenger of God said, "You have killed two men for whom I shall have to pay blood-money." Then he added, "This is the doing of Abū Barā'. I was opposed to sending out this party and apprehensive about it."[219] Abū Barā' heard of this and was distressed by 'Āmir's betrayal of him and by the disaster which had befallen the Messenger of God as a result of his guaranteeing the protection of the party of Muslims. One of those who was killed was 'Āmir b. Fuhayrah.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Hishām b. 'Urwah—his father: 'Āmir b. al-Ṭufayl used to say, "Which of them is the man whom I saw being raised up between heaven and earth after his death until I saw the heavens beneath him?" They said, "That was 'Āmir b. Fuhayrah."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq [1445]
—one of the Banū Ja'far, one of the sons of Jabbār b. Sulmā b. Mālik b. Ja'far: Jabbār was one of those who were present that day

219. The reason why Muḥammad had to give blood-money for two to Banū 'Āmir, while claiming none for the men he had lost, is presumably that the latter were actually killed by tribesmen of Sulaym, even if 'Āmir b. al-Ṭufayl had asked them to do so and was "morally responsible" according to Western ideas. Abū Barā' was at most responsible for exaggerating his own ability to protect, but he felt disgraced because his grant of protection had been betrayed. Hence the poem below by Ḥassān b. Thābit.

with 'Amir, but he accepted Islam later on. He used to say, "One of the things which summoned me to Islam was that I struck one of them that day between his shoulders with my spear. I saw the spearhead coming out of his breast, and I heard him say as I speared him, "I have won, by God!" I said to myself, "What has he won? Have I not killed the man?" Later on I asked what he had said, and was told, "He meant he had won martyrdom." "By God," I said, "he has won."

Ḥassān b. Thābit said,[220] inciting the sons of Abū Barā' against 'Āmir b. al-Ṭufayl:

O sons of Umm al-Banīn, have you not been dismayed, although you are the highest of the people of Najd,
By 'Āmir's scornful behaviour to Abū Barā'
in betraying his guarantee of protection; for a mistake is not like a deliberate act.
Say to Rabī'ah who ever strives, what have you done in the course of time since I was with you?
Your father is the man of war Abū Barā' and your maternal uncle, Ḥakam b. Sa'd, is glorious.

On the same subject, Ka'b b. Malīk said:

The betrayal of Abū Barā''s guarantee of protection has spread far and wide in every direction [1446] It is like Musahhab and his father's sons by al-Radh in the region of Suwā'
O sons of Umm al-Banīn, did you not hear the call for help at evening time
And the raising of the cry? Nay, you heard it, but you knew that it was a true battle.
The bags of the Banū Kilāb are not empty of blame for faithlessness, nor those of the Quraṭā'.
'Āmir, 'Āmir of shameful acts of old,
you have not gained comprehension or splendour

220. See his Dīwān, i.232f., ii.174–7; the verses are in a different order there. Umm al-Banīn ("mother of the sons") was the mother of Abū Barā' and had four other sons. Ḥakam b. Sa'd was her brother and Rabī'ah the son of Abū Barā'. The following verses by Ka'b b. Mālik are not in IḤ.

Have you betrayed the Prophet, when of old you used to hasten to shameful acts under the open sky?
You are not like the protector of Abū Duwād, nor like al-Asadī, the protector of Abū al-'Alā'
But your shame is an ancient sickness, and the sickness of treachery, be assured, is worst of all.

When these words of Ḥassān and Ka'b reached Rabī'ah, the son of 'Āmir Abū Barā', he attacked 'Āmir b. al-Ṭufayl and thrust at him with his lance, but the lance was deflected and failed to kill him. 'Āmir fell off his horse and said, "This is the doing of Abū Barā'. If I die, I give the right to avenge my death to my uncle,[221] and he is not to be held to account for it; but if I live, I shall make my own decision about what has happened to me."

According to Muḥammad b. Marzūq—'Amr b. Yūnus—'Ikrimah—Isḥāq b. Abī Ṭalḥah—Anas b. Mālik: The companions of the Prophet whom he sent to the people of Bi'r Ma'ūnah, were either forty or seventy, I do not know. 'Āmir b. al-Ṭufayl al-Ja'farī was in control of that watering place. This company of companions of the Prophet travelled until they came to a cave overlooking the watering place. There they settled down, and then said to one another, "Which of us will deliver the Messenger of God's letter to the people of this watering place?" One of them, Ibn Milḥān the Anṣārī, I think, said, "I will deliver the Messenger of God's letter." He reached a group of tents, in front of which he sat down, and said, "People of Bi'r Ma'ūnah, I am an envoy of the Messenger of God to you. I testify that there is no deity but God and that Muḥammad is His servant and His Messenger. So believe in God and His Messenger." A man came out of a tent flap with a spear and struck him with it in one side so that it came out at the other side. He said, "God is most great. I have won, by the Lord of the Ka'bah." Then they followed his tracks backwards until they came to his companions in the cave, and 'Āmir b. al-Ṭufayl killed them all. [1447]

According to Isḥāq—Anas b. Mālik: God revealed concerning them as part of the Qur'ān, "Tell our people of us. Verily we have met our Lord, and He has been pleased with us and we have been pleased with Him." Later it was abrogated and removed from the Qur'ān, but for a time we had recited it.[222] God then revealed, "Think not of those, who are slain in the way of Allah, as dead. Nay, they are living. With their Lord they have provision, jubilant."

221. That is, to Abū Barā', presumably. If 'Amir b. al-Ṭufayl lives, it will still be open to him to seek vengeance.

According to Al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd—his father—al-Awzā'ī—Isḥāq b. 'Abd Allāh b. Abī Ṭalḥa al-Anṣārī—Anas b. Malīk: The Messenger of God sent to 'Āmir b. al-Ṭufayl al-Kilābī seventy of the Anṣār. Their commander said, "Stay where you are until I bring you news of the people." When he came to them he said, "Will you grant me security so that I can tell you about the message of the Messenger of God?" They said, "Yes," but while he was with them one of them suddenly stuck his spear into him. He [1448] said, "I have won, by the Lord of the Ka'bah." 'Āmir said, "I am sure that he must have companions," so they followed his tracks backwards until they came to them and killed them. Nobody escaped except for one man.

Anas says: We used to recite, as part of what was abrogated, "Tell our brethren of us, that we have met our Lord, and he has been pleased with us and we have been pleased with him."

The Expulsion of the Banū al-Naḍīr[223]

In this year, the fourth year of the Hijrah, the Prophet expelled the Banū al-Naḍīr from their settlements.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: The cause of this was, as we have mentioned above, that 'Amr b. Umayyah, as he returned from the expedition sent out by the Messenger of God to Bi'r Ma'ūnah, killed two men to whom had been given a promise of protection by the Messenger of God. It is said that 'Āmir b. al-Ṭufayl wrote to the Messenger of God, "You have killed two men whom you had given a promise of protection, so send their blood-money." The Messenger of God went to Qubā' and then turned towards the Banū al-Naḍīr to seek help from them in the payment of the 222. For this revelation not in the Qur'ān see Th. Nöldeke, Geschichte des Qorāns,[2] Leipzig 1909, i.246–8. The following verse is Qur. 3.169.

223. IH, 652–61; W, 363–83; Watt, Medina, 211f.

blood-money. With him there were a group of Emigrants and Anṣār, including Abū Bakr, 'Umar, 'Alī and Usayd b. Ḥuḍayr.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: The Messenger of God went out to the Banū al-Naḍīr to ask for their help in the payment of the blood-money for those two men of the Banū 'Āmir whom 'Amr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī had killed. This was because he had entered into an obligation to protect them, as I have been told by Yazīd b. Rūmān. The Banū al-Naḍīr and the Banū 'Āmir were joined by a treaty and a compact, and when the Messenger of God came to them to ask for their help in the payment of the blood-money for those two men, they said, [1449] "Yes, Abū al-Qāsim,[224] we will give you the help which you want and which you have asked from us." Then they spoke privately with one another, and said, "You will never find this man in such a situation again." The Messenger of God was sitting by the wall of one of their houses, and they said, "Who will go on the roof of this house and drop a stone on him and kill him, and so relieve us of him?" 'Amr b. Jiḥāsh b. Ka'b, who was one of them, came forward to do this, and said, "I am your man." Then he went up to the roof to drop the stone on him as arranged. The Messenger of God was with a number of his companions, including Abū Bakr, 'Umar, and 'Alī, and news of what the people intended came to him from Heaven. He got up and said to his companions, "Do not leave until I come to you." He went back to Medina, and when his companions thought that he had been gone a long time they got up to look for him. Then they met a man coming from Medina and asked him about the Messenger of God. He said, "I saw him going into Medina." When his companions came to him, the Messenger of God told them the story of the treachery intended by the Jews and ordered them to get ready to fight them and march against them. He then led his men against the Banū al-Naḍīr and halted in their quarter. They fortified themselves against him in their strongholds, but he ordered the date-palms to be cut down and set fire to. They shouted, "Muḥammad, you have forbidden damage to property and have blamed those who

224. The kunyah of Muḥammad; al-Qāsim was the eldest of his sons by Khadījah but died at an early age.

perpetrated it: what is the idea of cutting down date-palms and setting fire to them?"

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: As for al-Wāqidī, he says that when they conspired together to drop the stone on the Messenger of God, Sallām b. Mishkam told them not to do so, and warned [1450] them that it would mean war, adding that Muḥammad knew what they intended. They ignored his advice, however, and 'Amr b. Jiḥāsh went up to the roof to roll the stone over. News of this came to the Prophet from Heaven, and he got up as though he wished to relieve himself. His companions waited for him, but he was gone for a long time. The Jews began to say, "What has delayed Abū al-Qāsim?" and his companions left. Kinānah b. Ṣūriyā' said, "News of what you intended has reached him."

When the Messenger of God's companions returned they went to him and found him sitting in the mosque. They said, "O Messenger of God, we waited for you but you did not come back." "The Jews intended to kill me," he replied, "and God informed me of it. Call Muḥammad b. Maslamah to me." When Muḥammad b. Maslamah came, he was told to go to the Jews and say to them, "Leave my country and do not live with me. You have intended treachery." Muḥammad b. Maslamah went to them and said, "The Messenger of God orders you to depart from his country." They said, "Muḥammad, we never thought that a man of al-Aws would come to us with such a message." "Hearts have changed," he replied, "and Islam has wiped out the old covenants." "We will go," they said.

'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy sent a message to the Banū al-Naḍīr saying, "Do not go. I have two thousand men from the beduin and those of my own people who are united around me. Stay, and they will enter battle with you, as will Qurayẓah." Ka'b b. Asad, however, the guarantor of the Banū Qurayẓah's compact with the Messenger of God,[225] heard of this and said, "No man of the Banū Qurayẓah shall break his compact as long as I am alive." Sallām b. Mishkam said to Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab, "Ḥuyayy, we (our tribe) are eminent among our people (the Jews) by virtue of our wealth; accept what Muḥammad has proposed before you have to accept 225. Ka'b b. Asad had signed the agreement with Muḥammad on behalf of Banū Qurayẓah. Sallām and Ḥuyayy were leaders of al-Naḍīr.

what is worse than that." "What is worse than that?" he asked. "The seizure of our wealth, the enslavement of our children, and the killing of our fighting men," he replied. Ḥuyayy refused to accept his advice, however, and sent Judayy b. Akhṭab to the Mes- [1451]
senger of God to say, "We will not leave our settlements; so do what you see fit."

The Messenger of God magnified God and the Muslims magnified God with him. Then he said, "The Jews have declared war." Judayy then went to Ibn Ubayy to ask for support from him. He said, "I found him sitting among a number of his companions while the Prophet's crier was calling men to arms. His son, ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Ubayy, came in as I was with him, took up his arms, and ran out.[226] I despaired of Ibn Ubayy's help, and told Ḥuyayy of all this. He said, "This is a clever trick of Muḥammad's." The Messenger of God marched against the Banū al-Naḍīr, and besieged them for fifteen days. In the end they made peace with him on the condition that the Messenger of God would not shed their blood and that their property and their coats of mail would be his.

According to Muḥammad b. Saʿd—his father—his paternal uncle—his father—his father—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Messenger of God besieged them (the Banū al-Naḍīr) for fifteen days until he had reduced them to a state of utter exhaustion, so that they gave him what he wanted from them and made peace with him. The terms were that he would not shed their blood, would expel them from their lands and their settlements, and would send them to Adhriʿāt in Syria, providing for every three of them a camel and a water-skin.

According to Ibn ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Muḥammad b. Thawr—Maʿmar—al-Zuhrī: The Prophet fought them until he made peace with them on condition that they evacuated Medina. He expelled them to Syria but allowed them to keep what their camels could carry, except for their coats of mail ("coats of mail" means weapons).

Resumption of Ibn Isḥāq's narrative. [1452]

226. ʿAbdallāh, the son of ʿAbdallāh b. Ubayy, the leading Hypocrite, was a fervent Muslim who said he was ready to kill his father if Muḥammad commanded it; here he answers Muḥammad's call to arms.

A group of the Banū 'Awf b. al-Khazraj, including 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl, Wadī'ah, Mālik b. Abī Qawqal, Suwayd, and Dā'is had sent a message to the Banū al-Naḍīr saying, "Stand firm and hold out, for we will not desert you. If they fight you, we will fight along with you, and if you are driven out, we will leave with you." So they waited patiently, but the group with Ibn Ubayy did nothing, and God cast fear into the hearts of Banū al-Naḍīr so that they asked the Messenger of God to spare their lives and allow them to leave Medina. The condition was to be that they could keep as much of their property as their camels could carry, with the exception of their coats of mail. The Messenger of God agreed to this and they took away as much of their property as their camels could carry. Some of them were destroying their houses down to the lintel of the door, putting even that on the back of their camels, and going off with it.

They went to Khaybar, and some of them went to Syria. Among their nobles who went to Khaybar were Sallām b. Abī al-Ḥuqayq, Kinānah b. al-Rabī' b. Abī al-Ḥuqayq, and Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab. When they settled in Khaybar its inhabitants submitted to them.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abd Allāh b. Abī Bakr: They loaded their camels with their wives, children and property, and there were tambourines, pipes, and singing girls behind them. Among them was Umm 'Amr, wife of 'Urwah b. al-Ward al-'Absī, whom they had bought from him.[227] She was one of the Banū Ghifār. They went with a splen-[1453] dour and a glory the like of which had never been seen from any tribe in their time.

The Banū al-Naḍīr left their property to the Messenger of God, and it became his personal property, to do with it as he wished. He divided it among the first Emigrants, to the exclusion of the Anṣār, except that Sahl b. Ḥunayf and Abū Dujānah Simāk b. Kharashah spoke of their poverty and he gave them some of it.[228] Only two of the Banū al-Naḍīr became Muslims, Yāmīn b. 'Umayr b. Ka'b, who was the nephew of 'Amr b. Jiḥāsh, and Abū Sa'd b. Wahb; they were allowed to keep their property when they accepted Islam and in this way they preserved it.

227. IH, 653. The story of Umm 'Amr Salmā is told more fully in W, 376.
228. See 1426 above and n.205.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: It is said that when the Messenger of God went out to fight the Banū al-Naḍīr he left Ibn Umm Maktūm in charge of Medina. His banner was borne on that occasion by 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

Other Events

In this year, in Jumādā al-Ūlā (which began October 9, 625), there died 'Abd Allāh b. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, who was six years old. The Messenger of God prayed over him, and 'Uthmān b. 'Affān went down into his grave.

In this year also, early in Sha'bān (which began January 6, 626), there was born al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī.

The Expedition of Dhāt al-Riqā'

There is a difference of opinion as to which of his expeditions took place after that against the Banū al-Naḍīr.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: The Messenger of God remained in Medina after the expedition against the Banū al-Naḍīr for the two months of Rabī' and part of the month of Jumādā (from August 11 to late October, 625). Then he went on an expedition into Najd, directed against the Banū Muḥārib and the Banū Tha'labah, part of Ghaṭafān, and reached Nakhl.[229] This [1454] was the expedition of Dhāt al-Riqā'. They met there a number of Ghaṭafān; the armies approached one another, but no fighting took place, because they feared one another. The Messenger of God then led the Muslims in the Prayer of Fear, and left with them.

As for al-Wāqidī, he asserts that the Messenger of God's expedition to Dhāt al-Riqā' was in Muḥarram in Year Five of the Hijrah (which began July 2, 626). He says that it was called Dhāt al-Riqā' because the mountain after which it was named, Dhāt al-Riqā' (the patchwork mountain) had black, white, and red patches on it. The Messenger of God left 'Uthmān b. 'Affān in charge of Medina during this expedition.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq

229. IH, 661–5; W, 395–402.

—Muhammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr and Muḥammad (meaning b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān)—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—Abū Hurayrah: We went out with the Messenger of God to Najd. When we were at Dhāt al-Riqā' in the region of Nakhl he met a number of Ghaṭafān. No fighting took place between us, but our army was afraid of the enemy, and the rules for the Prayer of Fear were revealed. The Messenger of God divided his companions into two parts; one group stood facing the enemy while the other stood behind the Messenger of God. He magnified God and they all magnified God. Then he and those behind him performed a rak'ah and prostrated themselves. On standing up, they walked back to the ranks of their companions, while these returned and themselves prayed a rak'ah. When this party stood up (after their first rak'ah), the Messenger of God prayed a further rak'ah with [1455] them, and at the end of it they sat down. Those who had been facing the enemy then came back and prayed the second rak'ah. When they had all sat down, the Messenger of God pronounced the greeting to both parties together.[230]

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: The accounts of the way in which the Messenger of God led this prayer at the valley of Nakhl vary so much that I do not like to mention them here, for fear that this book may be unduly prolonged. We shall mention them, God willing, in our book entitled The Simple Exposition of the Provisions of the Laws of Islam,[231] in the chapter on the Prayer of Fear.

According to Muḥammad b. Bashshār—Mu'ādh b. Hishām—his father—Qatādah—Sulaymān al-Yashkurī: I asked Jābir b. 'Abd Allāh about the shortening of the prayer, on which day it was revealed or on which day it took place. Jabīr said, "We set off to intercept a caravan belonging to Quraysh which was coming from Syria. When we got to Nakhl one of the enemy came to the

230. The details can be followed in a general account of Ṣalāt such as that in EI[1], section 2. To "magnify" God is to say "God is very great" (Allāhu akbar). The rak'ah is the cycle of acts and words which is repeated two, three, or four times according to the hour of the day—only twice for obvious reasons in the Prayer of Fear. The Ṣalāt also has an introductory section and a closing section, the latter concluding with the greeting ("Peace be with you") pronounced first to one's right then to one's left.

231. This work does not appear to be extant, if indeed it was ever written; see GALS, i.218.

Messenger of God and said, 'Muḥammad!' 'Yes?' he said. 'Are you afraid of me?' 'No.' 'Who will protect you from me?' he asked. 'God will protect me from you,' he said. Then the man drew his sword and threatened him.

"After this the Messenger of God gave the command to leave that place and take up arms, and then the call to prayer was made. The Prophet of God led one group of the army in prayer while another group guarded them. Those nearest to him he led in prayer for two *rak'ah*s, and then this group went back and occupied the positions of the other group. This second group meanwhile came and were led in prayer for two *rak'ah*s while the others guarded them. Then the Prophet gave the greeting to all. In this way the Prophet performed four *rak'ah*s while each half of his army performed only two *rak'ah*s. This was the day on which God gave a revelation concerning the shortening of prayer when the believers were ordered to take up arms."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —'Amr b. 'Ubayd—al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī—Jābir b. 'Abd Allāh al-Anṣārī: A man of the Banū Muḥārib called so-and-so b. al-Ḥārith said to his people of Ghaṭafān and Muḥārib, "Shall I kill Muḥammad for you?" They said, "Yes, but how are you going to kill him?" "I will do it by surprise," he said. He went to the Messenger of God as the latter was sitting with his sword in his lap, and said, "Muḥammad, may I have a look at your sword?" He said, "Yes." So the man took it and unsheathed it, and then started brandishing it, intending to kill him with it; but God restrained him. Then he said, "Muḥammad, are you not afraid of me?" "No," he said, "why should I be afraid of you?" "Are you not afraid of me with the sword in my hand?" he asked. "No," he replied, "God will defend me from you." At that he sheathed the sword and returned it to the Messenger of God. On this event, God revealed, "O ye who believe! Remember Allāh's favor unto you, how a people were minded to stretch out their hands against you but He withheld their hands from you. . . ."[232] [1456]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —Ṣadaqah b. Yasār—'Aqīl b. Jābir—Jābir b. 'Abd Allāh al-Anṣārī:

232. Qur. 5.11.

We went out with the Messenger of God on the expedition to Dhāt al-Riqā' in the neighbourhood of Nakhl. At one point, one of the Muslims killed a polytheist woman. When the Messenger of God was on his way back to Medina, her husband, who had been away and had returned, on being told what had happened, swore that he would not rest until he had wrought bloodshed among Muḥammad's companions. He set out, following the Messenger of God's tracks. When the Messenger of God halted for the night
[1457] he said, "Who will keep watch for us tonight?" One of the Emigrants and one of the Anṣār volunteered, saying, "We will, O Messenger of God." He told them to station themselves at the top of the pass. The Messenger of God and his companions had halted further down the pass towards the valley bottom. When the two reached the top of the pass, the Anṣārī asked the Emigrant, "Which part of the night would you like me to stand watch for you—the first part or the second part?" "Stand watch for the first part for me," he said, and lay down and went to sleep, while the Anṣārī stood up to pray. The woman's husband now came, saw the standing figure, realised that he was the lookout for the army, and shot an arrow which hit him. The Anṣārī pulled the arrow out, put it down, and remained standing in prayer. The man shot a second and a third arrow at him, but exactly the same thing happened. Finally the Anṣārī, after bowing and prostrating himself, woke up his companion with the words, "Sit up, I have been wounded." The Emigrant leapt to his feet. When the man saw the two of them, he knew that they were alerted to his presence, [and fled].[233] When the Emigrant saw the Anṣārī's bloodstained condition he exclaimed, "God Almighty! Why did you not wake me up the first time he shot at you?" "I was in the middle of reciting a Sūrah," he replied, "and I did not want to break off without finishing it. When he kept shooting at me I completed a rak'ah and woke you up. By God, but for the fact that I would have lost an outpost which the Messenger of God had ordered me to hold, the man could have killed me before I would have broken the Sūrah off uncompleted."

233. The words "and fled" have been added from IH's text; he also has a dual instead of the plural in al-Ṭabarī.

The Expedition of al-Sawīq (or Badr al-Mawʿid)[234]

This is the Prophet's second expedition to Badr, which he undertook to keep his appointment with Abū Sufyān.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: After the Messenger of God had returned to Medina from Dhāt al-Riqāʿ, he remained there for the rest of Jumādā al-Ūlā, Jumādā al-Ākhirah, and Rajab (late October 625 to early January 626). Then in Shaʿbān (which began January 6, 626) he went out to Badr to meet Abū Sufyān and halted there for eight days, waiting for him. Abū Sufyān came out with the Meccans and halted at Majannah in the region of Murr al-Ẓahrān—or, according to some people, went through ʿUsfān, after which he decided to go back. "Men of Quraysh," he said, "only a fertile year in which you can pasture your animals on the bushes and drink their milk will be any good to you. This is a year of drought, and I am going to go back, so you go back too." They all went back, and the people of Mecca called them "the army of sawīq (barley-meal)," saying, "You only went out to drink barley-gruel."[235] [1458]

The Messenger of God stayed at Badr waiting to keep his rendezvous with Abū Sufyān. Makhshī b. ʿAmr al-Ḍamrī, who had made a treaty with him on behalf of the Banū Ḍamrah during the expedition to Waddān, came to him and said, "Have you come to meet Quraysh at this watering place, Muḥammad?" "Yes, O brother of the Banū Ḍamrah," he said; "nevertheless, if you wish, we will release you from your treaty with us and then fight you until God decides between us." "No, by God, Muḥammad," he replied, "we want no such thing from you."

The Messenger of God remained, waiting for Abū Sufyān, and Maʿbad b. Abī Maʿbad al-Khuzāʿī passed by him, having seen where he was as he galloped past on his she-camel, and said:

> She was frightened away by Muḥammad's two companies [1459]

234. IH, 666–8; W, 384–91.
235. See n.153 above.

and a date-stone from Yathrib like a raisin, Hurrying along in the hereditary faith of her fathers, having made the water of Qudayd my meeting place
And the water of Ḍajnān hers tomorrow morning.

As for al-Wāqidī, he says that the Messenger of God urged his companions to take part in an expedition to Badr in order to meet Abū Sufyān, whom he had promised on the day of Uḥud to meet there for battle in a year's time. This was in Dhū al-Qa'dah (which began April 4, 626). Nu'aym b. Mas'ūd al-Ashja'ī had come to Mecca to perform the 'umrah (lesser pilgrimage) and was asked by Quraysh which direction he had come from. When he said, "From Yathrib," Abū Sufyān asked, "Did you see Muḥammad making any movements?" He replied, "I left him making preparations for an expedition against you." This was before Nu'aym became a Muslim.

Abū Sufyān said to him, "Nu'aym, this is a year of drought, and only a year in which our camels can graze on shrubs and we can drink their milk will be suitable for us. Since the time for our rendezvous with Muḥammad has come, go to Medina, delay them, and make them think that we are coming with such a huge army that they will not be able to withstand us. In that way it will be they who break the agreement; and I would prefer that to our breaking it. Do this, and you shall have ten camels which I shall place in Suhayl b. 'Amr's custody for safekeeping." So Suhayl b. 'Amr came to them, and Nu'aym said to Suhayl, "Abū Yazīd, will you be responsible for these camels so that I can go to Muḥammad and delay him?" He agreed, and Nu'aym set out. When he arrived in Medina he found the people preparing themselves, so he mingled unobtrusively with them and would say, "This is not sensible. Was not Muḥammad personally wounded? Were his companions not killed?" In this way he delayed them, and when [1460] the Messenger of God heard of it, he said, "By him in whose hand my soul rests, even if nobody goes out with me, I shall go out alone." Then God set the Muslims' understanding on the right path, and they set out to trade, earning two dirhams for every dirham laid out. They did not meet any enemy, and this expedition was known as "Badr al-maw'id" (Badr of the Rendezvous).

Badr was the site of one of their markets in pre-Islamic times, and they assembled there for eight days once a year.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: The Messenger of God left 'Abd Allāh b. Rawāḥah in charge of Medina.

Other Events

Al-Wāqidī says: In this year, the Messenger of God married Umm Salamah bt. Abī Umayyah[236] and consummated the marriage in Shawwāl (which began March 6, 626). In this year also, the Messenger of God commanded Zayd b. Thābit to study the Book of the Jews, saying, "I fear that they may change my Book."

In this year, the polytheists were in charge of the Meccan Pilgrimage.

---

236. Umm Salamah Hind belonged to the Meccan clan of Makhzūm; her previous husband, Abū Salamah, also of Makhzūm, had been killed at Uḥud.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME VIII

The Victory of Islam

TRANSLATED BY MICHAEL FISHBEIN

The Events of the Year 5

(JUNE 2, 626–MAY 22, 627)

Muḥammad's Marriage to Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh

In this year the Messenger of God married Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh.[1] [1460]

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī][2]—'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir al-Aslamī[3]—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥabbān,[4] who said:

---

1. Zaynab was the daughter of Muḥammad's paternal aunt Umaymah bt. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib and Jaḥsh b. Ri'āb, a member of the tribe of Asad b. Khuzaymah, who had settled in Mecca and become a confederate of the Banū Umayyah of the 'Abd Shams clan of Quraysh. Muḥammad had arranged her marriage to his freedman and adopted son, Zayd b. Ḥārithah. Cf. EI[1], s.v. Zainab bint Djaḥsh; Lings, Muhammad, 40; Stowasser, Women in the Qur'an, Traditions, and Interpretation, 87–89.

2. Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī (b. 130/747 in Medina, d. 207/823 in Baghdād) was a major historian and author of Kitāb al-maghāzī on the military campaigns of the Prophet. See GAS, I, 294–97.

3. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir al-Aslamī Abū 'Āmir al-Madanī was a traditionist who died in Medina in 150/767–68 or 151/768. As a transmitter of ḥadīth he was considered "weak." See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 275–76.

4. Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥabbān al-Anṣārī al-Māzinī was a scholar who taught in Medina. He died in 121/738–39 at the age of seventy-four. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 507–8.

The Messenger of God came to the house of Zayd b. Ḥārithah.[5] (Zayd was always called Zayd b. Muḥammad.) Perhaps the Messenger of God missed him at that moment, so as to ask, "Where is Zayd?" He came to his residence to look for him but did not find him. Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh, Zayd's wife, rose to meet him. Because she was dressed only in a shift, the Messenger of God turned away [1461] from her. She said: "He is not here, Messenger of God. Come in, you who are as dear to me as my father and mother!" The Messenger of God refused to enter. Zaynab had dressed in haste when she was told "the Messenger of God is at the door." She jumped up in haste and excited the admiration of the Messenger of God, so that he turned away murmuring something that could scarcely be understood. However, he did say overtly: "Glory be to God the Almighty! Glory be to God, who causes hearts to turn!"

When Zayd came home, his wife told him that the Messenger of God had come to his house. Zayd said, "Why didn't you ask him to come in?" She replied, "I asked him, but he refused." "Did you hear him say anything?" he asked. She replied, "As he turned away, I heard him say: 'Glory be to God the Almighty! Glory be to God, who causes hearts to turn!'"

So Zayd left, and, having come to the Messenger of God, he said: "Messenger of God, I have heard that you came to my house. Why didn't you go in, you who are as dear to me as my father and mother? Messenger of God, perhaps Zaynab has excited your admiration, and so I will separate myself from her." The Messenger of God said, "Keep your wife to yourself." Zayd could find no possible way to [approach] her after that day. He would come to the Messenger of God and tell him so, but the Messenger of God

5. Zayd b. Ḥārithah was brought to Mecca as a slave by a nephew of Muḥammad's first wife, Khadījah. The nephew sold Zayd to Khadījah, who gave him to Muḥammad before the beginning of his calling as a prophet. Although Zayd's father later came to Mecca to free his son, Zayd refused to leave Muḥammad, who subsequently freed him and adopted him. Zayd came to be known thereafter as Zayd b. Muḥammad. He was a very early convert to Islam and emigrant to Medina; fought at Badr, Uḥud, and the Trench; was present at al-Ḥudaybiyah; and commanded several expeditions. He died as one of the commanders of the expedition to Mu'tah in A.H. 8. See EI[1], s.v. Zayd b. Ḥārithah.

would say to him, "Keep your wife." Zayd separated from her and left her, and she became free.[6]

While the Messenger of God was talking with 'Ā'ishah,[7] a fainting[8] overcame him. When he was released from it, he smiled and said, "Who will go to Zaynab to tell her the good news, saying that [1462] God has married her to me?" Then the Messenger of God recited: "And when you said unto him on whom God has conferred favor and you have conferred favor, 'Keep your wife to yourself . . .'"—and the entire passage.[9]

According to 'Ā'ishah, who said: "I became very uneasy because of what we heard about her beauty and another thing, the greatest and loftiest of matters—what God had done for her by giving her in marriage. I said that she would boast of it over us."

According to 'Ā'ishah, who said: "Salmā, the maidservant of the Messenger of God, went out to inform Zaynab of this, and [Zaynab] gave [Salmā] some anklets that she was wearing."[10]

---

6. Sc. from any impediment to marriage. Ordinarily this implied abstinence from conjugal relations with the former husband for a time ('iddah) long enough to establish that the woman was not pregnant by him, thereby removing any uncertainty about the paternity of any future children. The passage implies that Zayd divorced Zaynab.

7. The marriage of Muḥammad to Abū Bakr's daughter 'Ā'ishah was arranged after the death of Khadījah and three years before the emigration to Medina. 'Ā'ishah was only six years old at the time, and the marriage was not consummated until seven or eight months after the Hijrah, when 'Ā'ishah was about ten years old (v. al-Ṭabarī, I, 1261). She was very beautiful and remained Muḥammad's favorite wife. See EI[2], s.v. 'Ā'ishah bt. Abī Bakr; Abbott, Aishah the Beloved of Muhammad; and Spellberg, Politics, Gender, and the Islamic Past.

8. Arabic ghashyah, a swoon or fainting spell; literally "a covering": here signifying an episode of revelation (waḥy). See EI[1], s.v. waḥy, for a description of such episodes.

9. Qur'ān 33:37. The verse continues: "'. . . and fear God.' And you did hide in your mind that which God was to bring to light, and you did fear mankind whereas God had a better right that you should fear Him. So when Zayd had performed the necessary formality [of divorce] from her, We gave her unto you in marriage, so that [henceforth] there may be no sin for believers in respect of wives of their adopted sons, when the latter have performed the necessary formality [of release] from them. The commandment of God must be fulfilled." Cf. the commentary on the passage in al-Ṭabarī, Jāmi' al-bayān, XXII, 10–11.

10. The pronouns in the Arabic are ambiguous regarding who gave whom the anklets. My translation is suggested by a similar incident at p. 109, below, where another prospective bride of the Prophet gives the bearer of the good news a gift out of joy.

According to Yūnus b. 'Abd al-A'lā[11]—Ibn Wahb[12]—Ibn Zayd,[13] who said: The Messenger of God had married Zayd b. Ḥārithah to Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh, his paternal aunt's daughter. One day the Messenger of God went out looking for Zayd. Now there was a covering of haircloth over the doorway, but the wind had lifted the covering so that the doorway was uncovered. Zaynab was in her chamber, undressed, and admiration for her entered the heart of the Prophet. After that happened, she was made unattractive to the other man.[14] So he came and said, "Messenger of God, I want to separate myself from my companion." Muḥammad asked: "What is wrong? Has anything on her part disquieted you?" "No, by God," replied Zayd, "nothing she has done has disquieted me, Messenger of God, nor have I seen anything but good." The Messenger of God said to him, "Keep your wife to yourself, and fear God." That is [the meaning of] the Word of God:[15] "And when you said unto him on whom God has conferred favor and you have conferred favor, 'Keep your wife to yourself, and fear God.' And you did hide in your mind that which God was to bring to light." You did hide in your mind [the thought] that "if he separates himself from her, I will marry her."

The Expedition to Dūmat al-Jandal and Other Events

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year he mounted an expedition [1463] against Dūmat al-Jandal[16] in the month of Rabī' I.[17] The reason for

11. Yūnus b. 'Abd al-A'lā was born in 170/787 and died in 264/877. He was Egypt's leading scholar in the fields of ḥadīth and Qur'ān reading. Al-Ṭabarī studied with him in Egypt. See GAS, I, 38 (which identifies this isnād as pointing to a Qur'ān commentary by 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Zayd b. Aslam); and F. Rosenthal, in "General Introduction," 27.

12. 'Abdallāh b. Wahb b. Muslim al-Fihrī al-Qurashī was born in Egypt in 125/743 and died in 197/812. He was a traditionist, Qur'ān commentator, and jurist, and was a student of Mālik b. Anas. See GAS, I, 466.

13. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Zayd b. Aslam al-'Adawī of Medina (d. 182/798) was known primarily as a Qur'ān commentator. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 177–78; GAS, I, 38.

14. I.e., God caused her to become unattractive to her husband Zayd. Cf. Stowasser, Women in the Qur'an, Traditions, and Interpretation, 88.

15. Qur'ān 33:37.

16. Dūmat al-Jandal is an oasis in northern Arabia at the head of Wādī Sirḥān. It was inhabited by the Banū Kināna subtribe of the Banū Kalb, plus some Christian Arabs. The present town of al-Jawf is on the site. See *EI*², s.v. Dūmat al-Djandal.

17. Rabī' I of A.H. 5 began on 31 July 626. Parallels: IH, III, 213 (tr. Guillaume, 449); W, I, 402–4 (fuller version).

it was that word reached the Messenger of God that a host had assembled there and had approached his territories; so the Messenger of God mounted an expedition against them and reached Dūmat al-Jandal, but he had no clash with the enemy. He left Sibā' b. 'Urfuṭah al-Ghifārī in charge of Medina.

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: In this year the Messenger of God made a truce with 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn[18] that the latter might pasture his herds in Taghlamān and its vicinity.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far—his father [Ja'far b. Maḥmūd]:[19] This was because 'Uyaynah's lands became affected by drought. The Messenger of God therefore made a truce, so that 'Uyaynah might pasture his herds in Taghlamān as far as al-Marāḍ.[20] The land there had become lush with pasturage because of a rain cloud that had arrived. The Messenger of God made a truce with him that he might pasture his herds there.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year the mother of Sa'd b. 'Ubādah[21] died while Sa'd was journeying with the Messenger of God to Dūmat al-Jandal.

The Battle of the Trench

In this year the battle of the Messenger of God at the trench took place in the month of Shawwāl,[22] according to Ibn Ḥumayd[23]—

---

18. 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn b. Ḥudhayfah was leader of the Banū Fazārah subdivision of the tribe of Dhubyān (itself part of Ghaṭafān). See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 91–92; and *EI*², s.v. Fazāra.

19. Parallel: W, II, 552. Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far b. Maḥmūd b. Muḥammad b. Maslamah al-Anṣārī al-Ḥārithī was a frequent informant of al-Wāqidī, providing information from his father. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 106.

20. Al-Marāḍ was about 36 Arab miles from Medina, in the area of al-Ṭaraf (present-day al-Ṣuwaydirah) on the road to Iraq, according to al-Samhūdī, Khulāṣat al-wafā', 578–79, 604.

21. Sa'd b. 'Ubādah of the Banū Sā'idah clan was a leader of the tribe of al-Khazraj of Medina. See also Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 475–76.

22. Shawwāl of A.H. 5 began on 23 February 627. For general background, the article Khandak in *EI*² by W. Montgomery Watt may be consulted, as well as Hamidullah, The Battlefields of the Prophet Muhammad, 29–36.

23. Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd b. Ḥayyān al-Rāzī al-Tamīmī died in al-Rayy in 248/862. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 127–31; al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, II, 259–64.

Salamah[24]—Ibn Isḥāq.[25] What brought on the battle of the Messenger of God at the trench, according to what has been reported, was what happened because of the expulsion of the Banū al-Naḍīr from their settlements by the Messenger of God.[26]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Rūmān[27] (a mawlā of the family of al-Zubayr)—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr;[28] and [according to] someone whom I do not doubt—'Ubaydallāh b. Ka'b b. Mālik,[29] al-Zuhrī,[30] 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatā-[1464] dah,[31] 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm,[32] Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Qurażī,[33] and others of our learned men

24. Salamah b. al-Faḍl al-Anṣārī died in 191/806. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 153–54.

25. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Yasār, born in Medina ca. 85/207, died in Baghdād in 150/767, was the most influential of the early biographers of the Prophet. His Kitāb al-maghāzī, in its recension by Ibn Hishām, d. 218/834, generally known as Sīrat Rasūl Allāh, or simply the Sīrah, became the standard treatment of the events of the Prophet's life. See *EI*², s.v. Ibn Isḥāḳ; Guillaume, The Life of Muhammad (tr. of Ibn Hishām's Sīrah), pp. xiii-xli; GAS, I, 288–90.

26. For the expulsion of the Jewish tribe of Banū al-Naḍīr in the previous year, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1448–53. The tribe had left for Khaybar and Syria to the north, forfeiting their property in Medina. See *EI*², s.v. Naḍīr, Banū 'l-.

27. Yazīd b. Rūmān al-Asadī (d. 130/747) was a mawlā (a client, i.e., a freed slave or a person of non-Arab origin) of the al-Zubayr family and author of a book about the Prophet's campaigns. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 325; GAS, I, 284.

28. 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām al-Asadī (b. between 23/643 and 29/649, d. 94/712–13) was the son of a prominent companion of the Prophet and the younger brother of 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr, whose challenge to the caliphate of the Umayyads ended with his death in 73/692. He became one of the most respected authorities of Medina on traditions and early Islamic history. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 180–85; GAS, I, 278–79; Duri, Rise of Historical Writing, 76–95.

29. Abū Faḍālah 'Ubaydallāh b. Ka'b b. Mālik al-Anṣārī (d. 97/715 or 98) is identified by al-Ṭabarī (I, 1364) as "one of the most learned of the Anṣār." See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 44–45; GAS, I, 276–77.

30. Muḥammad b. Muslim b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī (b. 50/670 or 51, d. 124/742) was a celebrated traditionist and historian. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 445–51; *EI*¹, s.v. al-Zuhrī; GAS, I, 280–83; Duri, Rise of Historical Writing, 95–121.

31. 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah al-Anṣārī (d. 120/737) was known as an authority on the campaigns of the Prophet. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 53–54; GAS, I, 279–80.

32. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Madanī was born in 60/679 (or in 56) in Medina and died in 130/747 (or 135). He was a transmitter of historical reports and traditions, which he received from his father (died 120/737) and from Anas b. Mālik. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 164–65; GAS, I, 284.

33. Muḥammad b. Ka'b b. Sulaym al-Qurażī (d. 118/736), the son or grandson of a convert to Islam from the Banū Qurayẓah, was known primarily as a commentator on the Qur'ān. See Ibn Sa'd, Tabaqāt, V, 272–73; VII/2, 193; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 420–22; GAS, I, 32.

[the report of each has been combined in this account of the Trench, some of them relating what others do not relate]:[34] The account of the trench is as follows. A group of Jews, including Salām b. Abī al-Ḥuqayq al-Naḍarī,[35] Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab al-Naḍarī, Kinānah b. al-Rabī' b. Abī al-Ḥuqayq al-Naḍarī, Hawdhah b. Qays al-Wā'ilī, and Abū 'Ammār al-Wā'ilī, along with a group of men from the Banū al-Naḍīr and a group from the Banū Wā'il,[36] were the ones who assembled parties of men against the Messenger of God. They went to the Quraysh in Mecca and invited them to make war on the Messenger of God. They said, "We will be with you against him until we root him out." The Quraysh said to them: "People of the Jews, you are the people of the first scripture,[37] and you have knowledge about the subject on which we and Muḥammad have come to differ. Is our religion better or his?" "Your religion is better," they said, "and you are closer to the truth than he."

They are the ones concerning whom God revealed: "Have you not seen those to whom a portion of the scripture has been given, how they believe in idols and false deities, and how they say of those who disbelieve, 'These are more rightly guided than those who believe'?"—until the words, "Hell is sufficient for [their] burning."[38]

When they said this to Quraysh, the latter were pleased by what they said and embarked enthusiastically on what they invited them to do, namely, make war on the Messenger of God. They determined to do it and decided on a time for it.[39] Then the same

---

34. Parallel: IH, III, 214 ff.; tr. Guillaume, 450 ff.

35. I.e., of the Jewish tribe of Banū al-Naḍīr.

36. The Banū Wā'il were a clan of the Aws Manāt of Medina. They seem to have lived among the Jews; here they are treated as if they were Jews. See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 154, 164.

37. I.e., the Torah.

38. Qur'ān 4:51–55. For "idols and false deities" the Arabic reads al-jibt and al-ṭāghūt." Commentators disagreed on the exact meaning. Al-Sha'bī said that the words meant "they believe in enchantment and the devil." Ibn 'Abbās thought the words referred specifically to Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab and Ka'b b. al-Ashraf or that these two Jews prostrated themselves before the gods of Quraysh in order to induce Quraysh to join with them in a league against Muḥammad. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 373, s.v. jibt.

39. For itta'adū "decided on a time," Ms. S reads ista'addū "prepared themselves."

group of Jews set out and came to [the tribe of] Ghaṭafān,[40] a division of Qays 'Aylān, and called on them to make war on the [1465] Messenger of God. The Jews told them that they would be with them against him and that Quraysh had followed them and had decided on the matter. So they responded favorably. Quraysh set out under the leadership of Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb;[41] Ghaṭafān set out under the leadership of 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn b. Ḥudhayfah b. Badr with the Banū Fazārah, al-Ḥārith b. 'Awf b. Abī Ḥārithah al-Murrī with the Banū Murrah, and Mas'ūd b. Rukhaylah b. Nuwayrah b. Ṭarīf b. Suḥmah b. 'Abdallāh b. Hilāl b. Khalāwah b. Ashja' b. Rayth b. Ghaṭafān with those of his fellow tribesmen from Ashja' who followed him. When the Messenger of God received word of them and what they had determined to do, he laid out a trench to protect Medina.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī], who said:[42] The person who advised the Messenger of God about the trench was Salmān.[43] It was the first combat that Salmān saw with the Messenger of God. He was a free man at this time. He said, "Messenger of God, in Persia, whenever we were surrounded, we would dig a trench to protect ourselves."

Resumption of the account of Ibn Isḥāq: The Messenger of God worked [at building the trench] in order to inspire the Muslims with hope of reward, and they set to work on it. He toiled at it, and [1466] they toiled. Certain men of the hypocrites[44] hung back from the

40. Ghaṭafān was a group of North Arabian tribes to the east of Medina and Mecca in the land between the Ḥijāz and the Shammar Mountains. Among its divisions were 'Abs, Ashja', and Dhubyān—the latter with its divisions Fazārah (the tribe of 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn), Murrah, and Tha'labah. See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 91–95; *EI*², s.v. Ghaṭafān.

41. Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb b. Umayyah, of the clan of 'Abd Shams of Quraysh, was a prominent Meccan merchant. See *EI*², s.v. Abū Sufyān.

42. Parallel: W, 445.

43. For the religious quest and conversion to Islam of Salmān, a Persian landowner's son who had gone to Syria to learn about Christianity and then to Arabia to investigate prophecies of a new religion, see IH, I, 214–22; tr. Guillaume, 95–98; *EI*¹, s.v. Salmān al-Fārisī.

44. The munāfiqūn "hypocrites, waverers"—Brockett in *EI*², s.v., prefers the rendering "dissenters"—were nominal Muslims who secretly opposed many of Muḥammad's policies. 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy was said to be their leader. See also Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 180–91.

Messenger of God and from the Muslims in their work. They began pretending to be too weak to work and slipping away to their families without the knowledge or permission of the Messenger of God. As for the Muslims, whenever some matter of unavoidable necessity befell any of them, he would mention it to the Messenger of God and ask leave to attend to his need, and the Messenger of God would grant him leave. Having attended to his need, the person would return to the work he had been doing—this from a desire for good and because he reckoned on a reward for his work. Concerning this, God revealed: "They only are the true believers who believe in God and His Messenger and, when they are with him on some common enterprise, go not away until they have asked leave of him"—until the words "and ask for them forgiveness of God. Lo! God is forgiving, merciful."[45] This verse was revealed about all those believers who were people who reckoned [on a reward in the world to come], desired good, and obeyed God and His Messenger. God then said, referring to the hypocrites who would slip away from work and depart without leave from the Messenger of God: "Make not the calling of the Messenger among you as your calling one of another"—until the words "He knows your condition."[46] [That is, He knows your condition with regard to truthfulness or lying.] The Muslims worked at the trench until they had finished it solidly. As they were working, they improvised a work song[47] about a Muslim who used to be called Ju'ayl but whom the Messenger of God had named 'Amr. They said:

After he had been Ju'ayl, he named him 'Amr;
and to the once needy man he was backing.

Whenever they came to the word "'Amr," the Messenger of God would say "'Amr"; whenever they said "backing," the Messenger of God would say "backing." [1467]

45. Qur'ān, 24:62.
46. Qur'ān, 24:63–64.
47. Arabic: "they recited a verse in rajaz" [the meter used for extemporized poems]. See Goldziher, Abhandlungen zur arabischen Philologie, I, 80. The name change to which the verse alludes may have been made to improve Ju'ayl's morale, as his name appears to be a diminutive of ju'al "dung beetle." In W, 447, Ju'ayl is said to have been "pious but ugly." Cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 49.

According to Muḥammad b. Bashshār[48]—Muḥammad b. Khālid Ibn 'Athmah[49]—Kathīr b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. 'Awf al-Muzanī[50]—his father ['Abdallāh b. 'Amr][51]—his father ['Amr b. 'Awf],[52] who said: The Messenger of God laid out the trench in the Year of the Parties,[53] from the Fortress of the Two Shaykhs (ujum al-shaykhayn) on the side of the Banū Ḥārithah[54] until it reached al-Madhād.[55] He divided it up forty cubits between each ten [men].[56] The Emigrants[57] and the Anṣār[58] disputed over Salmān the Persian, who was a strong man. The Anṣār said, "Salmān is one of us." The Emigrants said, "Salmān is one of us." So the Messenger of God said, "Salmān is one of us, the People of the Household."[59]

According to 'Amr b. 'Awf: I, along with Salmān, Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān, al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin al-Muzanī, and six of the Anṣār, was in a 40-cubit [section of the trench]. We dug beneath

---

48. Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Bashshār b. 'Uthmān b. Dāwūd al-'Abdī (b. 167/783 in al-Baṣrah, died 252/866) was considered a reliable transmitter of traditions. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 70–71; GAS, I, 113–14.

49. For Muḥammad b. Khālid, who was called Ibn 'Athmah after his mother 'Athmah, see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 142–43.

50. Kathīr b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. 'Awf al-Yashkurī al-Muzanī (died between 150/767 and 160/777 in Medina) was generally considered a weak transmitter of ḥadīth. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 421–23.

51. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. 'Awf b. Zayd al-Muzanī was a transmitter of ḥadīth generally considered sound. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 339–40.

52. 'Amr b. 'Awf al-Anṣārī was present at the Battle of Badr and died during the caliphate of 'Umar. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 85–86.

53. Years were named after their most prominent events: hence Year of the Hijrah and Year of the Aḥzāb (the parties, confederates, or allied clans that attacked Medina in this year). Sūra 33 of the Qur'ān, Sūrat al-Aḥzāb, is named for them.

54. The Banū Ḥārithah, a clan of the al-Aws, had land on the northeast side of Medina. See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 152 (map); Hamidullah, Battlefields, 26, 32 (photograph of a mosque on the site).

55. Al-Madhād was a stronghold belonging to the Banū Ḥaram of the Banū Salimah clan of al-Khazraj (see al-Samhūdī, Khulāṣat al-wafā', 603). It lay to the west of Mt. Sal' (see map in Hamidullah, Battlefields, 31).

56. I.e., he divided the work so that ten men were responsible for digging each 40-cubit section (approximately 60 feet).

57. The Emigrants (al-muhājirūn) were the followers of Muḥammad who had migrated from Mecca to Medina with him. See *EI*², s.v. Muhādjirūn.

58. The Anṣār ("helpers") were Muslims from Medina, primarily from the tribes of al-Aws and al-Khazraj. See *EI*², s.v. Anṣār.

59. Arabic ahl al-bayt designates the Prophet's household.

Dhūbāb[60] until we reached al-Nadā.[61] Then God caused a white rock to emerge from the bottom of the trench, a flint that broke our iron implements and exhausted us. So we said, "Salmān, go up to the Messenger of God and inform him about this rock—either [1468] that we may turn aside from it, for the place to turn aside is near, or that he may give us his order about it—for we do not wish to deviate from his plan."

Salmān climbed out and went to the Messenger of God, who was pitching a Turkish-style round tent[62] nearby, and said: "O Messenger of God, who are as dear to us as father and mother, a white rock came out of the trench, a flint that broke our iron implements and exhausted us, so that we can make no impression small or great on it. Give us your order concerning it, for we do not wish to deviate from your plan." The Messenger of God went down into the trench with Salmān, and we nine climbed up onto its side. The Messenger of God took the pickaxe from Salmān and struck the rock a blow that cracked it, and a flash of lightning shot out, illuminating everything between the two tracts of black stones—that is, Medina's two tracts of black stones[63]—like a lamp inside a dark room. The Messenger of God shouted, "God is greatest!"—a shout of victory—and the Muslims, too, shouted, "God is greatest!" Then the Messenger of God struck it again and cracked it, and a flash of lightning shot out, illuminating everything between Medina's two tracts of black stones—like a lamp inside a dark room. The Messenger of God shouted, "God is greatest!"—a shout of victory—and the Muslims, too, shouted, "God is greatest!" Then the Messenger of God struck it a third time and broke it, and a flash of lightning shot out, illuminating

60. Dhūbāb (or Dhubāb) was located to the north of Mt. Sal'. According to al-Samhūdī, Khulāṣat al-wafā', 552, it became the site of the Mosque of the Banner. See Hamidullah, Battlefields, 32, for a photograph of the site.

61. The reading al-Nadā is uncertain; see the apparatus of ed. Leiden.

62. As noted in ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CL, "Turkish-style round tent" (qubbah turkiyyah) is an apparent anachronism, at least as regards the adjective "Turkish." Note, however, that the Prophet's tent at the time of the conquest of Mecca (p. 177, below) is called a qubbah, which normally implies a round tent. In any case, that this is not a very great anachronism is shown by a report from A.H. 16 (al-Ṭabarī, I, 2444) indicating that the Arab conquerers of al-Madā'in found qibāb turkiyyah "Turkish round tents" containing baskets of treasure.

63. Medina is surrounded by black lava flows called ḥarrah or lābah.

everything between Medina's two tracts of black stones—like a lamp inside a dark room. The Messenger of God shouted, "God is greatest!"—a shout of victory—and the Muslims, too, shouted, [1469] "God is greatest!" Then he took Salmān's hand and climbed out. Salmān said: "You are as dear to me as father and mother, Messenger of God! I have seen something I never saw before." The Messenger of God turned to the men and asked, "Did you see what Salmān says?" They said: "Yes, Messenger of God, you who are as dear to us as father and mother; we saw you strike and lightning come out like waves. We saw you shout 'God is greatest,' and so we shouted 'God is greatest.' We saw nothing else." "You have spoken truly," he said. "I struck my first blow, and what you saw flashed out, so that the palaces of al-Ḥīrah[64] and al-Madā'in[65] of Kisrā lit up for me from it as if they were dogs' teeth, and Gabriel informed me that my nation would be victorious over them. Then I struck my second blow, and what you saw flashed out, so that the palaces of the pale men in the land of the Byzantines lit up for me from it as if they were dogs' teeth, and Gabriel informed me that my nation would be victorious over them. Then I struck my third blow, and what you saw flashed out, so that the palaces of Ṣan'ā'[66] lit up for me from it as if they were dogs' teeth, and Gabriel informed me that my nation would be victorious over them, [saying]: "Rejoice; victory shall come to them! Rejoice; victory shall come to them! Rejoice; victory shall come to them!" So the Muslims rejoiced and said: "Praise be to God! The promise of One who is true and faithful! He has promised us victory after tribulation." So when the allied clans came up, the believers said: "This is what God and His Messenger promised us. God and His Messenger have spoken truly." And it only increased them in faith and surrender.[67] But the hypocrites said: "Do you not wonder? He

64. Al-Ḥīrah, on the west bank of the Euphrates, southeast of the present Najaf in Iraq, was the capital of the pre-Islamic Arab vassal state of the Sasanian empire governed by the Banū Lakhm (Lakhmids). See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥīra.

65. Al-Madā'in (Ctesiphon), on the Tigris about 20 miles south of the site of later Baghdād, was the winter capital of the Sasanian emperors, who in Arabic are normally given the title Kisrā (from Persian Khusraw, the name of several rulers in the dynasty). See *EI*², s.v. al-Madā'in.

66. At this time Ṣan'ā' in Yemen was ruled by a Persian governor. One of the palaces was presumably the famous Ghumdān, said to have been twenty stories tall. See *EI*¹, s.v. Ṣan'ā.

67. Cf. Qur'ān 33:22.

discourses to you, raises your hopes, and promises you false things. He tells you that from Yathrib[68] he can see the palaces of al-Ḥīrah and al-Madā'in of Kisrā and that they will be conquered by you—and this while you are digging the trench and cannot go forth!" So the following [verse of the] Qur'ān was revealed: "And [1470] when the hypocrites and those in whose hearts is sickness were saying, 'God and His Messenger promised us naught but delusion.'"[69]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—someone not to be doubted—Abū Hurayrah:[70] When these cities were conquered in the time of 'Umar,[71] 'Uthmān,[72] and afterward, [Abū Hurayrah] used to say, "Conquer for yourselves whatever seems good to you; for, by the One who holds Abū Hurayrah's soul in His hand, you have conquered no city, neither shall you conquer any until the Day of Resurrection, but that Muḥammad was given its keys beforehand."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: The people of the trench were 3,000.

When the Messenger of God had finished the trench, Quraysh came and encamped where the stream beds meet at Rūmah, between al-Juruf and al-Ghābah,[73] with 10,000 of their Aḥābīsh[74] and those of the Banū Kinānah and people of Tihāmah[75]

---

68. Yathrib was the old name of Medina.

69. Qur'ān 33:12.

70. Abū Hurayrah, a companion of the Prophet, is said to have acquired his nickname ("the man with the kitten") because he kept a kitten to play with while he herded his goats. He came to Medina in A.H. 7. Later he became noted as a prolific narrator of traditions. See *EI*², s.v. Abū Hurayra.

71. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb ruled as caliph from 13/634 to 23/644.

72. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān ruled as caliph from 23/644 to 35/656.

73. IH, III, 219 reads "Zaghābah," for al-Ghābah. Al-Ṭabarī's reading of al-Ghābah is noted by Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, s.v. Zaghābah. Yāqūt implies that al-Ṭabarī chose his reading because he believed a place called "Zaghābah" was unknown; Yāqūt then cites ḥadīth to show that such a place was known. Al-Ghābah was eight miles north of Medina. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, s.v.; Hamidullah, Battlefields, 31 (map).

74. Aḥābīsh (plural of uḥbūsh or uḥbūshah) means "companies or bodies of men not all of one tribe." They consisted of a number of small clans or subtribes allied with Quraysh. The most important was Banū al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah; others were al-Muṣṭaliq (of Khuzā'ah) and al-Hūn (of Khuzaymah, with subdivisions 'Aḍal and al-Qārah). The thesis of Henri Lammens that they were Abyssinian slave mercenaries is mistaken. Cf. *EI*², s.v. Ḥabash; W. Montgomery Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 153–56; Muhammad at Medina, 81–83.

75. Tihāmah is the Red Sea coastal plain of the Arabian peninsula.

who followed them. Ghaṭafān and the people of Najd who followed them came and encamped at Dhanab Naqamā, beside Uḥud.[76] The Messenger of God and the Muslims went out and set their backs toward Sal'[77] with 3,000 of the Muslims. There he pitched his camp, with the trench between him and the enemy. He commanded that the children and women should be taken up into the strongholds.[78]

[1471] The enemy of God, Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab, went out and came to Ka'b b. Asad al-Quraẓī, who was the possessor of the treaty and covenant of the Banū Qurayẓah.[79] Ka'b had made a truce with the Messenger of God for his people, making a contract and covenanting with him on it. When Ka'b heard Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab, he shut his fortress in his face. Ḥuyayy asked to be allowed in, but Ka'b refused to open to him. Ḥuyayy called to him, "Ka'b, open to me!" "Woe to you, Ḥuyayy," answered Ka'b, "you are a man who brings bad luck! I have made a treaty with Muḥammad and will not break the pact that exists between me and him. I have seen nothing but faithfulness and truth on his part." Ḥuyayy said: "Woe to you! Open to me, and I will speak to you!" "I will not do it," said Ka'b. Ḥuyayy said, "By God, you have shut me out only on account of your gruel,[80] lest I should eat any of it with you." This angered the man, so that he opened to him. Ḥuyayy said: "Woe to you, Ka'b! I have brought you everlasting might and an overflowing sea. I have brought you Quraysh, with their leaders and chiefs, and have caused them to encamp where the stream beds meet at Rūmah;

---

76. Uḥud, where a battle between the Muslims and Meccans had taken place in Shawwāl 3 A.H. (March 625), is about a mile north of Medina. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, s.v.; Hamidullah, Battlefields, 22, 31 (maps).

77. Sal' was a hill in the central area of Medina. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, s.v.; Hamidullah, Battlefields, 31 (map).

78. "Medina was at first not a compact town, but a collection of scattered settlements, surrounded by groves of date palms and cultivated fields. For defense, therefore, a large number of forts or strongholds (āṭām, sing. uṭum; also ājām, sing. ujum) had been constructed, perhaps 200 in all. In these the local inhabitants took refuge in times of danger." M. Watt in *EI*², s.v. al-Madīna, p. 994.

79. The Banū Qurayẓah were one of the three main Jewish tribes of Medina, with lands toward the southeast of the oasis; see *EI*², s.v. Ḳurayẓa. On this treaty, cf. W, 454–56, which implies that it was a document written by Muḥammad and that Ḥuyayy, having persuaded Ka'b to go over to his side, tore it up.

80. Jashīshah was a gruel of coarsely ground wheat or barley, sometimes with the addition of dates and meat. See Lane, Lexicon, II, 425.

and Ghaṭafān, with their leaders and chiefs, and have caused them to encamp at Dhanab Naqamā beside Uḥud. They have made a treaty and covenant with me not to withdraw until they root out Muḥammad and those who are with him." Ka'b b. Asad said to him: "By God, you have brought me everlasting humiliation—a cloud that has already shed its water, that thunders and lightens but has nothing in it. Woe to you! Leave me to continue with Muḥammad as I am now, for I have seen nothing from Muḥammad except truth and faithfulness." But Ḥuyayy kept wheedling[81] Ka'b until he yielded to him, Ḥuyayy having given him a promise [1472] and oath by God that "if Quraysh and Ghaṭafān retreat without having killed Muḥammad, I will enter your fortress with you, so that whatever happens to you shall happen to me." So Ka'b b. Asad broke his treaty and renounced the bond that had existed between him and the Messenger of God.

When the news reached the Messenger of God and the Muslims, the Messenger of God sent out Sa'd b. Mu'ādh b. al-Nu'mān b. Imru' al-Qays (one of the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal who at that time was the chief of al-Aws), Sa'd b. 'Ubādah b. Dulaym (one of the Banū Sā'idah b. Ka'b b. al-Khazraj who at that time was the chief of al-Khazraj[82]), and with them 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah[83] (a member of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. al-Khazraj) and Khawwāt b. Jubayr (a member of the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf), and said: "Go and see whether what has reached us about these men is true or not. If it is true, speak to me in words that we can understand but that will be unintelligible to others, and do not break the strength of the people. But, if these men remain loyal to the pact between us and them, announce it to the people."

So they went out and came to them. They found them engaged in the worst of what had been reported about them. They slan-

---

81. Literally, "kept twisting [the fur of] the upper part and the fore part of the hump"; the metaphor is of a refractory camel that must be massaged and coaxed before it will allow the nose rein to be attached. See Lane, Lexicon, VI, s.v. ghārib.

82. Al-Aws and al-Khazraj were the two most important Arab tribes of Medina (as opposed to the Jews); see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 151 ff. (genealogical table, p. 154); and EI[1], s. vv. Sa'd b. Mu'ādh, Sa'd b. 'Ubāda.

83. 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah was a leader of his clan and a poet. He was one of the Medinans who pledged allegiance to Muḥammad at the Second Pledge of 'Aqabah, a year before the Hijrah. He fought at Badr, Uḥud, and the Trench and was killed at Mu'tah in A.H. 8. See EI[2], s.v. 'Abd Allāh b. Rawāḥa; GAS, II, 292–93.

dered the Messenger of God and said, "There is no treaty between us and Muḥammad and no covenant." Sa'd b. 'Ubādah reviled them, and they reviled him—Sa'd was a man with a sharp temper.
[1473] So Sa'd b. Mu'ādh said to him, "Stop reviling them, for the disagreement between us and them is too serious for an exchange of taunts." The two Sa'ds and the men with them went back to the Messenger of God and, having greeted him, said, "'Aḍal and al-Qārah!" [They meant that it was] like the treachery of 'Aḍal and al-Qārah to the companions of the Messenger of God who were [betrayed] at al-Rajī', Khubayb b. 'Adī and his companions.[84] The Messenger of God said: "God is greatest! Rejoice, people of the Muslims!"

Soon the trial became great, and fear intensified. Their foe came at them from above them and below them, so that the believers were beset with fears of all kinds.[85] The hypocrisy of some of the hypocrites became evident. Mu'attib b. Qushayr, a member of the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf, said, "Muḥammad was promising us that we should eat up the treasures of Kisrā and Caesar, and now none of us can go out to relieve himself!" Aws b. Qayẓī, one of the Banū Ḥārithah b. al-Ḥārith, said, "Messenger of God, our houses lie exposed to the enemy"[86]—he had been put up to this by certain

84. For the story of how a group of men from the clans of 'Aḍal and al-Qārah came to Muḥammad in Medina in A.H. 4 and asked for men to instruct them in Islam and how, after Muḥammad had sent six men back with them (including Khubayb b. 'Adī), they betrayed the six to the pro-Meccan Liḥyān subtribe of Hudhayl (which had a vendetta against the Muslims) at the watering place of al-Rajī', see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1431–37; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 33–34; and *EI*², s.v. Liḥyān. For an account of Muḥammad's eventual retaliation, see p. 42 [I, 1501], below.

85. The sentence is virtually a paraphrase of Qur'ān 33:10. According to al-Ṭabarī, Jāmi' al-bayān, ad loc. [XXI, 71], those who came "from above" refers to 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn, who came from the highlands of Najd, and those who came "from below" refers to Quraysh from Mecca. The final phrase in al-Ṭabarī, ḥatta ẓanna al-mu'minūna kulla ẓannin, parallels the Qur'ānic wa-taẓunnūna billāhi al-ẓunūna, generally translated as if the verb ẓanna meant "thinking unsubstantiated thoughts, making vain suppositions." But with the omission of billāhi, "concerning God," it seems more natural to translate according to another meaning of the idiom ẓann al-ẓunūn. Cf. Dozy, Supplément, II, 86: "s'abandonner aux pensées les plus douloureuses, se dit en parlant de celui qui est rempli de crainte."

86. Cf. Qur'ān 33:13.

chiefs of his tribe—"therefore give us leave, and let us return to our dwelling place, for it lies outside Medina."

The Messenger of God and the polytheists[87] stayed in their positions for over twenty nights—nearly a month—with no warfare between the troops, except for the shooting of arrows and the siege.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah and Muḥammad b. Muslim b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī:[88] When the trial became great for the people, the Messenger of God sent to 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn and al-Ḥārith b. 'Awf b. [1474] Abī Ḥārithah al-Murrī, the two leaders of Ghaṭafān, and offered them a third of the date harvest of Medina on condition that they and their followers go back, leaving the Messenger of God and his companions. The truce between the two sides progressed to the point of drawing up a written document, but there was no witnessing or firm determination to make peace; it was only a matter of maneuvering. So the two of them acted as they did. When the Messenger of God was about to act, he sent to Sa'd b. Mu'ādh and Sa'd b. 'Ubādah, gave them an account, and asked their advice. The two said, "Messenger of God, is it something you would like us to do, or is it something God has commanded you to do that we must do, or is it something you are doing for us?" He answered: "Indeed, it is for you. By God, I am doing it only because I saw that the Arabs had shot at you from a single bow[89] and had dogged you from every side; so I wanted somehow to avert their furor from you for a time." Sa'd b. Mu'ādh said: "Messenger of God, we and these people used to be polytheists, associating [other divinities] with God and worshiping idols, and we neither worshiped God nor knew him; and they did not hope to eat a single date of ours except in hospitality or by buying. Now that God has conferred Islam on us, guided us to it, and strengthened us with your presence, shall we give them our wealth? We have no need for this! By God, we will offer them only the sword, until God judge between us and them." "As you wish," said the Messenger of God. So Sa'd took the sheet and erased the writing on it. Then he said, "Let them do their utmost against us."

87. Mushrikūn, those who associate other divinities with Allāh, is the regular Qur'ānic term for pagans.

88. Parallel with more details: W, 477–80.

89. I.e., were unanimous against you. See Lane, Lexicon, VII, 2575, for the proverb.

[1475] The Messenger of God and the Muslims remained besieged by their enemy. There was no fighting between them, except that some horsemen of Quraysh—among them were 'Amr b. 'Abd Wudd b. Abī Qays (a member of the Banū 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy), 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl and Hubayrah b. Abī Wahb (both from Makhzūm), Nawfal b. 'Abdallāh, and Ḍirār b. al-Khaṭṭāb b. Mirdās (a member of the Banū Muḥārib b. Fihr) clad themselves for battle.[90] They rode out on their horses and passed by the Banū Kinānah and said: "Get ready for warfare, Banū Kinānah. Today you shall know who are the real horsemen." Then they advanced toward the trench and halted by it. When they saw it, they said, "By God, this is a stratagem that the Arabs have never employed." They headed to a place where the trench was narrow and struck their horses, so that they rushed through it and carried them round onto the marshy ground between the trench and Sal'. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib went out with a band of Muslims and blocked the gap through which they had driven their horses. The horsemen rode at a fast pace toward them. 'Amr b. 'Abd Wudd had fought at the Battle of Badr[91] until he was immobilized by wounds, and therefore he had not been present at Uḥud. When the Battle of the Trench took place, he went forth wearing a mark, so that his position would be visible. When he and his horsemen drew to a halt,[92] 'Alī said to him, "'Amr, you used to swear to God that if a man of Quraysh ever summoned you to one of two alternatives, you would accept one of them from him." "Yes," he replied. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib said, "I summon you to God, to His Messenger, and to Islam." He replied, "I have no need of this." So 'Alī said, "Then I

[1476] summon you to fight." 'Amr said: "Why, O son of my brother? By God, I do not want to kill you." 'Alī said, "But I, by God, want to kill you." 'Amr then became very angry. He jumped from his

90. Parallel with many more details: W, 470–72.

91. At the Battle of Badr in 2/642, a Muslim force from Medina defeated a large Meccan force; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1282–338.

92. IH, III, 225, adds: "He said, 'Who will come out for single combat?' 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib came out to him."

horse, hamstrung it[93] (or he struck it on its face), and advanced toward 'Alī. The two fought in single combat with each other, and 'Alī killed 'Amr. His horsemen went away in a rout and rushed through the trench in flight. Two men were killed along with 'Amr: Munabbih b. 'Uthmān b. 'Ubayd b. al-Sabbāq b. 'Abd al-Dār (he was hit by an arrow and died of it in Mecca) and Nawfal b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Mughīrah of the Banū Makhzūm. Nawfal plunged into the trench and became trapped in it. They pelted him with stones. He said, "People of the Arabs, a slaying better than this!" So 'Alī went down and killed him. The Muslims took his body. They asked the Messenger of God to sell them his body. The Messenger of God said: "We have no need for his body or its price. Do with it as you like." So he left them to do as they pleased with it.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Abū Laylā 'Abdallāh b. Sahl b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sahl al-Anṣārī[94] (a member of the Banū Ḥārithah): At the time of the Battle of the Trench, 'Ā'ishah, the Mother of the Faithful,[95] was in the fortress of the Banū Ḥārithah, one of Medina's strongest fortresses, and the mother of Sa'd b. Mu'ādh was there with her.

According to 'Ā'ishah: That was before the curtain[96] was imposed on us. Sa'd [b. Mu'ādh] passed by wearing a coat of mail

93. A horse was hamstrung when its rider resolved not to attempt escape but to fight to the death.

94. His exact dates are unknown. His name is also given as Abū Laylā b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sahl al-Anṣārī, and he is said to have been a reliable transmitter. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 215.

95. On the title "Mother of the Faithful" conferred on Muḥammad's wives, see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 286–87.

96. Arabic: ḥijāb, "anything that veils, conceals, hides, covers, or protects" (Lane, Lexicon, II, 516). Originally, the word designated the curtain that was set up in Muḥammad's house to separate his wives from the view of unrelated male visitors; in later usage it was applied to a veil or article of clothing concealing any Muslim woman's features and thereby protecting her from the desire of men. The institution of such a curtain in Muḥammad's house is usually dated to this year, A.H. 5, and sometimes connected with the behavior of certain guests at the wedding of the Prophet and Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh. Qur'ān 33:53 enunciates the injunction: "O believers, enter not the houses of the Prophet, except leave is given you for a meal, without watching for its hour. But when you are invited, then enter; and when you have had the meal, disperse, neither lingering for idle talk; that is hurtful to the Prophet, and he is ashamed before you; but God is not ashamed before the truth. And when you ask his wives for any object, ask them from behind a curtain (ḥijāb); that is cleaner for your hearts and theirs." 'Ā'ishah's account of the so-tucked up so that his entire forearm was exposed, with his lance in [1477] his hand. He was running about with it and reciting:

Wait a little, and Ḥamal shall be present at the fray:
There is no harm in death when one's time is come.[97]

His mother said to him, "Hurry up, son; by God, you are late!"

According to 'Ā'ishah: I said to her, "Umm Sa'd,[98] I wish Sa'd's coat of mail were ampler than it is." I feared for him where the arrow struck him. Sa'd b. Mu'ādh was shot with an arrow, and the median vein of his arm was cut.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah: The arrow was shot by Ḥibbān b. Qays b. al-'Ariqah (one of the Banū 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy). When he hit Sa'd, Ḥibbān said: "Take that! I am Ibn al-'Ariqah." Sa'd replied: "God make your face sweat[99] in hellfire! O God, if Thou hast saved any portion of the warfare with Quraysh, save me for it; for there are no men against whom I would rather strive than men who hurt Thy Messenger, called him a liar, and cast him out. O God, if Thou hast set warfare between us and them, grant me martyrdom, and do not let me die until Thou make my eye see its desire upon the Banū Qurayẓah."

According to Sufyān b. Wakī'[100]—Muḥammad b. Bishr[101]—Muḥammad b. 'Amr[102]—his father ['Amr b. 'Alqamah][103]— called "Affair of the Lie" in A.H. 6 (p. 59, below) implies that by that date seclusion of the Prophet's wives was in force. On the development of regulations concerning the modest behavior expected from Muḥammad's wives, see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 284–87; *EI*², s.v. Ḥidjāb; and Stowasser, Women in the Qur'an, Traditions, and Interpretation, 90–94, 127–31.

---

97. The verse was proverbial. Commentators give various identifications for Ḥamal (whose name sometimes appears as Jamal).

98. I.e., "Mother (umm) of Sa'd," using the form of address (kunyah) that names a person after his or her first son.

99. 'Arraqa ("make sweat") is a pun on the name al-'Ariqah.

100. Sufyān b. Wakī' b. al-Jarrāḥ al-Kūfī died in 247/861; see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 123–24.

101. Muḥammad b. Bishr b. al-Farāfiṣah b. al-Mukhtār, a Kūfan scholar, died in 203/818. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 73–74.

102. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. 'Alqamah b. Waqqāṣ al-Laythī died in 144/761–62 or 145/762–63. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 375–77.

103. For 'Amr b. 'Alqamah b. Waqqāṣ al-Laythī of Medina (exact dates not known), see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 79–80.

'Alqamah[104]—'Ā'ishah, who said: I went out at the time of the [1478]
Battle of the Trench following the footsteps of the people. Suddenly, as I was walking, I heard footsteps on the ground behind me. Turning around, I saw Sa'd; so I sat down on the ground. With him, carrying his shield, was his brother's son, al-Ḥārith b. Aws (who, according to Muḥammad b. 'Amr, had been present at Badr with the Messenger of God). Sa'd was wearing an iron coat of mail, but the extremities of his limbs stuck out of it—he was one of the biggest and tallest of men. I feared for Sa'd's limbs. He passed by me reciting:[105]

Wait a little, and Ḥamal shall reach the fray:
How fair is death when one's time is come!

After he passed me I stood up and hurried into a walled garden where there were a group of Muslims. Among them were 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and a man wearing his tasbighah (according to Muḥammad [b. Hishām], a tasbighah is a mighfar[106]), so that only his eyes could be seen. 'Umar said: "You are very brave! Why have you come? How can you tell?—perhaps there may be a retreat or trouble." By God, he kept scolding me until I wished the earth would split open for me to enter it. Then the man threw back the tasbighah and revealed his face. It was Ṭalḥah,[107] and he said [to 'Umar]: "You have talked too much! What flight and what retreat, except to God?" Sa'd b. Mu'ādh was shot with an arrow that day by [1479] a man named Ibn al-'Ariqah, who said: "Take that! I am Ibn al-'Ariqah." Sa'd said, "God make your face sweat in hellfire![108] He had hit his median vein and cut it. (According to Muḥammad b. 'Amr: Some have said that whenever a person's median vein is 104. Ed. Cairo, index, identifies him as 'Alqamah b. Qays al-Nakha'ī. He was supposedly ninety years old when he died sometime between 61/680 and 63/683. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, 276–78. However, the rest of the isnad points to 'Alqamah b. Waqqāṣ al-Laythī. See note 153, below.

105. Literally, "reciting verse in rajaz meter."

106. I.e., "a portion of the mail of the coat of mail, that is conjoined to the helmet, and protects the neck"—Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1299.

107. For a biography of Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, a member of the Quraysh clan of Banū Taym b. Murrah, who accompanied Muḥammad on the Hijrah and distinguished himself at the Battle of Uḥud, see EI[1], s.v. Ṭalḥa. The incident reveals Ṭalḥah's coolness toward 'Umar and his closeness to 'Ā'ishah, elements that would be important in his subsequent career.

108. See note 99, above.

cut, it keeps oozing blood until the person dies.] Sa'd said, "O God, do not let me die until Thou make my eye see its desire upon the Banū Qurayẓah"—in the Time of Ignorance[109] they had been his confederates and clients.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—someone not to be doubted—'Ubaydallāh b. Ka'b b. Mālik, who used to say: No one hit Sa'd with an arrow that day but Abū Usāmah al-Jushamī, a confederate of the Banū Makhzūm. God knows best what actually happened.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. 'Abbād b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr[110]—his father, 'Abbād, who said:[111] Ṣafiyyah[112] bt. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib was in Fāri', the fortress of Ḥassān b. Thābit.[113]

According to Ṣafiyyah, who said: Ḥassān was with us there with the women and children. A man from the Jews passed by us and began to circle the fortress. The Banū Qurayẓah had gone to war and had broken their pact with the Messenger of God. There was no one between us and them to defend us—the Messenger of God and the Muslims, being face to face with the enemy, could not leave them to come back to us when anyone came at us. So I said:
[1480] "Ḥassān, this Jew, as you see, is circling the fortress. By God, I fear he will point out our exposed places to the Jews who are to our rear while the Messenger of God and his companions are too busy to attend to us. So go down to him and kill him." He replied: "God forgive you, daughter of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib! You know I am not the man to do it." When he said that to me and I saw that nothing could be expected from him, I girded myself, took a club, and, having gone down from the fortress to the man, I struck him with

109. Arabic, "in the jāhiliyyah," the "time of ignorance" before Islam. See *EI*², s.v. Djāhiliyya.

110. Yaḥyā b. 'Abbād b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām is said to have died at the age of thirty-six, but no exact date is given. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 234–35.

111. On 'Abbād b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām, see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 98. Parallels: IH, III, 228 (tr. Guillaume, 458); Aghānī, IV, 15 (ed. Cairo, IV, 1378).

112. Muḥammad's paternal aunt; the daughter of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib's last marriage, she was slightly younger than Muḥammad.

113. Ḥassān b. Thābit of the tribe of al-Khazraj in Medina was the most prominent of the poets supporting Muḥammad. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥassān b. Thābit; GAS, II, 289–92.

the club until I killed him. When I had finished with him, I returned to the fortress and said: "Ḥassān, go down to him and strip him"—only his being a man kept me from stripping him. Ḥassān replied, "I have no need for his spoils, daughter of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib."[114]

According to Ibn Isḥāq: The Messenger of God and his companions continued in the fear and distress that God has described [in the Qur'ān], because their enemies had leagued together against them and had come at them "from above them and below them."[115] Then Nu'aym b. Mas'ūd b. 'Āmir b. Unayf b. Tha'labah b. Qunfudh b. Hilāl b. Khalāwah b. Ashja' b. Rayth b. Ghaṭafān came to the Messenger of God and said, "I have become a Muslim, but my tribesmen do not know of my Islam; so command me whatever you will." The Messenger of God said to him: "You are only one man among us. Make them abandon [each other], if you can, so that they leave us; for war is deception."

Nu'aym b. Mas'ūd therefore set out and came to the Banū Qurayẓah—he had been their drinking companion in the Time of Ignorance—and said to them, "Banū Qurayẓah, you know my affection for you and the special tie between myself and you." "Yes," they said, "you are not a person whom we doubt." He said to them: "Quraysh and Ghaṭafān have come to make war on [1481] Muḥammad, and you have backed them against him. The position of Quraysh and Ghaṭafān is not like yours. The land is your land. Your wealth, your children, and your women are in it; you cannot move from it to another. The wealth, children, women, and land of Quraysh and Ghaṭafān are elsewhere; so they are not in a position like yours. If they see an opportunity and booty, they will take it; if it turns out otherwise, they will return to their lands and

114. The editor of ed. Cairo adds the following note: "According to al-Suhaylī, people infer from this tradition that Ḥassān was very cowardly. One scholar disputes this and denies it on the ground that the tradition has a broken chain of transmission. He says that if it were true, Ḥassān would have been mocked for it: for he used to compose satirical verses against such poets as Ḍirār and Ibn al-Ziba'rā, and they would engage in polemics and reply to him; yet no one ever berated him for cowardice or branded him a coward. This indicates the weakness of Ibn Isḥāq's tradition. If the tradition is true, perhaps he was sick that day with an illness that prevented him from being present at the fighting."

115. See note 85, above.

leave you exposed to this man in your land, and you will have no strength to deal with him if he is left to deal with you alone. So do not fight on the side of the men [of Quraysh and Ghaṭafān], until you take from them hostages from their nobles, to be in your hands as surety for you that they will fight Muḥammad with you until you have fought it out with him." They said, "You have given good counsel and advice."

Nu'aym then set out and came to Quraysh. He said to Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb and the men of Quraysh who were with him: "People of Quraysh, you know my affection for you and how I have separated from Muḥammad. Word has come to me of something that I consider it my duty to pass on to you as a matter of sincere advice, but keep to yourselves what I say." "We will," they said. "Then know," he said, "that the Jews have regretted what they did regarding relations between them and Muḥammad. They have sent to him, saying: 'We regret what we have done. Will you be satisfied with us if we take nobles from the tribes of Quraysh and Ghaṭafān and give them to you, so that you can behead them? Then we will be on your side against any of them that remain.' He has sent them word saying yes. So if the Jews send to you asking for hostages from your men, do not give them a single one of your men."

[1482] Then Nu'aym set out and came to Ghaṭafān. He said: "People of Ghaṭafān, you are my stock and my kin, the dearest of people to me. I think you have no doubts about me." "Truly spoken," they said. He said, "Keep to yourselves what I say." "We will," they said. Then he spoke to them as he had spoken to Quraysh, warning them as he had warned Quraysh.

Thus, on a Sabbath eve in the month of Shawwāl of the year 5, by the favor of God toward His Messenger, Abū Sufyān and the chiefs of Ghaṭafān sent to the Banū Qurayẓah 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl with a group of men from Quraysh and Ghaṭafān. They said to the Banū Qurayẓah: "We are not in a place where one can stay. Our camels and horses have perished. Come out to do battle tomorrow morning, so that we can fight it out with Muḥammad and finish matters between us and him." The Banū Qurayẓah sent back word to Quraysh, saying: "Today is the Sabbath, a day on which we do no labor. One of us violated it once, and you know what befell him.[116] Moreover, we will not fight on your side until you give us some of your men as hostages to be in our hands as surety to us until we fight it out with Muḥammad; for we fear that if the warfare tests your mettle and the fighting becomes difficult for you, you will hurry back to your lands, leaving us with the man in our land, and then we shall have no strength to deal with Muḥammad."

When the messengers brought back to them what the Banū Qurayẓah had said, Quraysh and Ghaṭafān said, "You know, by God, that what Nu'aym b. Mas'ūd told you is indeed true." So they sent to the Banū Qurayẓah, saying: "By God, we will not give you a single one of our men. If you want to fight, come out and fight." When the messengers reached them with this message, the Banū Qurayẓah said [to each other]: "What Nu'aym b. Mas'ūd told you is indeed true! The men [of Quraysh and Ghaṭafān] only want to fight. If they find an opportunity, they will take it; if not, they will [1483] hurry back to their lands and leave you exposed to this man in your lands." So they sent to Quraysh and Ghaṭafān, saying, "By God, we will not fight on your side until you give us hostages." Quraysh and Ghaṭafān refused. God caused them to abandon each other. Then God sent against them in the bitter cold winter nights a wind that began overturning their cooking pots and blowing away their tents. When word of their disagreement and how God had disrupted their unity reached the Messenger of God, he called Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān and sent him to them by night to see what the enemy was doing.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Ziyād[117]—Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Quraẓī, who said: A young man of al-Kūfah[118] asked Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān, "Abū 116. See note 127, below.

117. Yazīd b. Ziyād [dates unknown; the name is also given as Yazīd b. Abī Ziyād, or Yazīd b. Ziyād b. Abī Ziyād] of Medina was a mawlā of 'Abdallāh b. 'Ayyāsh b. Abī Rabī'ah al-Makhzūmī. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 328.

118. The Muslim garrison city of al-Kūfah was founded ca. 17/638 in the caliphate of 'Umar on the Euphrates near the older city of al-Ḥīrah; see *EI*², s.v. This report portrays Ḥudhayfah as being asked many years later, after the conquest of Iraq and the settlement of al-Kūfah, by a young Kūfan (fatā implies a man who has recently reached military age) to recall the events of the battle.

'Abdallāh,[119] you saw the Messenger of God and accompanied him?" "Yes, nephew," he replied. The young man asked, "How did things go with you?" "By God we toiled!" said Ḥudhayfah. The young man said, "By God, had we lived in his time, we would not have left him to walk on the ground; we would have carried him on our necks." Ḥudhayfah said: "Nephew, by God, I can see us with the Messenger of God at the trench. He prayed part of the night, then turned to us and said, 'Who is a man who will go up and see for us how the enemy is doing?'—the Messenger of God stipulated for him that he should come back—'and God shall cause him to enter paradise.'[120] Not a man stood up. Again the Messenger of God prayed part of the night and turned to us and said the same words, but not one of us stood up. Again the Messenger of God prayed part of the night and turned to us and said, 'Who is a man who will go up and see for us how the enemy is doing and then come back?'—the Messenger of God stipulated [1484] that he should return—'and I will ask God that he may be my companion in paradise.' But none of the men stood up, so intense were the fear, the hunger, and the cold. When no one stood up, the Messenger of God called me. I had no choice but to stand up when he called me. He said, 'Ḥudhayfah, go and enter among the enemy, and see what they are doing; make no disturbance, and come back to us.'

"So I went and entered among the enemy. The wind and God's hosts[121] were taking their toll on them, allowing not a cooking pot, fire, or tent of theirs to stay put. Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb stood up and said, 'People of Quraysh, let every man see who is sitting next to him.' So I took hold of the hand of the man who was beside me. I asked who he was, and he gave his name. Then Abū Sufyān said: 'People of Quraysh, by God you are not in a place where one can stay. Horses and camels have perished. The Banū Qurayẓah have

---

119. Abū 'Abdallāh is Ḥudhayfah's kunyah (nickname). Since the verbs in the question are in the second person plural, the young man must have meant something like, "Did you and the people of your generation see the Messenger of God?"

120. I.e., he would be assured of paradise even though he had not died a martyr's death.

121. God's hosts (junūd Allāh) apparently refers to angels (so according to al-Ṭabarī, Jāmi' al-bayān, XXII, 81). Cf. Qur'ān 33:9, "O you who believe! Remember God's favor to you when there came against you hosts, and We sent against them a great wind and hosts (junūdan) you could not see."

broken their promise to us. Words hateful to us have come to us from them, and you can see what we have suffered from this wind. By God, no pot of ours stays put, no fire of ours keeps burning, and no tent of ours holds together. So saddle up, for I am leaving!' Then he went over to his camel, which was hobbled, seated himself on it, and struck it. It jumped up with him, standing on three legs, for its hobble was untied only after it stood up. Had it not been for the injunction of the Messenger of God to me that I should not cause any disturbance until I came to him—and I wanted to—I would have killed him with an arrow."

Ḥudhayfah continued: "I went back to the Messenger of God. He was standing, praying in a woolen wrapper woven with a camel-saddle pattern that belonged to one of his wives. When he saw me, he sat me at his feet and threw the edge of the wrapper over me. Then he bowed down and prostrated himself, but I disturbed him. After he pronounced a greeting,[122] I told him the [1485] news. Ghaṭafān heard what Quraysh had done, and they hastened back to their lands."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, who said: The next morning, the Prophet of God left the trench and went back to Medina with the Muslims, and they laid down their weapons.

The Expedition against the Banū Qurayẓah[123]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī: At noontime Gabriel,[124] wearing a cloth-of-gold turban, came to the Messenger of God on a mule with a brocade-covered saddle. He said, "Have you laid down your arms, Messenger of God?" "Yes," he replied. Gabriel said: "The angels have not laid down their arms! I have just returned from pursuing the enemy. God commands you, Muḥammad, to march to the Banū Qurayẓah. I, too, will betake myself to the Banū Qurayẓah."[125]

---

122. I.e., either after he pronounced the salutation to the guardian angels with which Islamic prayers end or after he greeted Ḥudhayfah.

123. Parallels: IH, III, 233–54 (tr. Guillaume, 461–69); W, II, 496–531.

124. Gabriel (Jibrīl) was the angel who brought revelations to Muḥammad (cf. Qur'ān 2:97). See *EI*², s.v. Djabrāʾīl.

125. IH, III, 233, and W, II, 497, add "and will shake them."

The Messenger of God commanded a crier to announce to the people that whoever would heed and obey should not pray the afternoon prayer until they were in [the territory of] the Banū Qurayẓah. The Messenger of God sent 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib ahead with his banner to the Banū Qurayẓah, and the people hastened to it. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib marched and, having approached the fortresses, heard foul words from them about the Messenger of God. He went back and met the Messenger of God on the way and said, "Messenger of God, it would be better for you not to go near these most wicked men." "Why?" he asked, "I think you have heard them insult me." He said, "Yes, Messenger of God." He said,[126] "If they had seen me, they would not have said anything of the sort."

When the Messenger of God had approached their fortresses, he [1486] said: "You brothers of apes![127] Has God shamed you and sent down his retribution on you?" They said, "Abū al-Qāsim,[128] you have never been one to act impetuously."[129]

Before reaching the Banū Qurayẓah, the Messenger of God passed his companions at al-Ṣawrān.[130] "Has anyone passed you?" he asked. "Yes, Messenger of God," they replied. "Diḥyah b. Khalīfah al-Kalbī[131] passed us on a white mule with a brocade-covered saddle." The Messenger of God said, "That was Gabriel, sent to the Banū Qurayẓah to shake their fortresses and cast terror into their hearts."

When the Messenger of God came to the Banū Qurayẓah, he halted at one of their wells in a part of their territory called Bi'r

---

126. Ed. Cairo omits "He said," making the next sentence a continuation of 'Alī's words.

127. The Qur'ān contains references to how God punished a group of Jews who violated the Sabbath by changing them into apes; cf. Qur'ān 2:65, 5:60, and 7:166. See pp. 24, above, and 30, below, where the Jews themselves allude to the legend.

128. Abū al-Qāsim (father of al-Qāsim) was Muḥammad's kunyah (a familiar name usually derived from the name of the bearer's first male child).

129. Arabic: mā kunta jahūlan. On the meanings of the root j-h-l, which includes both the ideas of ignorance and of violent, blind, or impulsive action, see Goldziher, Muslim Studies, I, 201–8; and Blachère et al., Dictionnaire arabe-français-anglais, I, 1845–46.

130. According to al-Samhūdī, Khulāṣat al-wafā', 575–76, the place was located at the farther end of al-Baqī', alongside the road to the Banū Qurayẓah.

131. Diḥyah b. Khalīfah al-Kalbī was traditionally represented as a rich merchant of such beauty that the Angel Gabriel assumed his features. When he arrived in Medina, all the women were said to have come out to see him. See *EI*², s.v. Diḥya.

Annā,[132] and the men joined up with him. Some men came to him after the last evening prayer. They had not prayed the afternoon prayer because of what the Messenger of God had said—that no one should pray the afternoon prayer until in [the territory of] the Banū Qurayẓah because of the warfare against them that was incumbent on them. They refused to pray because the Prophet had said "until they reach the Banū Qurayẓah"; so they prayed the afternoon prayer there after the last evening prayer. God did not find fault with them in His Book, nor did the Messenger of God reprimand them for it. (This report is according to Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—his father [Isḥāq b. Yasār][133]—Ma'bad b. Ka'b b. Mālik al-Anṣārī.[134])

According to [Sufyān] b. Wakī'—Muḥammad b. Bishr—Muḥammad b. 'Amr—his father ['Amr b. 'Alqamah]—'Alqamah—'Ā'ishah, who said: The Messenger of God pitched a round tent over Sa'd in the mosque.[135] He laid down his arms—that is, when he had come back from [the Battle of] the Trench—and the Muslims, too, laid down their arms. Then Gabriel came to [1487] him and said: "Have you laid down your arms? By God, the angels have not yet laid down their arms! Go out to them, and fight them!" The Messenger of God called for his breastplate and put it on. Then he went out, and the Muslims went out too. When he passed by the Banū Ghanm,[136] he said, "Who passed by you?" They replied, "Diḥyah al-Kalbī passed by us." (His demeanor, beard, and face were likened to Gabriel's.) Then he encamped by [the Banū Qurayẓah]. (Sa'd was in his tent that the Messenger of God had pitched over him in the mosque.) He besieged them for a month or for twenty-five nights. When the siege became too severe for them, they were told to submit to the judgment of the Messenger of God. Abū Lubābah b. 'Abd al-Mundhir gave a sign that it would mean slaughter. So they said, "We will submit to the judgment of Sa'd b. Mu'ādh." The Messenger of God said, "Submit

132. Also vocalized Unā.

133. Isḥāq b. Yasār, the father of Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, was a mawlā of Qays b. Makhramah. He was considered a very reliable transmitter. His exact dates are not known. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 257.

134. The brother of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ka'b b. Mālik al-Anṣārī. See GAS, I, 276–77.

135. To shelter Sa'd b. Mu'ādh while he was recuperating from his wound.

136. A clan of the al-Aws; see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 154.

to his judgment." So they submitted. The Messenger of God sent to him a donkey with a saddle padded with palm fiber, and he was mounted on it.

According to 'Ā'ishah: His wound had healed, so that nothing of it was visible except what looked like a ring.

Resumption of the account of Ibn Isḥāq: The Messenger of God besieged them twenty-five nights, until the siege exhausted them and God cast terror into their hearts. Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab had entered among the Banū Qurayẓah in their fortress when Quraysh and Ghaṭafān had gone back leaving them; this he did in fulfillment of his compact with Ka'b b. Asad. When they became certain that the Messenger of God would not depart from them until he [1488] had fought it out with them, Ka'b b. Asad said to them: "People of the Jews, you see what has befallen you. I shall propose three alternatives to you. Take whichever one you will." "What are they?" they asked. He said: "That we follow[137] this man and believe him; for, by God, it has become clear to you that he is indeed a prophet sent [from God] and that it is he whom you used to find [mentioned] in your book. Then you will be secure in your lives, your property, your children, and your wives." They said, "We will never depart from the law of the Torah or exchange it for another." "Since you reject this proposal of mine," he said, "come let us kill our children and wives and go out to Muḥammad and his companions as men who brandish swords, leaving behind us no impediments to worry us, until God judges between us and Muḥammad. If we die, we shall die having left nothing behind us for which we fear; if we win victory, by my life we shall find women and children." They said: "Kill these poor ones? What would be the good of living after them?" He said: "Since you have rejected these proposals of mine, tonight is the night of the Sabbath. Perhaps Muḥammad and his companions feel themselves safe in it. Go down; perhaps we can take Muḥammad and his companions by surprise." They said, "Profane our Sabbath and do on it what none of our predecessors has ever done, except those you know about—and they were transformed in a way that you surely know?" He said, "No man among you has ever for a single night shown sound judgment since his mother bore him!"

137. Variant, "swear allegiance to."

Then they sent to the Messenger of God, saying, "Send us Abū Lubābah b. 'Abd al-Mundhir, one of the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf"[138]— they[139] were confederates of al-Aws—"so that we can ask his advice in this affair." The Messenger of God sent him to them. When they saw him, the men rose to meet him, and the women and children rushed to grab hold of him, weeping before him, so that he felt pity for them. They said to him, "Abū Lubābah, do you think we should submit to Muḥammad's judgment?" "Yes," he said, but he pointed with his hand to his throat, that it would be slaughter. {Abū Lubābah [later] said, "By God, as soon as my feet moved, I knew that I had betrayed God and His Messenger."} Abū Lubābah rushed away at a loss. Before coming to the Messenger of God, he tied himself to one of the pillars in the mosque, saying, "I will not leave this spot until God forgives me for what I have done." He promised God that he would never set foot on the territory of the Banū Qurayẓah. "Never," he said, "shall God see me in a land where I betrayed God and His Messenger." When news of him reached the Messenger of God—Abū Lubābah was slow in coming to him, and the Messenger of God deemed him late—he said, "Had he come to me, I would have sought forgiveness for him; but, since he has done what he did, I cannot release him from his place, until God forgives him." [1489]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. 'Abdallāh b. Qusayṭ:[140] The forgiving of Abū Lubābah was revealed to the Messenger of God while he was in the apartment of Umm Salamah.[141] Umm Salamah said, "I heard the Messenger of God laughing at daybreak; so I said, 'Why are you laughing, Messenger of God?—may God make you laugh heart-

138. 'Amr b. 'Awf was a clan of al-Aws.

139. I.e., the Banū Qurayẓah; on the alliance between the Banū Qurayẓah and al-Aws, see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 214.

140. Yazīd b. 'Abdallāh b. Qusayṭ died in 122/740 at the age of ninety. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 342–43.

141. Muḥammad married Umm Salamah Hind bt. al-Mughīrah, whose husband, Abū Salamah, had died of wounds after the Battle of Uḥud, in 4/626; see Poonawala, Last Years, 132, [I, 1771]. Muḥammad's wives lived in separate apartments of his residence, which was adjacent to the mosque in Medina. He is said to have spent a night with each of them in turn; cf. Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 284, 396.

ily!'[142] He replied, 'Abū Lubābah has been forgiven.' I said, 'Shall I not announce the good news to him?' 'Yes,' he said, 'if you will.'" So Umm Salamah stood at the door of her chamber (it was before [1490] the curtain was imposed on them) and said: "Abū Lubābah, rejoice! God has forgiven you." The people swarmed toward him to release him, but he said: "No, by God! Not until the Messenger of God is the one who releases me with his own hand!" And so, when he went out for the morning prayer, he released him.

According to Ibn Isḥāq: Tha'labah b. Sa'yah,[143] Usayd[144] b. Sa'yah, and Asad b. 'Ubayd—a group of men from the Banū Hadl,[145] not from the Banū Qurayẓah or al-Naḍīr (their genealogy was superior to that), but cousins of the men in question—became Muslims the night that Qurayẓah submitted to the judgment of the Messenger of God. During that night, 'Amr b. Su'dā al-Qurazī went out and passed by the guards of the Messenger of God—Muḥammad b. Maslamah al-Anṣārī was in charge of them that night. When the latter saw 'Amr, he said, "Who is it?" "'Amr b. Su'dā," he replied. 'Amr had refused to go along with the Banū Qurayẓah in their treachery toward the Messenger of God. "Never," he had said, "will I act treacherously toward Muḥammad." Having recognized him, Muḥammad b. Maslamah said, "O God, do not deprive me of [forgiveness for][146] the lapses of the noble"—and he let him pass. 'Amr went his way and spent that night in the mosque of the Messenger of God in Medina. Then he went away, and no one knows to this day into which of God's lands he went. His story was mentioned to the Messenger of God, [1491] who said, "He was a man whom God rescued for his loyalty."

---

142. Aḍḥaka Allāhu sinnaka—literally, "may God make your tooth laugh"; i.e., may He make you laugh or smile heartily, so that you reveal your side teeth. The teeth immediately behind the four eyeteeth were called ḍawāḥik ("laughers") because they became visible in laughter or smiling; see Lisan, IV, 2558.

143. So vocalized by ed. Leiden; perhaps to be vocalized "Sa'iyyah," as by the editor of W, II, 503.

144. So vocalized by IH and ed. Cairo. Ed. Leiden prefers the vocalization "Asīd" on the basis of al-Dhahabī, Mushtabih, 299.

145. On the clan of Hadl, which had become closely connected to the Banū Qurayẓah, see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 193–94.

146. Understanding iqālah, as in W, 504; IH, III, 238; cf. ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CCCL.

According to Ibn Isḥāq: Some men allege that he was bound with an old frayed rope along with the Banū Qurayẓah who were bound when they submitted to the judgment of the Messenger of God. In the morning his rope was cast aside, and no one knew where he had gone. Then the Messenger of God said this saying about him. But God knows best [what really happened].

According to Ibn Isḥāq: In the morning, they submitted to the judgment of the Messenger of God. The al-Aws jumped up and said: "Messenger of God, they are our clients (mawālī), not clients of al-Khazraj. You know what you did the other day with the clients of al-Khazraj!" [Before besieging the Banū Qurayẓah, the Messenger of God had besieged the Banū Qaynuqā', who were confederates of al-Khazraj.[147] They had submitted to his judgment. 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl[148] had asked him for them, and he had given them to him.] Therefore, when the al-Aws spoke to him, the Messenger of God said, "People of al-Aws, will you not be satisfied if one of your own men passes judgment on them?" "Yes," they said. So he said, "It shall be entrusted to Sa'd b. Mu'ādh." The Messenger of God had placed Sa'd b. Mu'ādh in the tent of a Muslim[149] woman named Rufaydah in his mosque. She used to nurse the wounded and earn merit for herself by serving Muslims who were impoverished. When Sa'd was struck by the arrow in the ditch, the Messenger of God said to his tribesmen, "Put him in Rufaydah's tent, so that I can visit him from nearby."[150] When the Messenger of God appointed him judge over the Banū Qurayẓah, his tribesmen came to him and lifted him onto a donkey on which they had put a leather cushion, for he was a stout man. They brought him to the Messenger of God, saying, [1492] "Abū 'Amr,[151] treat your clients well; for the Messenger of God has put you in charge of the matter only that you may treat them well." After they had plied him with many such requests, he said, 147. For the campaign in 2/624 against the Jewish tribe of Banū Qaynuqā' and their expulsion, see Watt and McDonald, Foundation, 85–87 [I, 1359–62].

148. 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy, a leader of al-Khazraj and one of the leading men of Medina, had become a Muslim but was usually deemed to be a "hypocrite" (munāfiq) because of his opposition to some of Muḥammad's decisions; see *EI*², s.v. 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy.

149. IH and ed. Cairo: "a woman of Aslam."

150. Muḥammad's house adjoined the mosque.

151. Addressing Sa'd by his kunyah.

"The time has come for Sa'd for the sake of God not to be influenced by anyone's reproach." Then one of his tribesmen who was with him went back to the dwelling place of the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal and announced to them the death of the men of the Banū Qurayẓah before Sa'd b. Mu'ādh reached them because of the words he had heard from him.

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: When Sa'd reached the Messenger of God and the Muslims, the Messenger of God said (according to Ibn Wakī'—Muḥammad b. Bishr—Muḥammad b. 'Amr—his father—'Alqamah, in a report that he attributed to Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī,[152] who said: When he—that is, Sa'd—came into sight, the Messenger of God said), "Arise and go to your master (sayyid)" (or he said "to the best of you"), "and help him dismount." The Messenger of God said [to Sa'd], "Pass judgment on them." He replied, "I pass judgment on them that their fighters shall be killed and their children made captives and that their property shall be divided." The Messenger of God said, "You have passed judgment on them with the judgment of God and the judgment of His Messenger."

Resumption of the account of Ibn Isḥāq: As for Ibn Isḥāq, he said in his report: When Sa'd reached the Messenger of God and the Muslims, the Messenger of God said, "Arise and go to your master." So they arose and went to him and said, "Abū 'Amr, the Messenger of God has entrusted you with your clients (mawālī), so that you may pass judgment on them." Sa'd said, "God's oath and covenant be upon you in this matter, that the judgment on them shall be what I judge!" "Yes," they replied. He said, "And [1493] upon the one who is here"—[this he said] in the direction of the Messenger of God, while turning away from the Messenger of God out of respect for him. The Messenger of God said, "Yes." Sa'd said, "I pass judgment on them that the men shall be killed, the property divided, and the children and women made captives."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Amr b. Sa'd b.

152. Abū Sa'īd Sa'd b. Mālik b. Sinān al-Khudrī al-Anṣārī (the Banū Khudrah were a small group in the Banū al-Ḥārith clan of al-Khazraj; cf. Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 167), a companion of the Prophet, used to give legal opinions in Medina. He died ca. 63/682–83. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 124, 127; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 78–80.

Mu'ādh—'Alqamah b. Waqqāṣ al-Laythī,[153] who said: The Messenger of God said to Sa'd, "You have passed judgment on them with the judgment of God from above seven heavens."[154]

According to Ibn Isḥāq: Then they were made to come down, and the Messenger of God imprisoned them in the dwelling of al-Ḥārith's daughter, a woman of the Banū al-Najjār.[155] The Messenger of God went out into the marketplace of Medina (it is still its marketplace today) and had trenches dug in it; then he sent for them and had them beheaded in those trenches. They were brought out to him in groups. Among them were the enemy of God, Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab, and Ka'b b. Asad. the head of the tribe. They numbered 600 or 700—the largest estimate says they were between 800 and 900. As they were being taken in groups to the Messenger of God, they said to Ka'b b. Asad, "Ka'b, what do you think will be done to us?" Ka'b said: "On each occasion you do not understand. Do you not see that the summoner does not discharge [anyone] and that those of you who are taken away do not come [1494] back? By God, it is death!" The affair continued until the Messenger of God had finished with them.

Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab, the enemy of God, was brought. He was wearing a rose-colored[156] suit of clothes that he had torn all over with fingertip-sized holes so that it would not be taken as booty from him, and his hands were bound to his neck with a rope. When he looked at the Messenger of God, he said, "By God, I do not blame myself for being hostile to you, but whomever God forsakes is forsaken."[157] Then he turned to the people and said:

---

153. 'Alqamah b. Waqqāṣ al-Laythī was born during the lifetime of the Prophet. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 280–81.

154. The phrase, which uses the Hebrew loanword raqī' for "heaven," is usually taken to mean, "You have judged with the judgment of God [written on the preserved tablet] above the seven heavens"; cf. Lane, Lexicon, III, 1137.

155. The Banū al-Najjār were the most numerous clan or clan group among al-Khazraj; see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 165–66.

156. Arabic fuqqāḥiyyah refers either to the color of the garments (that of the desert flower called fuqqāḥ; Lane, Lexicon, VI, 2424), or to a kind of embroidery (IH, III, 241).

157. Here and in the verses that follow I read man yakhdhuli llāhu, rather than man yakhdhuli llāha, the voweling of edd. Leiden and Cairo, which would mean "whoever forsakes God." Ḥuyayy, who remained a Jew to the end, certainly would not have considered hostility to Muḥammad to be a forsaking of God. Furthermore, khadhala (fail to aid, forsake) and its opposite naṣara (aid) are normally "People, there is no injury in God's command. It is the book of God, His decree, and a battlefield of great slaughter ordained against the Children of Israel." Then he sat down and was beheaded. Jabal b. Jawwāl al-Tha'labī said:

By your life, Ibn Akhṭab did not censure himself [for his action], but whomever God forsakes is forsaken.
He fought until he made his soul attain its vindication, and he strove to the utmost seeking glory.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr[158]—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—'Ā'ishah, who said: Only one of their women was killed. By God, she was by me, talking with me and laughing unrestrainedly while the Messenger of God was killing their men in the marketplace, when suddenly a mysterious voice[159] called out her name, saying, "Where is so and so?" She said, "Here I am, by God." I asked, "Alas, what is wrong?" She said, "I shall be killed." "Why?" I [1495] asked. She said, "A misdeed[160] that I committed." She was taken away and beheaded. ('Ā'ishah used to say: I shall never forget my wonder at her cheerfulness and much laughter, even when she knew that she would be killed.)

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī: Thābit b. Qays b. Shammās came to al-Zabīr b. Bāṭā al-Quraẓī, whose familiar name was Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān. Al-Zabīr had done Thābit b. Qays b. Shammās a favor in the Time of Ignorance [before Islam]. (According to Muḥammad [b. Isḥāq]: One of al-Zabīr's descendants told me that he had done him this favor at the battle of Bu'āth.[161] He had captured him but had cut off his forelock and released him.) Thābit came to al-Zabīr, now an predicated of God. Cf. Qur'ān 3:154: "If God helps you, none can overcome you; but if He forsakes you, who then can help you after Him?"

---

158. Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr died between 110/728–29 and 120/738. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 93.

159. Arabic hātif, a voice from an unseen source, often with supernatural overtones.

160. Arabic ḥadathun aḥdathtuhū (literally, "a happening or a novelty that I caused to happen") usually has a negative sense; see Lane, Lexicon, II, 528.

161. The battle of Bu'āth, the climax of the war of Ḥāṭib between Medina's two Arab tribes, al-Aws and al-Khazraj, took place ca. A.D. 617, shortly before the Hijrah and was fought in the territory of the Banū Qurayẓah. See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 155–58; *EI*², s.v. Bu'āth.

old man, and said, "Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, do you recognize me?" Al-Zabīr replied, "Can someone like me fail to recognize someone like you?" Thābit said, "I want to repay you for your favor to me." Al-Zabīr said, "Truly the noble man repays the noble!" Thābit then went to the Messenger of God and said: "Messenger of God, al-Zabīr did me a favor and I owe him a debt of gratitude. I wish to repay him for it. Grant me his life." The Messenger of God said, "It is yours." So Thābit went to him and said: "The Messenger of God has granted me your life. It is yours." He replied, "An old man with no family and no children—what will he do with life?" So Thābit went to the Messenger of God and said, "Messenger of God, his family and children?" "They are yours," he said. So Thābit went to him and said: "The Messenger of God has given me your wife and your children. They are yours." He replied, "A household in the Ḥijāz with no wealth—how can they survive?" So Thābit went to the Messenger of God and said, "His wealth?" "It is yours," he said. So Thābit went to him and said: "The Messenger of God has given me your wealth. It is yours." He replied, "O Thābit, how fares it with the one whose face was like a Chinese mirror in which the virgins of the tribe viewed themselves—Ka'b b. Asad?" Thābit said, "He has been killed." "And how fares it," he said, "with the chief of the settled folk and the nomads, Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab?" Thābit said, "He has been killed." "And how fares it," he said, "with our vanguard when we attacked and our defense when we wheeled round,[162] 'Azzāl b. Shamwīl?" Thābit said, "He has been killed." "And how fares it," he said, "with the two assemblies?" [He meant the Banū Ka'b b. Qurayẓah and the Banū 'Amr b. Qurayẓah.] Thābit said, "They have gone to their death." He said: "Then I ask you for the sake of the favor I once did for you to join me to my kinsmen, for by God there is no good in living after them. I will not wait patiently for God, not even [the time needed] to take the bucket of a watering trough, until I meet my dear ones." So Thābit brought him forward, and he was beheaded. When what he said—"until I meet my dear ones"—was reported to Abū Bakr, he said, "He will meet them, by God, in the fire of Gehenna, there to dwell forever and [1496] forever." Concerning this, Thābit b. Qays b. al-Shammās said, mentioning al-Zabīr b. Bāṭā:

162. Arabic kararnā; IH, III, 243, reads fararnā, "we fled"; W, II, 519, reads wallaw "they turned back." Al-Wāqidī gives the name as Ghazzāl b. Samaw'al.

My obligation has been acquitted: I was generous and was patient, when the folk turned away from patience.
Zabīr of all men had the greatest claim to gratitude on me; therefore, when his wrists were tied with a thong,
I came to the Messenger of God, that I might untie him;
and the Messenger of God to us was a flowing sea.[163]

The Messenger of God had commanded that all of them who had reached puberty should be killed.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—
[1497] Ayyūb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ṣa'ṣa'ah[164] (a member of the Banū 'Adī b. al-Najjār): Salmā bt. Qays, the mother of al-Mundhir and sister of Salīṭ b. Qays, was one of the maternal aunts of the Messenger of God. She had prayed with him facing both of the qiblahs[165] and had sworn allegiance to him after the manner of women.[166] She asked him for [the life of] Rifā'ah b. Shamwīl al-Quraẓī, who had come of age. He had taken refuge with her and had previously been one of their acquaintances. She said: "Prophet of God, you are as dear to me as my father and mother! Give me Rifā'ah b. Shamwīl, for he has said that he will pray and eat camel meat.[167] He gave him to her, and thus she saved his life.

According to Ibn Isḥāq: Then the Messenger of God divided the wealth, wives, and children of the Banū Qurayẓah among the Muslims. On that day he made known the shares of horsemen and shares of foot soldiers, and he deducted from these shares the fifth 163. I.e., granted the request. The sea is a metaphor for generosity.

164. His name is also given as Ayyūb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah. His exact dates are not known. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 408.

165. The qiblah is the direction that Muslims face in prayer. Originally Muḥammad followed the practice of the Jews in facing Jerusalem, but changed the qiblah to the direction of the Ka'bah in Mecca during A.H. 2 (see Watt and McDonald, Foundation, 24–25 [I, 1279–81]; the change is alluded to in Qur'ān 2:136 ff.). In other words, Salmā's conversion to Islam took place before the change in the qiblah. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳibla.

166. Arabic: bāya'athu bay'ata al-nisā'i—this was the term for a pledge of allegiance in which no obligation to fight was involved.

167. Camel meat is permitted under Islamic dietary regulations but prohibited under Jewish regulations.

(khums).[168] A horseman received three shares: two shares for the horse and one share for its rider. A foot soldier who had no horse received one share. The cavalry at the battle with the Banū Qurayẓah numbered thirty-six horses. It was the first booty (fay')[169] in which shares were allotted and from which the khums was deducted; and according to its precedent (sunnah) and the procedure of the Messenger of God in it divisions of booty took place and precedent was followed in [succeeding] expeditions. However, if a man had horses with him, he appointed shares only for two horses.

Then the Messenger of God sent Sa'd b. Zayd al-Anṣārī [a member of the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal] with some of the captives from the Banū Qurayẓah to Najd, and in exchange for them he purchased horses and arms. The Messenger of God selected for himself from their women Rayḥānah bt. 'Amr b. Khunāfah, a woman from the [1498]
Banū 'Amr b. Qurayẓah, and she remained his concubine; when he predeceased her, she was still in his possession.[170] The Messenger of God offered to marry her and impose the curtain (ḥijāb) on her, but she said, "Messenger of God, rather leave me in your possession [as a concubine], for it is easier for me and for you." So he did so. When the Messenger of God took her captive, she showed herself averse to Islam and insisted on Judaism. So the Messenger of God put her aside, and he was grieved because of her. Then, while he was with his companions, he heard the sound of shoes behind him and said, "This must be Tha'labah b. Sa'yah coming to bring me tidings of Rayḥānah's acceptance of Islam." He came to him and said, "Messenger of God, Rayḥānah has become a Muslim"—and it gave the Messenger of God joy.

After the affair of the Banū Qurayẓah had ended, the wound of Sa'd b. Mu'ādh broke open. The account of this is as follows, according to Ibn Wakī'—Ibn Bishr—Muḥammad b. 'Amr—his father—'Alqamah [in a report that he attributed to 'Ā'ishah]: After Sa'd b. Mu'ādh had passed judgment as he did on the Banū Qurayẓah, he prayed, saying: "O God, Thou knowest that there are no men against whom I would rather fight and strive than men who called Thy Messenger a liar. O God, if Thou hast saved any portion of warfare with Quraysh for Thy Messenger, save me for it; but if Thou hast cut off the warfare between him and them, take me to Thee." So his wound broke open. The Messenger of [1499] God returned him to the tent he had pitched over him in the mosque.

168. The khums was the one-fifth of booty reserved to Muḥammad under Qur'ān 8:14 [said to have been revealed after the battle of Badr] to be used for communal purposes; see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 232, 255.

169. On the development of the term fay' ("chattels taken as booty") see *EI*², s.v.

170. I.e, she never became a full wife. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 92–94.

'Ā'ishah said: The Messenger of God, Abū Bakr, and 'Umar came to him. By the One holds the soul of Muḥammad in His hand, I could tell Abū Bakr's weeping from 'Umar's even while I was in my chamber. They were, as God has said, "merciful among themselves."[171]

'Alqamah asked ['Ā'ishah], "Mother [of the Faithful],[172] how did the Messenger of God behave?" She replied: "His eye did not weep for anyone. When his grief for someone became intense or when he was upset, he would only take hold of his beard."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: At the Battle of the Trench only six Muslims and three polytheists were killed. At the battle with the Banū Qurayẓah, Khallād b. Suwayd b. Tha'labah b. 'Amr b. Balḥārith b. al-Khazraj was killed: a millstone was thrown onto him and badly crushed him. Abū Sinān b. Miḥṣan b. Ḥurthān, a member of the Banū Asad b. Khuzaymah, died while the Messenger of God was besieging the Banū Qurayẓah and was buried in the cemetery of the Banū Qurayẓah. After the Messenger of God returned from the trench, he said, "Now we shall attack them"—meaning Quraysh—"and they will not attack us"—and thus it was, until God granted His Messenger the conquest of Mecca.

According to Ibn Isḥāq, the conquest of the Banū Qurayẓah took place in the month of Dhū al-Qa'dah or in the beginning of Dhū al-Ḥijjah.[173] Al-Wāqidī, however, has said that the Messenger of God attacked them a few days before the end of Dhū al-Qa'dah. He asserted that the Messenger of God commanded that furrows should be dug in the ground for the Banū Qurayẓah. Then he sat down, and 'Alī and al-Zubayr began cutting off their heads in his presence. He asserts that the woman whom the Prophet killed that day was named Bunānah, the wife of al-Ḥakam al-Quraẓī—it was she who had killed Khallād b. Suwayd by throwing a millstone on him. The Messenger of God called for her[174] and beheaded her in retaliation for Khallād b. Suwayd. [1500]

171. Qur'ān 48:29.
172. See note 95, above.
173. Dhū al-Qa'dah of A.H. 5 began on 24 March 627; Dhū al-Ḥijjah began on 23 April.

There is disagreement over the date of the Prophet's expedition against the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq. This was the expedition called the expedition of al-Muraysī'—al-Muraysī' being the name of a watering place belonging to [the tribe of] Khuzā'ah, near Qudayd toward the coast.[175] According to Ibn Isḥāq (as transmitted to us by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq), the Messenger of God attacked the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq [clan] of Khuzā'ah in Sha'bān of the year 6 of the Hijrah.[176] Al-Wāqidī has said that the Messenger of God attacked al-Muraysī' in Sha'bān of the year 5 of the Hijrah.[177] He asserted that the Battle of the Trench and the battle with the Banū Qurayẓah took place after al-Muraysī'—referring to the warfare with the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq of Khuzā'ah. Ibn Isḥāq (as transmitted to us by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq) asserted that the Messenger of God returned after concluding the affair of the Banū Qurayẓah at the end of Dhū al-Qa'dah or at the beginning of Dhū al-Ḥijjah. He remained in Medina during Dhū al-Ḥijjah, Muḥarram, Ṣafar, and the two months of Rabī'.[178] During the year 5, the polytheists were in charge of the pilgrimage.

---

174. For ed. Leiden's da'ā bihā ("called for her"), ed. Cairo reads da'ā lahū ("prayed for him"—i.e., for Khallād).

175. The place, about 15 kilometers from Medina, was the site of the shrine to Manāt at al-Mushallal. See the article by T. Fahd in *EI*², s.v. Manāt.

176. Sha'bān of A.H. 6 began on 16 December 627.

177. Sha'bān of A.H. 5 began on 26 December 626. For al-Wāqidī's account, see W, I, 404 ff. Cf. al-Ṭabarī's account p. 51, below. Cf. also Hamidullah, Battlefields, 29–30, who argues for the earlier dating.

178. Roughly from 23 April 627 (the beginning of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 5) to 17 September 627 (the end of Rabī' II, 6).

The Events of the Year 6

(May 23, 627–May 10, 628)

The Expedition against the Banū Liḥyān[179]

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: The Messenger of God set out [1501] during Jumādā I[180] at the end of six months from the conquest of the Banū Qurayẓah to the Banū Liḥyān, seeking [vengeance] for the men [who were betrayed] at al-Rajī', Khubayb b. 'Adī and his companions.[181] To take the enemy by surprise, he pretended to be setting out for the north.[182] He left Medina and traveled by Ghurāb, a mountain near Medina, on his way north, then by Makhīḍ[183] and al-Batrā'.[184] Then he veered to the left and, having passed Yayn and Ṣukhayrāt al-Yamām,[185] his route led him directly by the main road to Mecca. He traveled quickly and halted at Ghurān, where there were settlements of the Banū

179. Parallels: W, II, 535–37; IH, III, 279–81 [tr. Guillaume, 484–86].

180. Jumādā I of A.H. 6 began on 18 September 627.

181. See note 84, above.

182. Arabic al-sha'm means both "north" and "Syria."

183. IH, III, 279: al-Maḥīṣ; but Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VII, 411, records Makhīḍ with reference to this passage and gives Maḥīṣ as a place within Medina [VII, 401].

184. Al-Batrā' is a mountain about 150 miles northwest of Medina, about midway between Medina and Tabūk; it is not to be confused with the ancient Nabatean city of Petra, which has the same name in Arabic.

185. In W, II, 536, the names are given as Bīn and Ṣukhayrāt al-Thumām, respectively.

Liḥyān. (Ghurān is a valley between Amaj and 'Usfān[186] extending toward a village called Sāyah.) He found that they were on the alert and had taken secure positions on the mountain tops. After the Messenger of God had halted there and failed to take them by surprise as he intended, he said, "If we went down to 'Usfān, the Meccans would think that we had come for Mecca." So he set out with two hundred riders of his companions and halted at 'Usfān. He sent out two horsemen of his companions. They reached Kurā' al-Ghamīm[187] and then returned, and he turned back.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq (who transmitted the report about the expedition against the Banū Liḥyān from 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah and 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr, who transmitted it from 'Ubaydallāh b. Ka'b): Then the Messenger of God returned to Medina. He had stayed only a few nights before 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn b. Ḥudhayfah b. Badr al-Fazārī with horsemen of [1502] Ghaṭafān raided the milch camels of the Messenger of God at al-Ghābah.[188] Tending them were a man of the Banū Ghifār[189] and his wife. They killed the man and carried off the woman with the camels.

The Expedition to Dhū Qarad

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah, 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr, and someone whom I do not doubt—'Ubaydallāh b. Ka'b b. Mālik (each of whom transmitted part of the report about the expedition to Dhū Qarad): The first person to know about them[190] was Salamah b.

186. Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VI, 173–74, locates 'Usfān at two stages or 33 Arab miles from Mecca on the road to Medina. The name is preserved by a modern town about 50 miles northwest of Mecca.

187. Kurā' al-Ghamīm was a mountain on the edge of a lava field eight miles from 'Usfān; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VII, 226.

188. For al-Ghābah, see note 73, above. Parallels: W, II, 537–49; IH, III, 281–89 (tr. Guillaume, 486–90).

189. The Banū Ghifār, a subdivision of the Banū Ḍamrah b. Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah, lived in the Ḥijāz between Mecca and Medina. They became allies of the Muslims and eventually embraced Islam. Some of them must have settled within Medina. Cf. p. 5, above, where Muḥammad is said to have left Sibā' b. 'Urfuṭah al-Ghifārī in charge of Medina during his absence. See *EI*², s.v. Ghifār.

190. I.e., the raiding party from Ghaṭafān mentioned in the previous paragraph.

'Amr b. al-Akwa' al-Aslamī.[191] He set out for al-Ghābah early in the morning, with his bow and arrows suspended from his shoulder, accompanied by a slave of Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh.[192]

However, the account of this expedition of the Messenger of God from Salamah b. al-Akwa' [himself dates it] after his return to Medina from Mecca in the Year of al-Ḥudaybiyah.[193] If that is correct, the events narrated on the authority of Salamah b. al-Akwa' must have taken place either in Dhū al-Ḥijjah of A.H. 6 or in the beginning of A.H. 7, because the return of the Messenger of God from Mecca to Medina in the Year of al-Ḥudaybiyah took place in Dhū al-Ḥijjah of A.H. 6. Thus, nearly six months separate the date given by Ibn Isḥāq for the expedition to Dhū al-Qarad and the date transmitted from Salamah b. al-Akwa'.

The account of Salamah b. al-Akwa' [is as follows]. According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā[194]—Abū 'Āmir al-'Aqadī[195]—'Ikrimah b. 'Ammār al-Yamāmī[196]—Iyās b. Salamah[197]—his father [Salamah b. al-Akwa'], who said: We returned to Medina with the Messenger of God—that is, after the peace of al-Ḥudaybiyah. The Mes-[1503] senger of God sent out his camels with Rabāḥ, the slave of the Messenger of God, and I went out with him with a horse belonging to Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh. When we woke up in the morning, we saw that 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Uyaynah had raided the camels of the Messenger of God, driving off all of them and killing their herdsman. I said: "Rabāḥ, take this horse and get to Ṭalḥah. Tell the

191. Salamah is more frequently called "Ibn al-Akwa'," after his grandfather's nickname ["having a prominent or deformed wrist"]. Known for his bravery, Salamah died in 74/693–94 when he was about eighty. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 150–52.

192. The reading of ed. Cairo, "Ṭalḥah b. 'Abdallāh," is probably a misprint. At I, 1507, ed. Cairo agrees with ed. Leiden in reading "Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh."

193. In accordance with the custom of naming years after their most important event, A.H. 6 came to be known as the Year of al-Ḥudaybiyah, after the episode narrated at pp. 67 ff., below.

194. Al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā al-Jurjānī died in 263/876 in his eighties. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 324–25.

195. Abū 'Āmir 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Amr al-'Aqadī died in 204 or 205/819–21. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 409–10.

196. 'Ikrimah b. 'Ammār al-'Ijlī Abū 'Ammār al-Yamāmī was born in al-Baṣrah and died in 159/775–76. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 261–63.

197. Iyās b. Salamah b. al-Akwa' al-Aslamī Abū Salamah was born in Medina and died there in 119/737 at the age of seventy-seven. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 388–89.

Messenger of God that the polytheists have raided his camels." Standing on a hill, I faced Medina and shouted, "A raid!"[198] three times. Then I set out after the enemy, shooting arrows at them and saying these rajaz verses:

I am Ibn al-Akwa'!
Today is the day for the mean [to receive destruction].[199]

By God, I kept shooting at them and hitting their riding animals. Whenever one of their horsemen came back toward me, I would go to a tree, sit beneath it, and shoot at him and hit his mount. Whenever the mountain [track] narrowed and they went into a narrow place, I would climb the mountain and pelt them with stones. I kept doing this, by God, until I had set behind me every one of the Messenger of God's camels that God had created and they had left me free to do as I pleased with them. They had cast off more than thirty spears and thirty cloaks to lighten themselves, and I placed stones to mark everything they cast off so that the Messenger of God and his companions would notice it. Finally they came to a narrow place on a pass, and 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn b. [1504]
Badr came to them bringing help. They sat down for a midmorning meal, and I sat down on a ridge above them. 'Uyaynah looked and said, "What is it I see?" They said: "This fellow has given us trouble. By God, he never left us since dawn, shooting at us until he rescued everything that was in our hands." 'Uyaynah said, "Four of you get up and attack him." Four of them made for me. When they came within speaking range, I said, "Do you recognize me?" "Who are you?" they asked. I said: "Salamah b. al-Akwa'! By Him who has honored Muḥammad, I will overtake every one of you that I pursue, but none shall pursue me and overtake me." One of them said, "I don't think so!"

They went back, and I did not leave my place until I saw the horsemen of the Messenger of God coming through the trees. The first of them was al-Akhram al-Asadī; following him came Abū Qatādah al-Anṣārī, and after him was al-Miqdād b. al-Aswad al-Kindī.[200] I took hold of the rein of al-Akhram's horse and said: "Akhram, the men are few. Be on guard against them; don't let them cut you off before the Messenger of God reaches us with his companions." Al-Akhram said, "Salamah, if you believe in God and the Last Day and know that Paradise is real and that the Fire is real, do not stand between me and martyrdom!"

198. Arabic: yā ṣabāḥāh, literally, "O my morning!" or "O what a morning!" See Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1642, for the idiom.

199. Arabic: al-yawmu yawmu l-ruḍḍa'i, literally, "today is the day of the ones who suck." In pre-Islamic Arab folklore one sign of stinginess (one of the lowest of vices in Bedouin society) was for a man to suck the teats of his milch camel rather than milk it, so that the sound of milk streaming into the bucket would not attract guests. See Lane, Lexicon, III, 1098.

I let him go. He and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Uyaynah met. Al-Akhram hamstrung 'Abd al-Raḥmān's horse, but 'Abd al-Raḥmān [1505] thrust at him with a spear and killed him. 'Abd al-Raḥmān then shifted onto his horse. Abū Qatādah overtook 'Abd al-Raḥmān and thrust at him and killed him. 'Abd al-Raḥmān had hamstrung Abū Qatādah's horse, so Abū Qatādah shifted onto al-Akhram's horse. They left in flight.

According to Salamah: By Him who honored Muḥammad, I followed them, running on foot until I could not see any of Muḥammad's companions behind me, or even their dust. Before sunset they turned aside into a canyon called Dhū Qarad where there was water to drink, for they were thirsty. They saw me running after them, and I drove them away so that they tasted not a drop of it. Then they went up into the mountain trail of Dhū Athīr. One of them turned back to attack me, and I shot him with an arrow that landed in his shoulder blade. I said, "Take that!":[201]

I am Ibn al-Akwa'!
Today is the day for the mean [to receive destruction].

He said, "My al-Akwa' of early this morning?" "Yes," I said, "you enemy of your own soul!" Then I saw two horses on the trail, and I led them back toward the Messenger of God. My uncle 'Āmir met me after dark with a skin of watered milk and one of water. I made my ablutions, prayed, and drank; then I came to the Messenger of 200. He was also called al-Miqdād b. 'Amr; cf. IH, III, 282 (tr. Guillaume, 487). See *EI*², s.v. al-Miḳdād b. 'Amr.

201. We should follow ed. Cairo in reading the words "Take that!" as part of the verse, which would then form a complete hemistich of rajaz meter: khudhhā wa_na_bnu_l-'akwa'ī. However, on p. 48, below, the same verse is introduced with the words "Take that from me" (khudhhā minnī), which could not form part of the verse metrically.

God, who was at the watering place from which I had driven them at Dhū Qarad. Behold, the Messenger of God had taken the camels [1506] I had rescued from the enemy and each spear and cloak. Bilāl[202] had slaughtered a female camel from the ones I had rescued from the foe and was roasting some of its liver and hump for the Messenger of God. I said, "Messenger of God, let me choose a hundred men and follow the enemy, so that not one of them shall remain." The Messenger of God laughed until his back teeth became visible and could be clearly seen [in the light of the fire];[203] then he said, "Would you do it?" I said, "Yes, by Him who has honored you!" The next morning the Messenger of God said, "Now they are being received as guests in the country of Ghaṭafān."

A man then came from Ghaṭafān and said that so and so "slaughtered a camel for them. When they had stripped off its skin, they saw dust; so they said, 'The enemy is upon you,' and left fleeing."

The next morning the Messenger of God said, "Our best horseman today has been Abū Qatādah, and our best foot soldier has been Salamah b. al-Akwa'." The Messenger of God gave me the share of a horseman and the share of a footman. Then the Messenger of God mounted me behind him on al-'Aḍbā'.[204] While we were traveling, a footman of the Anṣār who was unbeatable at running began saying, "Is there no one who will race?" He said this several times. When I heard him, I said, "Do you not honor a generous man and fear a noble man?" He said, "No, unless he be the Messenger of God." So I said: "Messenger of God, you are as dear to me as my father and mother! Permit me to race the man." "If you wish," he said. So I leaped down and ran. I held back for one or two hills,[205] then I caught up with him and slapped him be-[1507] tween the shoulders. "I've beaten you, by God," I said. "I don't think so!" he said.[206] So I beat him back to Medina. We stayed there only three nights before setting out for Khaybar.[207]

202. Bilāl, an Ethiopian slave, tortured by his pagan master for accepting Islam, was rescued by Abū Bakr and became the first muezzin of the Muslim community. See EI[2], s.v. Bilāl b. Rabāḥ.

203. Arabic nawājidh could be used for the wisdom teeth, all the molars, or the teeth next to the eye teeth. The lexicographers were concerned about the possibility of Muḥammad's laughing immoderately. See the discussion in Lane, Lexicon, VIII, 2769. Instead of ed. Leiden's (badā aw bānat nawājidhuhū) "his back teeth became visible or could be clearly seen," I translate ed. Cairo (badā wa-qad bānat nawājidhuhā [fī ḍaw'i al-nār]). The bracketed words are from the parallel text in the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim (3:1433–41).

204. Al-'Aḍbā' ("slit-eared," or "short in the foreleg") was Muḥammad's she-camel; see Lane, Lexicon, V, 2071.

Resumption of the account of Ibn Isḥāq:[208] Salamah b. al-Akwa' was accompanied by a slave of Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, and with the slave was a horse of Ṭalḥah's that he was leading. When Salamah went up into al-Wadā' Pass,[209] he saw some of [the raiders'] horsemen; so he looked in the direction of Sal' and shouted, "A raid!" Then he set out at full speed after the enemy—he was like a beast of prey. Having overtaken them, he began to turn them away with arrows. When he shot, he would say, "Take that from me"—

I am Ibn al-Akwa'!
Today is the day for the mean [to receive destruction].

Whenever the horses came toward him, he fled and attacked them from the side. Whenever he could shoot, he would shoot and say, "Take that"—

I am Ibn al-Akwa'!
Today is the day for the mean [to receive destruction].

One of their men said, "Our little al-Akwa' it is at the beginning of the day!"[210]

When a report of Ibn al-Akwa''s shout reached the Messenger of God, he sounded the alarm in Medina. The horsemen all came following one another to the Messenger of God. The first of the

---

205. The text in the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim is fuller: "I held myself back from him for one hill or two to save my breath; then I ran on his heels. I held back from him for one hill or two; then I sprinted and overtook him"; see ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CCLVI.

206. Following ed. Leiden (in aẓunnu); ed. Cairo reads innī aẓunnu, "I think so."

207. See pp. 116–24, below, for an account of the expedition to Khaybar in A.H. 7.

208. This continues the report begun at al-Ṭabarī, I, 1502, above.

209. Thaniyyat al-Wadā' ("Farewell Pass") was the pass over which the road to Mecca left Medina. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, III, 25; photograph in Hamidullah, Battlefields, 10.

210. The text is uncertain. Ed. Leiden reads, ukayyi'unā huwwa awwala l-nahāri, which is what I have translated. This seems to be a contemptuous rejoinder, using the diminutive form of the name al-Akwa'. Ed. Cairo has a different reading, which also puns on the name: a-wa-yakī'unā huwwa . . . (and will he sting, or butt, us . . .).

horsemen to reach him was al-Miqdād b. 'Amr. The first horseman to stand by the Messenger of God after al-Miqdād from the Anṣār was 'Abbād b. Bishr b. Waqsh b. Zughbah b. Za'ūrā (a member of the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal); then came Sa'd b. Zayd (one of the Banū Ka'b b. 'Abd al-Ashhal), Usayd b. Ẓuhayr (a member of the [1508] Banū Ḥārithah b. al-Ḥārith, but there is uncertainty about him), 'Ukkāshah b. Miḥṣan (a member of the Banū Asad b. Khuzaymah), Muḥriz b. Naḍlah (a member of the Banū Asad b. Khuzaymah), Abū Qatādah al-Ḥārith b. Rib'ī (a member of the Banū Salimah), and Abū 'Ayyāsh (that is, 'Ubayd b. Zayd b. Ṣāmit, a member of the Banū Zurayq). When they had gathered round the Messenger of God, he appointed Sa'd b. Zayd as their commander and said, "Set out in pursuit of the enemy until I catch up to you with men."

According to a report that has come to me from members of the Banū Zurayq, the Messenger of God said to Abū 'Ayyāsh, "Abū 'Ayyāsh, why don't you give this horse to a man who rides better than you, so that he can overtake the enemy?"

According to Abū 'Ayyāsh, who said: I replied, "Messenger of God, I am the best rider among the people!" Then I struck the horse, but I swear to God that before it had run fifty cubits it threw me. So I marveled about how the Messenger of God had said, 'Why don't you give it to someone who rides better than you?' and about how I had said that I was the best rider among the people."

Some of the Banū Zurayq asserted that the Messenger of God gave Abū 'Ayyāsh's horse to Mu'ādh b. Mā'iṣ (or 'Ā'idh b. Mā'iṣ) b. Qays b. Khaldah, who was an eighth man. Some people count Salamah b. 'Amr b. al-Akwa' as one of the eight and reject Usayd b. Ẓuhayr of the Banū Ḥārithah; however, Salamah on that day was not a horsemen: he was the first to overtake the enemy on foot. So the horsemen set forth in pursuit of the enemy and met them.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq— [1509]
'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah: The first horseman to overtake the enemy was Muḥriz b. Naḍlah of the Banū Asad b. Khuzaymah (Muḥriz was called al-Akhram and was also called Qumayr). When the alarm was sounded, a horse belonging to Maḥmūd b. Maslamah started running around in its enclosure when it heard the neighing of the horses—it was a specially tended, well-rested horse. Some of the women of the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal said [to him] when he saw the horse running around in the enclosure, dragging the trunk of the palm tree to which it had been tied, "Qumayr, would you like to ride this horse—you see how it is—and catch up with the Messenger of God and with the Muslims?" He said yes; so they gave it to him, and he set out on it. The horse being rested, it did not cease to outstrip the [other] horses until it reached the enemy. Muḥriz stopped before them and said, "Halt, you sons of vile slave women, until the Emigrants and Anṣār riding after you catch up with you!" One of them attacked him and killed him. The horse wheeled round, and they could not stop it until it stood by its pen among the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal. No other Muslims were killed. The name of Maḥmūd's horse was Dhū al-Limmah.[211]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—someone whom people do not doubt—'Ubaydallāh b. Ka'b b. Mālik al-Anṣārī: Muḥriz in fact was riding a horse called al-
[1510] Janāḥ[212] belonging to 'Ukkāshah b. Miḥṣan. When Muḥriz was killed, al-Janāḥ was taken as booty. When the horsemen met, Abū Qatādah al-Ḥārith b. Rib'ī of the Banū Salimah killed Ḥabīb b. 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn, covered him with his cloak, and rejoined the men. When the Messenger of God approached with the Muslims, there was Ḥabīb covered with Abū Qatādah's cloak. The people exclaimed, "Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return!"[213] and said that Abū Qatādah had been killed; but the Messenger of God said, "It is not Abū Qatādah, but someone killed by Abū Qatādah; he has put his cloak on him so that you will know that he did it." 'Ukkāshah b. Miḥṣan overtook Awbār and his son 'Amr b. Awbār, who were riding on one camel, and ran them through with a spear, killing both of them. They rescued some of the camels. The Messenger of God traveled until he halted at the mountain of Dhū Qarad, and the people came to him in groups. The Messenger of God made camp and stayed there a day and a night. Salamah b. al-Akwa' said to him, "Messenger of God, if you sent me out with a hundred men, I would rescue the remaining animals and seize the enemy by their necks." The Messenger of God said, as I have been informed, "They are now being given

211. Dhū al-limmah means "having a long lock of hair."
212. Al-janāḥ means "wing."
213. Qur'ān 2:156, traditionally said in times of misfortune.

their evening drink in [the territory of] Ghaṭafān." The Messenger of God divided the meat of one camel among each hundred of his companions. They stayed there, and then the Messenger of God returned to Medina. He stayed there part of Jumādā II and Rajab; then he raided the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq[214] [clan] of Khuzā'ah in Sha'bān of the year 6.[215]

The Expedition against the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq[216] [1511]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl and 'Alī b. Mujāhid[217]—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah, 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr, and Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥabbān. [Ibn Isḥāq] said, "Each transmitted to me part of the report on the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq." They said: Word reached the Messenger of God that the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq were gathering against him under the leadership of al-Ḥārith b. Abī Ḍirār. (Al-Ḥārith was the father of Juwayriyah bt. al-Ḥārith, [who subsequently became] the wife of the Messenger of God.) When the Messenger of God heard about them, he set out toward them and met them at one of their watering places called al-Muraysī', near Qudayd toward the coast. The people advanced toward each other and fought fiercely. God put the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq to flight and killed some of them. He gave their children, women, and property to the Messenger of God as booty—God gave them to him as spoil. A Muslim named Hishām b. Ṣubābah from the Banū Kalb b. 'Awf b. 'Āmir b. Layth b. Bakr was wounded by one of the Anṣār who was a close kinsman of 'Ubādah b. al-Ṣāmit; he mortally wounded him by mistake, thinking he was one of the enemy.

While the people were at that watering place, they brought their animals down to drink. With 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was a hired man of his from the Banū Ghifār named Jahjāh b. Sa'īd, leading his

214. The name is given sometimes in its full form of Banū al-Muṣṭaliq and sometimes in the abbreviated form of Balmuṣṭaliq. I have normalized to the longer form throughout.

215. Sha'bān of A.H. 6 began on 16 December 627.

216. Parallels: W, I, 404–II, 426 (dated A.H. 5, see p. 41, above); IH, III, 289–96 (tr. Guillaume, 490–93).

217. 'Alī b. Mujāhid b. Muslim al-Rāzī, a historian and traditionist, was born in 100/718 in Rayy and died in 182/798. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 377–78; GAS, I, 312.

horse. Jahjāh and Sinān al-Juhanī (a confederate of the Banū 'Awf [1512] b. al-Khazraj) began crowding each other at the watering place and fought. Al-Juhanī shouted, "People of the Anṣār!" and Jahjāh shouted, "People of the Emigrants!" 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl, who had with him a band of his fellow tribesmen including the young lad Zayd b. Arqam,[218] became angry and said: "Have they really done it? They have tried to outrank us and outnumber us in our own lands. By God, the proverb, 'Fatten your dog and he will eat you up!' fits us and [the wearers of] the jilbāb[219] of Quraysh to a tee. By God, if we go back to Medina, those who are stronger will drive out the weaker from it."[220] Then he turned to his tribesmen who were with him and said: "This is what you have done to yourselves! You allowed them to settle in your lands and divided your wealth with them. Had you kept from them what you had, by God they would have moved to lands other than yours."

Zayd b. Arqam heard this and took it to the Messenger of God—this when the Messenger of God had finished with his enemies—and he gave him a report. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who was with him, said, "Messenger of God, order 'Abbād b. Bishr b. Waqsh to kill him." The Messenger of God said: "'Umar, how will it be if people start saying that Muḥammad kills his companions? No, announce our departure instead." (It was at an hour when the Messenger of God usually did not break camp.) So the people departed.

---

218. Zayd b. Arqam b. Zayd b. Qays b. al-Nu'mān b. Mālik b. al-Agharr b. Tha'labah b. Ka'b b. al-Khazraj al-Anṣārī participated in seventeen expeditions with the Prophet. He later emigrated to al-Kūfah and fought on 'Alī's side at Ṣiffin. He died between 65/784 and 68/688. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, 394–95.

219. Arabic: jalābīb Quraysh "the shirts (or coarse waist wrappers) of Quraysh." The origin of this apparently derogatory epithet for the Emigrants remains obscure; none of the older Arabic dictionaries explains it. Abū Ḍharr's note printed in most editions of IH, reads: "An epithet that the polytheists applied to the Emigrants who had become Muslims. Jalālīb (plural of jilbāb) originally means 'coarse waist wrappers.' They used to wrap themselves in them, and so they acquired this nickname." One may see it as a reference to poverty or simply to distinctive dress. At p. 59, below, 'Ā'ishah uses the word to designate the outer garment in which she wrapped herself and lay down while waiting for the departed caravan to notice her absence. See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CLXVII. W. Arafat has argued that the word may be derived from the verb jalaba (to import) and may therefore mean "the imported ones." See the note in his article, "A Controversial Incident in the Life of Ḥassān b. Thābit," p. 197 n. 4.

220. Qur'ān 63:8 quotes these words.

Now when 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl heard that Zayd b. Arqam had informed the Messenger of God of what he had heard him say, he went to the Messenger of God and swore, "By God, I did not say what he said, neither did I speak of it." 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy was a great noble among his people; so those who were present with the Messenger of God—companions of his from the Anṣār—said, "Messenger of God, perhaps the lad was mistaken in his [1513] report and did not remember exactly what the man said." They said this out of affection for 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy and to defend him.

After the Messenger of God had mounted and set out, Usayd b. Ḥuḍayr met him and, having greeted him as a prophet and wished him peace, said, "Messenger of God, you have set out at an unheard-of hour at which you usually do not set out." The Messenger of God said to him, "Have you not heard what your companion has said?" "Which companion, Messenger of God?" he asked. "'Abdallāh b. Ubayy," he answered. "And what did he say?" he asked. He replied, "He said that if he returned to Medina, those who are stronger would drive out the weaker from it." Usayd said: "You, by God, O Messenger of God, will drive him out, if you wish. He is the weak one by God, and you are the strong." Then he said: "Messenger of God, be gentle with him. By God, God caused you to arrive at the very moment when his people were stringing precious stones to make him a crown; so he thinks that you deprived him of a kingdom."

The Messenger of God traveled all that day until evening with the people, all that night until dawn, and the first part of the day until the sun hurt them; then he halted with them, and they fell asleep as soon as they felt the touch of the ground. He did this only to distract them from the talk that had taken place the day before—what 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy had said. In the afternoon he set out with the people, marched through the Ḥijāz, and halted at a watering place in the Ḥijāz called Naq'ā', a little above al-Naqī'.[221] When the Messenger of God set out in the afternoon, a strong wind blew on the people, hurting them, and they became fearful about it. The Messenger of God said, "Do not be afraid: it blew only because of the death of one of the great men among the 221. The place is mentioned by Yāqūt, Mu'jam a-buldān, VIII, 309, as belonging to the tribe of Muzaynah.

[1514] unbelievers." When they reached Medina, they found that Rifā'ah b. Zayd b. al-Tābūt, one of the Banū Qaynuqā', a great man among the Jews and a cave of refuge to the hypocrites, had died on that day. The sura in which God mentions the hypocrites ("When the hypocrites come to you. . . . ") was revealed concerning 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl and those of like mind.[222] When this sura was revealed, the Messenger of God took hold of Zayd b. Arqam's ear and said, "This is he whose ear God has confirmed."[223]

According to Abū Kurayb[224]—Yaḥyā b. Ādam[225]—Isrā'īl[226]—Abū Isḥāq[227]—Zayd b. Arqam, who said: I went out with my paternal uncle on an expedition, and I heard 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl saying to his companions: "Do not spend on those who are with the Messenger of God. By God, if we return to Medina, the stronger will drive out the weaker from it."[228] I mentioned this to my uncle, and my uncle mentioned it to the Messenger of God. The latter sent for me; I spoke to him, and he sent to 'Abdallāh and his companions, who swore that they had not said it. The Messenger of God took me to be lying and believed him. I felt grief such as I never had felt, and I sat in the tent. My uncle asked, "What did you intend, acting so that the Messenger of God deemed you to be lying and hated your action?" Then God revealed [the sura that begins], "When the hypocrites come to you." The Messenger of God sent to me and recited it; then he said, "God has confirmed your truthfulness, Zayd."

Resumption of the account of Ibn Isḥāq: 'Abdallāh, the son of

---

222. Qur'ān, Sura 63, entitled al-Munāfiqūn, "The Hypocrites."

223. I.e., God has confirmed the truth of what he said he heard. Cf. ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. DLXIII.

224. Abū Kurayb Muḥammad b. al-'Alā' b. Kurayb al-Hamdānī al-Kūfī died in 248/862. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 385–86.

225. Abū Zakariyā Yaḥyā b. Ādam b. Sulaymān al-Umawī al-Aḥwal was born ca. 140/757 in al-Kūfah and died in 203/818. He was a respected scholar of fiqh, ḥadīth, and Qur'ān. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 175–76; GAS, I, 520.

226. Isrā'īl b. Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq al-Sabī'ī al-Kūfī was born in 100/718 and died in 162/778. See al-Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, VII, 20–25; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 261–63.

227. Abū Isḥāq 'Amr b. 'Abdallāh al-Hamdānī, the grandfather of Isrā'īl b. Yūnus, died between 126 and 129/743–47 at the age of ninety-six. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 261–63.

228. See note 220, above.

'Abdallāh b. Ubayy, got word of what had happened involving his father.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq— [1515]
'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah: 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl came to the Messenger of God and said: "Messenger of God, I have been told that you want to kill 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy because of what has been reported to you concerning him. If you are going to do it, command me to do it and I will bring you his head. By God, al-Khazraj know that there has never been among them a man more dutiful to his father than I. I am afraid that you may order someone else to do it and that he may kill him; and then my soul will not allow me to look on the slayer of 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy walking among the people: I would kill him, killing a believer to avenge an unbeliever, and thereby enter the Fire [of Hell]." The Messenger of God said, "No, we will be gentle with him and associate with him on friendly terms as long as he stays with us." Thus, after that day whenever he did anything objectionable, it was his own tribesmen who reproved him, corrected him, censured him, and threatened him. When word of how they were behaving reached the Messenger of God, he said to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb: "What do you think, 'Umar? By God, had I killed him the day you ordered me to kill him, prominent men would have been upset, who, if I ordered them today to kill him, would do so." 'Umar said, "Now by God I know that what the Messenger of God ordered had more of a blessing in it that what I would have ordered."

Miqyas b. Ṣubābah came from Mecca, pretending to have become a Muslim, and said: "Messenger of God, I have come to you as a Muslim. I have come to seek blood money[229] for my brother, who was killed by mistake." The Messenger of God ordered him to be paid blood money for his brother Hishām b. Ṣubābah. He stayed briefly with the Messenger of God; then he attacked his brother's slayer, killed him, and left for Mecca as an apostate. He said while he was traveling:[230]

229. Arabic diyah: a specified amount of money or goods due in cases of homicide or other injuries to physical health unjustly committed upon the person of another. The payment for homicide was normally 100 camels, payable to the aggrieved family. The payment terminated all further vengeance. See *EI*², s.v. Diya.

[1516] It has sated my soul that he has spent the night laid to rest in the valley, with blood from his neck veins staining his two garments.
Before I killed him, soul's griefs assailed me and forbade me the smoothness of beds.
With him I discharged my vengeance; I took my retaliation, and was the first to return to the idols.
By [killing] him I took vengeance by force,[231] and I made to pay blood money for him the princes of the Banū al-Najjār and the lords of Fāri'.[232]

Miqyas b. Ṣubābah also said:

I rained down on him a blow that settled accounts: because of it there was a dripping of the belly's fresh blood that overspread him and flowed away.
And I said, as death came over his features,
"You cannot be safe from the Banū Bakr when they are wronged!"

Many of the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq were wounded on that day. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib killed two of them: Mālik and his son. The Messenger of God took many captives, and they were divided among all the Muslims. Juwayriyah bt. al-Ḥārith b. Abī Ḍirār, [who became] the wife of the Prophet, was one of the captives.

[1517] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr—'Urwah—the Prophet's wife 'Ā'ishah, who said: When the Messenger of God divided the captives of the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq, Juwayriyah bt. al-Ḥārith fell to the share of Thābit b. Qays b. al-Shammās (or to a cousin of his), and

230. Ed. Cairo: "He said in a poem," reading fī shi'r, for ed. Leiden's fī safarihī. Parallel text of this and the following poem with variants: W, I, 408; IH, III, 293–94 (tr. Guillaume, 492).

231. Thus ed. Leiden (tha'artu bihī qahran); al-Wāqidī, Ibn Hishām, and ed. Cairo read fihran ("I avenged Fihr with him"). Since Fihr was one of the early members of Quraysh, the line would then refer to exacting vengeance for his brother, a member of Quraysh, from the Banū al-Najjār of Medina.

232. Fāri' was one of the fortresses of Medina; see p. 22, above.

she contracted with him for her freedom.[233] She was a sweet, beautiful woman who captivated anyone who looked at her. She came to the Messenger of God seeking his help in the matter of her contract. By God, as soon as I saw her at the door of my chamber, I took a dislike to her, and I knew that he would see in her what I saw. She went before him and said, "Messenger of God, I am Juwayriyah, the daughter of al-Ḥārith b. Abī Ḍirār, the chief of his tribesmen. You can see what misfortune has befallen me. I have fallen to the share of Thābit b. Qays b. al-Shammās (or his cousin) and have contracted with him for my freedom. I have come to you to ask your aid with my contract." He said to her, "Would you like something better than that?" She said, "What is it, Messenger of God?" He said, "I will pay your contract and marry you." She said, "Yes, Messenger of God," and he said, "I do so." When the news got out to the people that the Messenger of God had married Juwayriyah bt. al-Ḥārith, they said, "Relatives by marriage of the Messenger of God!" and they set free those in their possession. When he married her, a hundred families of the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq were freed. I know of no woman who was a greater blessing to her people than she.

An Account of the Lie[234]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, who said: The Messenger of God then set out on his way back from that journey (according to what my father Isḥāq [b. Yasār] transmitted to me from al-Zuhrī—'Urwah—'Ā'ishah). When he was near Medina ('Ā'ishah was along on that journey of his), the authors of the lie said about her what they said. [1518]

233. Arabic kātabathu 'alā nafsihā: she made a contract with him (written or otherwise) that she would pay a certain sum as the price of herself and be free on payment of it (cf. Lane, Lexicon, VII, 2590). The practice (called mukātabah, "manumission by contract") is recommended by the Qur'ān (24:33) for any slave who wishes it. Cf. Schacht, Introduction to Islamic Law, 42f., 129f.; and *EI*², I, 30, s.v. 'Abd.

234. Parallels: W, II, 426–40; IH, III, 297–307 (tr. Guillaume, 493–99); al-Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ (ed. Boulaq), V, 52; al-Ṭabarī, Jāmi' al-bayān, XVIII, 68–77. Cf. Stowasser, Women in the Qur'an, Traditions, and Interpretation, 94–95; and Spellberg, Politics, Gender, and the Islamic Past, 61–99.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—'Alqamah b. Waqqāṣ al-Laythī, Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab,[235] 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr, and 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah[236] (al-Zuhrī said, "Each transmitted to me part of this account, some remembering more of it than others, and I have assembled for you everything they transmitted to me").

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. 'Abbād b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr—his father—'Ā'ishah; also, [Muḥammad b. Isḥāq]—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī—'Amrah bt. 'Abd al-Raḥmān[237]—'Ā'ishah ([Muḥammad b. Isḥāq] said: "The report of each has been assembled in the account of 'Ā'ishah's story about herself, when the authors of the lie said about her what they said. Each contributed to her account as transmitted from all these people. Some [1519] of them relate what others do not. Each was a reliable informant concerning her, and each related about her what he had heard.")

'Ā'ishah said: Whenever the Messenger of God planned a journey, he had his wives draw lots among themselves; whichever one's lot came out, he took her with him. When the raid on the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq took place, he had his wives draw lots as he used to do; my lot came out over theirs, and the Messenger of God took me along. Women in those days used to eat only enough to stay alive; they were not bloated with meat so as to become heavy. While my camel was being saddled, I would sit in my litter; then the men who were to bind my litter onto my camel would come and carry me: they would take hold of the bottom of the litter, lift it, and place me on the back of the camel. Then they would tie it with its ropes, take hold of the camel's head, and set out with it.

---

235. Abū Muḥammad Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab b. Ḥazn al-Makhzūmī was born in 13/634 and died in 94/713 in Medina. He was a scholar of genealogy, history, traditions, and law and was closely connected with the caliph 'Umar. Al-Zuhrī was one of his students. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 84–88; GAS, I, 276.

236. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah died in the 90's/708–18. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 23–24, which quotes al-Ṭabarī's favorable opinion of him.

237. 'Amrah bt. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'd b. Zurārah al-Anṣāriyyah was highly regarded as a transmitter of material from 'Ā'ishah. The caliph 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz is said to have asked for a written collection of her reports from 'Ā'ishah. She died in 98/716–17 (or later) at the age of seventy-seven. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 438–39.

When the Messenger of God had finished with his journey on that occasion, he turned back to return. When he was near Medina, he made camp and, having spent part of the night there, announced the departure. When the people had mounted, I went out to attend to a need of mine.[238] On my neck was a necklace of mine with onyx beads from Ẓafār.[239] When I was finished, it came undone from my neck without my noticing. When I returned to the encampment, I felt for it on my neck and did not find it. The people had already begun to leave. I retraced my steps to the place to which I had gone and looked for the necklace until I found it. While I was away, the men who used to saddle the camel for me came and finished saddling it. Assuming that I was in the litter as [1520] usual, they took hold of the litter, lifted it up, and tied it onto the camel, not doubting that I was in it. Then they took hold of the camel's head and set out. When I came back to camp, not a soul was there[240]—the people had departed. So I wrapped myself in my outer garment (jilbāb) and lay down in the place to which I had gone. I knew that if they missed me, they would return for me. By God, while I was lying down, Ṣafwān b. al-Mu'aṭṭal al-Sulamī passed by me—he had lagged behind away from the camp to attend to a need of his and had not spent the night with the people in camp. When he saw my form, he approached and stood near me and recognized me, for he used to see me before the curtain (ḥijāb) was imposed on us.[241] When he saw me, he said, "'Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return!'[242]—is it she who travels in the litter of the Messenger of God?" I was wrapped up in my garments. "What has caused you to stay behind?—may God have mercy on you!" he asked, but I did not talk to him. Then he brought the camel near and said, "Mount—may God have mercy on you!"—and he kept back from me. I mounted, and he came and took hold of the camel's head and set out with me, hastening in pursuit of the party. By God, we did not overtake them, neither 238. I.e., to relieve herself.

239. The city of Ẓafār, near San'ā' in Yemen (not to be confused with Ẓafār on the coast of Oman), was famous for its onyx. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VI, 85–86.

240. Literally, "not a caller and not a responder."

241. See note 96, above.

242. See note 213, above.

was I was missed until morning. The people halted and, when they had settled down, the man came into view leading me. Then the authors of the lie said about me what they said, and the camp was disturbed; yet, by God, I knew nothing about it.

Then we came to Medina, and I immediately came down with a severe complaint. Nothing about the matter reached me, but the story reached the Messenger of God and my parents. My parents said not a word to me about it; however, I missed some of the [1521] kindness toward me of the Messenger of God. Whenever I complained of an illness, he would be merciful to me and treat me with kindness, but he did not do so at the time of that complaint of mine, and I missed it. When he came to see me while my mother was nursing me, he would say "How is she?" and nothing more. Finally, troubled by his apparent coldness toward me, I said, "Messenger of God, I wish you would allow me to move to my mother's, so that she could nurse me." "Do what you like," he said. So I moved to my mother's, knowing nothing of what had happened, and after some twenty days I recovered from my pain.

We were Arab folk. We did not have in our houses these privies that the foreigners have; we loathed and disliked such things. Instead, we would go out into the fields of Medina. The women would go out every night to attend to their needs. One night I went out to attend to my needs along with Umm Misṭaḥ, the daughter of Abū Ruhm b. al-Muṭṭalib b. 'Abd Manāf (her mother, the maternal aunt of Abū Bakr, was the daughter of Ṣakhr b. 'Āmir b. Ka'b b. Sa'd b. Taym). By God, as she was walking with me, she tripped over her garment and said, "May Misṭaḥ stumble and fall!" I said, "By the life of God, what a bad thing to say about an Emigrant who was present at Badr!"[243] She replied, "Daughter of Abū Bakr, hasn't the news reached you?" "What news?" I asked. She told me what the authors of the lie had been saying. I asked, "Has this really happened?" "Yes," she said, "by God, it really has happened." By God, I was unable to do what I had to do. I went back and kept crying until I thought that the crying would split my liver. I said to my mother: "May God forgive you. People spoke the things they spoke and you heard what you heard, yet you mention [1522] nothing of it to me!" She said: "Dear daughter, take it lightly. By

243. See note 91, above.

God, whenever a beautiful woman married to a man who loves her has rival wives, they always gossip about her, and people do the same."

The Messenger of God stood up among the people to preach without my knowing about it. He said: "People, why are some men hurting me regarding my family and saying falsehood about them?[244] By God, I know only good about them. People are saying this about a man about whom, by God, I know only good and who has never entered any of my apartments except in my company."

The main offense lay with 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl and some men of al-Khazraj, along with what Misṭaḥ and Ḥamnah bt. Jaḥsh had said. Ḥamnah's sister, Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh, was the wife of the Messenger of God.[245] Ḥamnah therefore spread her rumors trying to hurt me for the sake of her sister Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh, and I became distressed by it.

When the Messenger of God had finished his speech, Usayd b. Ḥuḍayr, a member of the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal,[246] said: "Messenger of God, if they belong to al-Aws, we will take care of them for you; if they belong to our brothers, al-Khazraj, give us your command. By God, they deserve to have their heads cut off!"

Sa'd b. 'Ubādah stood up—previously he was thought to be a righteous man—and said: "You lie! By God's life, their heads shall not be cut off. By God, you have said these words only because you already know that they belong to al-Khazraj; had they been your tribesmen, you would not have said it." Usayd said: "You lie, by [1523]
God's life! But you are a hypocrite arguing for hypocrites." The men jumped up at each other, so that violence almost took place between the tribes of al-Aws and al-Khazraj.

The Messenger of God descended [from the pulpit] and came in to see me. He called 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and Usāmah b. Zayd and asked their advice. Usāmah spoke in praise, saying, "Messenger of God, they are your family, and we know nothing but good about them,[247] and this is lying and falsehood." As for 'Alī, he said:

244. The pronoun "them" is in the feminine plural, indicating that "my family" is a polite way of saying "my wives."

245. IH adds: "None of his wives but she could rival me in status. As for Zaynab herself, God protected her; but Ḥamnah bt. Jaḥsh spread her rumors. . . . "

246. The Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal were a division of al-Aws.

247. As before, "them" [feminine plural] refers to Muḥammad's wives.

"Messenger of God, women are many, and you can get a replacement. Ask the slave girl; she will tell you the truth." So the Messenger of God called Barīrah to question her. 'Alī went up to her and struck her hard, saying, "Speak the truth to the Messenger of God." "By God," she said, "I know nothing but good. The only fault I ever found in 'Ā'ishah is that, when I was kneading my dough and ordered her to watch it, she fell asleep over it, and the pet sheep[248] came and ate it."

Then the Messenger of God came into my room. My parents were with me, along with a woman from the Anṣār. I was crying, and she was crying with me. Having seated himself, he praised and lauded God and then said: "'Ā'ishah, as you know, people have been saying things. Fear God, and if you have committed an evil deed such as people say, repent to God, for God accepts repentance from his servants." By God, as soon as he said that, my tears diminished, so that I felt nothing of them. I waited for my parents to reply to the Messenger of God, but they did not speak. I swear to [1524] God, I considered myself too lowly and unimportant for God, who is mighty and exalted, to reveal a Qur'ān[249] about me to be recited in mosques and used in worship; but I hoped that the Messenger of God would see something in a dream whereby God, knowing my innocence, would refute [the accusations] about me or that he would be given a message. As for a Qur'ān to be revealed about me, by God, I considered myself too lowly for that.

When I saw that my parents did not speak, I said, "Will you not reply to the Messenger of God?" They said to me, "By God, we do not know what to reply to him." (I swear to God, I know of no family that suffered what the family of Abū Bakr suffered during those days.) When they were unable to speak on my behalf, my eyes filled with tears and I wept. "By God," I said, "I will never repent to God of that which you have spoken of. By God, if I confess to what people are saying, so that you believe me—and God knows that I am innocent of it—I shall be saying what did not happen; and if I deny what you are saying, you will not believe me." Then I tried to recall the name of Jacob, but I could not remember it; instead, I said: "As the father of Joseph said, 'Comely patience! And God it is whose help is to be sought in that which you describe.'"[250]

248. Arabic: dājin, an animal (usually a sheep or goat) that one keeps in one's house.

249. I.e., a Qur'ānic revelation, a single passage of Qur'ān to be recited in liturgical worship; see Bell and Watt, Introduction to the Qur'ān, 135–36.

By God, before the Messenger of God left the place where he was sitting, there came over him from God what used to come over him. They covered him with his garment and set a leather cushion under his head. As for me, when I saw that happen, by God I did not become very frightened or troubled, for I knew that I was innocent and that God would not wrong me. As for my parents, by the One who holds 'Ā'ishah's soul in His hand, as soon as the Messenger of God came to, I thought their souls would depart for fear that confirmation of what people had said would come from God.

The Messenger of God came to and sat up. [Drops of sweat] were falling from him like silver beads on a day of hail. He began wiping the perspiration from his brow and said: "Rejoice, 'Ā'ishah! God has revealed your innocence." I said, "To God's praise and your[251] blame!" Then he went out to the people and preached to them. He recited to them the Qur'ān that God had revealed concerning me. He gave orders concerning Misṭaḥ b. Uthāthah, Ḥassān b. Thābit, and Ḥamnah bt. Jaḥsh (they were among those who had spoken evil openly) and they received their prescribed flogging.[252] [1525]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—his father [Isḥāq b. Yasār]—some men of the Banū al-Najjār: Umm Ayyūb, the wife of Abū Ayyūb Khālid b. Zayd, said to her husband,

---

250. Qur'ān 12:18.

251. The pronoun is plural.

252. Literally: "they were beaten with their ḥadd." Ḥadd, meaning "hindrance, impediment, limit, boundary," is used in the plural in the Qur'ān to designate the restrictive ordinances of God (ḥudūd Allāh). In Islamic jurisprudence, ḥadd is a technical term for the punishment of certain acts that have been forbidden or sanctioned by punishments in the Qur'ān and have thereby become crimes against religion. These are unlawful intercourse (zinā), false accusation of unlawful intercourse (qadhf), wine drinking (khamr), theft (sariqah), and highway robbery (qaṭ' al-ṭarīq). The punishment for false accusation of unlawful intercourse was set at eighty lashes by Qur'ān 24:4, which some say was revealed on this occasion (see al-Ṭabarī, Jāmi' al-bayān, XVIII, 59–60, ad loc.). See *EI*², s. vv. Ḥadd, Ḳadhf; Schacht, Introduction to Islamic Law, 179.

"Abū Ayyūb, don't you hear what people are saying about 'Ā'ishah?" "Yes," he replied, "and it is falsehood. Would you, Umm Ayyūb, do such a thing?" She said, "No, by God, I wouldn't do it." "And 'Ā'ishah," he said, "is better than you, by God!"

When the Qur'ān was revealed, God mentioned the authors of the slander who spoke their evil, saying: "Those who came with the slander are a band of you"—and the rest of the verse.[253] This refers to Ḥassān b. Thābit and his companions who said what they said. Then God said, "Why, when you heard it, did the believers, men and women, not of their own account think good thoughts?"—and the rest of the verse.[254] That is, [why did they not speak] as Abū Ayyūb and his wife spoke? Then He said: "When you received it on your tongues"—and the rest of the verse.[255]

When this was revealed concerning 'Ā'ishah and those who had said what they said about her, Abū Bakr, who had been supporting Misṭaḥ because of his close kinship with him and his poverty, [1526] said, "By God, I will never support Misṭaḥ with anything or help him in any way after what he said about 'Ā'ishah, making us suffer as we did." Then God revealed concerning this: "Let not those of you who possess bounty and plenty swear off giving kinsmen"—and the rest of the verse.[256] Abū Bakr therefore said, "By God, I want God to forgive me"—and he restored Misṭaḥ's support that he had been paying him, saying, "By God, I will never withdraw it from him."

Ṣafwān b. al-Mu'aṭṭal advanced on Ḥassān b. Thābit with a sword when he learned what Ḥassān was saying about him. In addition, Ḥassān had composed poetry with insinuations against

253. Qur'ān 24:11: "Those who came with the slander are a band of you; do not reckon it evil for you; rather it is good for you. Every man of them shall have the sin that he has earned charged to him; and whosoever of them took upon himself the greater part of it, him there awaits a mighty chastisement."

254. Qur'ān 24:12, which continues: "and say, 'This is a manifest calumny'?"

255. Qur'ān 24:15: "When you received it on your tongues, and were speaking with your mouths that whereof you had no knowledge, and reckoned it a light thing, and with God it was a mighty thing."

256. Qur'ān 24:22: "Let not those of you who possess bounty and plenty swear off giving kinsmen and the poor and those who emigrate in the way of God; but let them pardon and forgive. Do you not wish that God should forgive you? God is All-forgiving, All-compassionate."

Ibn al-Mu'aṭṭal and the Arabs of Muḍar[257] who had become Muslims. He had said:[258]

The [wearers of the] jilbāb[259] have become strong and numerous, and Ibn al-Furay'ah[260] has become [as alone as] an [ostrich's] egg in the land.[261]
Bereft of her son is the mother of the one whose companion I become,[262] or [of anyone who] becomes caught in the claws of a lion.
For my victim, the one whom I take early in the morning, no blood money shall be paid and no revenge [shall be taken].
Not even the sea, when the wind blows from the north,
so that it becomes heaped up and spatters the shore with foam,
Is more overwhelming ever than I, when you see me [1527] amaze with [my] rage[263] like a cloud that brings amazing [amounts of] hail.

Ṣafwān b. al-Mu'aṭṭal therefore advanced on him with a sword, struck him, and said (according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq):

---

257. I.e., the Emigrants of Quraysh. Muḍar was a large grouping of North Arabian tribes including Qays 'Aylān, Hudhayl, Khuzaymah, Asad, Kinānah, Quraysh, Ḍabbah, and Tamīm. See EI[1] Suppl., s.v. Rabī'a and Muḍar. Ḥassān b. Thābit belonged to al-Khazraj of Medina.

258. Parallels: Aghānī, IV, 11–13 (with narrative of the circumstances of the poem's composition, variant readings, and six additional lines); Dīwān, I, 284–86 and II, 212–13 (twelve verses and extensive comment); W, II, 436; IH, III, 304–5. See also W. Arafat, "A Controversial Incident."

259. See note 219. An alternate reading, preferred by Arafat in his edition of the Dīwān is khalābīs, "a mixed multitude, scum."

260. I.e., Ḥassān b. Thābit, whose mother was named al-Furay'ah. Cf. Aghānī, IV, 2.

261. Arabic bayḍat al-balad is a common metaphor for isolation or insignificance, although it can also mean something precious. See Arafat, "A Controversial Incident," 197.

262. Ed. Cairo (change of vocalization): "you become."

263. The interpretation follows the suggestion in the notes to the Dīwān of Ḥassān b. Thābit concerning the meaning of farā, yafrī. See Dīwān, II, 212–13; Lane, Lexicon, VI, 2391.

Receive the sword's edge from me: I am a young man who, when I am satirized, am no poet.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ḥārith al-Taymī:[264] Thābit b. Qays b. al-Shammās (a member of the Banū al-Ḥārith[265] b. al-Khazraj) assaulted Ṣafwān b. al-Mu'aṭṭal because of his having struck Ḥassān, and, having tied Ṣafwān's hands to his neck, set out with him for the territory of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. al-Khazraj. 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah met him. "What is this?" he asked. Thābit replied: "Hasn't the striking of Ḥassān b. Thābit with the sword made you indignant? By God, I think it nearly killed him!" 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah said to him, "Does the Messenger of God know anything about what you have done?" He replied, "No, by God." 'Abdallāh said: "You have acted too boldly. Release the man!" So Thābit b. Qays released him. They came to the Messenger of God and told him what had happened. He called on Ḥassān and Ṣafwān b. al-Mu'aṭṭal [to speak]. Ibn al-Mu'aṭṭal said, "Messenger of God, he insulted me and satirized me, so that rage overcame me and I struck him." The Messenger of God said to Ḥassān, "Ḥassān, have you treated my own tribesmen harshly because God has guided [1528] them to Islam?" Then he said, "Ḥassān, treat well[266] the one who struck you." "I will, Messenger of God," he answered.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ḥārith: In compensation for [the blow], the Messenger of God gave [Ḥassān] Bayraḥā,[267] which today is the palace of the Banū Ḥudaylah in Medina. It had been the property of Abū Ṭalḥah b. Sahl, who donated it to the Messenger of God, who in turn gave it to Ḥassān for his blow. He also gave him Sīrīn, a Coptic slave girl, and she bore him 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥassān.

'Ā'ishah used to say: They inquired about Ṣafwān b. al-Mu'aṭṭal

---

264. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ḥārith al-Taymī, died ca. 120/738, was the grandson of an Emigrant. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 5–7.

265. The tribal name is abbreviated here to Balḥārith. I have normalized it to Banū al-Ḥārith throughout, which is the form used later in the sentence.

266. Arabic: aḥsin yā Ḥassān. Muḥammad is punning on Ḥassān's name, which comes from the same root as the verb aḥsana, "do good, treat well."

267. Variant (al-Wāqidī, Aghānī): Bayraḥā'.

and found him to be an impotent man who had no intercourse with women. He was killed afterward as a martyr [in battle].

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abd al-Wāḥid b. Ḥamzah:[268] 'Ā'ishah's account was given on the Pilgrimage of Fulfillment.[269]

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: The Messenger of God stayed the months of Ramaḍān and Shawwāl in Medina. He set out to perform the lesser pilgrimage ('umrah) in Dhū al-Qa'dah of the year 6.[270]

The Prophet's Lesser Pilgrimage from Which the Polytheists Turned Him Back: The Story of al-Ḥudaybiyah[271]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—al-Ḥakam b. Bashīr[272]—'Umar b. Dharr al-Hamdānī[273]—Mujāhid:[274] The Prophet made three lesser pilgrimages, all of them in [the month of] Dhū al-Qa'dah, returning from each of them to Medina.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: The Prophet set out to make the lesser pilgrimage in Dhū al-Qa'dah, [1529] not intending to make war. He had called on the Arabs and Bedouin desert dwellers who were around him to help by setting out

---

268. On the Medinan transmitter 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. Ḥamzah b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr al-Asadī Abū Ḥamzah see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 434.

269. Arabic: 'umrat al-qaḍā', the lesser pilgrimage that Muḥammad performed in 7/629 (called the Pilgrimage of Fulfillment because it took the place of the pilgrimage he had been prevented from making). See pp. 133–38, below.

270. Ramaḍān of A.H. 6 began on 14 January 628, Shawwāl on 13 February, and Dhū al-Qa'dah on 13 March.

271. Parallels: W, II, 571–633; IH, III, 308–27 (tr. Guillaume, 499–510). Al-Ḥudaybiyah was a small town with a well one stage from Mecca and nine stages from Medina. It was on the edge of the Meccan ḥaram or sacred territory. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥudaybiya.

272. Perhaps the same as the Kūfan scholar al-Ḥakam b. Bishr b. Sulaymān al-Nahdī whom Ibn Ḥajar lists as one of the sources consulted by Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 424.

273. 'Umar b. Dharr b. 'Abdallāh b. Zurārah al-Hamdānī was a Kūfan who died ca. 153/770. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 444–45.

274. Abū al-Ḥajjāj Mujāhid b. Jabr al-Makkī was born ca. 21/642 in Mecca and died in 104/722. He was a student of Ibn al-'Abbās and author of a commentary on the Qur'ān. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 42–44; GAS, I, 29.

with him, for he feared that Quraysh would oppose him with fighting or turn him away from the [Holy] House[275]—which they did. Many of the Bedouins were slow in coming to him. The Messenger of God, the Emigrants and Anṣār who were with him, and the Arabs who joined him set out. He took sacrificial animals with him and put on pilgrim garb[276] so that people would have no apprehension about his fighting and would know that he had come only to visit and venerate the House.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Muslim al-Zuhrī—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—al-Miswar b. Makhramah[277] and Marwān b. al-Ḥakam,[278] who said: The Messenger of God set out in the Year of al-Ḥudaybiyah, intending to visit the House, not intending to fight. He drove with him seventy fattened camels. The party numbered seven hundred men; each fattened camel was for ten men.

However, according to Ibn 'Abd al-A'lā[279] (who transmitted his report to us from Muḥammad b. Thawr[280]—Ma'mar[281]—al-Zuhrī—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—al-Miswar b. Makhramah); and according to Ya'qūb[282] (who transmitted his report from Yaḥyā b.

---

275. Arabic: al-bayt, the Ka'bah.

276. Arabic aḥrama: "he entered the state of iḥrām," a state of ritual consecration marked by the wearing of a simple two-piece garment and abstention from cutting the hair, shedding blood, sexual relations, and a number of other activities. See *EI*², s.v. Iḥrām.

277. Al-Miswar b. Makhramah b. Nawfal al-Zuhrī was the nephew of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf through his mother. Born in 2/623–24 in Mecca, he was taken to Medina in 8/629–30 and died in 64/683–84 in Mecca. He was a close friend of 'Umar. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 151–52.

278. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-'Āṣ b. Umayyah, was governor of Medina under Mu'āwiyah and became caliph in 64/684, reigning nine months. He died in Ramaḍān 65/685. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 91–92; *EI*², s.v.

279. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-A'lā al-Ṣan'ānī (cf. p. 74, below, where the same isnād occurs in fuller form) died in 245/859 in al-Baṣrah, where al-Ṭabarī met him. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 289; Rosenthal, General Introduction, 20.

280. Muḥammad b. Thawr al-Ṣan'ānī died ca. 190/805. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 87.

281. Abū 'Urwah Ma'mar b. Rāshid, born in 96/714 and died in 154/770, a pupil of al-Zuhrī, was a historian and traditionist. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 243–46; GAS, I, 290–91.

282. I.e., Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm al-Dawraqī (cf. the fuller version of the same isnād at p. 74, below) was born in 166/782 and died in 252/866. See al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, XIV, 277–80; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 381–82.

Sa'īd[283]—'Abdallāh b. Mubārak[284]—Ma'mar—al-Zuhrī—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—al-Miswar b. Makhramah and Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, both of whom said): The Messenger of God set out from al-Ḥudaybiyah with between thirteen and nineteen hundred[285] of his companions. (The [same] report then follows.)

According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—Abū 'Āmir [al-'Aqadī]—'Ikrimah b. 'Ammār al-Yamāmī—Iyās b. Salamah—his father [Salamah b. al-Akwa'], who said: We came to al-Ḥudaybiyah with the Messenger of God. We were fourteen hundred.[286] [1530]

According to Yūsuf b. Mūsā al-Qaṭṭān[287]—Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik and Sa'īd b. Shuraḥbīl al-Miṣrī—al-Layth b. Sa'd al-Miṣrī[288]—Abū al-Zubayr[289]—Jābir,[290] who said: On the day of al-Ḥudaybiyah we were one thousand and four hundred.

According to Muḥammad b. Sa'd[291]—his father—his paternal 283. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. Farrūkh al-Qaṭṭān, who was born in 120/737 and died in 198/813, was a pupil of Sufyān al-Thawrī. See al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, XIV, 135–44; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 216–20; GAS, I, 75.

284. Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān 'Abdallāh b. al-Mubārak b. Wāḍiḥ al-Ḥanẓalī al-Tamīmī, who was born in 118/736 and died in 181/797, was a traditionist, historian, and Sufi. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 382–87; *EI*², s.v. Ibn al-Mubārak; GAS, I, 95.

285. Following the text of ed. Leiden (fī biḍ'a 'ashrata mi'atan). The reading of ed. Cairo (fī biḍ'ata 'ashara wa-mi'atin, "with between thirteen and nineteen and one hundred," i.e., with between 113 and 119) seems to be a misprint.

286. For ed. Leiden's arba'a 'ashrata mi'atan (14 hundred), ed. Cairo reads arba'ata 'ashara wa-mi'atun (14 and a hundred, i.e., 114).

287. Yūsuf b. Mūsā b. Rāshid b. Bilāl al-Qaṭṭān Abū Ya'qūb was born in al-Kūfah, lived in Rayy, then went to Baghdād, where he died in Ṣafar of 253/867. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 425.

288. Al-Layth b. Sa'd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Fahmī Abū al-Ḥārith (born in Qalqashandah, Egypt, in 94/713, and died in 175/791) was one of the most famous traditionists and jurists of his time. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 459–65; *EI*², s.v. al-Layth b. Sa'd; GAS, I, 520.

289. Abū al-Zubayr Muḥammad b. Muslim b. Tadrus al-Asadī, a traditionist, died in 126/743 or 128. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 440–43; GAS, I, 86–87.

290. I.e., the companion of the Prophet, Jābir b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr al-Khazrajī, one of the Medinans who swore allegiance to Muḥammad at the first Pledge of 'Aqabah. See GAS, I, 85.

291. Abū 'Abdallāh Muḥammad b. Sa'd b. Manī' al-Baṣrī al-Zuhrī (known as "Kātib al-Wāqidī" after his teacher) was born in al-Baṣrah in 168/784 and died in 230/845 in Baghdād. He was the author of Kitāb al-ṭabaqāt al-kabīr, containing biographies of the Prophet and of his companions. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 182–83; GAS, I, 300–301.

uncle—his father—his father—Ibn 'Abbās,[292] who said: The people who swore allegiance under the tree were one thousand five hundred and twenty-five.

According to Ibn al-Muthannā[293]—Abū Dāwūd[294]—Shu'bah[295]—'Amr b. Murrah,[296] who said: I heard 'Abdallāh b. Abī Awfā say: "On the Day of the Tree we were one thousand three hundred. Aslam[297] was an eighth of the Emigrants."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-A'mash[298]—Abū Sufyān[299]—Jābir b. 'Abdallāh al-Anṣārī, who said: We, the people of al-Ḥudaybiyah, were fourteen hundred.[300]

According to al-Zuhrī: The Messenger of God set out. When he [1531] was at 'Usfān, Bishr b. Sufyān al-Ka'bī met him and said: "Messenger of God, Quraysh have heard about your journey and have gone out with their 'foals and dams.'[301] They have put on leopard skins and encamped at Dhū Ṭuwā,[302] swearing by God that you shall never enter the city in defiance of them. Khālid b. al-

---

292. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās (or al-'Abbās), a cousin of the Prophet, was born three years before the Hijrah. He spent much of his life at al-Ṭā'if as a scholar and authority on Qur'ān interpretation. He died in 68/687 (or in 69 or 70). See GAS, I, 25–28; *EI*², s.v. 'Abd Allāh b. al-'Abbās.

293. Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā Abū Mūsā al-Baṣrī died ca. 252/866. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 425–27.

294. Abū Dāwūd Sulaymān b. Dāwūd b. al-Jārūd al-Ṭayālisī was born in 133/750 and died in 203/818 or 204. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 182–86; GAS, I, 97–98.

295. Shu'bah b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Baṣrī died in 160/776. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 233–34.

296. 'Amr b. Murrah b. 'Abdallāh al-Murādī al-Kūfī died ca. 118/736. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 102–3.

297. Aslam was a division of Khuzā'ah with territory to the west of Medina and Mecca. On the Emigrant status of members of other non-Medinan tribes than Quraysh who adhered to Muḥammad, see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 86.

298. Sulaymān b. Mihrān al-Asadī al-A'mash died in 148/765. See al-Dhahabī, Tadhkirah, 154; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 123.

299. For Abū Sufyān b. Sa'īd b. al-Mughīrah al-Thaqafī, see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 112; GAS, I, 63–64, 85.

300. For ed. Leiden's arba'a 'ashrata mi'atan (14 hundred), ed. Cairo reads arba'ata 'ashara wa-mi'atan (14 and a hundred, i.e., 114).

301. Arabic: al-'ūdh al-maṭāfīl, literally, "[camels] that have recently foaled and [camels] that have foals with them." The commentators take the phrase as figurative for "women and children"; see Lane, Lexicon, V, 2193, s.v. 'ā'idh.

302. At place near Mecca, sometimes vocalized Dhū Ṭawā, not the same as the valley where Moses is said to have met God (Qur'ān 20:12, 79:16); see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VI, 64.

Walīd[303] is with their horsemen, whom they have sent forward to Kurā' al-Ghamīm."[304]

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: Some have said that Khālid b. al-Walīd on that day was with the Messenger of God as a Muslim.

A Report That Khālid b. al-Walīd Was Already a Muslim

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Ya'qūb al-Qummī[305]—Ja'far [i.e., Ibn Abī al-Mughīrah][306]—Ibn Abzā,[307] who said: When the Messenger of God set out with camels for sacrifice and reached Dhū al-Ḥulayfah,[308] 'Umar said to him, "Messenger of God, will you without arms or horses enter the territory of people who are at war with you?" So the Prophet sent to Medina and left no horses or weapons there untaken. When he approached Mecca, they prohibited him from entering; so he marched to Minā[309] and halted there. His spy brought him word, saying, "'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl has come out against you with five hundred men." The Messenger of God said to Khālid b. al-Walīd, "Khālid, here is your paternal uncle's son come against you with horsemen." Khālid said, "I am the sword of God and the sword of His Messenger!"—he received the name Sword of God on that day—"Messenger of God, direct me wherever you wish!" He sent him in command of horsemen, and he met 'Ikrimah in the canyon and routed him, so that he drove 'Ikrimah back into the walled gardens of Mecca. 'Ikrimah returned again, and Khālid routed him, driving him back into the 303. On the later military career of Khālid b. al-Walīd see *EI*², s.v.

304. See note 187, above.

305. Ya'qūb b. 'Abdallāh al-Qummī died in 174/790. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 390–91.

306. Ja'far b. Abī al-Mughīrah al-Khuzā'ī al-Qummī is listed without dates in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 108.

307. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abzā is listed without exact dates in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 132–33.

308. Dhū al-Ḥulayfah is six or seven miles from Medina on the way to Mecca; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, III, 329.

309. Minā is located in a narrow valley about five miles east of Mecca and lies on the traditional pilgrimage route between Mecca and 'Arafāt. See *EI*², s.v. Minā.

walled gardens of Mecca. 'Ikrimah returned a third time, and [1532] Khālid routed him, so that he drove him back into the walled gardens of Mecca. God revealed concerning him: "It is He who restrained their hands from you, and your hands from them, in the hollow of Mecca, after He made you victors over them"—until the words "painful punishment."[310] Having made the Prophet victor over them, God restrained him from them on account of remnants of the Muslims who remained in Mecca after He had made Muḥammad victor over the Meccans; for God did not want the horsemen to trample them unwittingly.

Resumption of the account of Ibn Isḥāq: The Messenger of God said: "Woe to Quraysh! War has eaten them up! What would they lose if they left me to deal with the rest of the Arabs? If the Arabs defeat me, that will be what they want. If God makes me prevail over [the Arabs], [Quraysh] can enter Islam en masse; or, if they do not, they can fight, having regained their strength. What do Quraysh think? By God, I shall not cease to strive against them for the sake of that with which God has sent me until God makes it prevail or this side of my neck becomes separated."[311] Then he said, "Who is a man who will lead us forth on a way other than the one on which they are?"

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: A man from Aslam said, "I will, Messenger of God." He took them on a rough and rugged path among canyons. When they emerged from it—it was exhausting for the Muslims—and reached level ground at the end of the valley, the Messenger of God said to the people, "Say, 'We ask God to forgive us, and we repent to him.'" They did this. The Messenger of God said, "By God, this is the [petition for] 'putting down' [a heavy burden of

310. Qur'ān 48:24–25. The passage continues: "God sees the things you do. They are the ones who disbelieved, and barred you from the Holy Mosque and the offering, detained so as not to reach its place of sacrifice. If it had not been for certain men believers and certain women believers whom you knew not, lest you should trample them, and there befall you guilt unwittingly on their account (that God may admit into His mercy whom He will), had they been separated clearly, then We would have chastised the unbelievers among them with a painful chastisement."

311. I.e., until death; see Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1409.

sin][312] that was offered to the Children of Israel and which they did not say." [1533]

According to Ibn Shihāb [al-Zuhrī]: Then the Messenger of God gave orders to the people, saying, "Turn right, amid the salt-bush,[313] on a path that will bring [the army] out over al-Murār Pass[314] to the descent of al-Ḥudaybiyah below Mecca." So the army traveled that path. When the horsemen of Quraysh saw the dust of the army and that the Messenger of God had turned away from their path, they galloped back to Quraysh. The Messenger of God set out, but when he entered al-Murār Pass, his camel kneeled down. The people said, "She has balked." "She has not balked," he said, "and that is not her nature; but the One who restrained the elephant from Mecca has restrained her.[315] I will grant to Quraysh any matter to which they invite me today asking me to show kindness to kindred." Then he told the people to halt. He was told, "Messenger of God, there is no water in the valley for us to halt by." So he took an arrow out of his quiver and gave it to one of his companions; the man went down into an old well, inserted the arrow into the middle of it, and the water flowed abundantly, so that the people quenched their thirst and halted there.

---

312. Arabic: al-ḥiṭṭatu allatī 'uriḍat 'alā Banī Isrā'īl. The consonants ḥ.ṭ.h (read as ḥiṭṭatun) occur in Qur'ān 2:58 and 7:161, where God commands the Children of Israel to say the word ḥ.ṭ.h (ḥiṭṭatun) as a sign of humility or repentance. The word caused difficulty; a few commentators even suggested that it was a foreign word, though curiously none seems to have referred to Hebrew ḥeṭ' "sin," or to ḥaṭṭā'āh and ḥaṭṭāt, "sin, sin offering" (see Ṭabarī, Jāmi' al-bayān, I, 237–39). Most explained it as a noun derived from the verb ḥaṭṭ, "set down (e.g., a load)," and as meaning "a petition for the putting down of a heavy burden from one; or, of the heavy burden of sin" (see Lane, Lexicon, II, 592). James Bellamy suggests reading khiṭ'atan (this involves no change in the underlying unpointed text of the Qur'ān, where the dots distinguishing ḥ and kh were not written and hamzah was not indicated). Grammatically, the word would be a maṣdar to an understood finite verb: khaṭi'na khiṭ'atan, "we have truly sinned" (cf. Bellamy, "Some Proposed Emendations," 566–67).

313. Arabic: ḥamḍ, any of a variety of shrubs with salty leaves on which camels can feed; see Lane, Lexicon, II, 644.

314. Thaniyyat al-Murār (Bitter-Bush Pass) is mentioned by Yāqūt (Mu'jam al-buldān, VIII, 3) but not located precisely.

315. Ca. A.D. 570 (the year of Muḥammad's birth), God is said to have thwarted an attack on Mecca that included an elephant: the elephant is said to have balked at advancing toward Mecca (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 941). The event is commemorated in Sura 105 of the Qur'ān. See *EI*², s.v. al-Fīl.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—a person of learning—a man from Aslam: The person who went down into the old well with the arrow of the Messenger of God was Nājiyah[316] b. 'Umayr b. Ya'mar b. Dārim. He was the driver of the sacrificial camels of the Messenger of God.

[1534] A certain person of learning alleged to me that al-Barā' b. 'Āzib[317] used to say, "I was the one who went down with the arrow of the Messenger of God."

Aslam recited some verses of poetry that Nājiyah composed, [saying,] "We thought he [viz. Nājiyah] was the one who went down with the arrow of the Messenger of God." Aslam alleged that a slave girl from the Anṣār came with her bucket while Nājiyah was in the well drawing water for the people. She said:

O drawer of water, my bucket is near you:
I saw the people praising you,
Speaking well of you, and glorifying you.

Nājiyah replied while he was in the well drawing water for the people:

A Yemeni slave girl knows that I am the water drawer and that my name is Nājiyah:
Many a broad, blood-sprinkling wound have I struck under the breast of the enemy.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-A'lā al-Ṣan'ānī—Muḥammad b. Thawr—Ma'mar—al-Zuhrī—'Urwah [b. al-Zubayr]—al-Miswar b. Makhramah; and according to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd al-Qaṭṭān—'Abdallāh b. al-Mubārak—Ma'mar—al-Zuhrī—'Urwah—al-Miswar b. Makhramah and Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, who said: The Messenger of God halted at the edge of al-Ḥudaybiyah at a seasonal pool with a little water. The people were able to draw only small amounts of water before exhausting it, and so they complained of thirst to the Messenger of God. He drew an arrow from his quiver and commanded them to

316. IH, III, 310, inserts "b. Jundab."

317. For the later life of al-Barā' b. 'Āzib b. al-Ḥārith al-Awsī, who became a partisan of 'Alī and died in al-Kūfah ca. 72/691, see *EI*², s.v. al-Barā' b. 'Āzib.

set it in the pool. By God, the pool continued to flow abundantly for them until they departed from it. [1535]

While they were there, Budayl b. Warqā' al-Khuzā'ī came to them with a band of his tribesmen from Khuzā'ah. [They were the faithful friends of the Messenger of God among the people of Tihāmah.] Budayl said: "I left Ka'b b. Lu'ayy and 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy encamped at the all-season wells of al-Ḥudaybiyah with their 'foals and dams.'[318] They intend to fight you and turn you away from the House." The Prophet said: "We have not come to fight anyone; we have come to make the lesser pilgrimage. War has exhausted and harmed Quraysh. If they wish, we will grant them a delay, and they can leave me to deal with the people.[319] If I am victorious, if they wish to enter that which the people enter[320] they can do so; if not, they will have rested and recovered their strength. If they refuse [the delay], by Him who holds my soul in His hand, I shall fight them for the sake of this affair of mine until the side of my neck becomes separated[321] or God effects his command." Budayl said, "We will inform them of what you say."

Budayl then set out and went to Quraysh and said: "We come to you from this man. We have heard him make a statement—if you want us to present it to you, we will." The foolish among them said, "We have no need for you to say anything to us from him." But someone intelligent among them said, "Present what you have heard him say." So he said, "I heard him say the following"—and he told them what the Prophet had said. 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd al-Thaqafī stood up and said, "My people, are you not the father?" "Yes," they said. "And am I not the son?" he asked. "Yes," they said.[322] "And do you doubt me?" he asked. "No," they said. "Do you not know," he said, "that [once] I called on the people of 'Ukāẓ[323] for assistance; and, when they gave me no help,

318. See note 301, above.

319. I.e., the Arabs.

320. I.e., Islam.

321. See note 311, above.

322. As the next report indicates, 'Urwah's mother, Subay'ah bt. 'Abd Shams, was from Quraysh, while his father, Mas'ūd, was from the tribe of Thaqīf from al-Ṭā'if.

323. 'Ukāẓ was the site of a yearly market a day's journey from the city of al-Ṭā'if and three days from Mecca [Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VI, 203].

[1536] I came to you with my family and children and those who obeyed me?" "Yes," they said. (According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī, who said in his report of this incident: 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd was the son of Subay'ah bt. 'Abd Shams.)

Resumption of the account of Ibn 'Abd al-A'lā and Ya'qūb: 'Urwah said: "This man has offered you a sensible proposal. Accept it, and let me go to him." They said, "Go to him." So 'Urwah went to the Prophet and began speaking to him. The Prophet spoke as he had spoken to Budayl. Then 'Urwah said: "Muḥammad, tell me: if you extirpate your tribesmen, have you ever heard of any of the Arabs who destroyed his own race before you? And if the contrary comes to pass,[324] by God I see both prominent people and rabble who are likely to flee and leave you." Abū Bakr said, "Go suck the clitoris of al-Lāt!"—al-Lāt[325] was the idol of Thaqīf, which they used to worship—"Would we flee and leave him?" "Who is this?" asked 'Urwah. They said, "Abū Bakr." 'Urwah said, "By the One who holds my soul in His hand, were it not for a favor you did me for which I have not repaid you, I would answer you."[326]

'Urwah [again] began speaking to the Prophet. As often as he spoke to him, he took hold of his beard. Al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah was standing next to the Prophet with his sword, wearing a mail neck-protector, and whenever 'Urwah extended his hand toward [1537] the Prophet's beard, al-Mughīrah struck his hand with the lower end of the scabbard and said, "Take your hand away from his beard!" 'Urwah raised his head and asked, "Who is this?" They said, "Al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah." 'Urwah said, "Treacherous man, am I not trying to rectify your act of treachery?" (During the Time of Ignorance[327] al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah had accompanied some men and killed them and taken their money. Later he had come

---

324. I.e., if Quraysh prove too powerful for you.

325. Al-Lāt (called al-Ṭāghiyah, the dominator) was a female fertility and warrior goddess worshiped especially at al-Ṭā'if. See *EI*², s.v. al-Lāt; and T. Fahd, Le panthéon de l'Arabie centrale à la veille de l'Hégire, 111–20.

326. The favor was that Abū Bakr had helped 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd pay the blood money with which 'Urwah had ended the feud caused by his nephew, al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah. See W, II, 595.

327. See note 109, above.

and accepted Islam. The Prophet had said, "As for your Islam, we accept it; but the money is money of treachery for which we have no need."[328]

'Urwah began looking at the companions of the Prophet. "By God," he said, "if the Prophet coughs up a bit of phlegm and it falls onto the hand of one of them, he rubs his face and skin with it. If he gives them an order, they vie with each other to be the first to carry it out. If he performs ablutions, they almost fight over the water he used for them. If they speak in his presence, they lower their voices and do not look sharply at him out of respect for him."

'Urwah went back to his comrades and said: "My people, by God I have gone as an envoy to kings. I have gone as an envoy to Kisrā, Caesar, and the Negus,[329] but, by God, never have I seen a king whose companions respect him as Muḥammad's companions respect Muḥammad. By God, if he coughs up a bit of phlegm and it falls onto the hand of one of them, he rubs his face and skin with it. If he gives them an order, they vie with each other to be the first to carry it out. If he performs ablutions, they almost fight over the water he used for them. If they speak in his presence, they lower their voices and do not look sharply at him out of respect for him. [1538] He has offered you a sensible proposal; accept it!"

Then a man from Kinānah[330] said, "Let me go to him." "Go to him" they said. When he came in sight of the Prophet and his companions, the Prophet said: "This is so and so. He is from a people who venerate sacrificial camels; so send them out to him." They were sent out to him. People went out to meet him shouting [the pilgrim's cry] labbayka.[331] When [the man from Kinānah] saw that, he said: "Praise God! These people should not be turned away from the House."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī, who said in his report: Then they sent to him al-Ḥulays b. 'Alqa-

328. The parallels in IH, III, 313 (from al-Zuhrī), and in W, II, 595–98 (very elaborate), tell how al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, the nephew (or perhaps grandnephew) of 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd, once killed thirteen men and took their money, causing a feud that his uncle 'Urwah ended by paying blood money for the slain men.

329. The rulers of Persia, Byzantium, and Ethiopia respectively.

330. Kinānah (b. Khuzaymah) was a tribe near Mecca. See *EI*², s.v. Kināna.

331. Literally, "at your service [O Lord]," an ancient ritual chant used by pilgrims to Mecca in pre-Islamic times and preserved in the Islamic pilgrimage.

mah (or b. Zabbān), who was the chief of the Aḥābīsh[332] at that time. He was one of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah. When the Messenger of God saw him, he said: "Surely this man is from a people who devote themselves to piety. Send the sacrificial victims toward him for him to see." When he saw the sacrificial victims streaming toward him from the side of the valley with their necklaces and having eaten away their hair from being penned up so long, he returned to Quraysh without having reached the Messenger of God, so greatly was he impressed by what he had seen. "People of Quraysh," he said, "I have seen what it is not lawful to turn away: sacrificial victims with their necklaces, having eaten away their hair from being long penned up away from their place [of sacrifice]." They said to him, "Sit down; you are only a Bedouin who knows nothing!"

[1539] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: Al-Ḥulays became angry at this and said: "People of Quraysh, by God, not on these terms did we became your confederates! Not on these terms did we league together with you—that you should turn away from the House of God those who have come to venerate it! By Him who holds the soul of al-Ḥulays in His hand, you shall leave Muḥammad free to accomplish what he came for, or I will leave, taking every last man of the Aḥābīsh!" They said to him: "Wait! Leave us alone, Ḥulays, until we obtain terms for ourselves with which we can be satisfied."

Resumption of the account of Ibn 'Abd al-A'lā and Ya'qūb: One of them named Mikraz b. Ḥafṣ stood up and said to them, "Let me go to him." "Go to him!" they said. When he came into view, the Prophet said: "This is Mikraz b. Ḥafṣ. He is a dissolute man." Mikraz came and began speaking to the Prophet, but while he was speaking to him, Suhayl b. 'Amr came. (According to Ayyūb[333]—'Ikrimah:[334] When Suhayl came, the Prophet said, "Your business has now become easy for you."[335])

---

332. See note 74, above.

333. Ayyūb b. Abī Tamīmah Kaysān al-Sakhtiyānī was born in 66/685 (or 68) and died in 131/748. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 397–99; GAS, I, 87–88.

334. 'Ikrimah, a mawlā of Ibn 'Abbās and one of the most distinguished transmitters, is said to have died around 104–7/722-25 at the age of eighty. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 263–73; and *EI*², s.v. 'Ikrima.

335. Arabic sahula "it has become easy" is a pun on the name Suhayl.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umārah al-Asadī[336] and Muḥammad b. Manṣūr[337] [the wording of the account belongs to Ibn 'Umārah]—'Ubaydallāh b. Mūsā[338]—Mūsā b. 'Ubaydah[339]—Iyās b. Salamah b. al-Akwa'—his father [Salamah b. al-Akwa'], who said: Quraysh sent Suhayl b. 'Amr, Ḥuwayṭib b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā, and Ḥafṣ b. Fulān to the Prophet to make peace with him. When the Messenger of God saw that Suhayl b. 'Amr was among them, he said: "God has made your business easy for you. The men intend to gain access to you by their kinship[340] with you and intend to ask you for peace. Send forth the sacrificial animals and proclaim the [pilgrim's cry of] labbayka; perhaps that will soften their hearts." So they cried out labbayka from throughout the camp until their voices resounded with the call.

Then [the three emissaries of Quraysh] came and asked him for [1540] peace. When the people had made peace and while there were among the Muslims some of the polytheists and among the polytheists some of the Muslims, Abū Sufyān plotted treachery against him. Suddenly the valley was flowing with men and weapons.

According to Iyās [b. Salamah]—Salamah [b. al-Akwa']: I came bringing six of the polytheists, they being armed, I leading them, and they having no power to do any good or any mischief. I brought them to the Prophet, and he neither plundered nor killed, but forgave.

As for the report of al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—Abū 'Āmir [al-'Aqadī]—

---

336. For Muḥammad b. 'Umārah b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī, see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 359–60.

337. Muḥammad b. Manṣūr b. Dāwūd b. Ibrāhīm al-Ṭūsī Abū Ja'far al-'Ābid lived at Baghdād and died in 254/868 or 256/870 at age eighty. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 472.

338. 'Ubaydallāh b. Mūsā b. Bādhām/Bādhān was born in 128/745 and died in 213 or 214/828–29. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 50–53.

339. Mūsā b. 'Ubaydah b. Nashīṭ b. 'Amr b. al-Ḥārith al-Rabadhī Abū 'Abd al-'Azīz was born in Medina and died in 152/769 or 153. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 356–60.

340. This may allude to the fact that Muḥammad's second wife, Sawdah bt. Zam'ah, whom he married shortly after the death of Khadījah, had been the sister-in-law of Suhayl b. 'Amr. Although Suhayl (the head of the Banū 'Āmir clan of Quraysh) remained a pagan, his brother, al-Sakrān b. 'Amr, had become a Muslim and took part in the second Muslim emigration to Ethiopia. After al-Sakrān's death, Muḥammad married his widow. See EI[1], s.v. Sawda bint Zam'a.

'Ikrimah b. 'Ammār al-Yamāmī—Iyās b. Salamah—his father [Salamah b. al-Akwa']), it is that [Salamah] said: After we and the people of Mecca had made peace with each other, I went to the tree, cleared away its thorns, and lay down in its shade. Four polytheists, people of Mecca, came to me and began speaking evil of the Messenger of God. Finding them hateful, I moved to another tree. They hung up their weapons and lay down. While they were lying there, suddenly someone called out from the lower part of the valley: "Help, Emigrants! Ibn Zunaym has been killed." I drew my sword, ran at the four—they were lying down—and took their weapons, which I made a bundle in my hands. Then I said, "By Him who honored Muḥammad, if any of you raises his head, I will strike off his skull."[341] I led them away to the Messenger of God.
[1541] My uncle 'Āmir brought in a man clothed in mail named Mikraz from the al-'Abalāt.[342] We made them stand before the Messenger of God along with seventy of the polytheists. The Messenger of God looked at them and said, "Let the first violating [of the peace] be theirs"—and he pardoned them. Thus God revealed: "It is He who restrained their hands from you, and your hands from them, in the hollow of Mecca."[343]

Resumption of the account of Muḥammad b. 'Umārah and Muḥammad b. Manṣūr, from 'Ubaydallāh [b. Mūsā]: Salamah [b. al-Akwa'] said: We rushed toward those of our side who were in the hands of the polytheists, and we rescued every one of our men who was in their hands. We overpowered those of their side who were in our hands. Then Quraysh sent Suhayl b. 'Amr and Ḥuwayṭib and put them in charge of their [side of the] peace; the Prophet sent 'Alī for his [side of the] peace.

According to Bishr b. Mu'ādh[344]—Yazīd b. Zuray'[345]—Sa'īd[346]—Qatādah,[347] who said: We were told that one of the

341. Literally, "I will strike off that wherein are his two eyes."

342. Al-'Abalāt was a division of the clan of Banū Umayyah al-Ṣughrā of Quraysh (Lisan, IV, 2790).

343. Qur'ān 48:24.

344. Bishr b. Mu'ādh al-'Aqadī, with whom al-Ṭabarī studied in al-Baṣrah, died in or before 245/859. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 458.

345. Abū Mu'āwiyah Yazīd b. Zuray' al-Baṣrī was born in 101/720 and died in 182/798. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 325–28.

346. Sa'īd b. Abī 'Arūbah died in the 150s (ca. 772). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 63–66.

347. Abū al-Khaṭṭāb Qatādah b. Di'āmah b. Qatādah al-Sadūsī (born 60/679, died 118/736) was a Qur'ān commentator and scholar of poetry, genealogy, and companions of the Prophet, a man named Zunaym, had gone up into the pass from al-Ḥudaybiyah and that the polytheists shot and killed him. The Messenger of God sent out horsemen, and they brought him twelve horsemen of the unbelievers. God's Prophet asked them: "Do I owe you any treaty obligations? Do I owe you any protection?" "No," they replied. Then the Messenger of God released them. God revealed concerning this the [following words of] Qur'ān: "It is He who restrained their hands from you, [1542] and your hands from them, in the hollow of Mecca"—until the words, "He sees the things you do."[348]

As for Ibn Isḥāq, he has mentioned that Quraysh sent Suhayl b. 'Amr only after a message that the Messenger of God had sent to them with 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—a certain man of learning: The Messenger of God summoned Khirāsh b. Umayyah al-Khuzā'ī and sent him to Quraysh in Mecca, mounting him on a camel of his called al-Tha'lab,[349] to inform their dignitaries from him of why he had come. Quraysh, however, hamstrung the camel of the Messenger of God that Khirāsh was riding. They intended to kill Khirāsh, but the Aḥābīsh protected him; so they released him, and he returned to the Messenger of God.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—someone I do not doubt—'Ikrimah, the mawlā of Ibn 'Abbās: Quraysh sent forty or fifty of their men and commanded them to surround[350] the camp of the Messenger of God in order to injure[351] for themselves some[352] of his companions; however, these men were taken prisoner and brought to the Messenger of God. He pardoned them and released them. They had thrown stones and shot arrows into the camp of the Messenger of God.

Then the Prophet summoned 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, to send him to Mecca to inform the dignitaries of Quraysh from him of why he history. The isnād is to a Qur'ān commentary by him. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 351–56; GAS, I, 31–32.

---

348. Qur'ān 48:24.

349. The name means "fox."

350. Arabic yuṭīfū can also mean "go around, circumambulate."

351. Arabic yuṣībū has a range of meanings from "obtain" through "injure," and even "kill."

352. IH, III, 314, reads "one."

had come. 'Umar said: "Messenger of God, I fear for my life from Quraysh. There is no one of the Banū 'Adī b. Ka'b[353] in Mecca who will protect me now that Quraysh know of my hostility and roughness to them. But I can recommend to you a man they will like better than me—'Uthmān b. 'Affān."[354] So the Messenger of God summoned 'Uthmān and sent him to Abū Sufyān and the dignitaries of Quraysh, to inform them that he had come not for [1543] war but only to visit the House and venerate its sanctity. 'Uthmān set out for Mecca. When he entered Mecca (or before he entered it), Abān b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ met him and, dismounting from his animal, mounted 'Uthmān in front of him and rode [on the same animal] behind him. He protected 'Uthmān until the latter had delivered the message of the Messenger of God. 'Uthmān hastened to Abū Sufyān and the powerful men of Quraysh and informed them of the message with which he had been sent from the Messenger of God. When 'Uthmān had finished the message of the Messenger of God to them, they said to him, "If you wish to circumambulate the House, do so." He replied, "I will not do it until the Messenger of God circumambulates it." Quraysh then imprisoned him, and a report reached the Messenger of God and the Muslims that 'Uthmān had been killed.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: When the Messenger of God received a report that 'Uthmān had been killed, he said, "We will not leave until we fight it out with the enemy"—and he summoned the people to swear allegiance. Thus the Pledge of al-Riḍwān[355] took place under the tree.

According to Ibn 'Umārah al-Asadī—'Ubaydallāh b. Mūsā—Mūsā b. 'Ubaydah—Iyās b. Salamah—Salamah b. al-Akwa', who

353. The Banū 'Adī b. Ka'b were 'Umar's clan. They belonged to the group of less influential clans known as Quraysh al-Ẓawāhir ("of the outskirts"), whose quarters were far from the central area of Mecca.

354. 'Uthmān was a member of the influential clan of Banū Umayyah b. 'Abd Shams (the clan of Abū Sufyān) and would thus be a more respected emissary. As the sequel shows, 'Uthmān was immediately taken under the protection of his cousin, Abān b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ b. Umayyah.

355. I.e., the Pledge of [God's] Being Well Pleased [with the Muslims], alluding to the verse of Qur'ān revealed concerning the occasion [Qur'ān 48:18], as explained in the next paragraph. Watt in his *EI*² article on al-Ḥudaybiya calls it the Pledge of Good Pleasure.

said: While we were returning from al-Ḥudaybiyah, the Prophet's crier announced: "People, an oath of allegiance! An oath of allegiance! The Holy Spirit[356] has descended!" So we hastened to the Messenger of God, who was under an acacia tree, and swore allegiance to him. This was what God referred to when He said: "God was well pleased with the believers when they were swearing allegiance to you under the tree."[357] [1544]

According to 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. Bayān[358]—Muḥammad b. Yazīd[359]—Ismā'īl b. Abī Khālid[360]—'Āmir,[361] who said: The first to swear the Pledge of al-Riḍwān was a man from the Banū Asad named Abū Sinān b. Wahb.

According to Yūnus b. 'Abd al-A'lā—Ibn Wahb—al-Qāsim b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar[362]—Muḥammad b. al-Munkadir[363]—Jābir b. 'Abdallāh: They were fourteen hundred on the day of al-Ḥudaybiyah.[364] [Jābir] said: We swore allegiance to the Messenger of God while 'Umar was holding his hand under the tree, which was an acacia. We swore allegiance to him—except al-Jadd b. Qays al-Anṣārī, who hid under the belly of his camel.

Jābir said: We swore allegiance to the Messenger of God that we would not flee; we did not swear allegiance to him to the death.

Another account of this is as follows. According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—Abū 'Āmir—'Ikrimah b. 'Ammār al-Yamāmī—Iyās b. Salamah b. al-Akwa'—his father [Salamah b. al-Akwa']: The Prophet summoned the people to swear allegiance at the foot of the tree. I swore allegiance to him among the first of the people;

---

356. Arabic: rūḥ al-qudus, normally referring to the Angel Gabriel as the intermediary who delivered the Qur'ānic revelations to Muḥammad.

357. Qur'ān 48:18.

358. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. Bayān died in 244/858. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 111.

359. Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Kulā'ī Abū Sa'īd al-Wāsiṭī was a mawlā of Syrian origin who died in 188/803–4. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 527–28.

360. Ismā'īl b. Abī Khālid al-Aḥmasī, a mawlā known for his superior knowledge of reports from al-Sha'bī, died in 146/763. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 291–92.

361. Abū 'Amr 'Āmir b. Sharāḥīl b. 'Amr al-Sha'bī, a member of the South Arabian tribe of Hamdān, was born in al-Kūfah in 19/640, and died in 103/721. In addition to political activity, he was a transmitter of ḥadīth and a major source for later historians. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 65–69; EI[1], s.v. al-Sha'bī; GAS, I, 277.

362. Al-Qāsim b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ b. 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb died between 150/767 and 160/776–77. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 320–21.

363. Muḥammad b. al-Munkadir b. 'Abdallāh al-Taymī died ca. 130/747–48 at the age of seventy-six. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 473–75.

364. Ed. Cairo: "they were fourteen and a hundred"—i.e., 114.

then he received more and more pledges of allegiance, until, when he was in the middle of the people, he said, "Swear allegiance, Salamah!" I said, "I did swear allegiance to you, Messenger of God, among the first of the people." He said, "Again!" Seeing me unarmed, the Prophet gave me a [shield of the kind called] ḥajafah or daraqah.[365] The Messenger of God received the people's pledges of allegiance until, having arrived at the last of them, he said, "Aren't you going to swear allegiance, Salamah?" I said, "Messenger of God, I did swear allegiance to you among the first of the people and in the middle group." "Again!" he said. So I swore allegiance to him for the third time. The Messenger of God said, "Where are the daraqah and[366] ḥajafah that I gave you?" I said, [1545] "My uncle ʿĀmir came up to me without a weapon, and I gave it[367] to him." The Messenger of God laughed and said, "You are like the one who said of old, 'O God, help me find a friend who shall be dearer to me than myself.'"

Resumption of the account of Ibn Isḥāq: The people swore allegiance to the Messenger of God. None of the Muslims who were present on the occasion hung back except al-Jadd b. Qays, a member of the Banū Salimah. Jābir b. ʿAbdallāh used to say: "It is as if I could see him now, clinging to the armpit of his camel. He had taken refuge there to hide from the people by means of her." Word then came to the Messenger of God that the report about ʿUthmān was false.

According to Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī: Quraysh then sent Suhayl b. ʿAmr, a member of the Banū ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy, to the Messenger of God. They instructed Suhayl: "Go to Muḥammad and make peace with him. Let the only provision of the peace with him be that he shall go away from us this year; for, by God, the Arabs must never say that he entered our territory by force."

---

365. Both terms, which can be synonymous, refer to a shield made of heavy animal skins without wood. Insofar as the dictionaries distinguish between them, the ḥajafah was taken to be the native Arab shield made of layered camel hides, while the daraqah was said to be made of hippopotamus or crocodile skins imported from Ethiopia. See Lane, Lexicon, II, 520; III, 872.

366. The parallel in Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, reads "your ḥajafah or daraqah"—ed. Leiden, note.

367. The pronoun -hā (feminine singular or collective plural, but not dual) implies that only one shield was given.

Suhayl b. 'Amr approached. When the Messenger of God saw him coming, he said, "The people [of Quraysh] intended peace when they sent this man." When Suhayl reached the Messenger of God, he spoke for a long time. The two men negotiated with each other, and peace was made between them. When the matter had been arranged and only the writing of the document remained, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb jumped up and went to Abū Bakr and said, "Abū Bakr, isn't he the Messenger of God?" "Yes," he replied. "And are we not Muslims?" he asked. "Yes," he replied. "And are they not polytheists?" he asked. "Yes," he replied. "Then why," asked 'Umar, "should we grant what is detrimental to our religion?" Abū Bakr said, "'Umar, stick to what he says,[368] for I bear witness that he is the Messenger of God." 'Umar said, "I, too, bear witness that he is the Messenger of God."

'Umar then went to the Messenger of God and said, "Messenger of God, are you not the Messenger of God?" "Yes," he replied. [1546] "And are we not Muslims?" asked 'Umar. "Yes," he replied. "And are they not polytheists?" he asked. "Yes," he replied. "Then why," asked 'Umar, "should we grant what is detrimental to our religion?" He replied: "I am God's servant and messenger. I will never disobey His command, and He will not allow me to perish." ['Umar used to say, "I continued to fast, give alms, pray, and free slaves because of what I did on that day, for fear of the words I had spoken, until I hoped it would be set right."]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Buraydah b. Sufyān b. Farwah al-Aslamī[369]—Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Quraẓī—'Alqamah b. Qays al-Nakha'ī—'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, who said: Then the Messenger of God summoned me and said, "Write, 'In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate.'" Suhayl said: "I do not know this one.[370] Write rather, 'In Thy name, O God.'" So the Messenger of God said, "Write, 'In Thy name, O

368. Literally, "hold closely to his stirrup." See Lane, Lexicon, VI, 2246, s.v. gharz for the idiom.

369. Buraydah b. Sufyān b. Farwah al-Aslamī is mentioned as a tābi'ī (but without dates) in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 433–34.

370. Suhayl's objection is to the peculiarly Muslim formula, "the Merciful and Compassionate," (cf. the parallel in W, II, 610, "I do not know 'the Merciful [al-Raḥmān]'") not to the invocation of God under the name Allāh. Suhayl's formula itself uses the name Allāh.

God'"—and I wrote it. Then he said, "Write, 'This is that whereon Muḥammad the Messenger of God has made peace with Suhayl b. 'Amr.'" Suhayl b. 'Amr said: "If I testified that you are the Messenger of God, I would not fight you. Write rather your name and the name of your father." So the Messenger of God said, "Write: This is that whereon Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh has made peace with Suhayl b. 'Amr. The two have agreed on these terms: that warfare shall be laid aside by the people for ten years, during which the people shall be safe and refrain from [attacking] each other; that whoever shall come to the Messenger of God from Quraysh without the permission of his guardian, [Muḥammad] shall return him to them; that whoever shall come to Quraysh from those who are with the Messenger of God, they shall not return him to [Muḥammad]; that there shall be between us a breast bound [to fulfill the terms of this writing];[371] that there shall be neither clandestine theft nor betrayal;[372] and that anyone who wishes to enter into treaty and pact with the Messenger of [1547] God may do so, and anyone who wishes to enter into treaty and pact with Quraysh may do so." [The Khuzā'ah jumped up and said, "We have a treaty and pact with the Messenger of God." The Banū Bakr jumped up and said, "We have a treaty and compact with Quraysh."][373] "You shall go back, leaving us this year and not entering Mecca against us. When the next year comes, we will go out, away from you, and you shall enter Mecca with your companions and stay there for three nights: you shall have with you the weapons of a rider, with the swords in scabbards; you shall not enter with other weapons."

While the Messenger of God was writing the document—he and

371. Arabic: anna baynanā 'aybatan makfūfatan, literally "a receptacle closed [or tied up]." The phrase is enigmatic. Lane, Lexicon, V, 2206, lists three quite different explanations. The first is that it means there shall be between us as it were a receptacle closed and fastened by its loops over its contents—i.e., a breast bound to fulfill the terms of the treaty. Another interpretation is that as a receptacle is tied up so shall evil be tied up between the two sides. Yet another interpretation is that there shall be sincere friendship between the two sides [a friend being often compared to a receptacle in which one can deposit one's secrets].

372. Arabic: lā islāla wa-lā ighlāla, thus interpreted by Abū Dharr's commentary on the Sīrah. Alternatively, the two terms may be taken as referring to secret and open violations.

373. This notice anticipates the violence between the Banū Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah [allies of Quraysh] and the Banū Khuzā'ah [allies of Muḥammad] in A.H. 8, which precipitated the Muslim conquest of Mecca. See p. 160, below.

Suhayl b. 'Amr—suddenly Abū Jandal, the son of Suhayl b. 'Amr, came walking with short steps in shackles. He had escaped to the Messenger of God. The companions of the Messenger of God had set out not doubting that they would conquer, because of a vision the Messenger of God had seen. Therefore, when they saw what they saw—the peace, the retreat, and the obligations the Messenger of God had taken on himself—the people felt so grieved about it that they were close to despair. When Suhayl saw Abū Jandal, he went up to him, struck him on the face, and grabbed him by the front of his garment. "Muḥammad," he said, "the pact was ratified between me and you before this fellow came to you." "You are right," he replied. Suhayl began pulling and dragging [his son Abū Jandal] by the front of his garment to return him to Quraysh. Abū Jandal began screaming at the top of his voice, "People of the Muslims, shall I be returned to the polytheists for them [1548] to torment me for my religion?" This made the people feel even worse. The Messenger of God said: "Abū Jandal, count on a reward, for God will give you and those who are oppressed with you relief and a way out. We have made a treaty and peace between ourselves and these people; we have given them and they have given us a promise, and we will not act treacherously toward them."

'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb jumped up with Abū Jandal, walking beside him, and saying, "Be patient, Abū Jandal! They are only polytheists, and the blood of any of them is no more than the blood of a dog!" He held the hilt of his sword close to him. ['Umar used to say, "I hoped he would take the sword and strike his father with it, but the man was too attached to his father."]

When the writing was finished, he had some of the Muslims and some of the polytheists witness the peace: Abū Bakr b. Abī Quḥāfah, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf, 'Abdallāh b. Suhayl b. 'Amr, Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, Maḥmūd b. Maslamah [a member of the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal], Mikraz b. Ḥafṣ b. al-Akhyaf [a polytheist, a member the Banū 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy], and 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, who wrote—he was the writer of the document.

According to Hārūn b. Isḥāq[374]—Muṣ'ab b. al-Miqdām,[375] and 374. Hārūn b. Isḥāq b. Muḥammad al-Hamdānī al-Kūfī died in 285/898. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 2–3.

375. Muṣ'ab b. al-Miqdām al-Khath'amī al-Kūfī died in 203/818. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 165–66.

according to Sufyān b. Wakī'—his father [Wakī' b. al-Jarrāḥ];[376] each of the two said: according to Isrā'īl—Abū Isḥāq—al-Barā', who said:[377] The Messenger of God set out to perform the lesser pilgrimage during Dhū al-Qa'dah. The people of Mecca refused to allow him to enter Mecca until he made a pact with them that he would stay there [only] three days. When he wrote the document, [1549] he wrote, "This is what Muḥammad the Messenger of God has agreed to." They said, "If we knew that you are the Messenger of God, we would not prevent you; but you are Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh." He replied, "I am the Messenger of God, and I am Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh." He said to 'Alī, "Erase 'Messenger of God.'" "No," he replied, "by God, I will never erase you!" So the Messenger of God took the document—he did not write well—and wrote "Muḥammad" in place of "the Messenger of God."[378] Then he wrote: "This is what Muḥammad has agreed to: he shall not enter Mecca with weapons, except swords in scabbards; he shall not depart from its people taking anyone who wants to follow him; and he shall not hinder any of his companions who wants to stay in Mecca." When Muḥammad entered Mecca and the time elapsed, they came to 'Alī and said to him, "Tell your master to leave us, for the time has elapsed." So the Messenger of God left.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-A'lā—Muḥammad b. Thawr—Ma'mar—al-Zuhrī—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—al-Miswar b. Makhramah; and according to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd—'Abdallāh b. al-Mubārak—Ma'mar—al-Zuhrī—'Urwah—al-Miswar b. Makhramah and Marwān b. al-Ḥakam in the story of al-Ḥudaybiyah:[379] When the Messenger of God had finished his pact, he said to his companions, "Arise, sacrifice, and shave." By 376. Wakī' b. al-Jarrāḥ b. Mulayḥ (or Malīḥ) al-Ru'āsī Abū Sufyān was born ca. 129/746 in al-Kūfah. Regarded as one of the leading ḥadīth scholars of his time, he died ca. 197/812. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 123–31; GAS, I, 96–97.

377. Parallel in al-Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ (ed. Būlāq), III, 154.

378. The text as it stands is illogical. The parallel in al-Bukhārī omits "Muḥammad" (yielding, "he wrote [something] in place of 'the Messenger of God'"). As the Leiden editor notes, one could restore the logic of the passage by assuming that the treaty as originally drafted began, "This is what the Messenger of God has agreed to" (omitting "Muḥammad"). The sense of the report thus would be that Muḥammad replaced "the Messenger of God" with "Muḥammad."

379. Parallel: al-Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ (ed. Būlāq), III, 167.

God, not a man stood up until he had said it three times. When no one stood up, he arose and went into [the tent of] Umm Salamah and told her what he had encountered from the people. Umm Salamah said to him: "Prophet of God, do you approve of this? Go out, and speak not a word to any of them until you have slaughtered your fattened camel and summoned your shaver to shave you." He arose, went out, and spoke not a word to anyone until he [1550] had done this. He slaughtered his fattened camel and called his shaver, who shaved him. When they saw this, they rose up and slaughtered, and they began to shave each other, until they almost killed each other for grief.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: The person who shaved him that day—according to my information—was Khirāsh b. Umayyah b. al-Faḍl al-Khuzā'ī.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ[380]—Mujāhid—Ibn 'Abbās, who said:[381] On the day of al-Ḥudaybiyah, some men shaved [their heads] and others shortened [their hair by cutting it]. The Messenger of God said, "God will have mercy on those who shave." They asked, "And those who shorten, Messenger of God?" He replied, "God will have mercy on those who shave." They asked, "And those who shorten, Messenger of God?" He replied, "God will have mercy on those who shave." They asked, "Messenger of God, and those who shorten?" He replied, "And those who shorten." They asked, "Messenger of God, why did you explicitly mention mercy for those who shave and not those who shorten?" He replied, "Because they did not doubt."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid—Ibn 'Abbās, who said: Among the victims that he sacrificed the year of al-Ḥudaybiyah, the Messenger of God sacrificed a camel stallion belonging to Abū Jahl[382] which had a silver nose ring, and this he did to anger the polytheists.

---

380. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ died in 131 or 132/748–50. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 355; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 54–55. Sezgin (GAS, I, 20) argues that Ibn Abī Najīḥ was the author of a commentary on the Qur'ān commentary of Mujāhid.

381. Parallel: IH, III, 319 (tr. Guillaume, 505).

382. Abū Jahl (or Abū al-Ḥakam) 'Amr b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah, the leader of the Banū Makhzūm clan of Quraysh, was a prominent opponent of Muḥammad.

Resumption of the account of al-Zuhrī that we have mentioned previously: Then the Prophet returned to Medina.

In his account, Ibn Ḥumayd (on the authority of Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī) adds that al-Zuhrī used to say: No victory greater than this one had been won previously in Islam. There had been only fighting when the people met together; however, when the [1551] truce took place, and war laid down its burdens, and all the people felt safe with each other, they met with each other in conversation and debate, and no one possessing understanding was told about Islam but embraced it. Thus, in those two years as many or more entered Islam as had been in it before.

All [transmitters of the account] from al-Zuhrī—'Urwah—al-Miswar and Marwān say: When the Messenger of God arrived in Medina, Abū Baṣīr, a man from Quraysh, came to him.

According to Ibn Isḥāq in his report:[383] Abū Baṣīr 'Utbah b. Asīḍ[384] b. Jāriyah, a Muslim, was one of those confined in Mecca. When he came to the Messenger of God, Azhar b. 'Abd 'Awf and al-Akhnas b. Sharīq b. 'Amr b. Wahb al-Thaqafī wrote concerning him to the Messenger of God and sent a man from the Banū 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy along with a mawlā of that clan. The two brought the letter of al-Azhar and al-Akhnas to the Messenger of God. The Messenger of God said: "Abū Baṣīr, you know what we have given these people. Breaking a promise is not right in our religion. God will give you and those who are oppressed with you relief and a way out."

Abū Baṣīr departed with the two men. When he was at Dhū al-[1552] Ḥulayfah, he sat against a wall, and his two companions sat with him. Abū Baṣīr said, "Is this sword of yours sharp, O tribesman of the Banū 'Āmir?" "Yes," he replied. "May I look at it?" he said. "If you wish," he replied. Abū Baṣīr unsheathed it, attacked the man with it, and killed him. The mawlā hurried away and came to the Messenger of God while the latter was sitting in the mosque. When the Messenger of God caught sight of him, he said, "This man has seen something fearful." When he reached the Messenger

---

Presumably, the camel had been captured at the Battle of Badr, where Abū Jahl had been killed. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 1187; *EI*², s.v. Abū Djahl.

383. IH, III, 323–24 (tr. Guillaume, 507–8); parallel in W, II, 624–29.

384. Ed. Cairo: Usayd. Al-Dhahabī, al-Mushtabih, 12, gives Asīd as the name of Abū Baṣīr's father.

of God, the latter asked, "Alas, what has happened to you?" The man replied, "Your companion killed my companion." By God, while the man was still there, Abū Baṣīr appeared girded with the sword and halted before the Messenger of God, saying: "Messenger of God, your obligation has been fulfilled and has been discharged from you.[385] You surrendered me and returned me to them, but God rescued me from them." The Prophet said: "Woe to his mother! A kindler of war's fire"—Ibn Isḥāq, in his account, said "a stirrer up of war"—"if he had men with him!" When Abū Baṣīr heard this, he knew that he would return him to them. So Abū Baṣīr went out and encamped at al-'Īṣ,[386] in the vicinity of Dhū al-Marwah, on the coast of the sea, on the route that Quraysh used to take to Syria. The words that the Messenger of God had spoken to Abū Baṣīr—"Woe to his mother! A stirrer up of war if he had men with him!"—were reported to the Muslims who were confined in Mecca, and they went out to Abū Baṣīr at al-'Īṣ. Abū Jandal b. Suhayl b. 'Amr escaped and joined Abū Baṣīr. Nearly seventy such men gathered around him, and they harassed Quraysh. By God, whenever they heard of a caravan of Quraysh that had set out for Syria, they intercepted it, killed the men, and took their goods. Quraysh therefore sent to the Prophet, imploring him for the sake of God and the bond of kinship to send word to them that whoever came to him would be safe.[387] So the Messenger of God gave them refuge, and they came to him in Medina.

Ibn Isḥāq added in his account: When word of how Abū Baṣīr [1553] had killed their companion from the Banū 'Āmir reached Suhayl b. 'Amr, he leaned his back against the Ka'bah and said, "I will not remove my back from the Ka'bah until they pay blood money for this man."[388] Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb said: "By God, this is foolishness. By God, no blood money will be paid for him." He said it three times.

385. Ibn Hishām: "and God has discharged it for you."

386. Al-'Īṣ is said to be four nights' journey from Medina and two nights' journey from Dhū al-Marwah (a village in Wādī al-Qurā, the long valley extending north from Medina toward Syria)—see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II, 23.

387. I.e., he would not be returned to Mecca.

388. As the leader of the Banū 'Āmir, Suhayl b. 'Amr had responsibility for demanding compensation for the murder of a fellow clansman.

According to Ibn 'Abd al-A'lā and Ya'qūb in their account:[389] Believing women then came to him (that is, the Messenger of God). God therefore revealed to him: "O believers, when believing women come to you as emigrants"—until the words, "to the ties of unbelieving women."[390] On that day 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb divorced two women who had been his wives in polytheism. Thus, He forbade them to send the women back, but commanded them to return the bride price at that time. (A man asked al-Zuhrī, "Was that because of conjugal relations?" "Yes," he replied.[391]) Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān married one of the women; Ṣafwān b. Umayyah married the other.

Ibn Isḥāq added in his account: Umm Kulthūm bt. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ emigrated to the Messenger of God during that period. Her brothers, 'Umārah and al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah, went to the Messenger of God to ask him to return her to them according to the treaty made between him and Quraysh at al-Ḥudaybiyah, but he did not do so: God had rejected it.

Ibn Isḥāq also said in his report: Among those who divorced (their unbelieving wives) was 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who divorced [1554] his wives Quraybah bt. Abī Umayyah b. al-Mughīrah (Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān married her afterward in Mecca while both of them were still polytheists) and Umm Kulthūm bt. 'Amr b. Jarwal al-Khuzā'iyyah,[392] the mother of 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar (Abū Jahm b. Ḥudhāfah b. Ghānim, one of her tribesmen, married her in Mecca while both of them were still polytheists).

According to al-Wāqidī:[393] In this year, in the month of Rabī'

389. Parallel: al-Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ (ed. Būlāq), III, 127.

390. Qur'ān 60:10. The passage reads: "O believers, when believing women come to you as emigrants, test them. God knows very well their belief. Then, if you know them to be believers, return them not to the unbelievers. They are not permitted to the unbelievers, nor are the unbelievers permitted to them. Give the unbelievers what they have expended (on them); and there is no fault in you to marry them when you have given them their due. Do not hold fast to the ties of unbelieving women."

391. I.e., the bride price (ṣadāq), being the husband's payment to the woman for sexual rights, should be returned to indemnify the unbelieving husband for the loss of his now Muslim wife.

392. IH, II, 327, reads: Umm Kulthūm bt. Jarwal (omitting 'Amr). The Leiden editor prefers Ibn Hishām's reading.

393. Parallel with fuller text: W, II, 550.

II,[394] the Messenger of God sent out 'Ukkāshah b. Miḥṣan with forty men to al-Ghamr.[395] Among them were Thābit b. Aqram and Shujā' b. Wahb. He traveled quickly, but the enemy became aware and fled. He encamped by their water and sent out scouts. They captured a spy who guided them to some of their cattle. They found two hundred camels and brought them down to Medina.

In this year the Messenger of God sent out Muḥammad b. Maslamah with ten men in Rabī' I.[396] The enemy lay in wait for them until he and his companions went to sleep. Before they suspected anything, there was the enemy. The companions of Muḥammad b. Maslamah were killed; Muḥammad escaped wounded.

According to al-Wāqidī:[397] In this year the Messenger of God dispatched the raiding party of Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ to Dhū al-Qaṣṣah in the month of Rabī' II with forty men. They traveled through the night on foot and reached Dhū al-Qaṣṣah just before dawn. They raided the inhabitants, who escaped them by fleeing [1555] to the mountains, and took cattle, old clothes, and a single man. He became a Muslim, and the Messenger of God released him.

In this year a raiding party led by Zayd b. Ḥārithah went to al-Jamūm.[398] He captured a woman of the Muzaynah named Ḥalīmah, who guided them to an encampment of the Banū Sulaym, where they captured cattle, sheep, and prisoners. Among the prisoners was Ḥalīmah's husband. When Zayd brought back what he had taken, the Messenger of God granted to the woman of Muzaynah her husband and her freedom.

In this year a raiding party led by Zayd b. Ḥārithah went to al-'Īṣ in Jumādā I.[399] During it, the property that was with Abū al-'Āṣ b.

---

394. Rabī' II of A.H. 6 began on 20 August 627.

395. Al-Ghamr was a watering place belonging to the Banū Asad b. Khuzaymah to the east of Medina in the Yamāmah (central Arabia); see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VI, 304.

396. Rabī' I of A.H. 6 began on 21 July 627. Parallel with fuller text: W, II, 551–52, where the destination of this raid, like the following one, is given as Dhū al-Qaṣṣah of the Banū Tha'labah and 'Uwāl (subtribes of Ghaṭafān), a night's march east of Medina.

397. Parallel with fuller text: W, II, 552. Another account (perhaps the same raid) of a raid by Abū 'Ubaydah to the coast is in IH, IV, 632–33 (tr. Guillaume, 673).

398. The nature and date of this raid are uncertain.

399. Jumādā I of A.H. 6 began on 18 September 627. Parallel (with fuller text): W, II, 553–55.

al-Rabī' was taken. He asked the Prophet's daughter Zaynab to grant him refuge, and she did so.[400]

In this year a fifteen-man raiding party led by Zayd b. Ḥārithah went to al-Ṭaraf in Jumādā II against the Banū Tha'labah.[401] The Bedouins fled, fearing that the Messenger of God had set out against them. Zayd took twenty camels from their herds. He was away four nights.

In this year a raiding party led by Zayd b. Ḥārithah went to Ḥismā in Jumādā II.[402] According to [al-Wāqidī]—Mūsā b. Muḥammad—his father [Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm], who said: The beginning of this incident was when Diḥyah al-Kalbī came back from the court of Caesar,[403] who had presented Diḥyah with gifts of merchandise and clothing. When Diḥyah reached Ḥismā, men from Judhām[404] intercepted him and robbed him, leaving him [1556] with nothing. He came to the Messenger of God even before entering his own house [in Medina] and informed him. The Messenger of God then sent Zayd b. Ḥārithah to Ḥismā.

In this year 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb married Jamīlah bt. Thābit b. Abī al-Aqlaḥ. She was the sister of 'Āṣim b. Thābit. Jamīlah bore him 'Āṣim b. 'Umar; then 'Umar divorced her. Yazīd b. Jāriyah

---

400. Zaynab was Muḥammad's daughter by Khadījah, his first wife, and her marriage to Abū al-'Āṣ b. al-Rabī' b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. 'Abd Shams, an influential merchant, had taken place before Muḥammad began to receive revelations. Although Abū al-'Āṣ remained a pagan, Zaynab continued to live with him in Mecca even after Muḥammad's emigration to Medina. After Abū al-'Āṣ was captured at the Battle of Badr, it was arranged that he would be released in return for Zaynab's leaving him and coming to Medina. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 1347–51; IH, II, 651–60 (tr. Guillaume, 313–18); Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 20–24; EI[1], s.v. Zainab bint Muḥammad.

401. Jumādā II of A.H. 6 began on 18 October 627. Parallel: W, II, 555. According to Ibn Sa'd [Ṭabaqāt, II, 63] al-Ṭaraf was a watering place near al-Marāḍ, before al-Nakhīl, thirty-six miles from Medina; according to IH, IV, 616, it was near Nakhl on the road to Iraq.

402. Parallel with fuller text: W, II, 555–60. Ḥismā was on the route to Syria, west of Tabūk. Another account, probably of the same raid, can be found in IH, IV, 612–16 [tr. Guillaume, pp. 662–64]. See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 43f.

403. On Diḥyah's mission to the court of the Byzantine emperor Heraclius, who was in Palestine at the time, see pp. 100, 104–6, below.

404. Judhām was a nomadic tribe on the borders of the Byzantine empire. They ranged from places like Madyan, 'Ammān, Ma'ān, and Adhruḥ as far south as Tabūk and Wādī al-Qurā. They were among the Arab allies of the Byzantines. See EI[2], s.v. Djudhām.

married her after him, and she bore him 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Yazīd, who was 'Āṣim's half-brother through his mother.

In this year a raiding party led by Zayd b. Ḥārithah went to Wādī al-Qurā[405] in Rajab.[406]

In this year a raiding party led by 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf went to Dūmat al-Jandal in Sha'bān.[407] The Messenger of God said to him, "If they obey you, marry the daughter of their king." The people became Muslims, and therefore 'Abd al-Raḥmān married Tumāḍir bt. al-Aṣbagh. She became the mother of Abū Salamah [b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf]. Her father was their chief and king.[408]

In this year the people suffered a severe drought. The Messenger of God therefore led the people in prayers for rain in the month of Ramaḍān.[409]

In this year a raiding party led by 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib went to Fadak in Sha'bān.[410] According to [al-Wāqidī]—'Abdallāh b. Ja'far[411]—Ya'qūb b. 'Utbah,[412] who said: 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib set out for Fadak with a hundred men against a clan of the Banū Sa'd b. Bakr. This was because the Messenger of God had received information that a force of theirs intended to aid the Jews of Khaybar. 'Alī traveled toward them by night and lay in wait during the day. He captured a spy, who confessed to them that he had been sent to Khaybar to offer the people their aid on condition that they would give them the date harvest of Khaybar.

In this year a raiding party led by Zayd b. Ḥārithah set out [1557]

405. Wādī al-Qurā ("the Valley of the Villages") was a fertile valley stretching north from Medina on the road to Syria; see EI[1] s.v. Wādī 'l-Ḳurā.

406. Rajab of A.H. 6 began on 16 November 627.

407. For Dūmat al-Jandal, see note 16, above. Sha'bān of A.H. 6 began on 16 December 627. Parallel with fuller text: W, II, 560–62; IH, IV, 631–32 (tr. Guillaume, 672).

408. His full name was al-Aṣbagh b. 'Amr al-Kalbī. See EI[2], II, s.v. Dūmat al-Djandal.

409. Ramaḍān of A.H. 6 began on 14 January 628.

410. Parallel with fuller text: W, II, 562–63. Fadak was a village near Khaybar, north of Medina. See EI[2], s.v. Fadak.

411. Ed. Cairo, index, identifies him as 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far al-Zuhrī, based on the isnād in al-Ṭabarī, I, 1081.

412. Ya'qūb b. 'Utbah b. al-Mughīrah al-Thaqafī, a contemporary of al-Zuhrī, was an expert on the biography of the Prophet. He died in 128/745. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 392; GAS, I, 283. (Ed. Cairo's reading "b. 'Uqbah" is a misprint.)

against Umm Qirfah in the month of Ramaḍān.[413] During it, Umm Qirfah (Fāṭimah bt. Rabī'ah b. Badr) suffered a cruel death. He tied her legs with rope and then tied her between two camels until they split her in two. She was a very old woman.

Her story is as follows. According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr, who said: The Messenger of God sent Zayd b. Ḥārithah to Wādī al-Qurā, where he encountered the Banū Fazārah. Some of his companions were killed there, and Zayd was carried away wounded from among the slain. One of those killed was Ward b. 'Amr, one of the Banū Sa'd b. Hudhaym:[414] he was killed by one of the Banū Badr [b. Fazārah]. When Zayd returned, he vowed that no washing [to cleanse him] from impurity should touch his head until he had raided the Fazārah.[415] After he recovered from his wounds, the Messenger of God sent him with an army against the Banū Fazārah. He met them in Wādī al-Qurā and inflicted casualties on them. Qays b. al-Musaḥḥar al-Ya'murī killed Mas'adah b. Ḥakamah b. Mālik b. Badr and took Umm Qirfah prisoner. (Her name was Fāṭimah bt. Rabī'ah b. Badr. She was married to Mālik b. Ḥudhayfah b. Badr. She was very old woman.) He also took one of Umm Qirfah's daughters and 'Abdallāh b. Mas'adah prisoner. Zayd b. Ḥārithah ordered Qays to kill Umm Qirfah, and he killed her cruelly. He [1558] tied each of her legs with a rope and tied the ropes to two camels, and they split her in two. Then they brought Umm Qirfah's daughter and 'Abdallāh b. Mas'adah to the Messenger of God. Umm Qirfah's daughter belonged to Salamah b. 'Amr b. al-Akwa', who had taken her—she was a member of a distinguished family among her people: the Arabs used to say, "Had you been more powerful than Umm Qirfah, you could have done no more."[416] The Messenger of God asked Salamah for her, and Salamah gave

413. Parallels with fuller text: W, II, 564–65; IH, IV, 617–18 (tr. Guillaume, 664–65).

414. Ibn Hudhaym is Ibn Hishām's correction (accepted by the Leiden editor) of Ibn Isḥāq's original reading "Ibn Hudhayl."

415. This implies that he vowed to abstain from sexual relations, since the word for "major ritual impurity" (janābah) refers specifically to the impurity contracted by sexual relations, which requires full washing of the body.

416. The proverb is discussed in Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, II, 151 and 710.

her to him. He then gave her to his maternal uncle, Ḥazn b. Abī Wahb, and she bore him 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥazn.

The other version of the story of this expedition—from Salamah b. al-Akwa'—is that its commander was Abū Bakr b. Abī Quḥāfah.[417] According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—Abū 'Āmir—'Ikrimah b. 'Ammār—Iyās b. Salamah—his father [Salamah b. al-Akwa'], who said: The Messenger of God appointed Abū Bakr as our commander, and we raided some of the Banū Fazārah. When we came near the watering place, Abū Bakr ordered us to halt for a rest. After we prayed the dawn prayer, Abū Bakr ordered us to launch the raid against them. We went down to the watering place, and there we killed some people. I saw a group of people, women and children among them, who had almost outstripped us to the mountain; so I sent an arrow between them and the mountain. When they saw the arrow, they stopped, and I led them back to Abū Bakr. Among them was a woman of the Banū Fazārah [1559] wearing a worn-out piece of leather.[418] With her was her daughter, among the fairest of the Arabs. Abū Bakr gave me her daughter as booty. When I returned to Medina, the Messenger of God met me in the market and said, "Salamah—how excellent the father who begot you!—give me the woman." I said, "Messenger of God, I like her, by God, and I have not uncovered her garment." He said nothing to me until the next day, when he met me in the market and said, "Salamah—how excellent a father begot you!—give me the woman." I said: "Messenger of God, I have not uncovered her garment. She is yours, Messenger of God." The Messenger of God sent her to Mecca, and with her he ransomed some Muslim captives who were in the hands of the polytheists. [This version of the story comes from Salamah.]

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]: In this year a raiding party led by Kurz b. Jābir al-Fihrī set out against the members of the Banū 'Uraynah who had killed the herdsman of the 417. Parallel in Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, IV, 197.

418. Her garment is called a qash'. Lisān, V, 3637, cites this tradition without the words "of leather" and argues that the word means "old, worn-out fur." Another meaning is "a piece of old, worn-out leather," which fits in this version. See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CDXXIV.

Messenger of God and driven off camels in Shawwāl of the year 6.[419] The Messenger of God sent Kurz with twenty horsemen.

The Missions to Foreign Rulers

In this year the Messenger of God sent out messengers.[420] He sent out six persons in the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah,[421] three of them setting out together: Ḥāṭib b. Abī Balta'ah of Lakhm, a confederate of the Banū Asad b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā, to al-Muqawqis;[422] Shujā' b. Wahb of the Banū Asad b. Khuzaymah, a confederate of Ḥarb b. Umayyah and veteran of Badr, to al-Ḥārith b. Abī Shimr al-
[1560] Ghassānī;[423] and Diḥyah b. Khalīfah al-Kalbī to Caesar.[424] He sent out Salīṭ b. 'Amr al-'Āmirī (of 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy) to Hawdhah b. 'Alī al-Ḥanafī,[425] and he sent out 'Abdallāh b. Ḥudhāfah al-Sahmī to Kisrā,[426] and 'Amr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī to the Negus.[427]

As for what Ibn Isḥāq has alleged (according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq), it is: Between [the truce of] al-Ḥudaybiyah and his death, the Messenger of God dispersed some of his companions to the kings of the Arabs and the foreigners to call them to God.

---

419. Shawwāl of A.H. 6 began on 13 February 628. Parallel with fuller text: W, II, 568–71; cf. IH, IV, 640–41 (tr. Guillaume, 677–78)—apparently the same events.

420. Parallel: IH, IV, 606–8 (tr. Guillaume, 652–59); Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 15–86. For a discussion of the historicity of these reports, see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 345–47.

421. Dhū al-Ḥijjah of A.H. 6 began on 12 April 628.

422. Al-Muqawqis was the Arabic term for the Melkite (i.e., Byzantine) patriarch of Alexandria. Its derivation from the name of Patriarch Cyrus ("of the Caucasus"), who arrived in Egypt in 631, is discussed by K. Öhrnberg in *EI*², s.v. al-Muḳawḳis. If this derivation of the name is correct, this account, which places the mission in 627–28, involves an anachronism.

423. Ed. Cairo vocalizes the name as Shamir. The mission was to the ruler of the Banū Ghassān, an Arab tribal kingdom with its capital at Buṣrā (Bostra) in Syria. The Ghassānids were Monophysite Christians and ruled a client state of the Byzantine Empire. See *EI*² s.v. Ghassān.

424. I.e., the Byzantine emperor.

425. I.e., the chief of the Banū Ḥanīfah b. Lujaym (part of Bakr b. Wā'il), a tribe in al-Yamāmah (central Arabia) centered on the town of al-Hajr. Hawdhah was apparently a Christian and was aligned with the Persians, for whom he conducted caravans. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥanīfa b. Ludjaym.

426. Kisrā (Persian "Khusrau," Greek "Chosroes") was the Arabic designation for the ruler of the Sassanian (Persian) Empire. See *EI*², s.v. Kisrā.

427. Negus (Arabic al-Najāshī from Ge'ez nägäśi) was the Arabic term for the ruler of Ethiopia. See *EI*², s.v. al-Nadjāshī.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb al-Miṣrī:[428] [Yazīd b. Ḥabīb al-Miṣrī] found a letter containing a list of those whom the Messenger of God sent to the kings [of the unbelievers][429] and what he said to his companions when he sent them out. [Yazīd] sent the letter to Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī via a trustworthy countryman of his, and al-Zuhrī recognized the letter [as genuine]. The letter stated that the Messenger of God went out to his companions one morning and said to them: "I have been sent as a mercy and for all. Therefore, convey [the message] from me, and God shall have mercy on you. Do not become disobedient to me as the disciples became disobedient to Jesus the son of Mary." They asked, "Messenger of God, how were they disobedient?" He replied: "He called [them] to the like of what I have called you to. Those whom he sent close by were pleased and accepted; those whom he sent far off were displeased and refused. Jesus complained of their behavior to God, and when they awoke the next morning, each of them could speak the language of the people to whom he had been sent. Then Jesus said, 'This is an affair that God has determined for you; so go forth!'"

According to Ibn Isḥāq: The Messenger of God gave his companions different destinations. He sent Salīṭ b. 'Amr b. 'Abd Shams b. 'Abd Wudd (a member of the Banū 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy) to Hawdhah [1561]
b. 'Alī, the ruler of al-Yamāmah. He sent al-'Alā' b. al-Ḥaḍramī to al-Mundhir b. Sāwā[430] (a member of the Banū 'Abd al-Qays), the ruler of al-Baḥrayn; and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ[431] to Jayfar b. Julandā al-

428. Abū Rajā' Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb (Suwayd) al-Azdī al-Miṣrī was born in 53/672 and died in 128/745. He composed a history of the conquest of Egypt and was a teacher of Muḥammad b. Isḥāq. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 318–19; GAS, I, 341–42.

429. The reading of the Leiden editor (al-khā'ibīn, "those disappointed, who suffer loss," occasionally a synonym for kāfirīn "unbelievers") is conjectural. Of the two manuscripts, one gives the word's unpointed ductus, which could also be read as al-jānibayn, "of both sides," or, in the larger sense, "of all sides or directions"—cf. Lane, Lexicon, II, 466a. The other manuscript reads al-nās ("of the people"). Ibn Hishām reads "kings of the Arabs and foreigners."

430. Al-Mundhir b. Sāwā, chief of the tribal division Dārim of Tamīm, was in close relation with the Persian empire and controlled the market of Ḥajar (now al-Ḥasā) and Baḥrayn. See *EI*², s.v. al-Baḥrayn.

431. Cf. the notices below, pp. 142 and 143 [I, 1600 and 1601], dating this event and the coming of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ to Medina as a Muslim in A.H. 8. Cf. *EI*², s.v. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ.

Azdī and 'Abbād b. Julandā al-Azdī, the rulers of 'Umān. He sent Ḥāṭib b. Abī Balta'ah to al-Muqawqis, the ruler of Alexandria. Ḥāṭib delivered to him the letter of the Messenger of God, and al-Muqawqis gave the Messenger of God four slave girls, including Māriyah, the mother of Ibrāhīm, the son of the Messenger of God. The Messenger of God sent Diḥyah b. Khalīfah al-Kalbī (and al-Khazrajī)[432] to Caesar, who was Heraclius, the king of the Romans.[433] When Diḥyah brought him the letter of the Messenger of God, he looked into it and then placed it between his thighs and his flanks.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah b. Mas'ūd—'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās—Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb, who said:[434] We were merchant folk. The warfare between us and the Messenger of God had prevented us from journeying, so that our wealth became depleted. After the truce between us and the Messenger of God, we feared that we might not encounter security.[435] I set out for Syria with a group of merchants of Quraysh. Our specific destination was Gaza, and we arrived there at the time of Heraclius' victory over the Persians who were in his land—he expelled them and regained from them his Great Cross, which they had carried off.[436] Having accomplished this against them

---

432. Arabic: al-Kalbī thumma al-Khazrajī: "of the tribe of Kalb and of the subdivision Khazraj" (cf. Wright, Arabic Grammar, I, 293). Cf. the genealogy given in Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 161–62: Diḥyah b. Khalīfah b. Farwah b. Faḍālah b. Zayd b. Imru' al-Qays b. al-Khazraj b. 'Āmir b. Bakr b. 'Āmir al-Akbar b. 'Awf al-Kalbī. Ed. Cairo emends al-Khazrajī to al-Khazjī (the Qāmūs lists al-Khazj b. 'Āmir as an ancestor of Diḥyah).

433. The Byzantine emperor Heraclius (Arabic Hiraql) ruled 610–41. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳayṣar, for a list of all the versions of the account of this embassy.

434. Parallel: Aghānī, VI, 94–96.

435. Arabic: lam na'man an lā najida amnan. Ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CXX, renders this as persuasum nobis fuit nos securitatem inventuros, which would mean, "we were convinced that we should find/encounter security." The compilers of the Glossarium apparently took the second negative as pleonastic. I do not think it is. The sense of this passage and of the similarly worded one at p. 103, below, is that Abū Sufyān feared a possible violation of the truce.

436. "In 627 Heraclius invaded the Persian empire, and in December of that year won an important victory near ancient Nineveh, but had to retreat shortly afterwards. In February 628, however, the Persian emperor was assassinated, and the son who succeeded him desired peace. By about March 628 Heraclius could regard himself as victorious, but the negotiations for the evacuation of the Byzantine and having received word that his cross had been rescued from [1562]

them (he was staying at Ḥimṣ[437]), he set out from there on foot in thanksgiving to God for restoring it to him, to pray in Jerusalem.[438] Carpets were spread out for him, and fragrant herbs were strewn on them.[439] When he reached Jerusalem and performed his worship—with him were his military commanders and the nobles of the Romans—he arose troubled one morning, turning his gaze to the sky. His military commanders said to him, "By God, you have arisen troubled this morning, O King." "Yes," he replied, "I was shown in a dream last night that the kingdom of the circumcision will be victorious." They said to him: "O King, we know of no nation that practices circumcision but the Jews, and they are under your control and authority. Send to all over whom you have authority in your lands and command them to behead all the Jews under their control, and be rid of this care." By God, even as they were debating this proposal, a messenger from the ruler of Buṣrā[440] arrived leading an Arab—the kings used to send each other reports—and said: "O King, this man of the Arabs, the people of sheep and camels, will report about something marvelous that happened in his country. Ask him about it." When the messenger of the ruler of Buṣrā had brought the man to Heraclius, the latter said to his interpreter, "Ask him what was this event that happened in his country." So he asked him, and the man said: "A man has appeared among us claiming to be a prophet. Some people have followed him and believed him; others have opposed him, and between them there have been bloody battles in many places. That was their state when I left them." After he had given Her-empire by the Persians were not completed until June 629. In September 629 Heraclius entered Constantinople as victor, and in March 630 restored the Holy Rood to Jerusalem." (Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 113–14). See also Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State, 103–4.

---

437. Ḥimṣ (Emesa) is in Syria, approximately halfway between Damascus and Aleppo. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥimṣ.

438. I have used the conventional name for the city. The Arabic reads Bayt al-Maqdis ("House of the Holy Place") in this sentence and Īliyā' (from Aelia, the name the Romans gave the city after its recapture in A.D. 70) in the next sentence. Perhaps Bayt al-Maqdis here refers specifically to the Temple area or to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳuds.

439. I.e., he vowed to walk to Jerusalem, but tempered the rigor of the vow by having herb-strewn carpets spread along the way.

440. See note 423, above.

aclius his report, the latter said, "Strip him!" They stripped him, and behold he was circumcised. Heraclius said: "This, by God, is what I was shown [in the dream]; not what you say! Give him his garment, and be gone!"

[1563] Then Heraclius summoned his chief of police and said to him, "Turn Syria upside down for me, until you bring me someone from the people of this man"—he meant the Prophet. By God, while we were still at Gaza, his chief of police assaulted us and said, "Are you are from the people of this man in the Ḥijāz?" "Yes," we said. "Off to the king with us!" he said. So we set out with him. When we reached the king, he said, "Are you from the kindred of this man?" "Yes," we said. "Which of you," he asked, "is closest to him in kinship?" "I am," I said. I swear to God, I never saw a man I should consider more astute than that uncircumcised one—Heraclius, that is. "Bring him near," he said. He seated me before him and seated my companions behind me; then he said: "I will question him. If he lies, refute him." By God, had I lied, they would not have refuted me; however, I was a lordly person, too noble to lie. Also I knew that, if I lied, the least of the matter was that they would hold it against me and speak of it concerning me; so I did not lie to him.

Heraclius said, "Tell me about this man who has emerged among you claiming what he claims." I began minimizing his importance to him and disparaging him. "O King," I said, "do not worry about him. His importance is too small to affect you." Paying no attention to this, he said, "Tell me whatever I ask you about him." I said, "Ask whatever you wish." He said, "What is his lineage among you?" I said, "Pure—the best of us in lineage." He asked, "Tell me: has anyone from his family ever said the like of what he says, so that he would be imitating him?" "No," I said. He said, "Did he have authority among you, of which you then stripped him, so that he brought this discourse in order that you might restore to him his authority?" "No," I said. He said, "Tell me about his followers among you, who they are." I said, "The weak, poor, young boys, and women. As for those of his people [1564] who have years and honor, none of them has followed him." He said, "Tell me about those who follow him: Do they love him and adhere to him, or do they fall out with him and abandon him?" I said, "No man has followed him and then abandoned him." He said, "Tell me how the war between you and him is going." I said, "Variously—sometimes it is his luck to prevail against us, and sometimes our luck to prevail against him." He said, "Tell me, does he act treacherously?" (I found nothing in what he asked me about him in which I could impugn [Muḥammad's] character except that.) I said, "No; we are in a state of truce with him, and [yet] we fear he may act treacherously."

By God, Heraclius paid no attention to what I had said but repeated the conversation to me. He said: "I asked what his lineage was among you, and you stated that he was pure, one of your best in lineage; but that is how God chooses a prophet when He chooses one—He chooses him only from the best of his people in lineage. I asked you whether anyone from his family had ever said what he says, so that he would be imitating him; and you said no. I asked you whether he had had authority among you, of which you stripped him, so that he brought this discourse, seeking thereby to regain his authority; and you said no. I asked you about his followers, and you stated that they were the weak, poor, juveniles, and women; but such have been the followers of the prophets in every age. I asked you about those who follow him, whether they love him and adhere to him or fall out with him and abandon him, and you stated that no man follows him and then abandons him; but such is the sweetness of faith. It does not enter a heart and then depart from it. I asked you whether he acts treacherously, and you said no. And so, if you have told me the truth about him, he shall surely wrest from me this very ground under my feet. Would that I were with him that I might wash his feet! Depart to your business!" So I left his presence, clapping my hands together and saying, "O worshipers of God, the affair of the son of Abū Kabshah[441] has become serious. Now the kings of the Greeks[442] fear him in their domain in Syria!" [1565]

441. I.e., Muḥammad. The dictionaries give various explanations of why the Meccan pagans nicknamed Muḥammad "the son of Abū Kabshah." Abū Kabshah is supposed to have been a man from the tribe of Khuzā'ah who abandoned the idolatry of Quraysh and worshiped instead the star Sirius. The pagans called Muḥammad "son of Abū Kabshah" because he, like Abū Kabshah, had departed from their manner of worship. Others say that Abū Kabshah was the nickname of Muḥammad's maternal grandfather, Wahb b. 'Abd Manāf, or that Abū Kabshah was the husband of Muḥammad's wet nurse. See Lisān, V, 3812.

442. Arabic: banū al-aṣfar "sons of yellow"; various explanations are given in Heraclius received the following letter from the Messenger of God via Diḥyah b. Khalīfah al-Kalbī:

> In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate. From Muḥammad, the Messenger of God, to Heraclius, the ruler of the Romans. Peace to whoever follows right guidance!
>
> To proceed: Submit yourself, and you shall be safe.[443] Submit yourself, and God shall give you your reward twice over.[444] But, if you turn away, the sin of the Husbandmen shall be upon you.[445]

According to Sufyān b. Wakī'—Yaḥyā b. Ādam—'Abdallāh b. Idrīs[446]—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah—Ibn 'Abbās—Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb, who said: When the truce between us and the Messenger of God took place in the year of al-Ḥudaybiyah, I set out for Syria as a merchant. (Abū Sufyān then mentioned a report similar to the one transmitted on the authority of Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah, except that he added at the end of it: He took the letter and put it between his thighs and flanks.)

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī, who said: A Christian bishop whom I met in the time of 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān[447] told me that he was acquainted with that affair involving the Messenger of God and Heraclius and his addition to the reference to the comparatively light complexion of the Greeks. See Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1699.

---

443. Arabic: aslim taslam. The meaning of this lapidary and punning utterance is usually given as "Become a Muslim (or accept Islam), and you shall be safe." However, because the broader meaning of the verb aslama is "resign, or submit oneself [to God]," and the remainder of the letter contrasts submission and turning away, I have translated "submit yourself" to preserve the logic of the letter.

444. I.e., in this world and in the next.

445. The Arabic text adds a gloss: "i.e., the bearing of it." The sin of the Husbandmen (akkārūn) may allude to the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen in Matthew 22:33–41 (Guillaume's suggestion). The word akkārūn is a Syriac or Aramaic loanword; cf. Payne Smith, Syriac Dictionary, 17, s.v. akkārā, "ploughman, husbandman," which is "often metaphorical of the apostles, of ministers of evil, etc." The precise allusion is unclear to me.

446. 'Abdallāh b. Idrīs, a judge of al-Kūfah, lived from ca. 115/733 to 192/807. See al-Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, III, 266–69; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 144–46.

447. The Umayyad caliph 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān ruled from 65/685 to 86/705.

intelligence.[448] According to the bishop: When Heraclius received the letter of the Messenger of God via Diḥyah b. Khalīfah, he took it and put it between his thighs and flanks. Then he wrote to a man in Rome who used to read from the Hebrew what they used to read,[449] mentioning the affair of the man, describing him, and [1566] informing him of what he had received from him. The ruler of Rome wrote back to him: "He is indeed the prophet we have been awaiting. There is no doubt about it. Follow him, and believe him."

Heraclius then gave orders to gather the commanders of the Romans for him in a palatial building,[450] and he ordered its doors to be closed on them. He looked down on them from an upper chamber of his—he was mortally afraid of them—and said: "People of the Romans, I have assembled you for something good. I have received this man's letter calling me to his religion. By God, he is indeed the prophet whom we have been awaiting and whom we find in our books. Come, let us follow him and believe him, that our life in this world and the next may be secure." Without exception they snorted angrily and hastened to the doors of the building to leave it, but they found that they had been locked. Heraclius said, "Bring them back to me"—he was mortally afraid of them—and he said: "People of the Romans, I spoke to you the speech I spoke to see how steadfast you are in your religion because of this affair that has occurred. Now I have seen what gladdens me on your part." They fell down in obeisance to him; he ordered the doors of the building to be opened, and they departed.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—a learned person: Heraclius said to Diḥyah b. Khalīfah when the latter brought him the letter of the Messenger of God: "Alas, by God, I know that your master is a prophet who has been sent and that he is the one whom we have been awaiting and whom we find in our book, but I am mortally afraid of the Romans; but for that, I

448. Translating wa-'aqlihī, the voweling of ed. Leiden; ed. Cairo vowels wa-'aqalahū, "and he understood it."

449. The exact sense of the Arabic, kāna yaqra'u min al-'ibrāniyyati mā yaqra-'ūnahū, is unclear. Perhaps it means not only knowledge of the Hebrew language, but knowledge of specific prophecies of an Arabian prophet contained in the Bible.

450. Arabic: daskarah.

would follow him. Go to Ḍaghāṭir[451] the bishop, and tell him of the affair of your master; for he, by God, is greater among the Romans than I, and his word has more authority with them. See [1567] what he says to you."

So Diḥyah went to Ḍaghāṭir and told him what he had brought to Heraclius from the Messenger of God and to what he was summoning him. Ḍaghāṭir said: "Your master, by God, is a prophet who has been sent. We know him by his description, and we find him by name in our books." Ḍaghāṭir then went inside, laid off the black robes he was wearing, put on white ones, took his staff, and came out before the Romans while they were in the church. "People of the Romans," he said, "a letter has come to us from Aḥmad,[452] summoning us to God. I bear witness that there is no god but God and that Aḥmad is his servant and messenger." As one man they leaped up, attacked him, and beat him to death. When Diḥyah returned to Heraclius and told him the news, Heraclius said to him, "I told you that we are in mortal fear of them—and Ḍaghāṭir, by God, was greater in their estimation, and his word more authoritative than mine!"

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Khālid b. Yasār—a very old Syrian, who said: When Heraclius was about to leave the land of Syria for Constantinople because of the report he had received about the Messenger of God, he assembled the Romans and said: "People of the Romans, I shall present certain matters to you. Consider what I have decided." "What are they?" they asked. He said: "You know, by God, that this man is a prophet who has been sent. We find him in our book. We know him by the description whereby he has been described to us. Let us

---

451. Ed. Cairo: Ṣaghāṭir.

452. Aḥmad must be taken as a proper name synonymous with Muḥammad. Etymologically, both words are adjectival forms from the root ḥ-m-d ("praise") and both mean "highly, or most praised." Ḍaghāṭir's behavior implies that he expects his audience to recognize the name Aḥmad. Cf. Qur'ān 61:6, where Jesus says to the Jews that he brings "good tidings of a messenger who comes after me, whose name is Aḥmad"—or one might translate, "whose name is more praiseworthy." Al-Ṭabarī, I, 1141, records a tradition (placed on the lips of one of the pre-Islamic monotheists of Mecca) predicting the coming of a prophet Aḥmad from the descendants of Ishmael. (Cf. Watt, "His Name is Aḥmad," Muslim World, xliii [1953]: 110–17.) Another speculation about allusions to Muḥammad's name in the Christian scriptures is recorded in IH, I, 232–33 (tr. Guillaume, 103–4). See also *EI*², s.v. Aḥmad.

follow him, that our life in this world and the next may be secure." They said, "Shall we be under the hands of the Arabs, when we are mankind's greatest kingdom, most numerous nation, and best land?" He said, "Then let me give him tribute[453] each year, so that I can avert his vehemence from me and find rest from his warfare by means of money that I give to him." They said: "Shall [1568] we concede to the Arabs [our own] humiliation and abasement by a tax[454] that they take from us, when we are mankind's most numerous nation, greatest kingdom, and most impregnable land? By God, we will never do it!" He said, "Then let me make peace with him on condition that I give him the land of Syria and that he leave me with the land of al-Sha'm." [The land of Syria was the land of Palestine, Jordan, Damascus, Ḥimṣ, and whatever of the land of Syria was on this side of al-Darb,[455] while they considered whatever was beyond al-Darb to be al-Sha'm.[456]] They said to him: "Shall we give him the land of Syria, when you know that it is the navel of al-Sha'm? By God, we will never do it!" They having refused him, he said, "By God, you shall see that, if you hold back from him, you will be defeated in your own city." Then he mounted a mule of his and departed. When he came in sight of al-Darb, he turned toward the land of al-Sha'm and said, "Peace be with you, land of Syria!"—a farewell salutation—and galloped back to Constantinople.

According to Ibn Isḥāq: The Messenger of God sent Shujā' b. Wahb, a member of the Banū Asad b. Khuzaymah, to al-Mundhir b. al-Ḥārith b. Abī Shimr al-Ghassānī, the ruler of Damascus.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī: He wrote to him via Shujā':

---

453. Arabic jizyah, later the technical term for the poll tax paid by members of protected minorities, here is used in the general sense of tribute. See *EI*², s.v. Djizya.

454. Arabic: kharj.

455. Ancient Derbe, a town near the Cilician Gates, the principal pass between Anatolia and Syria. See Lane, Lexicon, III, 866.

456. Arabic al-Sha'm, which normally means Syria or Damascus, here seems to be used in the generic sense of "the north." The word used for Syria is Sūriyah. The passage seems to have puzzled the Arabic transmitters, who added the parenthetical note of explanation.

> Peace be with whoever follows right guidance and believes in it. I call you to believe in God alone, Who has no partner, and your kingdom shall remain yours.

Shujā' b. Wahb brought the letter to him, and he read it to them. Al-Mundhir said: "Who can wrest my kingdom from me? It is I who will go against him!" The Prophet said, "His kingdom has perished."[457]

[1569] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: The Messenger of God sent 'Amr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī to the Negus concerning Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib[458] and his companions, writing the following letter for him to take:

> In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate. From Muḥammad, the Messenger of God, to the Negus al-Aṣḥam, king of the Ethiopians. May you be at peace! I praise to you God, the King, the Most Holy, the Peace, the Keeper of Faith, the Watcher,[459] and I bear witness that Jesus the son of Mary is the Spirit and Word of God, which He cast into the goodly and chaste Virgin Mary, so that she conceived Jesus; whom God created from His Spirit and breathed into him, even as He created Adam by His hand and breathed into him. I call you to God alone, Who has no partner, to continued obedience to Him, and that you follow me and believe in what has come to me; for I am the Messenger of God.
>
> I have sent you my cousin Ja'far and a group of Muslims with him. When he comes to you, show them hospitality, and do not oppress; for I call you and your armies to God. I have communicated sincere advice. Accept my advice! Peace be upon whoever follows right guidance!

The Negus wrote back to the Messenger of God:

> In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate. To Muḥammad, the Messenger of God, from the Negus al-

457. Another possible translation, "May his kingdom perish!"

458. A cousin of Muḥammad and brother of 'Alī, he had emigrated to Ethiopia with a group of Muslims to avoid persecution in Mecca. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 1180–84; IH, I, 321–41 (tr. Guillaume, 146–55); *EI*², s.v. Dja'far b. Abī Ṭālib.

459. Cf. Qur'ān 59:23.

Aṣḥam b. Abjar. Peace be upon you, O Prophet of God, and God's mercy and blessings—from God, other than Whom there is no god; Who has guided me to Islam.

To proceed: I have received your letter, O Messenger of God, containing what you said about Jesus. By the Lord of heaven and earth, Jesus does not exceed by a whit[460] what you said—he is as you have said. We have acknowledged [as true[461] the message] wherewith you have been sent to us, and we have treated your cousin and his companions hospitably. I bear witness that you are the Messenger of God, speaking truly and confirming truth. I have sworn allegiance to you and sworn allegiance to your cousin. I [1570] have submitted myself at his behest to God, the Lord of the worlds. I have sent my son Arhā b. al-Aṣḥam b. Abjar to you. I have power only over myself. If you want me to come to you, I will, O Messenger of God; for I bear witness that what you say is true. Peace be upon you, O Messenger of God.

According to Ibn Isḥāq: I was told that the Negus sent his son with sixty Ethiopians in a ship. When they were in the middle of the sea, their ship sank, and they perished.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī], who said: The Messenger of God sent a message to the Negus that he should marry to him Umm Ḥabībah, the daughter of Abū Sufyān, and should send her to him along with the Muslims who were with him. To inform Umm Ḥabībah of the marriage proposal, the Negus sent a slave girl of his named Abrahah to her. Umm Ḥabībah was so overjoyed by the news that she gave Abrahah some of her silver jewelry and a ring.[462] The Negus commanded Umm Ḥabībah to appoint someone as her agent to give her in marriage, and she appointed Khālid b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ. He gave her in marriage: the Negus spoke on behalf of the Messenger of God, and Khālid spoke [for Umm Ḥabībah] and gave Umm Ḥabībah in marriage. The Negus called for 400 dinars as her bride gift and handed them to Khālid b. Sa'īd. When the money came to Umm Ḥabībah—it was Abrahah who brought it—Umm Ḥabībah gave her fifty mithqāls,[463] saying, "I gave you that[464] when I possessed nothing, but now God, Who is mighty and exalted, has brought [1571] this!" Abrahah said, "The king has commanded me not to take anything from you and to return to you what I took from you"—and she returned it.[465] "I am the mistress of the king's ointments and garments. I believe Muḥammad the Messenger of God and trust in him. All I ask you is to greet him for me." Umm Ḥabībah said that she would. [Abrahah said,] "The king has ordered his women to send you the aloes wood and ambergris they have." The Messenger of God used to perceive it on her and in her quarters, and he did not disapprove of it.

460. Arabic: thufrūq, the round part of the covering at the base of a date, where it joins the stalk.

461. For this interpretation of 'arafnā mā bu'ithta bihi ilaynā, see ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CCCLVIII, which tranlates 'arafa mā qāla as pro recto agnovit.

462. Arabic: awḍāḥ, fatakh. The first term refers either to silver jewelry made from coins or to anklets; the second term refers to unjeweled rings for the fingers or toes.

According to Umm Ḥabībah, who said: We departed in two ships, and he sent sailors with us. We landed at al-Jār[466] and rode animals to Medina. We found that the Messenger of God was at Khaybar, and some went out to him. I stayed in Medina until the Messenger of God returned and I entered his presence. He used to question me about the Negus. I greeted him from Abrahah, and he responded to her greeting.

When Abū Sufyān learned that the Prophet had been married to Umm Ḥabībah, he said, "That stallion's nose is not to be restrained!"[467]

In this year, the Messenger of God sent the following letter to Kisrā[468] via 'Abdallāh b. Ḥudhāfah al-Sahmī:

---

463. Usually mithqāl is a synonym for dīnār, although a smaller coin may be intended.

464. I.e., the silver jewelry and ring mentioned above.

465. Ed. Cairo: "and I have returned it" or "I hereby return it" (making these words part of the speech of Abrahah).

466. Al-Jār, on the bay of Buraykah south of modern Yanbu', was a Red Sea port a day's journey from Medina; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, III, 34–36; *EI*², s.v. al-Djār.

467. For the proverb, see Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, II, 869; Lisān, V, 3551 (s.v. q-d-') and 3595 (s.v. q-r-'). The meaning is that he is a match not to be rejected as unequal to the bride. The Lisān explains: "One would bring a thoroughbred camel mare to someone who had a stallion and ask him to have his stallion service the mare, but if he led out a stallion with no pedigree, one would strike it on the nose to signify that one did not want it."

468. See note 426, above.

> In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate. From Muḥammad, the Messenger of God, to Kisrā, the ruler of Persia. Peace be with whoever follows right guidance, believes in God and His Messenger, and testifies that there is no god but God and that I am the Messenger of God to all mankind, to warn whoever is alive.[469] Submit yourself, and you shall be safe. If you refuse, the sin of the Magians[470] shall be upon you.

Kisrā tore up the letter of the Messenger of God. The Messenger of God said, "His kingdom has been torn up."[471]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb, who said: He sent 'Abdallāh b. Ḥudhāfah b. Qays b. 'Adī b. Sa'd b. Sahm to Kisrā the son of Hurmuz, the king of Persia, with the following letter: [1572]

> In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate. From Muḥammad, the Messenger of God, to Kisrā, the ruler of Persia. Peace be upon whoever follows right guidance, believes in God and His Messenger, and testifies that there is no god but God alone, Who has no partner, and that Muḥammad is His servant and His messenger. I summon you with the summons of God; for I am the Messenger of God to all mankind, to warn whoever is alive, and that the word may be fulfilled against the unbelievers.[472] Submit yourself, and you shall be safe. If you refuse, the sin of the Magians shall be upon you.

When Kisrā read it, he tore it up and said, "He writes this to me when he is my servant!"

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr—al-Zuhrī—Abū Salamah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf:[473] 'Abdallāh b. Ḥudhāfah delivered the letter of

---

469. Cf. Qur'ān 36:69.
470. Arabic: al-Majūs, the ordinary word for Zoroastrians. See *EI*², s.v. Madjūs.
471. Alternative translation: "May his kingdom be torn up!"
472. Cf. Qur'ān 36:69.
473. As mentioned earlier, p. 95, above, Abū Salamah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf was the son of the Emigrant 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf by Tumāḍir bt. al-Aṣbagh al-Kalbiyyah. He died ca. 94/712–13. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 115–18.

the Messenger of God to Kisrā. When the latter had read it, he tore it in half. When the Messenger of God heard that he had torn his letter, he said, "His kingdom has been torn up."[474]

[Muḥammad b. Isḥāq] then resumed the report of Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb, who said: Kisrā then wrote to Bādhān, who was governor of Yemen, saying, "Send two strong men of yours after this man in the Ḥijāz, and have them bring him to me." So Bādhān sent his steward Bābawayh, who was a scribe and accountant, with the [1573] writ of Persia, and with him he sent a Persian named Khurrakhusrah.[475] He wrote a letter to be taken by them to the Messenger of God, commanding him to go back with the two men to Kisrā. He said to Bābawayh, "Go to this man's land, speak to him, and bring me a report about him." So the two men set out. Having reached al-Ṭā'if,[476] they found some men of Quraysh at Nakhib[477] in the territory of al-Ṭā'if and asked them about him. They said that he was at Medina. The men of Quraysh were delighted and glad to have met the two men; they said to one another: "Rejoice! Kisrā, the king of kings, has become his enemy. You have become rid of the man."

The two men set out and reached the Messenger of God. Bābawayh addressed him, saying: "The shah of shahs and king of kings, Kisrā, has written to King Bādhān, commanding him to send someone to you to bring you to him. Bādhān has sent me to you so that you may go back with me. If you do, he will write concerning you to the king of kings on your behalf and will keep him from you. If you refuse, you know who he is! He will destroy you, destroy your people, and lay waste to your lands."

Now the two men had come before the Messenger of God having shaved their beards but left their mustaches, so that he disliked looking at them. He turned to them and said, "Alas, who ordered you to do this?" They said, "Our lord"—meaning Kisrā—"ordered us to do it." The Messenger of God said, "But my Lord

474. See note 471, above.

475. So vocalized by ed. Cairo.

476. The city of al-Ṭā'if lies in the mountains about forty miles southeast of Mecca. See EI[1] s.v., Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, s.v.

477. Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VIII, 272, lists a valley by this name in al-Ṭā'if.

has ordered me to leave my beard and clip my mustache."[478] Then he said to them, "Go away, and come to me tomorrow."

Then a message from heaven came to the Messenger of God that God had incited against Kisrā his son Shīrawayh. He had killed him in such and such a month, on such and such a night of the month, after such and such hours of the night had passed.[479] God [1574] incited his son Shīrawayh against him, and he killed him.

According to al-Wāqidī: Shīrawayh killed his father, Kisrā, the eve of Tuesday, the 10th day of Jumādā I of the year 7, at the sixth hour of the night.[480]

Resumption of the account of Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb: He summoned the two men and told them the news. They said: "Do you know what you are saying? We have reproved you for what is less than this. Shall we write this on your authority and report it to the king?"[481] "Yes," he said, "report it to him from me, and tell him that my religion and my dominion shall reach as far as the kingdom of Kisrā has reached and extend to the utmost reach of camel's pad and horse's hoof. Say to him, 'If you submit yourself,[482] I will give you what you possess and make you 478. For a list of ḥadīths on the subject see Wensinck, Concordance, III, 91, s.v. shārib.

479. The text has been corrupted by the copyist. I have translated the reconstruction proposed by the Leiden editor.

480. Al-Wāqidī's date (15 September 628) conflicts with a previously cited tradition (al-Ṭabarī, I, 1009), according to which Muḥammad learned of the death of Kisrā (i.e., Khusrau II Parvīz, ruled 591–628) "on the day of al-Ḥudaybiyah"—i.e., sometime in Dhū al-Qa'dah (began 13 March 628) of A.H. 6. This corresponds closely to the date of the deposition of Khusrau II in February 628 in a coup involving Khusrau's son, Kavādh II Shērōē (Qubādh II Shīrawayh), and generals exasperated by Khusrau's refusal to conclude peace with the Byzantine emperor Heraclius after his military defeats. Shīrawayh's letter, quoted in the next paragraph, alludes to the army's discontent. The exact date of Khusrau's death is unknown. The History of Heraclius by the Armenian bishop Sebeos says he was killed immediately. A tradition preserved in al-Ṭabarī, I, 1045–61, has Shīrawayh prepare a detailed indictment of Khusrau's misdeeds, to which Khusrau replied—implying a lapse of time between the deposition and the killing of Khusrau. Shērōē/Shīrawayh ruled only briefly (six or eight months) and was dead by the fall of 628. See Christensen, L'Iran sous les Sassanides, 493–97; Cambridge History of Iran, III/1, 170; and Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State, 103.

481. I.e., to the governor of Yemen, who is given the title of malik (king) in the Arabic.

482. Or, "if you become a Muslim."

king over your people, the Abnā'.'"[483] Then he gave Khurrakhusrah a belt containing gold and silver that one of the kings had given him. The two men departed from him. They came to Bādhān and told him the news. He said: "By God, this is not the language of a king. I think the man is a prophet as he says. Let us await the event of what he has said. If it proves true, there is no disputing that he is indeed a prophet who has been sent. If it does not prove true, we shall consider what to do concerning him." Soon Bādhān received Shīrawayh's letter, which said:

> To proceed: I have killed Kisrā. I killed him only out of zeal for Persia, because he allowed himself to kill its nobles and detain them on the frontiers. When you receive this letter of mine, secure for me the obedience of those who are with you. See to the man about whom Kisrā wrote to you, and do not provoke him until you receive my order concerning him.

When Shīrawayh's letter reached Bādhān, he said, "This man is indeed a messenger," and he became a Muslim, and the Abnā'— [1575] those from Persia who were in Yemen—became Muslims with him. (The people of Ḥimyar[484] used to call Khurrakhusrah Dhū al-Mi'jazah, because of the belt that the Messenger of God gave to him. 'Belt' in the language of Ḥimyar is mi'jazah. His sons today take their surname from it: [sons of] Khurrakhusrah Dhū al-Mi'jazah.) Bābawayh said to Bādhān, "Never have I spoken to a man more awesome to me than he was." Bādhān said, "Does he have picked troops?" "No," he replied.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year he wrote to al-Muqawqis, the ruler of the Copts, summoning him to Islam, but he did not become a Muslim.

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: When the Messenger of God

---

483. The Abnā' ("Sons") were the Persian residents of Yemen, descendants of the Persians said to have come with Sayf b. Dhī Yazan. They were also called Abnā' al-Aḥrār ("Sons of the Free"). See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CXLII; *EI*², s.v. al-Abnā'.

484. Ḥimyar was a south Arabian tribe whose kingdom flourished before Islam. Here it is used loosely for Yemen.

returned to Medina from the expedition to al-Ḥudaybiyah, he remained there for the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah and part of al-Muḥarram (according to the account of Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq). The polytheists were in charge of the pilgrimage in that year.

The Events of the Year 7

(May 11, 628–April 30, 629)

The Expedition to Khaybar[485]

Then the year 7 began. The Messenger of God set out for Khaybar[486] in the remainder of al-Muḥarram, leaving Sibā' b. 'Urfuṭah al-Ghifārī in charge of Medina. He traveled and halted with his army at a valley called al-Rajī',[487] encamping between the people of Khaybar and [the tribe of] Ghaṭafān (according to the account from Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq) to prevent the latter from aiding the people of Khaybar, for they were going to back them against the Messenger of God.

It has been reported to me that, when Ghaṭafān heard that the [1576] Messenger of God had encamped near Khaybar, they assembled because of him and set out to aid the Jews against him. Having traveled a day's journey, they heard a sound behind them in their possessions and families. Thinking that the enemy had come at them from behind, they turned back and stayed with their families and possessions, leaving the way to Khaybar open to the

485. Parallels: W, II, 633–705; IH, III, 328–53 (tr. Guillaume, 510–23).

486. Khaybar is an oasis about 95 miles (150 km) north of Medina. Its inhabitants at this time were mostly Jews engaged in agriculture and commerce. L. Veccia Vaglieri's article in *EI*², s.v. Khaybar, discusses the attack and its motives.

487. This is not to be confused with the similarly named al-Rajī' near al-Ṭā'if, where a small party of Muslims was betrayed in A.H. 4 (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1473); see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, IV, 228–29.

Messenger of God. The Messenger of God began taking herds and property bit by bit and conquering Khaybar fortress by fortress. The first of their fortresses that he conquered was the fortress of Nā'im. Maḥmūd b. Maslamah was killed at it—a millstone was hurled on him from it and killed him. Next was al-Qamūṣ, the fortress of Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq. The Messenger of God took some of its people captive, including Ṣafiyyah bt. Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab (the wife of Kinānah b. al-Rabī' b. Abī al-Ḥuqayq) and two daughters of her paternal uncle. The Messenger of God chose Ṣafiyyah for himself. Diḥyah al-Kalbī had asked the Messenger of God for Ṣafiyyah; when the latter chose her for himself, he gave Diḥyah her two cousins. The captives of Khaybar were divided among the Muslims. Then the Messenger of God began taking the fortresses and property that were closest to him.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr—a member of the Aslam: The Banū Sahm, who were a part of Aslam,[488] came to the Messenger of God and said, "Messenger of God, by God we have been struck by drought and possess nothing." But they found that the Messenger of God had nothing to give them. So the Prophet said: "O God, Thou knowest their condition—that they have no strength and that I have nothing to give them. Open to them [for conquest] the great- [1577] est of the fortresses of Khaybar, the one most abounding in food and fat meat." The next morning God opened the fortress of al-Ṣa'b b. Mu'ādh for them [to conquer]. There was no fortress in Khaybar more abounding in food and fat meat than it.

After the Messenger of God had conquered some of their fortresses and taken some of the property, they reached their fortress[489] of al-Waṭīḥ and al-Sulālim, which was the last of the fortresses of Khaybar to be conquered. The Messenger of God besieged the inhabitants between thirteen and nineteen nights.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—

488. See note 297, above.

489. IH, III, 332, reads "their two fortresses"; cf. p. 123, below. The confusion may be due to the division of the oasis into three regions (al-Naṭāh, al-Shiqq, and al-Katībah), each containing several fortresses and separated from the other regions by wadis, lava fields, or swamps. See *EI*², s.v. Khaybar.

'Abdallāh b. Sahl b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sahl (a member of the Banū Ḥārithah)—Jābir b. 'Abdallāh al-Anṣārī, who said: Marḥab the Jew sallied forth from their fortress[490] fully armed, reciting the following verses in rajaz meter:

Khaybar knows well that I am Marḥab,
whose weapon is sharp, a warrior tested.
Sometimes I thrust with spear; sometimes I strike with sword.
When lions advance in their rage,
My territory is territory unapproachable.

He said, "Is there anyone who will come out for single combat?" The Messenger of God said, "Who will take him on?" Muḥammad b. Maslamah stood up and said: "I will take him on, Messenger of God. By God, I have had a relative slain and seek revenge, for they killed my brother yesterday." The Messenger of God said: "Arise and go to him! O God, help him against him!" When each drew [1578] near the other, an ancient 'ushar bush[491] came between them. Each of them began using it as a refuge from the other; but, whenever one took refuge in it, the other would cut with his sword the part of it separating him from his adversary. Finally each was exposed to the other, and the bush between them came to be like a man standing, with no branches between the two. Then Marḥab attacked Muḥammad and struck him. Muḥammad warded him off with his shield,[492] and Marḥab's sword landed in the shield, which gripped it and held it fast. Muḥammad b. Maslamah struck him and killed him.

After the death of Marḥab, his brother Yāsir came forth reciting the following verses:

Khaybar knows well that I am Yāsir, whose weapon is sharp, a warrior-raider.
When lions advance swiftly and raiders shrink from my assault,
In my territory death is a dweller.

---

490. For a photograph of the ruins traditionally identified as Qaṣr Marḥab (Marḥab's Castle), see Hamidullah, Battlefields, 51.

491. Identified as Asclepias gigantea (giant swallowwort) and described in Lane, Lexicon, V, 2051.

492. Arabic: daraqah; see note 365, above.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Hishām b. 'Urwah:[493] Al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām went out against Yāsir. Al-Zubayr's mother, Ṣafiyyah bt. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, asked, "Messenger of God, is he going to kill my son?" "No," he replied, "your son will kill him, God willing." Al-Zubayr went out reciting:

Khaybar knows well that I am Zabbār,[494]
chief of folk who do not turn back and flee;
A son of defenders of glory, a son of the best.
Yāsir, let the unbelievers' host not deceive you:
Their host is like a slow-moving mirage.

Then the two met, and al-Zubayr killed him. [1579]

According to Ibn Bashshār—Muḥammad b. Ja'far—'Awf[495]—Maymūn [Abū 'Abdallāh][496]—'Abdallāh b. Buraydah[497]—Buraydah al-Aslamī,[498] who said: When the Messenger of God encamped at the fortress of the people of Khaybar, he gave the banner to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Some of the people set out with him, and they encountered the people of Khaybar. 'Umar and his companions were put to flight. When they returned to the Messenger of God, 'Umar's companions accused him of cowardice, and he accused them of the same. The Messenger of God said, "Tomorrow I shall give the banner to a man who loves God and His Messenger and whom God and His Messenger love." The next day, Abū Bakr and 'Umar vied for the banner, but the Messenger of God called 'Alī, who was suffering from inflamed eyes, and, having spat on his eyes, gave him the banner. Some of the people set 493. Hishām b. 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr, the son of 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr, was born ca. 61/680 in Medina and died in 146/763 in Baghdād. He was a transmitter of traditions and a jurist. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 48–51; GAS, I, 88–89.

494. Zabbār ("extremely strong") is an intensive adjective from the root of his name. The line ends in a pun, also conditioned by the need for a rhyme.

495. 'Awf b. Abī Jamīlah al-A'rābī lived from 59/678 to 146 or 147/763–65. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 166–67.

496. Identified by the index to the Cairo ed. as Abū 'Abdallāh Maymūn, the mawlā of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah.

497. 'Abdallāh b. Buraydah b. al-Ḥuṣayb al-Aslamī, supposedly born in 16/637, died as judge of Marv, perhaps as late as 115/733. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 157–58.

498. Buraydah b. al-Ḥuṣayb al-Aslamī died between 60 and 64/679–84. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 432–33.

out with him. When 'Alī met the people of Khaybar, there was Marḥab reciting his verses:

Khaybar knows well that I am Marḥab,
whose weapon is sharp, a warrior tested.
Sometimes I thrust with spear; sometimes I strike with sword, when lions advance in burning rage.

He and 'Alī exchanged two blows. Then 'Alī struck him on his head, so that the sword bit firmly into it.[499] The people of the army heard his blow. Even before the last of the people had joined 'Alī, God gave him and them the victory.

According to Abū Kurayb—Yūnus b. Bukayr[500]—al-Musayyab b. Muslim al-Awdī—'Abdallāh b. Buraydah—his father [Buraydah b. al-Ḥuṣayb], who said: The Messenger of God often had migraines and would remain a day or two without coming out. When the Messenger of God encamped at Khaybar, he came down with [1580] migraine and did not come out to the people. Abū Bakr took the banner of the Messenger of God, set out and fought vigorously, and then came back. Then 'Umar took it, fought with even more vigor than the first fighting, and then came back. When the Messenger of God was informed of this, he said, "By God, tomorrow I shall give it to a man who loves God and His Messenger, whom God and His Messenger love, and who will take it in humble obedience."[501] Because 'Alī was not there, the Quraysh[502] vied for it, each of them hoping to be its bearer. In the morning, 'Alī came on his camel and made it kneel down near the tent of the Messenger of God. He was suffering from inflamed eyes and had ban-

499. Literally, "bit into it with its teeth." Perhaps this alludes to the tradition that 'Alī's sword, Dhū al-Faqār, had notches or ridges or that it was two-pointed. Cf. *EI*², s.v. Dhu'l-Faḳār. Another possibility, suggested by the parallel below (p. 121), is that the sword "bit into the [rear] teeth of it [viz. his head]."

500. Yūnus b. Bukayr b. Wāṣil al-Shaybānī (died 199/815) transmitted a recension of Ibn Isḥāq's biography of the Prophet, later condensed by Ibn Hishām. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 434; GAS, I, 146, 289.

501. Arabic 'anwatan, which can also mean "by force" or "by compulsion." It is possible that the second "it" refers, not to the banner, but to another feminine word left to be understood from the context, such as "the city" (al-madīnah)—cf. p. 121 below, where the word occurs. In that case, the fact that Khaybar fell to the Muslims "by compulsion" had legal implications for the disposition of the booty and the status of the inhabitants.

502. I.e., the Emigrants.

daged them with a strip of Qaṭarī cloth.[503] The Messenger of God asked, "What is wrong?" 'Alī replied, "My eyes are still inflamed." The Messenger of God said, "Come near me." 'Alī came near him, and he spat in his eyes. The pain departed immediately. He gave 'Alī the banner, and 'Alī set out with it. He was wearing a suit of reddish purple whose fringes[504] were of two colors, white and red.

When 'Alī came to the city of Khaybar, Marḥab, the master of the fortress, came out wearing a safflower-dyed Yemeni neck protector (mighfar) and a stone in which he had bored holes like a helmet on his head. He was reciting the following verse:

Khaybar knows well that I am Marḥab,
whose weapon is sharp, a warrior tested.

'Alī recited:

I am he whose mother named him Lion:[505]
I will mete you out sword blows by the bushel—
A lion in thickets, powerful, mighty.

They exchanged two blows. Then 'Alī struck him a swift blow [1581] that split the stone, the neck protector, and his head and landed in his rear teeth; and he took the city.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥasan[506]—a member of his family—Abū Rāfi',[507] the mawlā of the Messenger of God, who said: We went out with 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, when the Messenger of God sent him forth with his banner. When he approached the fortress, its inhabitants came out against him, and he fought them. One of the Jews hit him and knocked his shield out of his hand; so 'Alī picked up a door that was by the fortress and shielded himself with it. It remained in his hand while he fought until God granted him victory; then he threw it aside when he was finished. I can see myself with seven 503. A kind of reddish cloth ornamented with large figures; see ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CDXXVII.

504. Arabic: khaml, perhaps "nap."

505. Arabic ḥaydar. The word used for lion in the last line of the poem is layth, another of the many synonyms in Arabic for the lion. See *EI*², s.v. Asad.

506. Identified in ed. Cairo, Index, as 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

507. His name was Ruwayfi'. See the biography given in Poonawala, Last Years, 143 [I, 1778–79].

other men in a group straining to turn that door over and unable to do it.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: After the Messenger of God conquered al-Qamūṣ, the fortress of Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq, Ṣafiyyah bt. Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab was brought to him, and another woman with her. Bilāl, who was the one who brought them, led them past some of the slain Jews. When the woman who was with Ṣafiyyah saw them, she cried out, struck her face, and poured dust on her head. When the Messenger of God saw her, he said, "Take this she-devil away from me!" He commanded that Ṣafiyyah should be kept behind him and that his cloak should be cast over her. Thus the Muslims knew that the Messenger of God had chosen her for himself. The Messenger of God said to Bilāl (according to what I have received) when he saw [1582] the Jewish woman doing what he saw her do, "Are you devoid of mercy, Bilāl, that you take two women past their slain men?"

When Ṣafiyyah became the bride of Kinānah b. al-Rabī' b. Abī Ḥuqayq, she dreamt that a moon had fallen into her lap. She told her vision to her husband, and he said, "That is only because you are wishing for the king of the Ḥijāz, Muḥammad"—and he gave her face a slap that blackened her eye. She was brought to the Messenger of God with the traces of it still there; he asked her what it was, and she told him this story.

According to Ibn Isḥāq: Kinānah b. al-Rabī' b. Abī al-Ḥuqayq, who had the treasure of the Banū al-Naḍīr,[508] was brought to the Messenger of God, who questioned him; but he denied knowing where it was. Then the Messenger of God was brought a Jew who said to him, "I have seen Kinānah walk around this ruin every morning." The Messenger of God said to Kinānah: "What do you say? If we find it in your possession, I will kill you."[509] "All right," he answered. The Messenger of God commanded that the ruin should be dug up, and some of the treasure was extracted from it. Then he asked him for the rest of it. Kinānah refused to surrender it; so the Messenger of God gave orders concerning him to al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām, saying, "Torture him until you root out

508. See note 26, above.
509. Ed. Cairo: "shall I kill you?"

what he has." Al-Zubayr kept twirling his firestick in his breast[510] until Kinānah almost expired; then the Messenger of God gave him to Muḥammad b. Maslamah, who beheaded him to avenge his brother Maḥmūd b. Maslamah.

The Messenger of God besieged the people of Khaybar in their two fortresses of al-Waṭīḥ and al-Sulālim. Finally, when they were certain that they would perish, they asked him to banish them and spare their lives, which he did. The Messenger of God had already taken all the property—al-Shiqq, Naṭāh, al-Katībah, and all their [1583] fortresses—except what belonged to those two fortresses. When the people of Fadak[511] heard of what they had done, they sent word to the Messenger of God, asking him to banish them and spare their lives, and they would leave him their property; and he did so. Among the men who mediated between them and the Messenger of God in the matter was Muḥayyiṣah b. Mas'ūd, a member of the Banū Ḥārithah. When the people of Khaybar surrendered on these terms, they asked the Messenger of God to employ them on the properties for a half share. They said, "We know more about them than you and are better cultivators of them." So the Messenger of God made peace with them for a half share, provided that "if we want to make you leave, we may." The people of Fadak made peace with him on similar terms. Khaybar became the booty (fay') of the Muslims; Fadak belonged exclusively to the Messenger of God, because the Muslims had not attacked its people with horses or camels.[512]

When the Messenger of God rested from his labor, Zaynab bt. al-Ḥārith, the wife of Sallām b. Mishkam, served him a roast sheep. She had asked what part of the sheep the Messenger of God liked best and was told that it was the foreleg. So she loaded that part with poison, and she poisoned the rest of the sheep, too. Then she brought it. When she set it before the Messenger of God, he took the foreleg and chewed a bit of it, but he did not swallow it. With him was Bishr b. al-Barā' b. Ma'rūr, who, like the Messenger of

510. Possibly (as Guillaume translates the parallel from Ibn Hishām), "he kindled a fire" with his firestick on his chest (not, however, with flint and steel, as Guillaume would have it). The firestick (zand) was a stick of wood that could be twirled rapidly in an indentation in a second piece of wood to produce fire.

511. See note 410, above.

512. This echoes the language of Qur'ān 17:64.

God, took some of it; Bishr, however, swallowed it, while the Messenger of God spat it out, saying, "This bone informs me that it has been poisoned." Then he summoned the woman, and she confessed. He asked, "What led you to do this?" She said: "How [1584] you have afflicted my people is not hidden from you. So I said, 'If he is a prophet, he will be informed; but if he is a king, I shall be rid of him.'" The Prophet forgave her. Bishr b. al-Barā' died of the food he had eaten.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Marwān b. 'Uthmān b. Abī Sa'īd b. al-Mu'allā,[513] who said: The Messenger of God said during the illness from which he died—the mother of Bishr b. al-Barā' had come in to visit him—"Umm Bishr, at this very moment I feel my aorta being severed[514] because of the food I ate with your son at Khaybar." The Muslims believed that in addition to the honor of prophethood that God had granted him the Messenger of God died a martyr.

According to Ibn Isḥāq: After the Messenger of God had finished with Khaybar, he returned to Wādī al-Qurā and besieged its people for some nights; then he returned to Medina.

The Expedition of the Messenger of God to Wādī al-Qurā

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Thawr b. Zayd[515]—Sālim, the mawlā of 'Abdallāh b. Muṭī'[516]—Abū Hurayrah, who said: After we returned with the Messenger of God from Khaybar to Wādī al-Qurā, we halted late in the afternoon toward sunset. With the Messenger of God was a slave lad of his whom Rifā'ah b. Zayd al-Judhāmī (and al-Ḍubaybī)[517] had given

513. Marwān b. 'Uthmān b. Sa'īd b. al-Mu'allā al-Anṣārī al-Zurqī Abū 'Uthmān is listed in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 95, as being from Medina, but without dates.

514. The expression qaṭa'a abharahū "it severed his aorta" need not be taken literally; it is used metaphorically for extreme pain. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 266.

515. Thawr b. Zayd al-Dīlī was a mawlā born in Medina who died in 135/752–53. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 31–32.

516. Sālim Abū al-Ghayth, mawlā of Ibn Muṭī', is listed without dates in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 445.

517. I.e., of the al-Ḍubayb subdivision of the tribe of Judhām. One manuscript reads al-Ḍabīnī, which is also possible.

him. Suddenly, as we were setting down the saddle of the Messenger of God, a stray arrow came and hit the slave, killing him. We said, "May he enjoy Paradise!" But the Messenger of God said, "No; by Him who holds Muḥammad's soul in His hand, his cloak is now being burnt on him in the Fire!" He had pilfered it from the booty of the Muslims at the battle of Khaybar. Having heard these words, one of the companions of the Messenger of God came to him and said, "Messenger of God, I took two thongs for my sandals." He replied, "Two similar ones of fire will be cut for you!" [1585]

During this journey, the Messenger of God and his companions overslept the dawn prayer until the sun had already risen.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab, who said: After the Messenger of God had left Khaybar and was on the road, he said late at night, "Who will watch for dawn for us, so that we can sleep?" Bilāl said, "I will watch for you, Messenger of God." So the Messenger of God halted, and the people halted, and they went to sleep. Bilāl stood praying. Having prayed for a time, he leaned against his camel and turned himself in the direction of the dawn to watch for it, but his eye overcame him and he fell asleep. It was only the touch of the sun that woke them. The Messenger of God was the first among his companions to wake from sleep, and he asked, "What have you done to us, Bilāl?" "Messenger of God," he replied, "what overcame your soul overcame mine also." "You are right," he said. Then the Messenger of God led [his camel] a short distance and made it kneel down. He performed ablutions, and the people also performed them. Then he commanded Bilāl to give the call to prayer, and he led the people in worship. After he had recited the peace,[518] he turned to the people and said, "If you forget the prayer, pray it when you remember it; for God says, 'Perform the prayer on remembering Me.'"[519]

---

518. I.e., after he had finished praying: the ritual of ṣalāh ends with a twofold salutation, "Peace be upon you and God's mercy," usually explained as being recited by the worshiper to the attending angels at his right and left.

519. Qur'ān 20:14. The usual translation is "perform the prayer for/of [Arabic li-] My remembrance." However, the context implies reference to the time of prayer, not its purpose. Beside indicating purpose, li- can mark the time from which or at which something took place. Cf. Wright, Grammar, II, 151.

[1586] According to Ibn Isḥāq: The conquest of Khaybar took place in Ṣafar.[520] Some Muslim women were present with the Messenger of God. The Messenger of God gave them small gifts from the booty, but he did not assign them a share.

The Affair of al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Ilāṭ al-Sulamī

After Khaybar had been conquered, al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Ilāṭ al-Sulamī (and al-Bahzī)[521] said to the Messenger of God: "Messenger of God, I have property in Mecca with my wife Umm Shaybah bt. Abī Ṭalḥah"—she was his wife, and he had a son, Mu'arriḍ b. al-Ḥajjāj, by her—"and property dispersed among the merchants of Mecca. Give me leave to go, Messenger of God." The Messenger of God gave him leave. Then al-Ḥajjāj said, "It will be necessary for me for me to say [something]."[522] "Say [whatever you want]," he said.[523]

According to al-Ḥajjāj, who said: I departed and arrived in Mecca. On the mountain trail at al-Bayḍā'[524] I met some men from Quraysh who were eager to hear news and were asking about what had happened to the Messenger of God. They had heard that he had gone to Khaybar and knew that it was the leading town of the Ḥijāz in fertility, defenses, and men; so they were seeking news. When they saw me, they said: "Al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Ilāṭ!"—they had not learned that I had become a Muslim—"He, by God, must have news! Tell us what has happened to Muḥammad; for we have heard that that cutter [of kinship ties][525] has marched against Khaybar, a town of Jews and the most fertile land in the Ḥijāz."

I said, "I have heard about that, and I have news that will make you happy." They clung to the sides of my camel, saying, "Out with it, Ḥajjāj!" So I said: "They have been handed a defeat like no [1587] defeat you have ever heard of. His companions have suffered

520. Ṣafar, A.H. 7, began on 10 June 628.

521. I.e., of the Bahz subdivision of the Banū Sulaym.

522. I.e., to lie. Al-Ḥajjāj may be intentionally avoiding the bluntness of the ordinary word for lying.

523. The bracketed words are from the parallel in W, II, 702.

524. According to Yāqūt (Mu'jam al-buldān, II, 335), al-Bayḍā' is another name for Tan'īm, just outside the sacred territory (ḥaram) encircling Mecca.

525. Arabic: al-qāṭi', "the cutter," which can be a shortened way of saying qāṭi' al-raḥim, "cutter, i.e., breaker of ties of kinship," or qāṭi' al-ṭarīq, "cutter of the road, i.e., highwayman." Either meaning would fit the context.

slaughter like no slaughter you have ever heard of. Muḥammad himself has been taken prisoner, but they have said, 'We will not kill him, but will send him to Mecca, so that they can kill him in their midst for those of their men whom he killed.'"

So the men went and proclaimed it in Mecca, saying: "Here is news for you! Muḥammad is on the way. All you have to do is wait for him to be brought to you to be put to death in your midst."

I said, "Help me collect my property in Mecca from my debtors; for I want to go to Khaybar and get something from Muḥammad's defeated army and companions before the merchants beat me to what there is." So they went and collected my property as quickly as I have ever heard of its being done. I went to my wife and said: "My property!"—for I had property of mine left with her. "Perhaps I can reach Khaybar and take advantage of the opportunities to buy before the merchants beat me to it."

When al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib[526] heard the news—it was reported to him on my authority—he came and stood beside me while I was in one of the merchants' tents and said, "Ḥajjāj, what is this news you have brought?" I said, "Can you keep to yourself what I entrust to you?" "Yes," he replied. I said, "Leave me, and I will meet you in private; for I am in the midst of collecting my property, as you see." So he went away from me. When I had collected everything belonging to me in Mecca and was ready to leave, I met al-'Abbās and said, "Keep what I say to yourself for three nights, Abū al-Faḍl,[527] for I fear pursuit; then say whatever you want." "I will," he said. I said: "By God, I left your nephew [1588] married to their king's daughter, Ṣafiyyah bt. Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab. He has conquered Khaybar and plundered what it contains. It has become his and his companions'." "What are you saying, Ḥajjāj?" he said. I said: "It is so, by God! Keep my secret. I have become a Muslim and have come only to get my property for fear that it may be taken from me by force. After three days have passed, make what you know public; for the matter, by God, is as you would like it to be."

526. Al-'Abbās was Muḥammad's uncle. According to al-Ṭabarī, I, 1344, he became a Muslim sometime before the Battle of Badr but had been forced to fight on the Meccan side at that battle, professing his Islam openly only after he was captured. See *EI*², s.v. al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib.

527. Abū al-Faḍl is the kunyah of al-'Abbās.

On the third day, al-'Abbās put on a suit of clothes, perfumed himself, took his stick, left his house, went to the Ka'bah, and circumambulated it. When people saw him, they said, "Abū al-Faḍl, this, by God, is composure in the face of a searing misfortune!" "No," he replied, "by Him by whom you swore, Muḥammad has conquered Khaybar and has been made the husband of the daughter of their king. He has taken its wealth and what was in it; they have become his and his companions'." "Who brought you this news?" they asked. He said: "The one who brought you what he brought you. He came among you as a Muslim, took his property, and left to join the Messenger of God and his companions and be with him." They said: "Help, servants of God! The enemy of God has escaped! By God, had we known, we should have had a bone to pick with him." Soon the news of it reached them.

The Division of the Spoils of Khaybar

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr, who said: The property of Khaybar—[the fortresses of] al-Shiqq, Naṭāh, and al-Katībah—was divided as follows. Al-Shiqq and Naṭāh were among the shares of the Muslims. Al-Katībah was the fifth of God, the fifth of the Prophet, the share of kinsmen, orphans, the needy, and the wayfarer, food for the [1589] wives of the Prophet, and food for the men who had mediated the peace between the Messenger of God and the people of Fadak[528] (they included Muḥayyiṣah b. Mas'ūd, whom the Messenger of God gave from it thirty camel loads of barley and thirty camel loads of dates). Khaybar was divided among the people who had been at al-Ḥudaybiyah, both those who were present at Khaybar

528. It is unlikely that the ands in the original connect equal units, implying (as Guillaume translates the parallel in Ibn Hishām) that the spoils of al-Katībah were divided into five equal parts—one-fifth for God, one-fifth for the Prophet, one-fifth for relatives, orphans, the needy, and wayfarers, one-fifth for the Prophet's wives, and one-fifth for the mediators between him and Fadak. Qur'ānic usage normally treats the one-fifth (khums) of God and the one-fifth of the Prophet as synonymous (e.g., Qur'ān 8:41: "a fifth is for God and for the Messenger and for the kinsman and orphans and the needy and the wayfarer"; similarly Qur'ān 59:7). The most likely meaning is that al-Katībah as a whole was treated as constituting the fifth of the booty reserved for Muḥammad to divide for special uses ("the fifth of God"). This interpretation is followed by Vaglieri, in *EI*², s.v. Khaybar, summarizes the varying traditions about the division of the spoils of Khaybar.

and those who were absent. Only Jābir b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥarām al-Anṣārī was absent, and the Messenger of God allotted him a share like that of those who were present.

After the Messenger of God had finished with Khaybar, God cast fear into the hearts of the people of Fadak when they received news of what God had brought upon the people of Khaybar; so they sent to the Messenger of God to make peace with him for a half share of Fadak. Their messengers came to him in Khaybar [or on the way,[529] or perhaps after he had arrived in Medina], and he accepted their terms. Fadak became the property of the Messenger of God exclusively, because no horses or camels had been spurred against it.[530]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr, who said: The Messenger of God used to send 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah to the people of Khaybar to estimate the quantity of the date harvest [to be divided] between the Muslims and the Jews. He would make his estimate for them; and if they said, "You have wronged us," he would say, "If you wish, it[531] is yours; and if you wish, it is ours." So the Jews used to say, "By this man heaven and earth stand firm!"[532] 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah acted as their assessor for only [one year];[533] then he was killed at Mu'tah. Jabbār b. Ṣakhr b. Khansā' of the Banū Salimah became their assessor after 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah. The Jews continued on these terms, and the Muslims found no fault with their sharecropping until, in the lifetime of the Messenger of God, they [1590] attacked 'Abdallāh b. Sahl of the Banū Ḥārithah and killed him. The Messenger of God and the Muslims became suspicious of them because of him.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: I asked Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī how the Messenger of God's grant to

529. For "on the way" (bi-al-ṭarīq), IH reads "in al-Ṭā'if" (bi-al-Ṭā'if).

530. The language is similar to Qur'ān 59:7.

531. Apparently, "this heap." I.e., he divided the harvest into two heaps and gave the Jews the choice of which they wanted.

532. The pronoun hādhā ("this") refers, as is usual, to a person ['Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah]. Guillaume's finding of a direct echo of Pirqē Āvhōth 1:19 (he translates as if hādhā meant "this foundation") is unlikely, although some echo of the Jewish topos of "things on which heaven and earth rest" is possible.

533. The bracketed words, which are syntactically necessary, are from the parallel in IH, III, 354.

the Jews of Khaybar of their date palms, when he granted them the palm trees with the proviso of a tax on them, had taken place: did he concede them these terms as established [only] until his death, or for some necessity did he grant them to them without such a proviso? Ibn Shihāb informed me that the Messenger of God conquered Khaybar by force after fighting. Khaybar was something that God gave as booty to His Messenger. The Messenger of God took one-fifth of it and divided [the remainder] among the Muslims. Those of the inhabitants who surrendered did so on condition that they should be expelled after having fought. The Messenger of God summoned them and said, "If you wish, we will deliver these properties to you on condition that you shall work them and that their produce shall be divided between us and you; I will allow you to remain as long as God allows you to remain." They accepted, and they worked the properties on those terms. The Messenger of God used to send 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah; he would divide the produce and assess it fairly for the inhabitants. After the death of the Prophet, Abū Bakr after the Prophet confirmed the properties in their hands on the same terms of sharecropping on which the Messenger of God had dealt with them. When Abū Bakr died, 'Umar confirmed the sharecropping arrangement in the beginning of his term as commander; then, however, 'Umar was informed that the Messenger of God had said during his final illness, "Two religions cannot coexist in the Arabian peninsula."[534] 'Umar investigated the matter until trustworthy evidence reached him;[535] then he sent to the Jews, saying: "God has given permission for you to be expelled; for I have received [1591] word that the Messenger of God said that two religions cannot coexist in the Arabian peninsula. Let anyone who has a treaty from the Messenger of God bring it to me, and I will carry it out for him. Let any Jew who has no treaty from the Messenger of God make ready to leave." Thus 'Umar expelled any of them who had no treaty from the Messenger of God.

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: Then the Messenger of God returned to Medina.

534. Cf. the proverb (al-Maydani, II, 268): lā yajtami'u faḥlāni fī shawl, "Two stallions cannot live side by side in a herd."

535. Or, "until a trustworthy transmitter informed him."

Various Notices

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year the Messenger of God returned his daughter Zaynab to Abū al-'Āṣ b. al-Rabī'. This took place in Muḥarram.[536]

In this year Ḥāṭib b. Abī Balta'ah came back from al-Muqawqis bringing Māriyah and her sister Sīrīn, his female mule Duldul, his donkey Ya'fūr, and sets of garments. With the two women al-Muqawqis had sent a eunuch, and the latter stayed with them. Ḥāṭib had invited them to become Muslims before he arrived with them, and Māriyah and her sister did so. The Messenger of God lodged them with Umm Sulaym bt. Milḥān. Māriyah was beautiful. The Prophet sent her sister Sīrīn to Ḥassān b. Thābit, and she bore him 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥassān.

In this year the Prophet had the pulpit[537] made on which he used to preach to the people: he had it made with two steps and his seat. Others say that it was made in the year 8, which we[538] think is the reliable report.

In this year the Messenger of God sent 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb with thirty men against the "rear" of Hawāzin[539] at Turabah.[540] He set out with a guide from the Banū Hilāl. They traveled by night and [1592] hid by day. However, word reached Hawāzin and they fled. 'Umar returned without having encountered any fighting.

In this year a raiding party led by Abū Bakr b. Quḥāfah went to Najd in Sha'bān.[541]

According to Salamah b. al-Akwa': We raided with Abū Bakr in that year. According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: An account of this has been given earlier.[542]

---

536. Muḥarram of A.H. 7 began on 11 May 628. Cf. pp. 93–94 and note 400, above. Apparently, Abū al-'Āṣ became a Muslim after his release, so that Zaynab could become his wife again.

537. See *EI*², s.v. Minbar, for a discussion by J. Pedersen of the derivation of the term and the various traditions about how the pulpit was introduced.

538. I.e., al-Wāqidī and his authorities.

539. The rear ('ajuz or 'ujz) of the north Arabian tribe of Hawāzin consisted of the tribe's smaller divisions: Jusham, Naṣr, and Sa'd b. Bakr; see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 99; Lisān, IV, 2819; and *EI*², s.v. Hawāzin. Parallel: W, II, 722.

540. Turabah was south of Mecca; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, II, 374.

541. Sha'bān of A.H. 7 began on 4 December 628.

542. See p. 97, above.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year a thirty-man raiding party led by Bashīr b. Sa'd[543] went to the Banū Murrah at Fadak in Sha'bān.[544] His companions were killed,[545] and he was carried away wounded with the dead. Then he returned to Medina.

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: In this year a raiding party led by Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh went to al-Mayfa'ah in the month of Ramaḍān.[546]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr, who said:[547] The Messenger of God sent Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh al-Kalbī to the land of the Banū Murrah. During the raid, Usāmah b. Zayd and one of the Anṣār killed Mirdās b. Nahīk, an ally [of the Banū Murrah] from the al-Ḥuraqah [clan of the tribe] of Juhaynah.

According to Usāmah: When we overcame him, he said "I testify that there is no god but God," but we killed him before we left. When we came to the Messenger of God, we told him the story, and he said, "Usāmah, who will [say] to you 'There is no god but God'?"[548]

According to al-Wāqidī:[549] In this year the raiding party led by [1593] Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh went to the Banū 'Abd b. Tha'labah. Accord-

543. On this Medinese companion of the Prophet (a member of al-Khazraj), see *EI*², s.v. Bashīr b. Sa'd.

544. Parallel: W, II, 723–26.

545. Or "wounded": Arabic uṣība, "were hit," is ambiguous. The parallel in al-Wāqidī implies many, but not all, were killed.

546. Ramaḍān of A.H. 7 began on 2 January 629. Al-Mayfa'ah is in Najd. Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, II, 86) locates it beyond Baṭn Nakhl (which Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, II, 221, places "close" to Medina), toward al-Naqirah (which Yāqūt, VIII, 308, locates where the road from Iraq divides into two branches, one to Medina and one to Mecca; the modern toponym Nuqra in central Saudi Arabia may be the same place), eight post stages from Medina.

547. Parallel: IH, IV, 622–23 (without isnād).

548. I think this is the simplest interpretation of man laka bi-lā ilāha illā Allāh. Cf. Wright, Arabic Grammar, II, 163C; Reckendorf, Arabische Syntax, 240. Guillaume (p. 667) translates "who will absolve you from ignoring the confession of faith?"—which I think is too complicated. The idiom normally means "who will bring/get/procure something for someone?" Muḥammad's rebuke to Usāmah would therefore mean that if he kills prisoners who recite the Muslim creed, no one will ever bring him (i.e., say to him) these words and thus accept Islam in his presence.

549. Parallel: W, II, 626–27.

ing to al-Wāqidī—'Abdallāh b. Ja'far—Ibn Abī 'Awn[550]—Ya'qūb b. 'Utbah, who said: Yasār, the mawlā of the Messenger of God, said, "Messenger of God, I know where the Banū 'Abd b. Tha'labah can be taken by surprise." He sent with him Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh with 130 men. They raided the Banū 'Abd, drove off camels and sheep, and brought them back to Medina.

In this year a raiding party led by Bashīr b. Sa'd went to Yumn and Jināb in Shawwāl of the year 7.[551] According to [al-Wāqidī]—Yaḥyā b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Sa'īd[552]—Sa'd b. 'Ubādah—Bashīr b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Zayd, who said:[553] What prompted this raiding party was that Ḥusayl b. Nuwayrah al-Ashja'ī, who had been the guide of the Messenger of God to Khaybar, came before the Prophet. The Prophet asked him, "What news do you bring?" He said, "I left a large gathering of Ghaṭafān at al-Jināb: 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn has summoned them to march against you." So the Prophet summoned Bashīr b. Sa'd, and the guide, Ḥusayl b. Nuwayrah, went with him. They captured camels and sheep. A slave belonging to 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn met them, and they killed him. Then they encountered 'Uyaynah's army, which was put to flight. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Awf[554] met 'Uyaynah as he was fleeing and said, "The time has come, 'Uyaynah, for you to give up what you[555] plan."

The Lesser Pilgrimage of Fulfillment

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said:[556] When the Messenger of God returned to Medina from Khaybar, he

---

550. 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. Abī 'Awn al-Dawsī was born in Medina and died in 144/761–62. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 438.

551. Yumn (Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VIII, 524) was a watering place of Ghaṭafān between Baṭn Qaww and Ru'āf, on the road between Taymā' and Fayd; al-Jināb was near Khaybar (ibid., III, 130–31).

552. A Yaḥyā b. 'Abd al-'Azīz Abū 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Urdunnī (or al-Yamāmī) of Syrian origin—possibly they are two different men—is listed without dates in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 251.

553. Parallel: W, II, 727–31.

554. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Awf al-Murrī, the leader of the Banū Murrah, seems to have been an ally of 'Uyaynah; cf. the parallel in W, II, 729; also Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 94.

555. Variant, "we."

556. Parallel: IH, IV, 370 (tr. Guillaume, 530).

[1594] stayed there the months of Rabī' I, Rabī' II, Jumādā I, Jumādā II, Rajab, Sha'bān, Ramaḍān, and Shawwāl,[557] sending out expeditions and raiding parties during the period. Then in Dhū al-Qa'dah,[558] the month in which the polytheists had turned him back [in the previous year], he set out to perform the "Lesser Pilgrimage of Fulfillment" in place of the lesser pilgrimage from which they had turned him back.[559] The Muslims who had been with him on that lesser pilgrimage of his set out with him. It was the year 7. When the people of Mecca heard of it, they made way for him. The Quraysh spoke among themselves of how Muḥammad and his companions were in difficulty, distress, and want.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. 'Umārah[560]—al-Ḥakam b. 'Utaybah[561]—Miqsam[562]—Ibn 'Abbās, who said: They stood in rows at the House of Assembly (Dār al-Nadwah)[563] to look at the Messenger of God and his companions with him. When the Messenger of God entered the mosque, he put his cloak under his right arm and threw the bottom of it over his left shoulder,[564] leaving his right arm uncovered. Then he said, "May God have mercy on a man who today has shown them his 557. I.e., from 9 July 728 (the beginning of Rabī' I) to 1 March 729 (the end of Shawwāl).

558. Dhū al-Qa'dah of A.H. 7 began on 2 March 629.

559. See pp. 67 ff., above. The phrase 'umrat al-qaḍā' implies that it was seen as making up for the interrupted pilgrimage of the previous year. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳaḍā'. It was sometimes called 'umrat al-qaḍiyyah (the Lesser Pilgrimage of the Pact—so on p. 138, below) to imply that there was no obligatory making up, merely the fulfilling of a bargain struck at al-Ḥudaybiyah the previous year. See Burton, An Introduction to the Ḥadīth, 14.

560. Al-Ḥasan b. 'Umārah died in 153/752. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 304–8.

561. Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥakam b. 'Utaybah al-Kindī lived from around 47–50/667–70 to about 113–15/731–33. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 432–34; GAS, I, 65–66, 403.

562. Abū al-Qāsim Miqsam b. Bujrah (mawlā of 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal) died in 101/719. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 288–89; GAS, I, 65.

563. The House of Assembly (Dār al-Nadwah), to the north of the Ka'bah, was where the Meccan leaders gathered to deliberate and transact common business. See *EI*², s.v. Dār al-Nadwa.

564. The procedure is expressed by the Arabic phrase iḍṭaba'a bi-ridā'ihī. As Lane (Lexicon, V, 1766) notes, it frees the right arm and shoulder for work. One might see it as a symbolic gesture proclaiming the worshiper's readiness to serve the deity.

own strength." He touched the stone at the corner[565] and set out at a quick walk,[566] his companions going at the same pace with him. Then, when the House[567] had hidden him from the people and he had touched the southern corner, he walked until he touched the Black [Stone]; then he went at a quick walk in similar fashion for three circuits. He walked the remainder of the circuits.[568] Ibn 'Abbās used to say: "People used to think that it[569] was not incumbent upon them—that the Messenger of God had done it only because of those people of Quraysh, on account of what had been reported to him about them.[570] However, when he performed his Farewell Pilgrimage,[571] he trotted [those circuits],[572] and it became sunnah[573] to do so."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: When the Messenger of God entered Mecca on that lesser pilgrimage, he entered it while 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah was holding his camel's nose-ring and reciting:[574] [1595]

Make way, ye sons of unbelievers, for him:
I am a witness that he is His Messenger.
Make way: for all good is in His Messenger.
O Lord, I believe in what he says.
I know that God's truth is in accepting it.

---

565. The Black Stone at the corner of the Ka'bah. "He touched (istalama) it," may also mean "he kissed it, or wiped it with his hand." The verb implies a ritual gesture, and the dictionaries are uncertain of its derivation; cf. Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1413.

566. Arabic: yuharwil, going at the pace called harwalah, between a walk and a run.

567. I.e., the Ka'bah.

568. I.e., the four circuits remaining of the total of seven. See EI[1], s.v. 'Umra.

569. I.e., the quick walk.

570. I.e., to impress Quraysh that he was not exhausted, as they had rumored.

571. In A.H. 10 (February–March 632); cf. al-Ṭabarī, I, 1751 ff.

572. Arabic: ramala, usually taken to be synonymous with harwala and to refer to the same gait between a walk and a run; see Lane, Lexicon, III, 1159.

573. Sunnah (from sanna, to institute) originally meant "a way of acting or conduct . . . instituted by former people, and . . . pursued by those after them"—Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1438. The Islamic community applied the word to the normative actions and sayings of Muḥammad handed down within the community. See also, Bravmann, The Spiritual Background of Early Islam, 123–98.

574. Further discussion of the poem, its variants, and attributions of it to other poets may be found in the Dīwān of 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah, 101–2.

We have killed you in accordance with[575] its interpretation,
As we have killed you in accordance with its revelation, with striking that removes the head from its resting place and makes friend forget his friend.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Abān b. Ṣāliḥ[576] and 'Abdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ—'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ[577] and Mujāhid—Ibn 'Abbās: The Messenger of God married Maymūnah bt. al-Ḥārith on this journey while he was in a state of ritual purity; al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib married her to him.[578]

According to Ibn Isḥāq: The Messenger of God stayed in Mecca three nights. On the third day, Ḥuwayṭib b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. Abī Qays b. 'Abd Wudd b. Naṣr b. Mālik b. Ḥisl came to him with a [1596] group of Quraysh: Quraysh had deputed Ḥuwayṭib to make the Messenger of God leave Mecca. They said to him, "Your allotted time is up; so depart from us!" The Messenger of God said to them: "How would it harm you if you left me and I celebrated the wedding feast among you? We would prepare food for you, and you would attend it." They said, "We do not need your food; so depart from us!" The Messenger of God departed, leaving behind Abū

575. Arabic: 'ala ta'wīlihī, can also be rendered "over its interpretation," and the next hemistich "over its revelation." My translation preserves the possibility that the verses could have been addressed to the pagan Meccans on this occasion. IH, IV, 371–72, however, accepts the translation "over." After quoting the verse (omitting the hemistich "I am a witness . . ."), Ibn Hishām pronounces only the first two verses genuine: the last two verses, he argues, must have been pronounced on another occasion because "the polytheists had not accepted the revelation, and one fights over interpretation only with those who have already accepted the revelation."

576. Abān b. Ṣāliḥ b. 'Umayr b. 'Ubayd al-Qurashī, a mawlā, was born in 60/679–80 and lived until ca. 110/728–29. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 94–95.

577. Abū Muḥammad 'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ Aslam al-Qurashī was born in 27/647 and died in 114/732. He was a Qur'ān commentator and expert on law. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 199–203; GAS, I, 31.

578. Maymūnah, at this time a widow, was the sister of Umm al-Faḍl, the wife of al-'Abbās, Muḥammad's uncle. The authenticity of this tradition, which implies that it is permissible to contract (but not consummate) a marriage while one is in the state of ritual purity (iḥrām) necessary for performance of the pilgrimage ('umrah or ḥajj), was a subject of controversy among early Islamic schools of law. The various opinions are summarized by Schacht, The Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, 153. See also *EI*², s.v. Maymūna bint al-Ḥārith; Burton, An Introduction to the Ḥadīth, 78–81.

Rāfi' his mawlā to take charge of Maymūnah. Abū Rāfi' brought her to him at Sarif,[579] and the Messenger of God consummated his marriage with her there. The Messenger of God commanded that they should find a substitute for the sacrificial camels—he himself also found a substitute with them. Camels being scarce for them, he permitted them [to sacrifice] cattle. The Messenger of God returned to Medina in Dhū al-Ḥijjah and stayed there the remainder of Dhū al-Ḥijjah [the polytheists were in charge of the pilgrimage that year], Muḥarram, Ṣafar, and both months of Rabī'.[580] In Jumādā I he sent out his expedition to Syria, which came to grief at Mu'tah.

According to al-Wāqidī—Ibn Abī Dhi'b[581]—al-Zuhrī, who said: The Messenger of God commanded them that they should perform the lesser pilgrimage in the following year in fulfillment of [or, to make up for] the lesser pilgrimage of al-Ḥudaybiyah and that they should bring sacrificial animals.

According to [al-Wāqidī]—'Abdallāh b. Nāfi'[582]—his father [Nāfi']—Ibn 'Umar,[584] who said: This lesser pilgrimage was not a fulfillment [or a making up]; rather, it had been stipulated that the Muslims should perform the lesser pilgrimage in the following year in the month in which the polytheists turned them back.

According to al-Wāqidī: The statement of Ibn Abī Dhi'b is preferable to us because they had been prevented [the previous year] and had not reached the Ka'bah.

According to al-Wāqidī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b.

---

579. Sarif is close to Mecca. Yāqūt (Mu'jam al-buldān, V, 70f.) gives the distance as six, seven, nine, or twelve miles.

580. I.e., he remained in Medina roughly from 1 April 629 to 5 September [the end of Rabī' II].

581. Ibn Abī Dhi'b is Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Mughīrah, a judge of al-Kūfah, who died in 159/776. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 303–7; GAS, I, 204.

582. 'Abdallāh b. Nāfi' al-'Adawī was a mawlā born in Medina. He transmitted ḥadīth from his father, Nāfi', the mawlā of Ibn 'Umar, and died in 154/771. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 53–54.

583. Nāfi', the mawlā of 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, died in 119 or 120/737–38. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 412–15.

584. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb [a son of the caliph 'Umar] died in 73/692. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 228–29; *EI*², s.v. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar.

Mawhab[585]—Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, who said: The Messenger of God drove sixty fatted camels on the Lesser Pilgrimage of the Pact ('umrat al-qaḍiyyah).

[1597] According to [al-Wāqidī]—Mu'ādh b. Muḥammad al-Anṣārī[586]—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah, who said: He carried arms, helmets, and spears and led a hundred horses. He appointed Bashīr b. Sa'd to be in charge of the weapons, and Muḥammad b. Maslamah to be in charge of the horses. When Quraysh received word of this, it frightened them. They sent Mikraz b. Ḥafṣ b. al-Akhyaf, who met him at Marr al-Ẓahrān.[587] [The Messenger of God] said to him: "Young or old, I have never been known but for keeping a promise. I do not want to bring in weapons against them, but the weapons will be close to me." Mikraz returned to Quraysh and informed them.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year the raid of Ibn Abī al-'Awjā' al-Sulamī on the Banū Sulaym took place in Dhū al-Qa'dah.[588] The Messenger of God sent him against them with fifty men after he returned from Mecca, and he set out against them.

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: According to what I have received from Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr:[589] The Banū Sulaym met him during it, and he and his companions all were killed.

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: However, al-Wāqidī alleges that he escaped and returned to Medina, but his companions were killed.[590]

---

585. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mawhab is listed without dates in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 29.

586. For Mu'ādh b. Muḥammad al-Anṣārī, see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 193–94.

587. Marr al-Ẓahrān, according to Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VIII, 21, is either one stage or five miles from Mecca.

588. Thus the manuscripts, but it is an error for "Dhū al-Ḥijjah," which is given in al-Wāqidī, Ibn Sa'd, Nuwayrī, and others, and which the sequence demands; cf. al-Ṭabarī, I, 1596. [Ed. Leiden note].

589. The tradition does not appear in the surviving recensions of the Sīrah.

590. Parallel: W, II, 741.

The Events of the Year 8

(May 1, 629–April 19, 630)

In this year (as alleged by al-Wāqidī—Yaḥyā b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Qatādah[591]—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr) Zaynab, the daughter of the Messenger of God, died.

The Expedition against the Banū al-Mulawwiḥ

In Ṣafar of this year the Messenger of God sent Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh al-Laythī on a raid to al-Kadīd against the Banū al-Mulawwiḥ.[592] [1598]

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: The report of this raiding party and of Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh was transmitted to me by Ibrāhīm

591. Yaḥyā b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Qatādah, the grandson of the companion Abū Qatādah, seems to be mentioned in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 360 as having transmitted ḥadīth from his father 'Abdallāh. The name of 'Abdallāh's second son, Yaḥyā, appears to have dropped out of the text of Ibn Ḥajar by haplography.

592. Ṣafar of A.H. 8 began on 31 May 629. The Banū al-Mulawwiḥ (also vocalized as al-Mulawwaḥ) were a part of the Banū Layth (in turn a part of Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt) with territory west of Medina. Al-Kadīd is in the Ḥijāz, twenty-four miles from Mecca (Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VII, 224). Parallels: W, 750–52; IH, IV, 609–12 (tr. Guillaume, 660–62).

b. Sa'īd al-Jawharī[593] and Sa'īd b. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd.[594] [Ibrāhīm said he had received his report from Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd;[595] Sa'īd b. Yaḥyā said he had received his report from his father [Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd].] We also received this report from Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah. All [these reports] are from Ibn Isḥāq—Ya'qūb b. 'Utbah b. al-Mughīrah—Muslim b. 'Abdallāh b. Khubayb al-Juhanī[596]—Jundab b. Makīth al-Juhanī,[597] who said: The Messenger of God sent out Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh al-Kalbī [of the Kalb [subdivision] of Layth] against the Banū al-Mulawwiḥ in al-Kadīd and commanded him to raid them. Ghālib set out; I was in his raiding party. We traveled on until, when we were at Qudayd,[598] we encountered al-Ḥārith b. Mālik, known as Ibn al-Barṣā' al-Laythī. We took him, but he said, "I came only to become a Muslim." Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh said, "If you have indeed come as a Muslim, it will not harm you to be bound for a day and night; if you have come for another purpose, we shall [thereby] be safe from you." So he secured him with a rope and left a little black man who was with us in charge of him, saying: "Stay with him until we pass by you. If he gives you trouble, cut off his head."

We continued on until we came to the bottomland of al-Kadīd and halted toward evening, after the midafternoon prayer. My companions sent me out as a scout. I went to a hill that gave me a view of the settlement and lay face down on the ground. It was just before sunset. One of their men came out, looked, and saw me [1599] lying on the hill. He said to his wife: "By God, I see a shape on this hill that I did not see at the beginning of the day. See whether the dogs may not have dragged away one of your utensils." She looked and said, "By God, I am not missing anything." He said, "Hand me

593. Ibrāhīm b. Sa'īd al-Jawharī was originally from Ṭabaristān and died ca. 250/864. See al-Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, VI, 93–96; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 123–25.

594. Sa'īd b. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd al-Umawī died in 249/863. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 97–98.

595. Abū Ayyūb Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. Abān b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ al-Umawī al-Kūfī was born ca. 114/732. He later moved to Baghdād, where he died in 194/809. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 213–14; GAS, I, 293.

596. Muslim b. 'Abdallāh b. Khubayb al-Juhanī is mentioned without dates in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 133.

597. Jundab b. Makīth b. Jarād b. Yarbū' al-Juhanī was a companion of the Prophet. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 118.

598. Yāqūt [Mu'jam al-buldān, VII, 38] locates Qudayd near Mecca. Al-Samhūdī, Khulāṣat al-wafā', 595, calls it "a large village with abundant water on the road to Mecca."

my bow and two of my arrows." She handed them to him, and he shot me with an arrow and hit my side. I pulled it out, put it down, and did not move. Then he shot me with the other and hit the top of my shoulder. I pulled it out, put it down, and did not move. He said: "By God, both my arrows penetrated it. If it were a living thing,[599] it would have moved. Go after my arrows in the morning and get them, so that the dogs do not chew them up for me."

We gave them time until their herds had come back from pasture in the evening. After they had milked the camels, set them to rest by the watering trough, and had stopped moving around, after the first part of the night had passed, we launched the raid on them. We killed some of them, drove away the camels, and set out to return. Meanwhile, the party carrying the people's appeal for aid set out to the tribe to get help.

We traveled quickly. When we passed by al-Ḥārith b. Mālik [Ibn al-Barṣā'] and his companion, we took him with us. The party summoned to aid the people came at us. They were too powerful for us. However, when only the bottom of Qudayd Canyon was between us and them, God sent clouds from out of the blue, although we had seen neither rain nor clouds before that, and the result was [a torrent] that no one could risk [crossing]. We saw them looking at us, none of them able to risk it or advance, while we quickly drove off the camels. We took them up to al-Mushallal[600] and then brought them down from it, and we eluded the tribesmen with what we had taken. I shall never forget the [1600] rajaz verses that one of the Muslims recited as he was driving the camels from behind:

Abū al-Qāsim[601] refuses to let you remain out all night in [pasture] whose plants are moist and luxuriant, their tops golden like the color of something gilded.

---

599. Reading zā'ilah, as suggested by ed. Leiden "Addenda et emendanda," ad loc. The original Leiden reading (echoed by ed. Cairo) was rabī'ah, "a scout."

600. Al-Mushallal is a mountain overlooking Qudayd; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VIII, 67. Al-Samhūdī, Khulāṣat al-wafā', 607, calls it a mountain pass (or trail) overlooking Qudayd and refers to the shrine to the goddess Manāt located there. See p. 188, below, for the report of its destruction. Cf. *EI*², VI, 373–74, s.v. Manāt, and T. Fahd, Le panthéon de l'Arabie centrale, 123. Fahd locates al-Mushallal seven Arab miles (ca. fifteen kilometers) from Medina, but Yāqūt and al-Samhūdī give no distance.

601. Abū al-Qāsim ("Father of al-Qāsim") was the kunyah of Muḥammad, taken from the name of his first male child; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1128.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—a man from Aslam—a shaykh of Aslam: The battle cry of the companions of the Messenger of God that night was "Kill! Kill!"

According to al-Wāqidī: The raiding party led by Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh consisted of between thirteen and nineteen men.

Other Notices

In this year the Messenger of God sent al-'Alā' b. al-Ḥaḍramī to al-Mundhir b. Sāwā al-'Abdī[602] and wrote to him a letter containing the following:

> In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate. From Muḥammad the Prophet, Messenger of God, to al-Mundhir b. Sāwā: Peace be upon you! I praise to you God, save Whom there is no god.
>
> To proceed: I have received your letter and your messengers. Whoever prays our prayer, eats of our sacrifice, and turns to our qiblah is a Muslim: permitted to him is what is permitted to Muslims, and incumbent on him is what is incumbent on Muslims. Incumbent on whoever refuses is [the payment of] tax.[603]

The Messenger of God made peace with them on condition that the Zoroastrians should be required [to pay] tax, that their sacrifices should not be eaten, and that one should not marry their women.

In this year the Messenger of God sent 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ to Jayfar [1601] and 'Abbād, the sons of Julandā, in 'Umān. The two believed in the Prophet and affirmed what he had brought. He exacted the poor rate[604] on their wealth and collected tax (jizyah) from the Zoroastrians.

---

602. See note 430, above.

603. Arabic: jizyah, "the tax that is taken from the free non-Muslim subjects of a Muslim government, whereby they ratify the compact that ensures them protection" (Lane, Lexicon, II, 422). Cf. *EI*², s.v. Djizya.

604. Arabic: ṣaddaqa, he collected ṣadaqah, "a gift to the poor for the sake of God." Later usage distinguished ṣadaqah from zakāh, the obligatory payment by Muslims of a fixed portion or their wealth for the poor, but here ṣaddaqa clearly refers to the collection of an obigatory payment; such instances are not uncommon in early usage. See Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1668; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 369–72.

In this year a twenty-four-man raiding party led by Shujā' b. Wahb went to the Banū 'Āmir in the month of Rabī' I.[605] He launched a raid on them and took camels and sheep. The shares [of booty] came to fifteen camels for each man.

In this year a raiding party led by 'Amr b. Ka'b[606] al-Ghifārī went to Dhāt Aṭlāḥ. He set out with fifteen men, and when he reached Dhāt Aṭlāḥ he encountered a large force of men whom they summoned to Islam. They refused to respond and killed all of 'Amr's companions. He[607] managed to get away and returned to Medina.

According to al-Wāqidī: Dhāt Aṭlāḥ is in the direction of Syria. Its people belonged to [the tribe of] Quḍā'ah.[608] Their head was a man named Sadūs.

'Amr b. al-'Āṣ and Khālid b. al-Walīd Go to Medina as Muslims

In this year 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ came to the Messenger of God as a Muslim, having accepted Islam at the court of the Negus. With him came 'Uthmān b. Ṭalḥah al-'Abdarī and Khālid b. al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah. They came to Medina at the beginning of Ṣafar.[609]

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: The circumstances of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ's becoming a Muslim were as follows (according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb—Rāshid,

---

605. Rabī' I of A.H. 8 began on 29 June 629.

606. The name is given thus in the manuscripts of al-Ṭabarī and in the later historian Ibn al-Athīr. The correct reading, Ka'b b. 'Umayr, is preserved in Ibn Sa'd, and in W, II, 752, and IH, IV, 621 (tr. Guillaume, 667). See ed. Leiden, note ad loc.

607. Al-Ṭabarī implies that 'Amr was the man who escaped. Al-Wāqidī has: "The companions of the Prophet . . . fought very hard, until they were killed; one of them, who was wounded among the dead, escaped and managed to get away after nightfall"—similarly in Ibn Sa'd.

608. Quḍā'ah was a group of Arab tribes of obscure origin. Of its main divisions, Juhaynah controlled the coastal caravan route between Syria and Mecca, while Balī was located farther to the north, from Wādī Iḍam and Taymā'. Other divisions included 'Udhrah and Kalb. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳuḍā'a; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 110–11.

609. Ṣafar of A.H. 8 began on 31 May 629.

the mawlā of Ibn Abī Aws[610]—Ḥabīb b. Abī Aws,[611] who said [1602] that 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ himself had spoken in his hearing, saying]:[612] When we returned with the allies from the [Battle of the] Trench, I gathered some men of Quraysh who thought as I did and would heed my words. I said to them: "You know, by God, that I think Muḥammad's enterprise will prevail in an extraordinary manner. I have formed an idea: What do you think of it?" "What is your idea?" they asked. I said: "I think we should join the Negus and stay at his court. If Muḥammad defeats our people, we shall stay with the Negus; for it will be preferable for us to be under the power of the Negus than under the power of Muḥammad. If our people are victorious, we are people whom they know, and only good will come to us from them." They said, "This is good counsel indeed." So I said, "Gather up things that we can present to him as gifts." The gift he liked most from our land was tanned hides; so we gathered up many tanned hides for him. Then we set out, and we came to him. While we were at his court, by God, 'Amr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī came to him, sent to him by the Messenger of God in the matter of Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib and his companions. 'Amr went before him and then came out of his presence. I said to my companions: "This is 'Amr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī. Perhaps I should go before the Negus and ask him for him. Perhaps he will give him to me and I can cut off his head. If I do it, Quraysh will think I have rendered them a service by killing Muḥammad's messenger."

So I went before the Negus and prostrated myself to him as I used to do. "Welcome to my friend!" he said. "Have you brought me something from your country as a gift?" "Yes, King," I said, "I have brought you many tanned skins." I presented them to him; they pleased him, and he desired them. Then I said to him: "O [1603] King, I have seen a man who left your presence. He is the messenger of a man who is our enemy. Give him to me, so that I may kill him, for he has killed some of our dignitaries and best men." The Negus became angry and, reaching out with his hand, struck

610. Rāshid, the mawlā of Ḥabīb b. Aws (or b. Abī Aws), was Egyptian. He is listed without dates in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 225.

611. Ḥabīb b. Abī Aws (or b. Aws) al-Thaqafī participated in the conquest of Egypt. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 177.

612. Parallels: W, II, 741–50; IH, III, 276–79 (tr. Guillaume, 484–85).

his nose such a blow with it that I thought he had broken it. Had the earth split open for me, I would have entered into it for fear of him! I said, "By God, O King, had I thought the matter would displease you, I would not have asked it of you." He said, "Will you ask me to hand over to you the messenger of a man to whom comes the Great Nāmūs,[613] who used to come to Moses, for you to kill him?" I said, "O King, is he indeed such?" He said: "Alas for you, 'Amr! Obey me, and follow him! By God, he is right and will be victorious over whoever opposes him, even as Moses was victorious over Pharaoh and his hosts." I said, "Will you accept my oath of allegiance to him for Islam?" "Yes," he said. He extended his hand, and I swore allegiance to him for Islam. Then I went out to my companions, my outlook having changed, but I concealed my acceptance of Islam from my companions.

Then I set out, intending to go to the Messenger of God to accept Islam. I met Khālid b. al-Walīd—it was before the conquest [of Mecca]. He was coming from Mecca. I asked him, "Where to, Abū Sulaymān?" "By God," he replied, "the trail has become straight! The man is indeed a prophet. By God, I am going to become a Muslim. How much longer [can one delay]?" I said, "By God, I [too] have come only to become a Muslim!" So we came to the Messenger of God. Khālid b. al-Walīd went first, became a Muslim, and swore allegiance. Then I approached and said, "Messenger of God, I will pledge allegiance to you on condition that you forgive me my earlier sin; I will not mention what came later."[614] The Messenger of God said, "'Amr, swear allegiance; for acceptance of Islam entirely cuts off what went before it, and emigration,[615] too, entirely cuts off what went before it." So I swore allegiance to him and departed. [1604]

613. Arabic nāmūs, is derived (through Syriac nāmūs) from Greek nómos, "law" (i.e., the Pentateuch or Law of Moses); but Arabic uses it in this phrase as a title of the Angel Gabriel, and it is so glossed in al-Ṭabarī, I, 1151. See *EI*², s.v. Nāmūs.

614. This interpretation is grammatically more likely than Guillaume's, "on condition that my past faults are forgiven and no mention is made of what has gone before." In the parallel in W, III, 745, 'Amr describes himself as having been so awed by the occasion that he forgot to mention all his sins: "As soon as I sat before him I was unable to raise my eyes to him from embarrassment. I swore allegiance to him on condition that my earlier sin should be forgiven me; the later one(s) did not enter my mind."

615. Arabic: hijrah.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—someone I do not doubt: 'Uthmān b. Ṭalḥah b. Abī Ṭalḥah was with the two of them and accepted Islam when they did.

Other Events of the Year 8 of the Hijrah

Among the events of this year, the Messenger of God sent 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ in Jumādā II to al-Salāsil in the territory of [the tribe of] Quḍā'ah with 300 men.[616] The circumstances were as follows. According to reports, the mother of al-'Āṣ b. Wā'il[617] was a woman from Quḍā'ah. It has been reported that the Messenger of God wanted to win them over by that, and he therefore sent 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, along with men of eminence among the Emigrants and Anṣār. 'Amr asked the Messenger of God for reinforcements, and the latter reinforced him with Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ in charge of the Emigrants and Anṣār, including Abū Bakr and 'Umar, with 200 men. The total number of men was 500.

The Expedition of Dhāt al-Salāsil

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr, who said: The Messenger of God sent 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ to the territory of Balī and 'Udhrah to seek their assistance [for an expedition] to Syria. The circumstances were as follows. The mother of al-'Āṣ b. Wā'il was a woman from [the tribe of] Balī. The Messenger of God therefore sent 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ to [1605] them to try to gain their good will. When 'Amr was in the territory of [the tribe of] Judhām at a watering place called al-Salāsil (the expedition therefore came to be called Dhāt al-Salāsil[618])—when he was at the place, he became afraid and sent to the Messenger of God, asking him for reinforcements. The Messenger of God sent to him Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ with the first Emigrants, including Abū Bakr and 'Umar. When he sent out Abū 'Ubaydah, he said to him, "Let the two of you not disagree!" Abū 'Ubaydah set out.

---

616. Jumādā II of A.H. 8 began on 26 September 629. Parallels: W, III, 769–74; IH, IV, 623–26 (tr. Guillaume, 668–69).

617. Al-'Āṣ b. Wā'il was the father of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ.

618. I.e., [the Expedition] Pertaining to al-Salāsil. According to Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, II, 94) the site was ten-days' journey north of Medina.

When he reached 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, the latter said to him, "You have come only to reinforce me." Abū 'Ubaydah said to him: "'Amr, the Messenger of God said to me, 'Let the two of you not disagree.' Even if you disobey me, I will obey you." 'Amr said, "Then I am your commander, and you are merely a reinforcement to me." Abū 'Ubaydah replied, "Have your way." So 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ led the men in worship.[619]

The Expedition Known as al-Khabaṭ

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year the expedition known as al-Khabaṭ took place.[620] Its commander was Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ. The Messenger of God dispatched him in Rajab[621] of this year with 300 Emigrants and Anṣār toward [the tribe of] Juhaynah. During the expedition they suffered such severe dearth and distress that they divided up the dates by number.

According to Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān[622]—his uncle, 'Abdallāh b. Wahb[623]—'Amr b. al-Ḥārith[624]—'Amr b. Dīnār[625]—Jābir b. 'Abdallāh, who said: We set out with an expedition. We were 300 men, with Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ as our commander. Hunger beset us, so that for three months we ate leaves that we beat down from the trees. Then a sea creature came forth, called an ambergris whale, and we continued eating it for half a month. One of the Anṣār slaughtered some camels; then he slaughtered again the next day. Abū 'Ubaydah forbade him, and he stopped. ['Amr b. [1606]

619. Leading worship was a sign of authority.

620. Parallel: W, II, 774–77; IH, IV, 632–33 (tr. Guillaume, 673). The raid took its name not from a place, but from the shortage of provisions. Khabaṭ means "leaves that have been made to fall from a tree by its being beaten with a staff or stick, used as food for camels" (Lane, Lexicon, II, 698).

621. Rajab of A.H. 8 began on 25 October 629.

622. Ahmad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Wahb died in 264/877. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 54–55.

623. 'Abdallāh b. Wahb b. Muslim al-Fihrī was born in Egypt in 125/743 and died there in 197/812. He was a pupil of the jurist Mālik b. Anas. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 71–74; GAS, I, 466.

624. 'Amr b. al-Ḥārith b. Ya'qūb b. 'Abdallāh al-Anṣārī, a mawlā of Qays Abū Umayyah al-Miṣrī, was of Medinese origin. He was born ca. 90/708–9 and died ca. 148/765–66. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 14–15.

625. 'Amr b. Dīnār al-Makkī Abū Muḥammad al-Athram al-Jumaḥī was born in 46/666–67 and died in 126/743–44. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 28–30; GAS, I, 594 and Index.

Dīnār said that he heard Dhakwān Abū Ṣāliḥ say that the man was Qays b. Sa'd.]

'Amr [b. al-Ḥārith] said that he received a similar report from Bakr b. Sawādah al-Judhāmī[626]—Abū Jamrah[627]—Jābir b. 'Abdallāh, except that [in it] he said: They became exhausted. Qays b. Sa'd was their commander, and he slaughtered nine riding camels for them.

He also said: They had been sent on an expedition to the seacoast, and the sea cast up a creature to them. They stayed near it for three days, eating of it, making jerky, and scooping out its fat. When they returned to the Messenger of God, they told him what Qays b. Sa'd had done, and the Messenger of God said that generosity was the nature of that family. Concerning the whale he said, "If we knew that we could reach it before it began to smell, we should like to have some of it." [The narrator of this version] did not mention the leaves beaten down from the trees or anything except that.

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Makhlad[628]—Ibn Jurayj[629]—Abū al-Zubayr—Jābir b. 'Abdallāh, who said: The Prophet provisioned us with bags of dates. Abū 'Ubaydah doled them out to us handful by handful, then date by date. We would suck on them and drink water with them until night. Finally, when the contents of the bags were exhausted, we collected leaves beaten down from the trees. We became very hungry. Then the sea cast up a dead whale for us. Abū 'Ubaydah said, "Hungry ones, eat!"—and we ate. Abū 'Ubaydah would set up one of its ribs, and [1607] a rider on his camel could pass under it. Five men could sit in its eye socket. We ate and oiled ourselves until our bodies became healthy, and we came away fat. When we returned to Medina (so said Jābir), we mentioned this to the Prophet, and he said: "Eat a sustenance that God brought out for you. Do you have any of it

626. Bakr b. Sawādah b. Thumāmah al-Judhāmī died in North Africa during the caliphate of Hishām (reigned 105/724 to 125/743). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 483–84.

627. Abū Jamrah al-Ḍuba'ī died ca. 128/745. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 431–32.

628. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Makhlad, called Abū 'Āṣim al-Nabīl, lived from 122/740 to between 212 and 214/827–29. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 450–53; *EI*², Suppl., I, s.v. Abū 'Āṣim al-Nabīl.

629. Ibn Jurayj, 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, was born in 80/699 and died in 150 or 151/767–68. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 402–6; GAS, I, 91.

with you?" We had some of it with us. He sent one of the people to get it, and he ate some of it.

According to al-Wāqidī: It was called the expedition of al-Khabaṭ because they ate leaves beaten down from the trees (khabaṭ) until the linings of their mouths were like those of camels that have pastured on thorn trees.

Expeditions Involving Ibn Abī Ḥadrad and Abū Qatādah

In Sha'bān of this year[630] the Messenger of God sent out a party of men under the command of Abū Qatādah.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd al-Anṣārī[631]—Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm—'Abdallāh b. Abī Ḥadrad al-Aslamī, who said:[632] I married a woman from my tribe, promising her a nuptial gift (ṣadāq) of 200 dirhams. Then I came to the Messenger of God to seek his assistance with my marriage. He said, "How much did you set as the nuptial gift?" I said, "Two hundred dirhams, Messenger of God." "Praise God!" said he, "if you could take dirhams from a creek bed, you could not have gone higher! By God, I have nothing with which to help you."

I waited a few days. Then a man named Rifā'ah b. Qays or Qays b. Rifā'ah from the Banū Jusham b. Mu'āwiyah arrived with a large group from Jusham.[633] He encamped at al-Ghābah[634] with his tribesmen and companions, intending to gather [the tribe of] Qays to make war on the Messenger of God. He was a man of name and standing in [the tribe of] Jusham. The Messenger of God summoned me and two other Muslims and said, "Go out to this man and either bring him to us or bring us a report and information about him." He presented us with an emaciated old camel and mounted one of us on it. By God, it was so weak that it could not stand up with him until the men propped it up from behind with [1608]

630. Sha'bān of A.H. 8 began on 24 November 629.

631. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. Qays al-Anṣārī Abū Sa'īd, who died in 143/760, was a Medinan judge who later served under al-Manṣūr in al-Hāshimiyyah in Iraq. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 221–24; GAS, I, 407.

632. Parallels: W, II, 777–80; IH, IV, 629–31 (tr. Guillaume, 671–72).

633. The Banū Jusham were a division of the large tribe of Hawāzin. See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 99.

634. See note 73, above.

their hands, and then it raised itself, though barely. Then he said, "Make do with her, and take turns riding."

We set out, armed with arrows and swords. We approached the encampment at evening as the sun was setting. I hid myself in one place and commanded my two companions to hide themselves somewhere else near the men's encampment. I told them, "If you hear me shout 'God is greatest!' and attack the encampment, shout 'God is greatest!' and attack with me."

By God, we kept watching for some heedlessness on their part or some way to strike them until night fell over us and the time of the darkness of the night prayer passed. One of their herdsman who had gone out in the area in the morning was late coming back, so that they became worried about him. Their leader, Rifā'ah b. Qays, stood up, took his sword, put [its belt] on his neck, and said: "By God, I am going to follow the tracks of this herdsman of ours. Some evil must have befallen him." Some of his companions said: "By God, do not go. We will take care of it for you." He said, "By God, no one but I shall go." They said, "And we with you!" "By God," he said, "none of you shall follow me!" He set out and passed by me. When he came within range, I shot him with an arrow and put it into his heart. By God, he spoke not a word. I leaped at him and cut off his head. Then I rushed toward the encampment and shouted "God is great!" My two companions rushed and shouted "God is great!" In no time at all, those who were in the encampment were shouting "Save yourself!" and "Quick, quick!" and taking all they could—wives, children, and any property light enough to carry. We drove away a great herd of [1609] camels and many sheep and goats and brought them to the Messenger of God. I brought him Rifā'ah's head, which I carried with me. The Messenger of God gave me thirteen camels from that herd as aid, and I consummated my marriage.

As for al-Wāqidī, his account is as follows. According to al-Wāqidī—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Sahl b. Abī Ḥathmah—his father [Yaḥyā b. Sahl b. Abī Ḥathmah[635]]: The Prophet sent Ibn Abī Ḥadrad in this party with Abū Qatādah. The party consisted of sixteen men, and they were away fifteen nights. Their shares [of booty] were twelve camels [for each man], each camel being accounted equal to ten sheep or goats. When the people fled in various directions, they took four women, including one young woman who was very beautiful. She fell to Abū Qatādah. Then Maḥmiyah b. al-Jaz' spoke of her to the Messenger of God, and the Messenger of God asked Abū Qatādah about her. Abū Qatādah said, "I purchased her from the spoils." The Messenger of God said, "Give her to me." So he gave her to him, and the Messenger of God gave her to Maḥmiyah b. Jaz' al-Zubaydī.

635. Yaḥyā would be the son of Sahl b. Abī Ḥathmah, a companion of the Prophet, who died during the early part of Mu'āwiyah's reign (from 41/661 to 60/680). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 248–49.

In this year the Messenger of God sent Abū Qatādah with a company of men to raid the lowland of Iḍam.[636]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yazīd b. 'Abdallāh b. Qusayṭ—Abū al-Qa'qā' b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ḥadrad al-Aslamī [some authorities give the chain of transmission as Ibn al-Qa'qā'—his father—'Abdallāh b. Abī Ḥadrad],[637] who said: The Messenger of God sent us to Iḍam. I set out with a group of Muslims, including Abū Qatādah al-Ḥārith b. Rib'ī and Muḥallim b. Jaththāmah b. Qays al-Laythī. We set out and came to the lowland of Iḍam. This was before the conquest [of Mecca]. 'Āmir b. al- [1610]
Aḍbaṭ al-Ashja'ī passed us by on a young camel of his. He had a bit of food with him and a skin of sour milk. As he passed us, he greeted us with the greeting of Islam;[638] so we held back from him. But Muḥallim b. Jaththāmah attacked him because of some quarrel between them, killed him, and took his camel and food. When we returned to the Messenger of God and told him the story, the [following passage of] Qur'ān was revealed concerning us: "O believers, when you are journeying in the path of God, be discriminating"—and the rest of the verse.[639]

---

636. Parallels: W, II, 796–97; IH, IV, 397 and 626–29 [tr. Guillaume, 544, 669–71]. Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, I, 281, lists a number of places with the name, both in the Ḥijāz and Central Arabia. Iḍam is probably to be located at the present Wādī al-Ḥamḍ, which enters the Red Sea 50 kilometers south of al-Wajh in northwestern Arabia. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥamḍ, Wādī al-.

637. In the present recension of Ibn Hishām's Sīrah, the isnād reads: Yazīd b. 'Abdallāh b. Qusayṭ—al-Qa'qā' b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ḥadrad—his father 'Abdallāh.

638. I.e., al-salāmu 'alaykum, "Peace be upon you!"

639. Qur'ān 4:94, which continues: "and do not say to him who offers you a greeting, 'You are not a believer,' seeking the chance goods of the present life."

According to al-Wāqidī: The Messenger of God sent out this party only when he set out for the conquest of Mecca in the month of Ramaḍān.[640] They numbered eight men.

The Expedition to Mu'tah[641]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: After the Messenger of God returned to Medina from Khaybar, he stayed in Medina for the two months of Rabī'; then, in Jumādā I,[642] he sent out his expedition to Syria whose members met with disaster at Mu'tah.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr, who said: The Messenger of God sent his expedition to Mu'tah in Jumādā I of the year 8. He put Zayd b. Ḥārithah in command of the men and said, "If Zayd b. Ḥārithah is killed, Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib shall be in command of the men; if Ja'far is killed, 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah shall be in command." The men equipped themselves and made ready to set out. They numbered 3,000. When the time for their departure came, the people said goodbye to the commanders of the Messenger of God, wishing them safety and bidding them farewell. When 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah said goodbye with the other [1611] commanders of the Messenger of God who were doing so, he wept. They said to him, "What is making you weep, Ibn Rawāḥah?" He said, "By God, I have no love of this world or excessive love for you, but I heard the Messenger of God recite a verse from the Book of God that mentioned the Fire [of Hell]—'Not one of you there is, but he shall go down to it; that for thy Lord is a thing decreed, determined'[643]—and I do not know how I can come out after going down." The Muslims said, "May God accompany you, defend

640. Ramaḍān of A.H. 8 began on 23 December 629.

641. Parallels: W, II, 755–69; IH, IV, 373–89 (tr. Guillaume, 531–40). Mu'tah is a village in the area known as al-Balqā' (Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VIII, 190). The modern town of Mu'tah, Jordan, about 10 km south of Karak and 20 km east of the southern end of the Dead Sea, is on the site. See *EI*², s.v. Mu'ta, for a bibliography of the Arabic and Byzantine sources.

642. I.e., he remained in Medina from about 29 June to 26 August, dispatching the expedition to Mu'tah in the month that began on 27 August 629.

643. Qur'ān 19:71.

you, and bring you back to us in good health." Then 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah recited:[644]

But I ask the Merciful One for pardon, and for a sword blow that makes a wide wound that shoots out foaming [blood];
Or a deadly thrust by a thirsty one,
by a lance that pierces right through the guts and the liver;
So that people shall say, when they pass my grave:
"God guided you aright, O warrior who followed the right way."

Then the men made ready to depart. 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah went to the Messenger of God and said goodbye to him. The men set out, and the Messenger of God went out to see them off; having bidden them farewell, he returned from them. 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah recited:[645]

May [He who is] Peace supply the place [of the departing ones] to a man to whom I bade farewell among the palm trees—the best escort and friend!

They journeyed on and encamped at Mu'ān[646] in the land of Syria. The men learned that Heraclius had encamped with 100,000 Byzantines at Ma'āb[647] in the territory of al-Balqā'. Joined to him were Arab auxiliaries from [the tribes of] Lakhm, Judhām, Balqayn, Bahrā', and Balī, numbering 100,000 and commanded by a man from [the tribe of] Balī and of the subdivision Irāshah, named Mālik b. Rāfilah.[648] When the Muslims received word of

644. Other sources, variants, and commentary on the poem may be found in the Dīwān of 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah, 88.

645. For variants and commentary see Dīwān of 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah, 100. The line is a prayer that God (here paradoxically addressed by his name al-Salām, Peace) may supply the place of the departing men. The opening formula is a variant on a common formula of consolation for the loss of a relative—khalafa Allāhu 'alayka ("may God supply the place [of the one you have lost]"). See Lane, Lexicon, II, 792.

646. The name is also given as Ma'ān, which is the form used for the city in modern Jordan that perpetuates the name.

647. This is the ancient town of Rabbath Moab, now al-Rabbah, a dozen kilometers north of Karak in Jordan. See Le Strange, Palestine under the Moslems, 494–95, 509–10; Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VII, 249–50; *EI*², VII, s.v. Mu'ta.

648. Ibn Hishām: Zāfilah.

[1612] this, they stayed at Mu'ān two nights, considering what to do. They said: "We will write to the Messenger of God and inform him of the number of our enemy. Either he will reinforce us with men or he will give us his command that we should return to him." 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah encouraged the men, saying: "Men, by God, what you loathe is the very thing you came out to seek—martyrdom. We do not fight the enemy by number, strength, or multitude; we fight them only by this religion with which God has honored us. Go forward, for it is one of two good things: victory or martyrdom." The men said, "By God, Ibn Rawāḥah has spoken the truth." So the men went forward. Concerning how they held back, 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah recited the following verses:[649]

We urged our horses on from the fortresses of Qurḥ,[650] their packs crammed with grass.
Because of the flintstone we shod them with hide as slippery as if its surface were leather.[651]
They stayed two nights at Mu'ān, and energy replaced their fatigue.
Then we went forth with steeds given free rein,[652]
the simoom breathing in their nostrils.
No, by my father! Ma'āb—we will come to it though Arabs and Romans be in it.
We set their reins in order, and they came grim-faced, the dust being a second color for them,[653]

649. The poem, with significant variants, occurs in IH, IV, 375–76 (tr. Guillaume, 533) and in later texts. See Dīwān of 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah, 102–4.

650. Qurḥ was a market town in Wādī al-Qurā, the valley stretching north of Medina toward Syria. The verse is quoted in Yāqūt's article on Qurḥ (Mu'jam al-buldān, VII, 48–49). Ibn Hishām's text reads: "We urged on our horses from Aja' and Far'"—two mountains in the territory of the tribe of Ṭayyi'.

651. The line was obscure to the commentators. On journeys over stony ground the Arabs normally "shod" their camels and horses with protective "boots" of leather.

652. Arabic musawwam has a variety of meanings: pastured, sent forth, or marked (with brands or distinguishing colors).

653. The commentator suggests that the color of dust mixed with the color of their coats, forming a pattern that looked like barīm, a two-colored rope used by women as an ornament. Perhaps the meaning is less specific and refers to patches of dust covering the coats of the horses and making them appear dappled. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 195.

Bearing a clamorous [army]: as if the helmets in it, [1613] when their tops became apparent, were the stars.
A life of ease and contentment
our spears have divorced, to marry or remain unmarried.

Then the people proceeded on their way.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr—Zayd b. Arqam, who said: I was an orphan under the care and protection of 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah. He set out on that journey of his, mounting me behind him on the back of his camel saddle. By God, as he traveled by night, I heard him recite these verses of his:[654]

When you have delivered me and carried my saddle
a four-day's journey after al-Ḥisā',[655]
May yours be an easy life, and may blame pass away from you—
and may I not return to my family behind me.
May the Muslims come and leave me in the land of Syria, where I desire to remain.
May you be led back by men who, having close relationship to the Merciful One, are cut off from kindred.
There I shall care neither for the spathes of rain-watered palms nor for palm trees whose roots are irrigated.

When I heard him recite the verses, I wept. He tapped me with the whip and said: "What's wrong, little fellow? God is going to reward me with martyrdom, and you are going back between the two horns of the camel saddle!" Then 'Abdallāh said in one of his poems in rajaz meter:[656]

O Zayd, Zayd of the swift, lean camels,[657] [1614] the night has become protracted; so dismount—may you be guided!

---

654. For other sources of the poem, variants, and commentary, see Dīwān of 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah, 79–80. The verses are addressed to his riding camel.

655. Al-Ḥisā', meaning "a flow of water that disappears under the sand but can be reached by digging," is modern Wādī al-Ḥasā at the southern end of the Dead Sea; cf. Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, III, 274–75, quoting this verse.

656. Text and discussion in Dīwān of 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah, 99–100.

657. The editor of the Dīwān explains this as a compliment—i.e., Zayd who knows how to take care of such camels.

The men journeyed on. When they were within the boundaries of al-Balqā',[658] they were met by Heraclius' armies of Romans and Arabs at a village of al-Balqā' called Mashārif. When the enemy drew near, the Muslims withdrew to a village called Mu'tah, and the two sides encountered each other there. The Muslims disposed their forces: in command of their right wing they set a man from the Banū 'Udhrah named Quṭbah b. Qatādah; in command of their left wing they set a man from the Anṣār named 'Abāyah[659] b. Mālik. The two sides met and fought. Zayd b. Ḥārithah fought with the banner of the Messenger of God until he perished among the enemy's javelins. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib took up the banner and fought with it. When the fighting forced him into difficulties from which he could not extricate himself, he leaped from his sorrel mare, hamstrung it, and fought the enemy until he was killed. Ja'far was the first Muslim to hamstring his horse in the time of Islam.[660]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah and Abū Tumaylah[661]—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. 'Abbād—his father ['Abbād b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr]—his foster-father, who was from the Banū Murrah b. 'Awf and went on the expedition to Mu'tah and who said: By God, it is as if I could still see Ja'far when he leaped from his sorrel mare, hamstrung her, and fought the enemy until he was killed. When Ja'far was killed, 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah took up the banner and advanced with it on horseback. He kept urging his soul to obey. He hesitated a bit, and then he said:[662]

I swear, soul, that you shall become obedient willingly, or you shall be compelled.
[1615] If men raise a clamor and utter cries, why do I see you averse to Paradise?
Too long have you been at ease!

---

658. Al-Balqā' is the old Arabic name for most of modern Jordan, roughly the plateau between Wādī al-Zarqā' (or Jabbok) in the north to Wādī al-Mūjib (or Arnon) in the south. In Byzantine times, the Arnon formed the boundary between the province of Arabia and Palestina Tertia. See *EI*², s.v. al-Balḳā'.

659. Ibn Hishām notes that the name is also given as 'Ubādah.

660. See note 93, above.

661. For Abū Tumaylah Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 293–94.

662. For other sources of the poem, variants, and commentary, see Dīwān of 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah, 108–9.

Are you anything but a drop of moisture in an old water skin?

He also said:[663]

My soul, unless you are killed, you will die:
this is the destiny of death by which you have been tried.
You have been granted what you wished:
If you act as those two did, you will have been guided aright.[664]

Then he dismounted. When he had dismounted, a cousin of his brought him a joint of meat, saying, "Strengthen yourself with it, for you have endured much in these days." Having taken it from the cousin's hand, he took a bite of it. Then he heard the rushing of the troops. "And you are [still] in this world!" he said—and he threw the meat away. Then he took up his sword, advanced, and fought until he was killed. Thābit b. Aqram, of the Banū al-'Ajlān,[665] then took up the banner. He said, "O Muslims, agree on a man from among yourselves!" They said, "You!" He said, "I cannot do it." So the people agreed on Khālid b. al-Walīd. When he [1616] took the banner, he fended off the enemy and tried to deflect them.[666] Then he withdrew and there was a withdrawal [by the enemy] from him, so that he got away with his forces.

According to al-Qāsim b. Bishr b. Ma'rūf[667]—Sulaymān b. Ḥarb[668]—al-Aswad b. Shaybān[669]—Khālid b. Sumayr,[670] who 663. Ibid., 87 (with additional verses).

664. The reference is to Zayd b. Ḥārithah and Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib, who died carrying the Prophet's banner.

665. The name is also given as Thābit b. Arqam. The Banū al-'Ajlān (here abbreviated as Bal'ajlān) were a subdivision of Balī.

666. The textual witnesses are evenly divided between ḥāshā, "he tried to divert," and khāshā, "he was cautious or wary" of them (and therefore turned away and withdrew); see ed. Leiden note ad loc.

667. For al-Qāsim b. Bishr [b. Aḥmad] b. Ma'rūf see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 308.

668. Sulaymān b. Ḥarb b. Bujayl al-Azdī al-Wāshiḥī Abū Ayyūb was born in 140/757–58. Of Baṣran origin, he served as judge in Mecca, then returned to al-Baṣrah, where he died in 224/839. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 178–80.

669. Al-Aswad b. Shaybān al-Sadūsī al-Baṣrī Abū Shaybān died in 165/781–82. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 339–40.

670. Khālid b. Sumayr (or Shumayr) al-Sadūsī al-Baṣrī is listed without dates in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 97.

said: 'Abdallāh b. Rabāḥ al-Anṣārī,[671] whom the Anṣār had instructed [in religious matters], once arrived in our midst. The people came to him, and he said that he had received a report from Abū Qatādah, the horseman of the Messenger of God, who said: The Messenger of God sent out the Army of Commanders[672] and said, "Your commander is Zayd b. Ḥārithah; if he is killed, it is Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib; and if Ja'far is killed, it is 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah." Ja'far jumped up and said, "Messenger of God, I will not go if you appoint Zayd commander over me." "Go," he replied, "for you do not know what is best."

So they set out. After they had been away for some time, the Messenger of God ascended the pulpit. He ordered that the call to congregational prayer should be given, and the people gathered to hear the Messenger of God. He said: "A gate to good fortune! A gate to good fortune! A gate to good fortune! I bring you news of your campaigning army. They have set out and have met the enemy. Zayd has died a martyr's death"—he prayed for forgiveness for him. "Then Ja'far took up the banner and attacked the enemy until he died a martyr's death"—he testified that he had attained martyrdom and prayed for forgiveness for him. "Then 'Abdallāh b. Rawāḥah took up the banner and planted his legs firmly until he died a martyr's death"—he prayed for forgiveness for him. "Then Khālid b. al-Walīd took up the banner: he was not one of the commanders, but he showed himself to be a real commander." Then the Messenger of God said, "O God, he is one of Thy swords, [1617] and Thou wilt aid him." From that day on, Khālid was named "the Sword of God." Then the Messenger of God said: "Hasten to reinforce your brothers! Let none of you hang back." So they went forth to fight both on foot and mounted. It was in a time of extreme heat.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr, who said: When the Messenger of God received word of the death of Ja'far, he said, "Last night Ja'far, with two wings whose forefeathers were stained with blood, passed by among a 671. 'Abdallāh b. Rabāḥ al-Anṣārī Abū Khālid, of Medinese origin, moved to al-Baṣrah. He died ca. 90/708–9. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 206–7.

672. Jaysh al-umarā': apparently a title given to the Mu'tah expedition because of the presence of close relatives of Muḥammad appointed as commanders.

band of angels, all of them headed for Bīshah." [Bīshah is] a place in Yemen.[673]

Quṭbah b. Qatādah al-'Udhrī, the commander of the Muslims' right wing, attacked Mālik b. Rāfilah, the commander of the Arab auxiliaries, and killed him.

A woman soothsayer[674] from Ḥadas, having heard of the approach of the army of the Messenger of God, said to her people, who were a clan of Ḥadas known as the Banū Ghanm:[675] "I warn you of a folk with narrow eyes, who look askance, who lead horses whose tails have been cut off, and who spill blood copiously." They heeded her words and separated from the rest of Lakhm. Afterward, they remained the wealthiest [clan] of the Ḥadas. Those who felt the heat of battle that day were the Banū Tha'labah clan of Ḥadas, and afterward they remained few in number.

After Khālid b. al-Walīd withdrew with the men, he returned, bringing them back.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr, who said: When they were about to enter Medina, the Messenger of God and [1618] the Muslims met them. The young boys ran to meet them, and the Messenger of God came with the men on a mount. "Take up the boys," he said, "and have them ride. Give me Ja'far's son." 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far was brought, and the Messenger of God took him and mounted him in front of him.

The people began to throw dust at the army, saying, "Fleers in the way of God!" But the Messenger of God said: "They are not fleers. God willing, they are ones who will turn to fight again."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr—'Āmir b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr[676]—some

673. Bīshah is located at the junction of the routes from al-Ṭā'if and al-Riyāḍ to Abhā, Najrān, and southwest Arabia. See *EI*², s.v. Bīsha.

674. Arabic: kāhinah. See *EI*², s.v. Kāhin.

675. Ḥadas was a section of the tribe of Lakhm settled in Byzantine Syria. The woman's words that follow are in rhymed prose (saj'), which is typically used for such mantic utterances.

676. 'Āmir b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām al-Asadī Abū al-Ḥārith transmitted ḥadīth from his father and from his maternal uncle Abū Bakr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Hishām (his mother was Ḥantamah bt. 'Abd al-Raḥmān). He died about the same time as the caliph Hishām in 125/742–43. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 74.

members of the family of al-Ḥārith b. Hishām[677] [namely, his maternal uncles]—Umm Salamah, the wife of the Prophet: Umm Salamah said to the wife of Salamah b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah,[678] "Why don't I see Salamah attending worship with the Messenger of God and with the Muslims?" "By God," she replied, "he cannot leave the house! Every time he goes out, people shout, 'Did you flee in the way of God?' So he has stayed in his house and does not go out."

In this year the Messenger of God went on expedition against the people of Mecca.

The Conquest of Mecca[679]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: After sending his expedition to Mu'tah, the Messenger of God stayed in Medina during Jumādā II and Rajab.[680] Then the Banū Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah assaulted [the tribe of] Khuzā'ah while the latter were at a watering place called al-Watīr belonging to Khuzā'ah
[1619] in Lower Mecca. The cause of the strife between the Banū Bakr and the Banū Khuzā'ah was a man from the Banū al-Ḥaḍramī named Mālik b. 'Abbād. This man of the Banū al-Ḥaḍramī had a covenant of protection at that time with al-Aswad b. Razn.[681] Mālik set out on a journey as a merchant. When he was in the middle of Khuzā'ah territory, the Khuzā'ah assaulted him, killed him, and took his property. The Banū Bakr therefore attacked and killed a man from Khuzā'ah. Just before Islam, the Khuzā'ah in turn assaulted Salmā, Kulthūm, and Dhu'ayb, the sons of al-Aswad b. Razn al-Dīlī—they were the leading men and dignitaries

677. Al-Ḥārith b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī, a member of an important Meccan family, fought on the pagan side at the battles of Badr and Uḥud. He was the nephew of the Prophet's wife Umm Salamah bt. al-Mughīrah and became a Muslim at the time of the conquest of Mecca.

678. I.e., to her nephew's wife. Umm Salamah was the daughter of al-Mughīrah.

679. Parallels: W, II, 780–871; III, 873–75; IH, IV, 389–428 (tr. Guillaume, 540–61).

680. I.e., from 26 September (the beginning of Jumādā II) to 23 November 629 (the end of Rajab).

681. I.e., with one of the chiefs of Kinānah, al-Aswad b. Razn al-Dīlī, the Banū al-Dīl being a part of the Banū Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah.

of the Banū Bakr—and killed them at 'Arafah, by the border markers of the sacred territory.[682]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—a man from the Banū al-Dīl, who said: In pagan times two payments of blood money would be paid for each of the sons of al-Aswad, while a single payment of blood money would be paid for us; and that because of their excellence [compared with us].[683]

Matters stood thus between the Banū Bakr and Khuzā'ah when Islam intervened to separate them and occupy people's minds. When the peace of al-Ḥudaybiyah was concluded between the Messenger of God and Quraysh (this information is according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Muslim b. 'Abdallāh b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—al-Miswar b. Makhramah, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, and other learned men of ours), among the terms they imposed on the Messenger of God and that he granted to them was that whoever wanted to enter into a treaty and pact with the Messenger of God [1620] might do so, and whoever wanted to enter into a treaty and pact with Quraysh might do so. The Banū Bakr entered into a pact with Quraysh, and Khuzā'ah entered into a pact with the Messenger of God.

The truce having been concluded, the Banū al-Dīl of the Banū Bakr took advantage of it against Khuzā'ah. To retaliate for the sons of al-Aswad b. Razn they wanted to kill the persons from Khuzā'ah who had killed their men. Nawfal b. Mu'āwiyah al-Dīlī set out with the Banū al-Dīl (at that time he was leader of the Banū al-Dīl, though not all the Banū Bakr followed him). He made a night raid on Khuzā'ah while the latter were at their watering place of al-Watīr, and they killed a man [of the Khuzā'ah]. They tried to drive each other away and fought. Quraysh aided the Banū Bakr with weapons, and some members of Quraysh fought on their side under cover of darkness until they drove Khuzā'ah into the sacred territory.

According to al-Wāqidī: Among the members of Quraysh who helped the Banū Bakr against Khuzā'ah that night, concealing 682. Mecca is surrounded by a sacred territory (ḥaram) in which killing is prohibited. The murderers killed their victims just outside this territory.

683. The addition is from Ibn Hishām.

their identity, were Ṣafwān b. Umayyah, 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl, Suhayl b. 'Amr, and others, along with their slaves.

Resumption of the account of Ibn Isḥāq, who said: When they reached the sacred territory, the Banū Bakr said: "Nawfal, we have entered the sacred territory. Be mindful of your God! Be mindful of your God!" To which he replied blasphemously: "Today he has no God![684] Banū Bakr, take your revenge! By my life, you steal in the sacred territory; will you not take your revenge in it?"

The night that the Banū Bakr attacked the Khuzā'ah at al-Watīr, they killed a man of Khuzā'ah named Munabbih. Munabbih was a man with a weak heart. He had gone out with a tribesman of his [1621] named Tamīm b. Asad. Munabbih said to him: "Tamīm, save yourself! As for me, by God, I am a dead man whether they kill me or spare me, for my heart has ceased beating." Tamīm ran away and escaped; Munabbih they caught and killed. When the Khuzā'ah entered Mecca, they took refuge in the house of Budayl b. Warqā' al-Khuzā'ī and the house of one of their mawlās named Rāfi'.

When Quraysh leagued together [with the Banū Bakr][685] against Khuzā'ah and killed some of their men, breaking the treaty and covenant that existed between them and the Messenger of God by violating the Khuzā'ah, who had a pact and treaty with him, 'Amr b. Sālim al-Khuzā'ī, one of the Banū Ka'b,[686] went to the Messenger of God in Medina. This was one of the things that prompted the conquest of Mecca. 'Amr stood before the Messenger of God while he was in the mosque sitting among the people, and he recited:

O God, I will remind Muḥammad of the venerable alliance of our father and his father.
Parent were we, and you were child;[687]

---

684. I.e., "Today I have no God," referring to himself in the third person, as is frequent in oaths; see ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CXXI.

685. Addition from IH, IV, 394.

686. The Banū Ka'b b. 'Amr were a subdivision of Khuzā'ah.

687. Cf. the variant in IH, IV, 394: "You were progeny, and we were parent." According to the note in IH, ad loc., this refers to the fact that the mother of the Banū 'Abd Manāf (which included the Prophet's clan of the Banū Hāshim and the clans of 'Abd Shams, al-Muṭṭalib, and Nawfal) was a woman from Khuzā'ah. Quṣayy, the father of 'Abd Manāf, likewise had a mother from the Khuzā'ah. For then we became Muslims and did not withdraw our hand.

Help, Messenger of God, with ready help!
Summon God's worshipers to come with assistance!
Among them the Messenger of God has come forth [1622] bright as the full moon—waxing, ascending.
If he is wronged, his face takes on a dusky hue, among an army huge like the sea that runs foaming.
Quraysh have violated the promise to you;
they have broken the solemn covenant with you.
They have set a watch for me at Kadā'[688] and have said that I can call on no one.
Most contemptible are they and fewest in number.
They attacked us at al-Watīr while we were praying at night,
Killing many of us while we were bowing and prostrating ourselves.

[By this he was saying that they had killed them after they had become Muslims.] When the Messenger of God heard this, he said, "You have received help, 'Amr b. Sālim!" Then a cloud appeared to the Messenger of God in the sky, and he said, "This cloud signals the beginning of help for the Banū Ka'b."

Then Budayl b. Warqā' set out with a group of men from Khuzā'ah. They came to the Messenger of God in Medina and told him what had befallen them and how Quraysh had backed the Banū Bakr against them; then they departed to return to Mecca. The Messenger of God had told them, "I think you will see Abū Sufyān come to strengthen the pact and extend the term." As Budayl b. Warqā' and his companions traveled, they met Abū Sufyān at 'Usfān: Quraysh had sent him to the Messenger of God to strengthen the pact and extend the term, for they had become fearful of what they had done. When Abū Sufyān met Budayl, he said, "Where have you come from, Budayl?"—for he guessed that [1623] he had gone to the Messenger of God. Budayl said, "I traveled with the Khuzā'ah along this shore and along the bottom of this val-wālid as referring either to a male or female parent [the latter without the feminine termination], see Lane, Lexicon, VIII, 2967, s.v.

---

688. Kadā' is a mountain overlooking Mecca from the north; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VII, 220.

ley." Abū Sufyān asked, "Didn't you go to Muḥammad?" "No," he replied.

When Budayl set out for Mecca, Abū Sufyān said, "If in fact he went to Medina, he will have fed his camel date pits there." So he went to the place where his camel had rested, picked up some of its droppings, crumbled them, and saw date pits in them. "I swear by God," he said, "Budayl went to Muḥammad!"

Abū Sufyān then set out and went to the Messenger of God in Medina. Abū Sufyān [first] visited his own daughter, Umm Ḥabībah bt. Abī Sufyān.[689] When he was about to sit on the bed of the Messenger of God, she folded it up to stop him. He said, "My daughter, by God, I don't know whether you think I am too good for this bed or you think it is too good for me." She said: "It is the bed of the Messenger of God, and you are an unclean polytheist. I did not want you to sit on the bed of the Messenger of God." He said, "My daughter, by God, evil came over you after you left me."

Then he went out and came to the Messenger of God. He spoke to him, but the Messenger of God gave him no reply. Then he went to Abū Bakr and asked him to speak to the Messenger of God for him, but Abū Bakr said, "I will not do it." Then he went to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and spoke to him. 'Umar said: "I intercede for you with the Messenger of God! By God, if I found only ant grubs [to eat], I would fight you!" Abū Sufyān then left and went to see 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Messenger of God, was with him, and with her was al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī, a young child crawling before her. Abū Sufyān said: "'Alī, you are the nearest of the men to me in kinship and the closest of them in relationship. I [1624] have come with a request, and I will not go back empty-handed as I came. Intercede for us with the Messenger of God!" He said: "Woe to you, Abū Sufyān. By God, the Messenger of God has determined on a matter about which we cannot speak to him." Abū Sufyān then turned to Fāṭimah and said, "Daughter of Muḥammad, don't you want to command your little son here to make peace among the people,[690] so that he will be lord of the

689. Cf. the account of her marriage to Muḥammad at pp. 109–10, above.

690. The sense of the passage depends on the fact that Arabic yujīru bayna al-nās, means literally, "extend protection among the people (so that neither side commits aggression against the other)" but also has the extended sense of "procure Arabs forever?" "By God," she said, "my little son is not old enough to make peace among the people, and no one can do so against the will of the Messenger of God." Abū Sufyān said [addressing 'Alī]: "Abū al-Ḥasan, I see that matters have become difficult for me. Give me advice!" 'Alī said to him: "By God, I know of nothing that will be of any use to you. However, since you are the lord of the Banū Kinānah, go and make peace among the people, and then return to your country." Abū Sufyān asked, "Do you think that will be of any use to me?" "No, by God," replied 'Alī, "I do not think so, but I can find nothing else for you to do." So Abū Sufyān stood up in the mosque and said, "People, I hereby make peace among the people." Then he mounted his camel and departed.

When Abū Sufyān came to Quraysh, they asked, "What is your news?" He said: "I went to Muḥammad and spoke to him; and, by God, he gave me no reply. Then I went to Ibn Abī Quḥāfah and got nothing good from him. Then I went to Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, whom I found to be the most hostile of them. Then I went to 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, whom I found to be the mildest of them. He advised me to do something that I have done, but, by God, I do not know whether it will be of any use to me or not." They asked, "What did he command you?" He replied, "He commanded me to make peace among the people, and I did it." They asked, "Has Muḥammad approved it?" "No," he said. "Woe to you!" they said. "By God, he did no more than play with you. What you have said is of no use to us." Abū Sufyān replied, "No, by God, I found nothing else to do."

The Messenger of God commanded the people to prepare for travel, and he commanded his family to make his travel preparations. Abū Bakr visited his daughter 'Ā'ishah while she was moving some of the travel gear of the Messenger of God. "Daughter," asked Abū Bakr, "has the Messenger of God commanded you to make preparations for him to travel?" "Yes," she said, "so make yourself ready to travel!" "Where," he asked, "do you think he intends to go?" She said, "By God, I do not know." [1625] or mediate peace"—see ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CLXXV; Lane, Lexicon, II, 483; *EI*², s.v. Djiwār.

---

Then the Messenger of God informed the people that he would travel to Mecca. He commanded them to prepare themselves quickly, and he said, "O God, keep spies and news from Quraysh until we take them by surprise in their territory." So the people made preparations for travel. Ḥassān b. Thābit al-Anṣārī composed the following verses to rouse the people, mentioning the killing of the men of Khuzā'ah.[691]

I received word, though I was not present, that in the plain of Mecca are men of the Banū Ka'b whose necks were cut
At the hands of men who did not unsheathe their swords, and [there were] many slain men whose graveclothes were not hidden [in earth].[692]
Would that I knew whether my help [to Khuzā'ah] will harm Suhayl b. 'Amr—with its heat and its punishment—
And Ṣafwān, an old camel the edge of whose anus has been cut.
For this is the time for war—its milking girth has been firmly tied.[693]
You will not be safe from us, son of Umm Mujālid, when it is milked, yielding pure milk, and its teeth become strong.
[1626] So do not become impatient with it! Our swords have a fall the gate of which opens to reveal death.

Ḥassān's words, "at the hands of men who did not unsheathe their swords," refer to Quraysh; "son of Umm Mujālid" refers to 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr and others of our scholars, who said: When the Messenger of God had decided to go to Mecca, Ḥāṭib b. Abī Balta'ah wrote a letter to 691. For variant readings, one additional verse, and comment, see Dīwān of Ḥassān b. Thābit, I, 296–97, and II, 218.

692. I.e., they were killed indirectly by Quraysh, who, although they did not draw their own swords, aided the Banū Bakr. The second part of the verse refers to the dead who remained unburied.

693. The metaphor is complex: the 'iṣāb is a cord used to tie the leg of the camel during milking. War is not only compared to a camel (a common metaphor) but to a camel ready to be milked, so that war (the death-bringer) is compared paradoxically to milk (the sustainer of life).

Quraysh informing them of the decision of the Messenger of God to go to them, and he gave the letter to a woman. (Muḥammad b. Ja'far alleged she was from [the tribe of] Muzaynah; others asserted that she was Sārah, a mawlāh of one of the sons of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib.) He paid her to deliver it to Quraysh. She put it on her head, twisted the hair on the sides of her head over it, and set out carrying it. But word of what Ḥāṭib had done came to the Messenger of God from heaven, and he sent out 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām, saying, "Overtake a woman with whom Ḥāṭib has sent a letter to Quraysh warning them of what we have decided about them." The two went out and overtook her at al-Ḥulayfah, al-Ḥulayfah of Ibn Abī Aḥmad.[694] They made her dismount and searched her saddle, but found nothing. 'Alī b. Abī [1627] Ṭālib said to her: "I swear that the Messenger of God did not lie, nor have we lied. You shall produce this letter to me, or we will strip you." When she saw that he was serious, she said, "Turn away from me." He turned away from her, and she untied the sidelocks of her head, took out the letter, and handed it to him. He brought it to the Messenger of God.

